These Preparations engaged many factions People to design against the Government, inso-much, that on the Evening of that Day, wherein Colonel Howard presented the above-mentioned Address to the General, Colonel Lambert having made an Escape out of the Tower, was conceal'd by some of that Party that had been lately engaged against General Monk, and some others of fanatick Principles: These held a Council in London, but were not so private in their Consultations, but the General had from time to time Intimation of much of their Proceedings. They sent some busy Men to all the Regiments in England, and those Officers that refus'd the Address, had intic'd many of the Troopers to steal after them: but such was the Vigilance of the rest of the Officers, that there got not above seven or eight Troops of Horse in a Body to join with Lambert, and but one Company of Foot.

On Wednesday the 18th of April, the General, upon Advice from Colonel Streater, of Lambert's hovering in the North Parts, and of the want of Horse in his Quarters, sent for Colonel Ingoldsby to him, and told him, He must be at Northampton with his Regiment on the Saturday following; and that he should receive Orders to take any of Colonel Roffiter's Troops to his Assistance, which quartered in those Parts: He also told him, That Colonel Streater, a Person whom he could trust, was with some of his Companies at Northampton, whom he would find ready to join with him. The Colonel told him, That his Regiment was dispersed in Norfolk and Suffolk, but he would do his Endeavours to get them together. And he was so diligent herein, that by the Friday following he got his Regiment to Cambridge, and on Saturday in the Evening to Northampton.

The General also sent Colonel Howard with his Regiment, and some other select Troops, towards Worcestershire and Warwickshire, to hinder any Defection of the Troops in those Parts, and to have an Eye towards Coventry, which Lambert had a Design to Garrison; and indeed he had done it, had not the Care of the General prevented it, by ordering three Companies of Colonel Streater's Regiment to Quarter in that City:

The Colonel also sending one Company more to strengthen that Place, who in their March met with a Party of Horse, among whom was one who having been Major to that Regiment, shew'd them Lambert's Orders to march back again: But the Lieutenant that was intrusted with the Command of that Company, observing the Colonel's Orders, marched intire with great Speed, stood upon his Defence, and opposed them twice in his March thither.

The Council of State by Proclamation, declared Lambert and his Adherents Traitors, and the General was careful the very next Day after his getting out of Prison, to give Notice of it to all the Regiments and Troops, to prevent his Design of seducing them, and to command them to seize on him: By which Diligence, and the sending these Parties out, his Confederates were interrupted in their Endeavours. One Merry, a disbanded discontented Officer of Col. Smithson's Regiment, had inticed forty of Captain Peverel's Troop to revolt, with Design to seize on York, but by the Care of other Troops they were dissipated; and one Everard, and Captain Lockier, two discontented Officers that had been lately in Custody, and released upon their Engagement, not to act any thing in Disturbance of the publick Peace, did nevertheless march thro' Nottingham, with a seditious Troop of their Companions.

Whereof Captain Sherman of Colonel Saunders's Regiment having Notice, drew out his own Troop, and that of Captain Craddock's of Hacker's Regiment, to engage them; but immediately Craddock's Troop joined with the Enemy, which made Sherman, (finding himself too weak for them) to retreat to Nottingham, to secure that Place, where the Mayor, Aldermen, and Gentry, gave him ready Assistance. This News made the General give Orders, that the late Address signed by the Officers, should be tendered to all the private Soldiers also, which made so thorough a Reformation, that in many Regiments thirty of a Troop disbanded, rather than they would consent to it; and many in the Foot Companies also left their Arms: But in all the General's Regiments in London, that marched with him from Scotland, there were but two Dissenters.

On Easter-Eve, Colonel Ingoldsby joined with Colonel Streater at Northampton, where he was at that Time, and had been some Days before: The Earl of Exeter, who with several Loyal Gentlemen of that County, to the Number of near one hundred Horse, with much Resolution offered to assist Colonel Streater: Likewise the Trained-Bands of that Town were in Arms at the same time, in order to the securing thereof, in a Case of Necessity of Colonel Streater's attending Lambert's Motion: The Colonel purposing that Night, if Need had been, to have mounted four hundred Foot of his Regiment, with the Horses that came into the Town that Day (against the Fair on Monday following) and to have beaten up Lambert's Quarters.

On Easter-Day early Intelligence was brought to Colonel Ingoldsby and Colonel Streater, that Lambert was at Darventry; upon which they marched towards him: When they came to Darventry, they heard Lambert was marched two Miles from thence, and therefore hastened to meet him; which they did in a plain Field, where a little Brook parted them. Lambert had with him besides the Troops of Horse before-mentioned, these

Two more Regiments sent to Scotland.

All disaffected Officers displaced, and others put in their Rooms.

Lambert escapes out of the Tower.

The General takes great Care for the suppressing of Lambert's.

Col. Ingoldsby and Col. Streater march against Lambert's.

1659. these Persons, viz. Colonel Okey, Colonel Axtel, Colonel Cobbet, Lieutenant-Colonel Young, Major Creed, Captain Timothy Clare, Captain Gregory, Captain Spinage, besides divers private Soldiers, who were Anabaptists.

The two Parties fac'd one the other near four Hours, during which time, Colonel Ingoldsby, and Colonel Streater, spent their time, partly in their vigilant Observation of the Intention of the Enemy, and partly in encouraging of the Horse and Foot under their Command, whereby they begot a more than ordinary Resolution in both Horse and Foot: In the mean time, Lambert sent out several Scouts towards them; but Ingoldsby would not permit any of his to leave their Ranks, only he himself riding up towards them, had many Discourses with them: Ingoldsby was not known to the Scouts, but appearing to them as a private Soldier, dealt so effectually with them, by laying open the Danger of their Action, that twenty five Troopers, with a Quarter-Master, came over to him. The Colonel dismounted and disarmed them for the present, because they were unwilling to engage in his Party, but afterwards restored their Horses and Arms to them.

Lambert's delay in engaging being observed by Col. Streater, he advised that both Horse and Foot should immediately advance, and put the Business to an Issue, out of the Confidence he had of the Foot especially: And withal desired Col. Ingoldsby, That if he should be routed, he would rally with what Speed he could; for that he should be confident to find the Foot to maintain their Ground. Colonel Streater's Foot being about five hundred; two compleat Companies, the rest commanded Men out of Several Companies, most Pikes, which in that Champion Ground would serve well to secure the Body against the Horse.

When the two Bodies came near, just as Col. Ingoldsby was going to charge, Colonel Streater commanded six Files of Musqueteers to advance, one File gave Fire and hurt one or two of Lambert's Horse; his Drums beat, and in good Order he advanced, having given strict Command that his Musqueteers should not fire till they came as near as push of Pike. But Lambert's Men held the Noses of their Pistols towards the Ground, and Nelthrop's Troop came off to Ingoldsby; Haslerig's Troop having deserted him before; for Colonel Ingoldsby sending Captain Elsmore before him with a Party, as he marched to find Lambert, met Captain Haslerig, and took him Prisoner; but releas'd him upon his Parole, to send his whole Troop over to join with Ingoldsby, which he faithfully perform'd, sending it to them by his Quarter-Master, but retired himself: Colonel Ingoldsby told Lambert, He was his Prisoner: Whereupon Creed and the rest earnestly intreated him, to do what he pleased with them, but to permit Lambert to escape; acquainting him, That his Life could be of no Advantage to him, which Ingoldsby absolutely refused, telling them, He would not be treacherous to those that had commanded him by such an ungenerous Act: Lambert then turned about his Horse, and attempted to escape, but Ingoldsby pursued him so close, that he came quickly up to him, and vow'd to Pistol him, if he did not immediately yield. Lambert in great Depression of Spirit, twice pray'd him to let him escape; but when he saw he could not prevail, submitted as all the rest did, except Okey, Axtel, and Cleer, who escaped.

Defeats his Party, and takes him Prisoner.

General Montague, who had been some time before by the General's Advice, made one of the Generals at Sea, (General Monk being himself the other) and sent to take Charge of the Fleet, sent an Account to the Council of State of the Condition of it; how that Vice-Admiral Lawson, and with him the whole Navy, had received him with great Satisfaction, and were all fix'd in Obedience to their Authority, with Resolution to submit to the Determination of the next Parliament.

The Tuesday after this Defeat of Lambert, all the Militia of the City of London drew into Hide-Park; there were six Trained-Band Regiments, the Red, the White, the Green, the Blue, the Yellow, and the Orange, besides several Regiments of Auxiliaries: The Red was commanded by Col. Bateman Alderman; the White by Col. Wale Alderman; the Green by Col. John Robinson Alderman; the Blue by Col. William Vincent; the Yellow by Col. William Broomfield; and the Orange by Col. Thomas Bloodworth; all Men of Courage and good Affections to the Peace and Felicity of their Native Country. They made up in all twelve thousand Men: The General, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and a great Concourse of Noblemen and Gentlemen were present at the Appearance. And that Evening, Col. Lambert, Col. Cobbet, and Major Creed, were brought Prisoners to the Council of State, and committed to the Tower. And the next Day the rest of the Prisoners were brought by Captain Parry to the General, and by him committed to the Marshal-General.

The Defeat of Lambert did not make the Fanatics leave the Pursuit of their Mischiefs, several seditious Pamphlets being published in Print, to deprave the Minds of the People; and Tickers were thrown into the Courts of Guard in the Night to debauch the Soldiers. But none of them appeared to have been pen'd with more Virulency and Malice, than that vile supposititious Paper which they scattered about, carrying in its Frontispiece, A Letter from Brussels, &c. with which some of his Majesty's most implacable Enemies attempted to poison, or palliate the now high Expectations and Impressions of his good Subjects: And it was in truth so fatally timed, and so subtly contrived, that it had like to have done a great deal of Mischief amongst some, who not acquainted with the innate and unparallel'd Inclination of his Majesty to Clemency, began to apprehend their Forwardness for his Restoration, and to remit of their former Zeal: But this Hydra was dexterously cut off by Mr. Evelyn, whom we formerly mentioned, in a Reply which was printed, to the intire Satisfaction of all that read it. But nevertheless, these Practices, to divide the General's Friends, made the Council of State, the General, and all his Officers, more watchful for the publick Peace, and more diligent in their Duties: The Officers began more and more to be convinced of their former Errors, by several publick and private Discourses of the Clemency and other Royal Endowments of his Majesty: That which they most apprehended, was from Rumours which had been dispersed amongst them, of the Implacability of all those of his Party, of whom it was said, if they had Power they would shew themselves full of Rancour and Revenge against all that were engaged in the late War against them: And observing that most of the Members of Parliament were such, notwithstanding all the Qualifications for

Gen. Montague acquaints the Council of State with the Condition of the Fleet.

The Appearance of the City Militia in Hide-Park.

Col. Lambert, Col. Cobbet, and others sent Prisoners to the Tower.

Several seditious Pamphlets published and dispersed.

for their Elections, many strange Doubts possessed them; and amongst other Effects of their diseased Imaginations, they fancied, the Parliament (when met) would rather hinder, than promote his Majesty's Goodness and Mercy towards them: But whilst they were in the midst of these various Inquietudes, the Royal Party, in all the Counties of England, published several excellent Declarations, which fully satisfied and appeased their Minds; wherein they declared, 'That they resolved to adhere to the 'largest Assurances of amicable Agreement with all 'Persons, and that they would never put any Difference betwixt such as should now unite with them, 'and those who first engag'd in the same Persuasion 'with themselves'.

The Parliament assembled.

These Declarations were wholesome Preparations to usher in the Parliament, which met at Westminster, on the 25th Day of April. The Lords chose the Earl of Manchester to be their Speaker, and the House of Commons Sir Herbottle Grimstone; where after the Appointment of the usual Committees for Privileges and other essential Matters usual at their first Assembling, they gave all due Acknowledgement to Gen. Monk, for his eminent Services and great Wisdom in subduing his Enemies without Blood; magnifying the Mercies of God, that made him so instrumental to keep up the Nations from sinking, when no way appear'd whence Deliverance should arise.

Sir Arthur Haslerig being suspected by the General, clears himself.

Sir Arthur Haslerig was by the General suspected to have contributed towards the Insurrection of Lambert, but upon Notice thereof, he came to him, and gave him evident Proofs to the Contrary, and promised to live peaceably at home; having before quietly submitted his Regiments of Horse and Foot to the General's Dispose, together with the Garrisons of Berwick, New-Castle, Carlisle, and Tinnmouth.

Sir John Greenvil presents the General with a Commission from his Majesty, and a Letter for the Council of State.

On the 27th of April, Sir John Greenvil attended the General, and presented to him a Letter from his Majesty, to be communicated to the Officers of the Army, and the Council of State, with a Commission from his Majesty to constitute him Captain-General of all the Armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland; informing him likewise, that he had Letters from his Majesty to both Houses of Parliament, the City, and the Navy.

His Excellency received the Commission with all Humility and Respect; but in regard the Parliament was adjourn'd for three Days, advis'd him the next Day to deliver that Letter which was to be by him imparted to the Council of State, to the Council at their next sitting; which he accordingly did, but they would not presume to open it without the Parliament's Directions, and took Caution of Sir John Greenvil to attend the House at their next sitting. At which time, by the General's Advice, he went, without acquainting them, to the House of Lords, to inform them he had a Letter from the King; who being acquainted that Sir John Greenvil attended at the Door with a Letter from his Majesty, the Earl of Manchester went down to the Clerk and received it. The Letter had a Declaration inclosed in it; which were both read in the House: The Letter first, which was in these Words: viz.

CHARLES R.

RIGHT trusty and right well-beloved Cousins, and right trusty and well-beloved Cousins, and trusty and right well-beloved; We greet you all well. We cannot have a better Reason to promise Ourselves an end of Our common Sufferings and Calamities, and that Our own just Power and Authority will, with God's Blessing, be restorto Us, than that We hear you are again acknowledged to have that Authority and Jurisdiction which hath always belonged to you by your Birth, and the fundamental Laws of the Land: And We have thought it very fit and safe for Us to call to you for your Help in the composing the confounding Distempers and Distractions of the Kingdom, in which your Sufferings are next to those We have undergone Our selves: And therefore you cannot but be the most proper Counsellors for removing those Mischiefs, and for preventing the like for the future. How great a Trust We repose in you, for the procuring and establishing a blessed Peace and Security for the Kingdom, will appear to you by Our inclosed Declaration; which Trust, We are most confident you will discharge with what Justice and Wisdom that becomes you, and must always be expected from you; and that upon your Experience, how one Violation succeeds another, when the known Relations and Rules of Justice are once transgressed, you will be as jealous for the Rights of the Crown, and for the Honour of your King, as for your selves: And then you cannot but discharge your Trust with good Success, and provide for, and establish the Peace, Happiness and Honour, of King, Lords and Commons, upon that Foundation which can only support it; and We shall be all happy in each other: And as the whole Kingdom will bless God for you all, so We shall hold Ourselves oblig'd in an especial Manner to thank you in particular, according to the Affection you shall express towards Us. We need the less enlarge to you upon this Subject, because We have likewise writ to the House of Commons, which We suppose they will communicate to you: And We pray God to bless your joint Endeavours for the good of us all. And so We bid you very heartily farewell.

Given at our Court at Breda, this 14th Day of April, 1660. in the twelfth Year of Our Reign.

The Declaration was next read, which was Intituled;

His Majesty's gracious Declaration to all his loving Subjects.

CHARLES R.

CHARLES by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all our loving Subjects of what Degree or Quality soever, greeting. 'If the general Distraction and Confusion which 'is spread over the whole Kingdom, doth not 'awaken all Men to a Desire and Longing, that 'those Wounds which have so many Years together 'been kept bleeding, may be bound up, all We can 'say will be to no Purpose: However, after this 'long Silence, We have thought it our Duty, to declare how much We desire to contribute thereunto: 'And that as We can never give over the Hope in 'good time to obtain the Possession of that Right 'which God and Nature hath made Our due; so 'We do make it Our daily Suit to the divine Providence, that he will, in Compassion to Us and Our 'Subjects, after so long Misery and Sufferings; remit, and put Us into a quiet and peaceable Possession of that Our Right, with as little Blood and 'Damage to Our People as is possible: Nor do We 'desire more to enjoy what is Ours, than that all 'Our Subjects may enjoy what by Law is theirs, by 'a full and intire Administration of Justice throughout the Land, and by extending Our Mercy where 'it is wanted and deserv'd.

'And to the end that the fear of Punishment 'may not engage any Conscious of themselves of 'what is past, to a perseverance in Guilt for the future, by opposing the Quiet and Happiness of their 'Country, in the Restauration both of King, Peers,

His Majesty's Declaration.

and

1659. and People to their just, antient, and fundamental Rights, We do by these Presents declare, that We do grant a free and general Pardon, which We are ready, upon demand, to pass under our Great Seal of England, to all our Subjects of what Degree or Quality soever, who within forty Days after the publishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this Our Grace and Favour, and shall by any publick Act declare their doing so, and that they return to the Loyalty and Obedience of good Subjects; excepting only such Persons as shall hereafter be excepted by Parliament: Those only excepted, let all our Subjects, how faulty soever, rely upon the Word of a King, solemnly given by this present Declaration, That no Crime whatsoever committed against Us, or our Royal Father before the Publication of this, shall ever rise in Judgment, or be brought in Question, against any of them, to the least Endamagement of them either in their Lives, Liberties, or Estates, or (as far forth as lies in our Power) so much as to the Prejudice of their Reputations, by any Reproach, or Term of Distinction from the rest of any of our best Subjects; We desiring and ordaining, that henceforth all Notes of Discord, Separation, and Difference of Parties, be utterly abolished among all Our Subjects, whom We invite and conjure to a perfect Union among themselves, under Our Protection, for the Resettlement of Our just Rights and theirs, in a free Parliament, by which, upon the Word of a King, We will be advised.

And because the Passion and Uncharitableness of the Times have produced several Opinions in Religion, by which Men are engaged in Parties and Animosities against each other, which, when they shall hereafter unite in a Freedom of Conversation, will be composed, or better understood; We do declare a Liberty to tender Consciences, and that no Man shall be disquieted or called in Question for Differences of Opinion in matters of Religion, which do not disturb the Peace of the Kingdom; and that We shall be ready to consent to such an Act of Parliament, as upon mature Deliberation shall be offered to Us, for the full granting that Indulgence.

And because in the continued Distractions of so many Years, and so many and great Revolutions, many Grants and Purchases of Estates have been made to and by many Officers, Soldiers, and others, who are now possessed of the same, and who may be liable to Actions at Law, upon several Titles; We are likewise willing that all such Differences and all Things relating to the said Grants, Sales and Purchases, shall be determined in Parliament, which can best provide for the just Satisfaction of all Men who are concerned.

And We do further declare, that We will be ready to consent to any Act or Acts of Parliament to the Purposes aforesaid, and for the full Satisfaction of all Arrears due to the Officers and Soldiers of the Army, under the Command of General Monk, and that they shall be received into our Service upon as good Pay and Conditions as they now enjoy.

Given under our Sign Manual and Privy Signet, at our Court at Breda, this 14th Day of April, 1660. in the twelfth Year of our Reign.

After the reading of these, the Lords ordered Thanks to be given to Sir John Greenvil, for bringing that gracious Declaration and Letter, and resolv'd by Vote, That they do own and declare, that according to the antient and fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, the Government is, and ought to be, by King, Lords and Commons. 1659.

Sir John Greenvil came then to the House of Commons; who were before his coming acquainted with the Letter he delivered to the Council; upon Notice of his being at the Door, he was admitted, and presented a Letter to them from his Majesty. The Letter had in it a Duplicate of the same Declaration which was inclosed in the Letter to the Lords: The Letter and it were both read, and the Letter was superscribed;

To our Trusty and Well-beloved, the Speaker of the House of Commons.

CHARLES R.

Trusty and Well-beloved, We greet you well. In these great and insupportable Afflictions and Calamities under which the poor Nation hath been so long exercised, and by which it is so near exhausted, We cannot think of a more natural and proper Remedy, than to resort to those for Counsel and Advice, who have seen and observed the first Beginning of our Miseries, the Progress from bad to worse, than the Mistakes and Misunderstandings which have produced and contributed to Inconveniences which were not intended; and after so many Revolutions, and the Observation of what hath attended them, are now intrusted by our good Subjects to repair the Breaches which are made, and to provide proper Remedies for these Evils, and for the lasting Peace, Happiness and Security of the Kingdom.

We do assure you upon Our Royal Word, that none of Our Predecessors have had a greater Esteem of Parliaments, than We have in our Judgment, as well as from Our Obligations; We do believe them to be so vital a Part of the Constitution of the Kingdom, and so necessary for the Government of it, that We well know neither Prince nor People can be in any tolerable Degree happy without them: And therefore you may be confident, that We shall always look upon their Counsels as the best We can receive, and shall be as tender of their Priviledges, and as careful to preserve and protect them, as of that which is most near to our self, and most necessary for Our own Preservation.

And as this is Our Opinion of Parliaments, that their Authority is most necessary for the Government of the Kingdom: So We are most confident, that you believe and find, that the Preservation of the King's Authority is as necessary for the Preservation of Parliaments; and that it is not the Name, but the right Constitution of them, which can prepare and apply proper Remedies for those Evils which are grievous to the People, and which can thereby establish their Peace and Security. And therefore we have not the least Doubt, but that you will be as tender in, and as jealous of any thing that may infringe Our Honour, or impair Our Authority, as of your own Liberty and Property; which is best preserved by preserving the other.

How far We have trusted you in this great Affair, and how much it is in your Power to restore the Nation to all that it hath lost, and to redeem it from any Infamy it hath undergone, and to make King and People as happy as they ought to be, you will find by Our inclosed Declaration, a Copy of which we have likewise sent to

The Vote of the House of Lords upon the reading of the King's Letter and Declaration.

His Majesty's Letter to the House of Commons

1659. to the House of Peers; and you will easily believe that We will not voluntarily, and of Our selves, have reposed so great a Trust in you, but upon an intire Confidence that you will not abuse it, and that you will proceed in such a manner, and with such due Consideration of us who have trusted you, that We shall not be ashamed of declining other Assistance (which We have Assurance of) and repairing to you for more natural and proper Remedies for the Evils We would be freed from, nor sorry that We have bound up Our own Interest so intirely with that of Our Subjects, as that We refer it to the same Persons to take Care of Us, who are trusted to provide for them.

We look upon you as wise and dispassionate Men, and good Patriots, who will raise up those Banks and Fences which have been cast down, and who will most reasonably hope, that the same Prosperity will again spring from those Roots from which it hath heretofore and always grown: Nor can we apprehend that you will propose any thing to Us, or expect any thing from Us, but that We are as ready to give as you to receive.

If you desire the Advancement and Propagation of the Protestant Religion, We have, by our constant Profession and Practice of it, given sufficient Testimony to the World, that neither the Unkindness of those of the same Faith towards Us, nor the Civilities and Obligations from those of a contrary Profession, (of both which We have had abundant Evidence) could in the least Degree startle Us, or make Us swerve from our Zeal and Affection for it, to which We will not readily consent. And we hope in due time our self to propose something to you for the Propagation of it, that will satisfy the World, that We have always made it both our Care and our Study, and have enough observed what is most like to bring Disadvantage to it.

If you desire Security for those, who in these calamitous times, either wilfully or weakly have transgressed those Bounds which were prescribed, and have invaded each others Rights, We have left to you to provide for their Security and Indemnity, and in such a way as you shall think just and reasonable; and by a just Computation of what Men have done, and suffered, as near as is possibly, to take Care that all Men be satisfied, which is the surest Way to suppress and extirpate all such Uncharitableness and Animosity, as might hereafter shake and threaten that Peace, which for the present, might seem established.

If there be a crying Sin for which the Nation may be involved in the Infamy that attends it, We cannot doubt but that you will be as solicitous to redeem and vindicate the Nation from the Guilt and Infamy, as we can be.

If you desire that Reverence and Obedience may be paid to the fundamental Law of the Land, and that Justice may be equally and impartially administered to all Men, it is that which We desire to be sworn to Our self, and that all Persons in Power and Authority, should be so too.

In a Word, there is nothing which you can propose, that may make the Kingdom happy, which We will not contend with you to compass; and upon this Confidence and Assurance, We have thought fit to send you this Declaration, that you may, as much as is possible, at this Distance, see our Heart, which when God shall bring Us nearer together, (as We hope he will do shortly) will appear to you very agreeable to what

We have professed; and We hope that We have made that right Christian Use of our Affliction, and that the Observation and Experience We have had in other Countries, hath been such, as that We, and We hope all our Subjects, shall be the better for what We have seen and suffered.

We shall add no more, but our Prayers to Almighty God, that he will so bless your Counsels, and direct your Endeavours, that his Glory and Worship may be provided for, and the Peace, Honour and Happiness of the Nation, may be established upon those Foundations which can best support it: And so We bid you farewell.

Given at our Court at Breda, this 14th Day of April, 1660. in the twelfth Year of our Reign.

After the reading of this Letter and the Declaration, his Excellency the Lord General desired the Letter that was directed to him, to be communicated to the Council and the Army, might also be read, which was agreed. In that Letter there was also the former Declaration inclosed, and the Address of the Letter was:

To our trusty and Well-beloved General Monk, to be by him communicated to the President and Council of State, and to the Officers of the Armies under his Command.

CHARLES R.

TRusty and Well-beloved, We Greet you well: It cannot be believed, but that We have been, are, and ever must be, as solicitous as We can, by all Endeavours, to improve the Affections of Our good Subjects at home, and to procure the Assistance of Our Friends and Allies abroad, for the Recovery of that Right, which by the Laws of God and Man is unquestionable, and of which We have been so long dispossessed, by such Force, and with those Circumstances, as We do not desire to aggravate by any sharp Expressions, but rather wish, that the Memory of what is passed, may be buried to the World. That We have more endeavoured to prepare, and to improve the Affections of Our Subjects at home, for Our Restauration, than to procure Assistance from abroad, to invade either of Our Kingdoms, is as manifest to the World: And We cannot give a better Evidence, that We are still of the same Mind, than in this Conjuncture, when common Reason must satisfy all Men, that We cannot be without Assistance from abroad, We chose rather to send to you, who have it in your own Power to prevent that Ruin and Desolation which a War would bring upon the Nation, and to make the whole Kingdom owe the Peace, Happiness, Security, and Glory it shall enjoy, to your Virtue; and to acknowledge that your Armies have complied with their Obligations for which they were first raised, for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, the Honour and Dignity of the King, the Privileges of Parliament, the Liberty and Property of the Subject, and the Fundamental Laws of the Land; and that you have vindicated that Trust, which others most perfidiously abused and betray'd.

How much We desire and resolve to contribute to those good Ends, will appear to you by Our inclosed Declaration, which We desire you to cause to be published for the Information and Satisfaction of all good Subjects, who do not desire a further Effusion of precious Christian Blood, but to have their Peace and Security founded upon that which can only support it; an Unity of Affections 1660. Affections amongst our selves, an equal Administration of Justice to Men, restoring Parliaments to a full Capacity of providing for all that is amiss, and the Laws of the Land to their due Veneration.

'You have been your selves Witnesses of so many Revolutions, and have had so much Experience, how far any Power and Authority that is only assumed by Passion and Appetite, and not supported by Justice, is from providing for the Happiness and Peace of the People, or from receiving any Obedience from them, without which no Government can provide for them; and that you may very reasonably believe, that God hath not been so well pleased with the Attempts that have been made, since he hath usually increased the Confusion, by giving all the Success that hath been desired, and brought that to pass without Effect, which the Designers have proposed as the best Means to settle and compose the Nation: And therefore We cannot but hope and believe, that you will concur with Us in the Remedy We have applied, which to human Understanding, is only proper for the Ills We all groan under; and that you will make your selves the blessed Instruments to bring this Blessing of Peace and Reconciliation upon King and People; it being the usual Method in which Divine Providence delighteth it self, to use and sanctify those very Means which ill Men design for the Satisfaction of private and particular Ends and Ambition, and other wicked Purposes, to wholesome and publick Ends, and to establish that Good which is most contrary to the Designers: which is the greatest Manifestation of God's particular Kindness to a Nation that can be given in this World. How far We resolve to preserve your Interests, and reward your Services, We refer to Our Declaration, and We hope God will inspire you to perform your Duty to Us, and to your native Country, whose Happiness cannot be separated from each other.

'We have intrusted our Well-beloved Servant Sir John Greenvil, one of the Gentlemen of Our Bed-chamber, to deliver this unto you, and to give us an Account of your Reception of it, and to desire you, that it may be published. And so We bid you farewell."

Given at our Court at Breda this 14th of April, 1660. in the twelfth Year of our Reign.

After the reading of these Letters, his Excellency desired their Permission to answer it, and to communicate that his Majesty's Declaration to the Officers of the Army; which was readily consented to.

The Parliament present his Majesty and his two Brothers with the Sum of 65000l.

And then they took into their Consideration, that his Majesty having been deprived of his Revenue, could not but be in want of Monies, and therefore ordered, that the Sum of fifty thousand Pounds should be presently raised and presented to his Majesty from that House, and ten thousand Pounds to his Royal Highness the Duke of York, and five thousand Pounds to the Duke of Gloucester.

The Lords sent down a Message to the Commons, with the Vote of Recognition formerly mentioned, which was agreed to, and each of the Houses appointed Committees to draw up their several Answers to his Majesty's Letters, and resolved that the Supercription should be,

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.

And the Commons ordered, that all the Journals should be searched, and those Acts and Orders ras'd out, which were inconsistent with the Government of King, Lords and Commons: these were the chiefest Transactions in Parliament that Day.

In the Evening his Excellency summoned all his Officers that were in and near the City, and communicated to them his Majesty's Letter and Declaration; upon the Reading whereof, Colonel Lydcot first spake; addressing himself to his Excellency then present; he said, They were all bound to bless God for the Happiness of that Day, which made them Witnesses of his Majesty's great Goodness and Clemency to all his Subjects expressed in that Declaration, and for his particular Kindness to them manifested in his most gracious Letter.

He said, It was most true, that they had been Witnesses of many Revolutions (as it is therein expressed) and experienced to their Sorrow the Inconveniences of them; that at the Beginning of the Wars, the safety of the King's Person, Protestant Religion, Privileges of Parliament, and Liberty of the Subjects, were Principles that many good Men with them thought they might safely engage for, but by Degrees, after they came into Blood, some implacable Spirits improved their Successes to make the Divisions irreparable, and many Men were forced to continue their Arms, more for their own Security, than the Justice of them: But that which was his Comfort, and ought to be all theirs, was, That they had now, by the Prudence of their ever to be honoured General, the Opportunity to comply with the Obligations for which they were first raised, and they were these whom his Majesty was pleased to own in their Submission to his most just and lawful Authority, to be the Instruments to bring the Blessing of Peace and Reconciliation upon the King and People.

This Speech was approved by all them that heard it: But Colonel Knight desired they might give some written Testimony of their Acknowledgements of his Majesty's Authority over them, to be presented to his Excellency the Lord General; That since his Majesty's Letter was by him communicated to them, he might, in his Answer to it, return their humble Sense of it.

This Motion produced a Reference to a Committee of Officers, to draw up an Address to his Excellency, in Compliance with his Majesty's Letter and Declaration, to be prepared against six of the Clock the next Morning, and to desire his Excellency's Leave, that they might then meet to give their Consents, and subscribe their Names to it; which his Excellency readily approved. And the next Morning, the Address being prepared, was read to the Council of Officers, and signed by them, and presented to his Excellency.

The Title was:

To his Excellency the Lord General Monk, Captain General of all the Armies and Forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and one of the Generals at Sea.

The humble Address of the Officers of your Excellency's Army, in the Name of themselves and their Brethren.

Altho' we cannot doubt of your Excellency's Confidence in our Affections, and our Faithfulness to your Excellency, and that Discipline, which by your good and prudent Conduct, hath been exercised over us, whereby we are instructed to an intire Obedience to your Excellency, and that Authority which the Lord shall place over us, which we hope we have manifested in our last Actions under your Excellency, against all Persons whatsoever, in any ways

The Officers Address to his Excellency, in Compliance with his Majesty's Letter and Declaration.

di-

1660. W disturbing the Peace and Settlement of the Nations; altho' some of them have been our Brethren, formerly engaged in the same Cause with Us. As also in our late Remonstrance and Address to your Excellency, wherein as it becomes Us in Duty, we have solemnly declared to acquiesce in what the Lord shall bring forth from the Consultations of this present Parliament.

'Yet in regard your Excellency hath been pleased to communicate to Us, a Letter and Declaration from the King's Majesty, full of gracious Expressions, we cannot but acknowledge that the matter of it gives a great Measure of Quiet to our Minds, and more than ordinary Expectations of the Enjoyment of much Tranquility and Happiness under his Majesty's Government.

'The free and general Indemnity offered by his Majesty, with a Liberty to tender Consciences, Satisfaction of Arrears, his Readiness to consent to a Confirmation of Sales, and other Grants and Purchases of Estates to all Persons now in Possession of the same, is that of which we cannot doubt of the real Performance, being left by his Majesty to the Parliament's Determination; so we believe it is the most probable way to bring the Nations to their desired Settlement. And we hope to evince to his Majesty, and all the World, that we are his Majesty's Loyal Subjects, and that your Excellency, and the Armies under your Command, have complied with the Obligations, for which they were first raised, for the Preservation of the true Protestant Religion, the Honour and Dignity of the King, the Privileges of Parliament, the Liberty and Prosperity of the Subject, and the fundamental Laws of the Land."

It is read by the Commons and approved.

In the Morning, at the first sitting of the Common's-House, the General acquainted them that he had communicated his Majesty's Letter, and the Declaration in it inclosed, to the Officers of the Army; and that thereupon they had presented an Address to him, which he desired they would be pleased to read, which was ordered; and after the reading, it was well approved of.

Commissary Clarges appointed by the General to wait upon his Majesty with this Address.

His Excellency then told them, He intended to prepare a Letter to be sent to his Majesty, and did, with their Leave, purpose to send that Address to him, that his Majesty might thereby perceive the Armies were at his Devotion; and designing to send it by Commissary Clarges, who was as well a Member of their House, as an Officer of the Army, he requested their Permission for him to go.

The House then Ordered, he should have leave to go from his Excellency to the King; and they gave five hundred Pounds to Sir John Greenvil, to buy him a Jewel, as a Testimony of the Respects of the House to him.

After this Alderman Robinson informed them, That the said Sir John Greenvil, with the Lord Morant, had presented a Letter from his Majesty, to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and they commanded him to ask their Leave to return an Answer to it. Which after the reading it in the House was granted; in that Letter also his Majesty's Declaration was inclosed: The Letter it self was directed.

To our trusty and Well-beloved, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and the Common-Council of our City of London.

CHARLES R.

His Majesty's Letter to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London.

*T*rusty and Well-beloved, we greet you well: In these great Revolutions of late happened in that our Kingdom, to the Wonder and Amazement of all the World, there is none that we have look'd upon with more

Comfort, than the so frequent and publick Manifestations of their Affections to us in the City of London, which hath exceedingly raised our Spirits, and which no Doubt hath proceeded from the Spirit of God, and his extraordinary Mercy to the Nation, which hath been encouraged by you, and your good Example, to assert that Government, under which it hath so many hundred Years enjoyed as great Felicity as any Nation in Europe, and to discountenance the Imaginations of those, who would subject our Subjects to a Government they have not yet advised; and to satisfy the Pride and Ambition of a few ill Men, would introduce the most arbitrary and tyrannical Power that was ever yet heard of. How long we have all suffered under those and the like Devices, all the World takes Notice, to the no small Reproach of the English Nation, which we hope is now providing for its own Security and Redemption, and will be no longer bewitched by those Inventions: How desirous we are to contribute to the obtaining the Peace and Happiness of our Subjects without Effusion of Blood; and how far we are from desiring to recover what belongs to us by a War, if it can be otherwise done, will appear to you by the inclosed Declaration, which together with this our Letter, we have intrusted our right trusty and Well-beloved Cousin, the Lord Viscount Morant, and our trusty and Well-beloved Servant Sir John Greenvil, Knight, one of the Gentlemen of our Bed-chamber, to deliver to you; to the End, that you, and all the rest of our good Subjects of that our City of London (to whom we desire it should be published) may know how far we are from the Desire of Revenge, or that the Peace, Happiness, and Security of the Kingdom, should be raised upon any other Foundation than the Affections and Hearts of our Subjects, and their own Consents. We have not the least Doubt of your just Sense of these our Condescensions, or of your Zeal to advance and promote the same good End, by disposing all Men to meet us with the same Affection and Tendernefs, in restoring the fundamental Laws to that Reverence that is due to them, and upon the Preservation whereof all our Happiness depends. And you will have no Reason to doubt of enjoying your full Share in that Happiness, and of the improving it by our particular Affection to you. It is very natural for all Men to do all the good they can for their native Country, and to advance the Honour of it: And as we have that full Affection for the Kingdom in general, so we would not be thought to be without some extraordinary Kindness for our native City in that Particular, which we shall manifest on all Occasions, not only by renewing their Charter, and confirming all those Privileges which they have received from our Predecessors; but by adding and granting any new Favours which may advance the Trade, Wealth and Honour of that our native City, for which we will be so solicitous, that we doubt not but that it will in due time receive some Benefit and Advantage in all those Respects, even from our own Observation and Experience abroad. And we are most confident, we shall never be disappointed in our Expectation, of all possible Service from your Affections; and so we bid you farewell.

Given at our Court at Breda, the 14th Day of April, 1660. in the twelfth Year of our Reign.

We must not omit to commemorate the City's joyful Receiving of this Letter, and the Declaration in it, expressed by the grateful Duty of the Common-Council; who immediately upon the reading of them, ordered ten thousand Pounds to be presented to his Majesty, a thousand Pounds to the Duke of York, and a thousand Pounds to the Duke of Gloucester; and that Alderman

7 R

Langham,

1660. Langham, Alderman Reynaldson, Alderman Brown, Alderman Thompson, Alderman Frederick, Alderman Wale, Alderman Adams, Alderman Bateman, Alderman Robinson, Mr. Recorder Wild, Sir Nicholas Crisp, Mr. Vincent, Mr. Bidolph, Mr. Foord, Mr. Bloodworth, Sir James Bunce, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. William Bateman, should from that City attend his Majesty, with a Presentment of their most dutiful Acknowledgments for his Clemency and Goodness towards them. His Excellency took Care, that the Address presented to him by the Officers, together with Copies of the King's Letter and Declaration, should be sent to all the Regiments and Garrisons in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Dunkirk; requiring all to return their Subscriptions to him, and the Names of Dissenters (if any were). But it appeared by the Returns made, that the Army was so well purged by the Remonstrance that went before, that all readily and dutifully complied with this.

Six of the House of Lords, and twelve of the Commons sent to attend upon his Majesty. The Lords House nominated the Earls of Oxford, Warwick, and Middlesex, and the Lord Viscount Hereford, the Lord Brook, and the Lord Berkly, to attend his Majesty from that House; and the Commons appointed the Lord Fairfax, Lord Bruce, Lord Falkland, Lord Castleton, Lord Herbert of Worcester, Lord Mandeville, Sir Horatio Townshend, Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper, Sir George Booth, Sir John Holland, Sir Henry Cholmley, and Denzill Hollis, Esq; to attend his Majesty from that House, who were ordered to make the quickest Preparation they could for their Journey, to desire his Majesty to make a speedy Return to his Parliament, to the Exercise of his Kingly Office.

His Majesty's Letter and Declaration to the Fleet, by the Diligence of General Montague, had the same Success there, as that in the Army, being gratefully received by all the Commanders and Seamen.

The Letter it self was in these Words:

CHARLES R.

His Majesty's Letter to the Officers of the Fleet.

TRUSTY and Well-beloved, We greet you well: It is no small Comfort to us, after so long and great Troubles and Miseries, which the whole Nation hath groaned under; and after so great Revolutions, which have still increased those Miseries, to hear that the Fleet and Ships, which are the Walls of the Kingdom, are put under the Command of two Persons so well disposed to, and concerned in the Peace and Happiness of the Kingdom, as we believe you to be; and that the Officers and Seamen under your Command, are more inclined to return to their Duty to us, and put a Period to those Distempers and Distractions which have so impoverished and dishonoured the Nation, than to widen the Breach, and to raise their Fortunes by Rapine and Violence; which gives Us great Encouragement and Hope, that God Almighty will heal the Wounds by the same Plaster that made the Flesh raw; that he will proceed in the same Method, in pouring his Blessings upon Us, which he was pleased to use when he began to afflict Us; and that the Manifestation of the good Affection of the Fleet and Seamen towards Us, and the Peace of the Nation, may be the Prologue to that Peace which was first interrupted by the Mistake and Misunderstanding of their Predecessors, which would be such a Blessing upon Us all, that we should not be less delighted with the Manner, than the Matter of it: In this Hope and Confidence, we we have sent the inclosed Declaration to you, by which you may discern how much we are willing to contribute towards the obtaining the general and publick Peace: In which, as no Man can be more, or so much concerned; so no Man can be more sollicitous for it. And We do earnestly desire you, that you will cause the said Declaration to be published to all the Officers and Seamen of the Fleet; to the end that they may plainly discern, how much We have put it into their Power, to provide for the Peace and Happiness of the Nation, who have been always understood by them, to be the best and most proper Counsellors for those good Ends. And you are likewise further to declare to them, that We have the same gracious Purpose towards them, which We have expressed towards the Army at Land, and will be as ready to provide for the Payment of all Arrears due to them, and for rewarding them according to their several Merits, as We have expressed to the other; and We will always take so particular a Care of them, and their Condition, as shall manifest our Kindness towards them. And so depending upon God's Blessing, for infusing those good Resolutions into your and their Hearts, which are best for Us all, We bid you farewell". Given at Our Court at Breda, this 14th Day of April, 1660. in the twelfth Year of Our Reign.

Subscribed,

To Our trusty and well-beloved General Monk, and General Montague, Generals at Sea; to be communicated to the Fleet.

Clarges on the 5th Day of May, began his Journey to his Majesty; and at his parting from the General, he gave him no other Instructions, but to give the King all manner of Assurance of his Fidelity to him, and his Resolution to im- prove all his Opportunities to his Service; desiring him not to move any thing to his Majesty, either for himself, or him, or any other in his Company, that his Majesty might see that both he, and those so nearly concerned with him in his Restauration, sought more the publick Good of their Country, than their own private Honour or Profit; which he did faithfully observe at that time, and ever after. And three Days after the Lords and Commons having agreed upon a Proclamation to that Purpose, his Majesty was proclaimed with great Solemnity in the Cities of London and Westminster, the Lords and Commons, and the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London being present.

Commissary Clarges made such Speed in his Journey to his Majesty, that on Tuesday the 8th of May in the Morning, which was the Day after the happy making of this Proclamation, he arrived at Breda: There the Governour gave him a very honourable Reception, and accommodated him with his Coach and six Horses to Breda; and a League before he came to the Town, the Lord Gerrard met him with two Coaches and six Horses, and accompanied him to his Majesty, who received him with most gracious Satisfaction: And he presented his Majesty with the General's Letter, and the Address for the Army; for which he was knighted.

The Parliament and City Commissioners, in three Days after their Departure from London, arrived at the Hague; and on Wednesday the 16th of May, our Stile, they had their several Audiences by 1660. by his Majesty, who received them all with a sweet and serene Countenance, and a Heart full of Content and good Inclinations towards them; and all the City Commissioners were knighted by him. He gave that Evening his Dispatch to Sir Thomas Clarges, and commanded him to acquaint the General, he intended to take Shipping at the Bay of Scheveling on Monday after, and to sail to Dover, and land there; from whence he would immediately go to Canterbury, and stay there some time to determine of the manner of his Entrance into London. The Fleet was some Days before in Pursuance of the Orders of both Houses in the said Bay.

Sir Thomas Clarges returns with Intimation of his Majesty's Resolution. On Thursday early in the Morning, Sir Thomas Clarges, attempted by Boat from Scheveling, to get on Board the Admiral, but the Weather was so stormy he could not do it 'till towards the Evening; and then General Montague ordered the Norwich Frigate for his Transportation: The Winds were so contrary, and the Weather so stormy, that the Pilot could not make any Land in England 'till Monday Morning, at which time he landed at Aldbrough in Suffolk, and immediately from thence sent an Express to the General, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, with Intimation of his Majesty's Resolutions: Whereupon his Excellency, with a great and gallant Company of the chiefeft of the Nobility and Gentry of England, set forward from London on the 22d of May; and for the more Conveniency of Quartering so numerous a Company, he advised them to divide themselves into Troops, according to the several Counties, and the Interest of the Noblemen present. At Rochester he met Sir Thomas Clarges, who presented him with a gracious Letter from the King.

The King intended to have taken Shipping on Monday, but the Crossness of the Winds forced him a little to defer it. His Royal Highness the Duke of York, went on Monday and Tuesday to the Fleet, to take Charge thereof as Lord High-Admiral: And on Wednesday the 23d, his Sacred Majesty, the Queen of Bohemia, the Princess Royal of Orange, the Dukes of York and Gloucester, and the Prince of Orange, went on Board the Naseby, (which his Majesty now named the Royal Charles) where after a Repast, the Queen of Bohemia, the Princess Royal, and the Prince of Orange, her Son, took leave of his Majesty, and then the Fleet set Sail for England: His Royal Highness the Duke of York came in the London, and the Duke of Gloucester in the Swiftsure, now called the James.

The King and the Dukes take Shipping for England. During the time his Majesty had remained at the Hague, and all the way thither from Breda, the States of Holland entertained him with great Magnificence; and at his Departure they presented him with a rich Bed, of the Value of seven thousand Pounds Sterling, and as much Linnen as was valued at a thousand Pounds.

His Majesty's Entertainment from the States of Holland. On Friday about three of the Clock in the Morning, the Fleet was in Sight of Dover, whereupon an Express was sent to the General (then newly come to Canterbury) to haste to Dover; which he presently did, and about ten of the Clock came thither.

His Excellency before he came from Canterbury, advising with the Earl of Lindsey, and some of the other Noblemen that accompanied him, about the Conveniency of his Majesty's Stay at Dover, was informed that he could have no Accommodation there for a fourth Part of his Train, and those that came to wait on him; and therefore he resolved humbly to move him, at his Landing, to proceed on directly to Canterbury.

1660. About one in the Afternoon, his Majesty landed at the Beech near Dover-Peer, with the Duke of York, and the Duke of Gloucester, and many Noblemen and Gentlemen. All that were present put themselves into Posture, to see the Meeting of the King and the General. The Admirers of Majesty, were jealous on his Majesty's Behalf, of too low Condescension; and the Lovers of Duty, fearful on the other Side of an Ostentation of Merit: But such an humble Prostration was made by the General, and so generous a Reception by his Majesty, kissing and embracing him, that all Parties were satisfied to Admiration. And his Excellency from that time received so great an Impression of the marvellous Goodness of his Majesty, that he resolved what before he had performed out of bounden Duty to his Liege-Lord, should be forever continued with the same Observing, out of Loyal Affections to his gracious Sovereign.

His Majesty walked from the Water-side towards the Town with the General, a Canopy being carried over his Head, and a Chair of State by him; and upon his Excellency's Motion for his going to Canterbury, for the Reasons before expressed, he hasted to his Coach; in his Passage to which he was met by the Mayor and Aldermen of the Town, with Mr. Reading their Minister, who presented his Majesty with a large Bible, with gold Clasps: At one end of the Coach next the King, sat the Duke of York, and at the other the Duke of Gloucester, and the General, and the Duke of Buckingham, sat in the Boot. About two Miles from Dover, his Majesty took Horse, his Royal Brothers rode on his Right-Hand, and the General on his Left: After whom the Duke of Buckingham, and other Noblemen and Gentlemen followed in gallant Equipage.

At his Majesty's Entrance into Canterbury, he was met by the Mayor and Aldermen, and Mr. Lovelace the Recorder, who made an eloquent Speech to him; the Mayor also presented him with a Tankard of Massy Gold, and then conducted him to the Palace, where he remained 'till Monday.

The next Day after his Arrival at Canterbury, his Majesty dignified his Excellency with the Honour of the Garter: He was brought up to the King by the Earl of Winchelsea, and the Lord Mordant, who were both Knighted with him; and his Royal Highness the Duke of York, and the Duke of Gloucester, in great Testimony of Respect to him, assisted at the Ceremony, and put on the Garter, and the George: Mr. Morrice was also Knighted, and declared Secretary of State; and that Evening his Majesty sent the General a Warrant to be Master of his Horse.

His Majesty likewise at Canterbury, conferred the Honour of Knighthood on Major-General Massey, Alderman Robinson, Mr. Daniel Harvey, Mr. Thomas Stewkley, Colonel Rossiter, Captain Philip Howard, and Mr. Robert Paston. Moreover, his Excellency, the Earl of Southampton, and Mr. Secretary Morrice, were Sworn of the Privy-Council.

On Monday following, his Majesty came into Rochester, where after he had a little refreshed himself, he went to Chatham, to see the Royal Sovereign, and returned that Night to Colonel Gibbons's House, where he lay, and was by the Colonel presented with a most dutiful and loyal Address from him and his Regiment, which was then quartered in Rochester.

From thence his Majesty marched to Black-Heath, where the Army was drawn up, and was much pleas'd with His Majesty's Lands at Dover.

His Reception there.

His Reception at Canterbury.

His Majesty confers the Order of the Garter upon the General, and the Honour of Knighthood upon the Earl of Winchelsea, the Lord Mordant and divers others.

He is entertained at Rochester by Col. Gibbons.

1660. with the Sight of it; for indeed they seemed all Men of one Age, and one Mind, and were, for their Number, as gallant Troops as were to be seen in the World.

The Army being drawn up on Black-heath, welcomed his Majesty with great Joy and Acclamation.
Colonel Knight there most humbly presented to his Majesty a Writing, which contained the most humble and obedient Declaration of the Army's Joy, for the Honour of his Majesty's Presence amongst them; wherein after many dutiful Expressions of exalted Gladness for his Majesty's Restauration, they besought, That his Majesty would have now his great Council about him, who had already given Proof of their Loyalty and Wisdom, both to his Majesty and all his People. They also declared, That as they had not been altogether useless in the Restauration of his Sacred Majesty, to his Crown and Kingdom, and his People to their just Rights thereby: so they should for the future cheerfully sacrifice their Lives, or whatsoever could be more dear unto them, in the Service of his Majesty, against all Opposers whatsoever, and by a ready Obedience to his Majesty's Commands, express themselves better than in Words.

The manner of his Majesty's triumphal Cavalcade through the City of London.
When his Majesty came to St. George's-Fields, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen humbly on their Knees revered him, and the Lord Mayor presented his Sword, which his Majesty gave back to him, and after a little Collation in a Tent, provided by the Lord Mayor, his Majesty went towards Whitehall in this Manner.

All the Streets were richly adorned with Tapis-try, from London-Bridge to Whitehall; and as far as Temple-Bar, were equally ranked in good Order, the Train'd-Band-Forces on the one Side of the Street, and the several Companies in their Liveries on the other: From Temple-Bar to Whitehall, the Train'd-Bands of Westminster and the Parts adjacent on one Side, and some Companies of the Army on the other, to whom was joined a gallant Company of the late King's Officers, commanded by Sir John Stowell.

The Procession was led by Major-General Brown, who had a Troop of three Hundred, all in Cloth of Silver Doublets; then followed twelve Hundred in Velvet Coats, with Footmen and Liveries attending them in Purple: Then another Troop led by Alderman Robinson, in Buff Coats, with Cloth of Silver Sleeves, and very rich Green Scarfs: And after these a Troop of above one hundred and fifty with blue Liveries, laced with Silver Lace, with six Trumpeters, and seven Footmen, in Sea-green and Silver: Then a Troop of two hundred and twenty, with thirty Footmen in Gray and Silver Liveries, and four Trumpeters richly cloathed: Then another Troop of one hundred and five, with Gray Liveries, and six Trumpets: And another of seventy, with five Trumpets: And then three Troops more, two of three hundred, and one of one hundred, all richly habited, and bravely mounted. After these came two Trumpets with his Majesty's Arms; the Sheriffs Men in Red Cloaks, richly laced with Silver Lace, to the number of fourscore, with half-Pikes in their Hands: Then followed six hundred of the several Companies of London, on Horse-back, in black Velvet Coats, with Gold Chains; each Company having Footmen in Liveries attending.

After these came a Kettle-Drum, five Trumpets, and three Streamers, and many rich Red Liveries, with Silver Lace: After these twelve Ministers, and then another Kettle-Drum, and four Trumpets, and his Majesty's Life-Guard of Horse, commanded by the Lord Gerrard: Then three Trumpets in rich Coats and Satin Doublets; and the City Marshal, 1660. with eight Footmen in French-Green, trimmed with Crimfon and White: The City Waits, and all the City Officers in Order: Then the two Sheriffs, and all the Aldermen of London in Scarlet Gowns, and rich Trappings; with Footmen in Liveries, Red Coats laced with Silver, and Cloth of Gold and Silver: The Heralds and Maces in rich Coats: Then the Lord Mayor carrying the Sword bare; and next to him the Duke of Buckingham, and the General; and then the King's Majesty betwixt the Dukes of York and Gloucester: Then followed a Troop of Horse with white Colours; and after them the General's Life-Guard, led by Sir Philip Howard: Then five Regiments of the Army-Horse, led by Colonel Knight: And after them, two Troops of Noblemen and Gentlemen.

Thus was his Majesty conducted to his Royal Palace at Whitehall, on the nine and twentieth Day of May, his Birth-Day; and with him, Peace and Happiness remained to his Kingdoms and People.

When the Lord-Mayor had taken leave of him, he went to the Lords, where he was entertained with a grave, but eloquent Speech, of the Earl of Manchester's, and from thence to the Banqueting-House, where the whole House of Commons attending him, the Speaker, in their Names, expressed the joyful Sense they all had, to behold his Majesty returned in Safety, and thereby an End was put to that Tyranny and Slavery his good People had endured.

The King told them, He was so disordered by his Journey, and with the Noise still sounding in his Ears, (which nevertheless He confessed was pleasing to him, because it expressed the Affections of his People) that he was thereby unfit to make such a Reply as he desired: But added, That he took no greater Satisfaction to himself in this his Change, than that he found his Heart really set to endeavour by all Means the restoring of these Nations to their Freedom and Happiness, which he hoped by the Advice of his Parliament to effect: And that, next to the Honour of God, from whom he chiefly owned the Restauration to his Crown, he would study the Welfare of his People, and not only be a true Defender of the Faith, but a just Assertor of the Laws and Liberties of his Subjects.

After the Conclusion of these Ceremonies, he intended to go to Westminster-Abbey to offer up a Thanksgiving to God for all his Deliverances and Mercies towards him; but by the Weariness he had contracted through the Toil, (however grateful) of that Day's Action, he was diverted from his Intention of going thither.

Thus did the merciful Hand of God, by a wonderful and distinguished Providence, heal the cruel Wounds our Country had received by a Civil War and Confusion of twenty Years; and restore our happy Constitution, and Peace and Safety with it. The Value of this blessed Change was gloriously inhaunted by this Consideration, that it was not introduced, as has happened in other Countries, by Fields swimming in Blood, and Cities forced and plundered; when the Happiness and Security of one Part of a Nation has been founded on the Ruin and Desolation of another; but by an unknown and unheard of Mercy; by turning the Hearts of three great Kingdoms, as the Heart of one Man, to long for and establish that Felicity they had so madly rooted up and destroyed before. What happened after this great Revolution, how long this delightful Scene lasted, and the Causes that brought on those great Alterations we have since experimented, are to be found in the following Parts of this Work.

THE REIGN OF King CHARLES II. AFTER HIS RESTORATION.

A.D. 1660.

The King's Privy Council.

THE first Care that offered it self to the King, was the Choice of his Counsellors and Servants. In doing this, Policy obliged him to employ several who had been his Enemies, and Gratitude to remember such as had been his Friends. The Privy Council consisted of thirty Persons; namely, the Duke of York, the Duke of Gloucester, Sir Edward Hyde, General Monk, Admiral Montague, the Marquis of Ormond, the Marquis of Dorchester, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Lindsey, the Earl of Berkshire, the Earl of Norwich, the Lord Viscount Say, the Lord Wentworth, the Lord Seymour, Mr. Daniel Hollis, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir George Carteret, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Colonel Charles Howard, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Manchester, the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of St. Albans, the Earl of Leicester, the Lord Colepeper, the Lord Roberts, Mr. Arthur Annesley, Sir John Barkley, Sir Edward Nicholas, and Sir William Morrice. Of these the Duke of York was invested with the Office of Lord High Admiral of England, and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports: Monk was continued Captain General of all the Forces of the three Kingdoms, and made Master of the Horse to his Majesty: Sir Edward Hyde was continued in the Office of Lord Chancellor of England: The Earl of Southampton was made Lord Treasurer; the Marquis of Ormond, Lord Steward of the Household; the Lord Say, Privy Seal; the Lord Seymour, Chancellor of the Dutchy; the Earl of Manchester, Lord Chamberlain of the Household; Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Treasurer of the Household; Sir John Barkley, Comptroller; Sir George Carteret, Vice-Chamberlain; and Sir Edward Nicholas, and Sir William Morrice, were made chief Secretaries of State; General Monk was made Duke of Albemarle, a Title anciently appropriated to the Royal Blood; Sir Edward Hyde was made Earl of Clarendon; Admiral Montague, Earl of Sandwich; the Marquis of Ormond was made an English Earl, and afterwards a Duke; the Marquis of Hertford was made Duke of Somerset; Mr. Annesley, Earl of Anglesey; and Hollis, Barkley, Cornwallis, and Ashley Cooper, were made Barons and Peers of England.

In the next Place he filled the Benches of the Courts of Judicature: Sir Edward Hyde was made Lord Chancellor, as above; the Lord Colepeper Master of the Rolls, who shortly dying, was succeeded by Sir Harbottle Grimstone; Sir Robert Foster, Sir Thomas Mallet, Sir Thomas Twissden, and Sir Wadham Windham, were placed in the King's-Bench: In the Common-Pleas, Sir Robert Hyde, Sir Thomas Tyrrel, and Sir Samuel Brown; and in the Exchequer, Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Sir Matthew Hale, Sir Edward Atkins, and Sir Christopher Turner: Sir Jeffrey Palmer was made Attorney General, and Sir Heneage Finch Solicitor General. The next Provision to be made was for all military Offices, that the Commands in the Army, and the Governments of the Fortresses and Garrisons might be in the Hands of trusty Persons. These Posts were, by General Monk, conferred upon such Lords, and other Persons of Honour, as the King recommended to him: Lord Lieutenants of Counties were constituted of the chief Nobility of the Land, each having under them as Deputy Lieutenants, such Gentlemen of the same Counties as had most eminently shew'd their Affections to his Majesty, by which the Militia was secured.

Those of the Ministry who had the most signal Influence and Authority, were the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Southampton, the Duke of Ormond, Secretary Nicholas, the Duke of Albemarle, and the Earl of Sandwich; the four first, by their eminent Services to the King, and Loyalty to his Father; and the other two, by the Part they had in the King's Restoration. The Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Southampton, and the Duke of Ormond, were united in a fast

The Chancellor and Judges.The Military Offices.The Character of the Ministry.

Friend-

A.D. 1660. Friendship; and never was there, in any Ministry, a more glorious Triumvirate. These excellent Men made Use of all the Authority and Influence their Favour with the King, their high Dignities, and great Abilities supplied them with, only to restore and secure their Country's Happiness, without following any Ends, or indulging any Passions of their own. To the wise Counsels and Management of these worthy Patriots it was owing, that the Wounds our Country had received during the long Civil Wars, were so easily and so quickly closed up; and that our Constitution in Church and State, which they found overturned from its Foundations, rose from its Ruines as beautiful as before.

The Character of the Parliament.

This was the Disposition of the Ministry. The House of Commons in the Convention-Parliament, was composed of Men of different Ranks and Parties. At the Election, the Members were, by the last long Parliament, limited to certain Qualifications; one of which was, that all that advised, or voluntarily aided in the War against the Parliament, in 1641, unless they had since given a Manifestation of their good Affection, should be made incapable (or even their Sons) of being elected Members of this Parliament. The Consequence was, that many who were Enemies to the King, and more who had been so, sat in the House. The Speaker himself, Sir Harbottle Grimstone, had sat in the long Parliament, till he was turned out in 1648 with the other secluded Members. Nevertheless, as the Stream of the People's Affections was turning towards the King, many of the Royal Party got in in Spite of these Precautions. So that the professed Loyalists, joined to those dispassionate Persons who saw that nothing could restore the Nations Quiet but the Settlement of the old Constitution, made a Majority that overpowered all Enemies to Peace. As to the Peers, their Honours and Privileges had been too much insulted and trampled on during the late Times, not to make them seriously desire the Re-establishment of the Crown, on whose Lustre their own depends. So that the two Houses were entirely disposed to concur in any Measures to restore the King's Honour, and the publick Quiet.

Acts passed by the King.

Within two Days after his Arrival, his Majesty, accompanied with his two Royal Brothers, York and Gloucester, Lord Chancellor Hyde, and many other Persons of Honour, went in a solemn Manner by Water to the House of Lords. There the King being seated on his Throne, and the Commons appearing at the Bar, he in a short Speech acquainted them with the Occasion and Cause of his present sending for them, namely, to pass those Bills which he understood were prepared for him, all which were very material at this Time. The first was for making the present Convention a Parliament; the second for authorizing the Tax for 70000 Pounds per Menssem for three Months longer; and the third for Continuance of Process, and all judicial Proceedings. Which being pass'd, the

A.D. 1660. Lord Chancellor in a handsome Speech told both Houses, with how much Readiness his Majesty had pass'd those important Acts, and how willingly they should at all Times hereafter find him to pass any other that might tend to the Advantage and Benefit of the People; in a particular Manner desiring, in his Majesty's Behalf, that the Bill of Oblivion, in which they had made so good a Progress, might be expedited; that the People might see and know his Majesty's extraordinary gracious Care to ease and free them from their Doubts and Fears, and that he had not forgotten his gracious Declaration made at Breda, but that he would in all Points make good the same.

The Convention having now the Effence of a Parliament, tho' not the exact Form, proceeded in the great Affairs that lay before them, with all Diligence and Vigour. They had, among others, three great Points to bring to Perfection, the general Act of Indemnity, the disbanding of the Army, and the settling the publick Revenues. The first was judged most necessary to begin withal: The Commons would not look upon themselves or the People of England, as freed from that Guilt and Punishment which the unhappy Times had contracted, unless they laid hold on his Majesty's Grace, mentioned in his Declaration from Breda; and therefore they resolved, that the House doth declare, that they do in the Name of themselves, and all the Commons of England, lay hold on his Majesty's gracious Pardon, mention'd in his Declaration, with Exception to such as shall be excepted in an Act of Pardon. And accordingly a Declaration was drawn up, and solemnly presented to the King in the Banqueting House, by Mr. Denzil Hollis. Another of the same kind was presented by the House of Lords; both of which were graciously accepted by the King.

About that Time he issued out a Proclamation, declaring, That all such of the late King's Judges, as did not render themselves within fourteen Days, should be excepted out of the general Pardon. Upon this several surrender'd themselves, while some made their Escapes, and others were taken in their Flight. At the same Time several of the most eminent Officers under the Usurpation, for their greater Security, got their particular Pardons exemplified under the Great Seal of England: And the King, out of his own good Nature, and by the Advice of those excellent Ministers he had about him, was very ready to grant those Pardons, as an Earnest of that free and general Amnesty, which he promoted with so much Solitude, the Act of Oblivion. About the same Time he published a Proclamation to suppress and discourage Vice, Profaneness and Debauchery, which the immoderate Joy of the Times had but too much propagated. It only were to be wished, he had better enforced his Proclamation by his own Example.

The King's excellent Conduct.

He was now one of the greatest and happiest Princes that ever lived, reigning over a loving and a loyal People; adored at home, and

His Felicity.

A.D. 1660. and feared and respected abroad. He was daily receiving the Addresses of his People, and the Congratulations of foreign Princes and States, for the Blessings that Providence had showered upon him. The Stream of Affairs returned with Rapidity into its former Channel. Those Towns and Corporations that had bought out their Fee-farm Rents formerly belonging to the Crown, which by the Commonwealth had been alienated from it, sent their Deputies to the King, with a voluntary Surrender of them. Others presented him with Sums of Gold, and other Gifts, according to their respective Abilities. And that the Splendor of outward Appearance might answer to the real and solid Happiness of the Times, himself, with his two Brothers, his Privy Council, great Officers, and the Houses of Parliament, were upon a solemn Invitation entertained by the City of London at Guildhall, with a publick Magnificence, suited to the Wealth and Greatness of that renowned City, and the Dignity of the illustrious Guests.

The Act of Oblivion obstructed.

The Parliament in the mean Time proceeded with the Act of Oblivion, but met with several Obstructions, arising from the Animosities of some, who remembering the Injuries they had formerly received, were unseasonably severe to the Authors of them. The King was too well counselled to suffer private Passions or Resentments to stand in the Way of so general a Good, and applied himself with great Assiduity to remove the Difficulties attending it. He was the more concerned to expedite this important Act, because some ill affected Persons had in Pamphlets aspersed him with Insinuations, that he intended nothing less than the Performance of his Promises from Breda. This caused him to send a Message to the House of Commons by Secretary Morrice, to quicken their Debates about the Act of Indemnity. This Message was couched in those obliging Terms, in which the King corresponded with his Parliament at this happy Time. The Scope of it was, to let them know his earnest Desire to see this Act perfected, and to acquaint them with one particular Reason that made him the more pressing; namely, that the Delay of this Bill gave Occasion to ill affected Persons to insinuate, that he had forgot his Offer of a free and general Pardon, mentioned in his Declaration: That it being so near his Heart, he could not forbear earnestly recommending the passing of it as soon as possible; and that he knew they would do it the sooner for his Recommendation.

The King's gracious Interposition therein.

The Debates of the House of Commons were so much quickened by this Message, that they dispatched the Bill in a very short Time, and sent it up to the Lords. But the two Houses could not agree in the Exceptions to be made to this Act. The Commons had excepted only a few of the most notorious Regicides; but the Lords, among whom there were very few whose Families had not suffered by the Iniquity of the late Times, had a more feeling Remembrance of those Farther obstructed in the House of Lords.

Injuries. They were besides incited by the Complaints of the Widows and Relations of those who had lost their Lives by the late usurped Powers. So that they entered into a Consultation to except all from Pardon who had sat in a high Court of Justice. But this Severity, which was more just than seasonable, gave the King some Uneasiness. He found that the Debates occasioned by this rigorous Justice, much obstructed the speeding and perfecting the Bill he desired so much to have finished; and therefore July 27, he came to the House, and made a Speech upon that Subject; which tended to let them know, that when he sent his Declaration from Breda, it was his Intention to pardon all who had not been immediately concerned in his Father's Murther, and that he should take it well, if they themselves would allow of no other Exceptions.

This Speech, at the same Time that it forwarded the Bill, gave great Satisfaction to the People, who were extremely delighted to see, that the King, who had been most injured, was the readiest to forgive.

At the same Time the King took no less Care of the Benefit and Revenues of the Church, especially with Relation to poor Vicarages, and other Endowments, and wrote Letters to all the Bishops, Deans and Chapters in the Kingdom, testifying his Will and Pleasure, That no Lease be granted of any Rectory or Parsonage, belonging to any of them, or their Successors, unless they first provided, that the respective Vicarages, or Curates Places, where no Vicarages are endowed, have so much Revenues in Glebe Lands, or other Emoluments, as commonly will amount to eighty Pounds per Annum, or more, if it will bear it: And where the Rectories are of small Value, and cannot admit of such Portion to the Vicar or Curate, that then one half of the Profits of such Rectory, be reserved for the Maintenance of such Vicar or Curate, &c. All which being communicated to the House of Commons, new Thanks were returned by them to the King, in which they particularly testified the great Joy they took in the Goodness and Favour he had expressed to his People in general, and the Church in particular; after which they proceeded to prepare such a Bill as should best answer the King's pious Intentions.

A.D. 1660.

The King again interposes.

The King's Care of the Church and Clergy.

For which he receives the Thanks of the Commons.

Within a few Days after the Parliament completed the much desired Act of Indemnity. By this Act two Things were intended; the first to give Quiet and Security to such various and numerous Offenders as must needs be found after so universal a Defection; the second, to bury for ever the Remembrance of the past Troubles and Divisions. In order to blot out the Memory of former Animosities, a Clause was inserted, "That if any Person objected against any other any Words of Reproach, tending to revive the Memory of the late Differences, he should pay ten Pounds, if a Gentleman; and forty Shillings, if one of a more inferior Degree". The Indemnity given by this Act was almost universal, the

The Act of Indemnity completed. The Purport and Use of it.

Excepti-

A.D. 1660. Exceptions respecting only those who had had an immediate Hand in the Murther of the late King; as Roe, Garland, Harvey, Smith, Martin, Waller, Titchburn, Fleetwood, J. Temple, Wait, Meyn, Heveningham, Pennington, P. Temple, Lilburn, Millington, Potter, Wogan, Downs, Scroop, Lisle, Say, Walton, Harrison, Whally, Barkstead, Ludlow, Livesey, Okey, Hewson, Goffe, Holland, Chaloner, Carew, Jones, Corbet, Clement, Scot, Cawley, Love, Dixwell, Blagrove, Cook, Broughton, Dendy, Hewlet, Peters, Hacker, Axtell, and those two disguised upon the Scaffold the 30th of January, 1648. All these, with Sir Henry Vane, and Colonel John Lambert, were wholly excluded for Life and Estate. The Estates of Cromwell, Bradshaw, Ireton, Pride, and one and twenty others who were dead, were made liable to such Penalties and Forfeitures, as by another Act should be ordained. Some other Exceptions of less Importance were also made.

An Act to confirm Judicial Proceedings.

Another Law was exceedingly requisite at this Time, to confirm the Judicial Proceedings that had passed since the Beginning of the Rebellion, under Commissions from the different usurping Powers. The endless Confusions that must arisen from the unsettling the judicial Sentences of twenty Years together, are too obvious to be insisted on. Therefore the Wisdom of the Parliament provided such an Act, as a proper Attendant on that of Indemnity.

An Act to pay off the Soldiers and Mariners.

By this all Proceedings in Law, Equity, &c. since the first of May, 1642. were confirmed, notwithstanding any Defect of legal Power, or Difference in Style or Title; but with some Restrictions, especially as to Crown and Church Lands. This was attended with a third Act for a Provision of Money, to pay off the Armies and Navy, which was by an extraordinary Poll, variously comprehending Persons of all Ranks and Conditions. To these was added a fourth, for restraining the taking of excessive Usury, which made it highly penal to any that should take above six Pounds for the Loan of a hundred Pounds for a Year; and to any Scrivener or Broker that should take above five Shillings for the same, or above twelve Pence for the making or renewing a Bond or Bill. A fifth Act was for a perpetual Anniversary Thanksgiving on the Twenty Ninth Day of May, the Day of his Majesty's Nativity and Restoration.

An Act for a Thanksgiving on the 29th of May.

The Army disbanded.

After these Acts were passed, the Parliament had yet several Affairs of Importance to proceed with. The first was to disband the Army and Garrisons, and to pay off the Wages due to the Fleet; the second, the settling the Revenue of the Crown. The first was necessary even before the other, it being natural to consider, that the same Army which brought the King in, might send him away again. And he was now so firmly settled in the Hearts of his People, that as he needed not the Military Power to secure him, so it was dangerous to be subject to their Caprice. It was indeed great Pity, that it should be so necessary to disband that noble Body of Men, who did Honour to their Country, from their resolute Courage, their regular Discipline, and exemplary Sobriety. With a Military Skill and Bravery that would carry Victory through the World, they lived like good Citizens in the City, and like good Husbandmen in the Countrey, and were nowhere terrible but in the Field. Those Vices which are now so frequent among the Soldiery, were either unknown or detested in that Army. But the Danger and Expence of maintaining such a Force, were very just as well as powerful Reasons for dismissing it.

The settling the Revenue of the Crown was like to take up so much Time, that it could not be finished before the Recess which was expected. It was therefore put off till the next Meeting, and in the mean Time the Parliament went upon other Bills of less Importance; which being finished, and having received the Royal Assent, the Parliament adjourned themselves for two Months.

During the Parliament's Recess, those of the Regicides who could be taken, or had surrendered themselves, were brought to Trial. Two of them pleaded Guilty, and the rest were easily convicted. Ten of them, namely, Harrison, Carew, Cook, Peters, Scot, Clement, Scroop, Jones, Hacker and Axtell were executed, either for the Flagrancy of their Crimes, or their Justification of them at their Trial. The rest having acknowledged their Offences, and throwing themselves on the King's Mercy, had their Lives spared.

The Regicides tried and executed.

The King and his Ministry had another Care besides those hitherto mentioned, which required their utmost Dexterity and Attention; namely, the giving Satisfaction to those of the several religious Persuasions. The Dissenters had great Hopes of kind Usage, from the Lenity and Tenderness of the King's Declaration from Breda; and the Affection and kind Concern for his Subjects, which appeared in all his publick Acts hitherto. The Presbyterians had more particular Encouragement from the Respect and Civility the King shewed them when in Holland. To give Quiet to this Part of the Nation, the King published a healing Declaration on the 25th of October, in which he made the following Orders by Way of Concession to the Dissenters. 1. For the more strict Observation of the Lord's Day, and to encourage the frequent Preaching of Bishops. 2. For appointing Suffragan Bishops, especially in the larger Dioceses. 3. That no Bishop ordain or exercise Church-Censure, without the Advice and Assistance of the Presbyters; and that Lay-Officers be excluded in Matters purely Spiritual. 4. That Deans and Chapters be better fitted to afford Counsel and Assistance to the Bishop in Ordinations, and other Spiritual Matters. 5. That rural Deans be assisting in Confirmation, Admission to the Lords Supper, and Catechising. 6. That no Bishop exercise any Power, or impose any Thing, but according to the known Laws of the Land. 7. To appoint some learned Men to review and amend the Liturgy; and to prohibit any Punishment for the

A healing Declaration issued by the King.

A.D. 1660. the Difuse of it. 8. To leave Persons at Liberty, as to kneeling at the Sacrament, the Cross in Baptism, bowing at the Name of Jesus, and the Oath of Canonical Obedience.

In the mean Time the Church of England and Episcopacy, gradually revived in the Nation; tho' the Bishops themselves, by Reason of the Act of Parliament in 1641, remained still excluded from the House of Peers. It is observable, that only nine of the old Bishops survived the Times of Confusion, who now all recovered their Episcopal Sees; William Juxon, Bishop of London; William Pierce, Bishop of Bath and Wells; Robert Skinner, Bishop of Oxford; John Warner, Bishop of Rochester; William Roberts, Bishop of Bangor; Matthew Wren, Bishop of Ely; Brian Duppa, Bishop of Salisbury; Henry King, Bishop of Chichester; and Accepted Frewen, Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry. Of these in a short Time, Juxon was translated to the See of Canterbury, Frewen to that of York, Duppa to Winchester, and Skinner to that of Worcester. Seven or eight others were consecrated this Year, and appointed to their respective Bishopricks; as John Cosens to that of Durham, William Lucy to St. David's, Benjamin Laney to Peterborough, Richard Sterne to Carlisle, Hugh Lloyd to Landaff, Brian Walton to Chester, and John Gauden to Exeter. About the same Time several of the Presbyterian Ministers were invited to Church Preferments; Mr. Calamy had the Bishoprick of Litchfield and Coventry offered him, Doctor Reynolds that of Norwich, and Mr. Baxter that of Hereford: Doctor Manton was offered the Deanry of Rochester, Doctor Bates the Deanry of Litchfield and Coventry, and Mr. Bowles the Deanry of York. But all refused on the Account of the uncertain Continuance of the Terms of the Declaration; except Doctor Reynolds, who accepted the Bishoprick of Norwich, and continued about sixteen Years in that See. These Bishops, tho' they were still kept from their Places and Votes in Parliament, were fully restored to their spiritual Jurisdiction, and all other Rights and Ordination, Institution, Censures, &c. So that the established Church daily recover'd its former Authority, and began to shine with its usual Splendor.

The Duke of Gloucester dies.

Meeting of the Royal Family.

On September 13. died of the Small Pox, Henry Duke of Gloucester, third Brother to the King, about the 22<sup>d</sup> Year of his Age, with the hearty Grief of all good Men; he being an excellent young Person, Religious, Brave and Prudent, and endued with all those Accomplishments that promise a wife and happy Ruler. This great Loss cast a Cloud over the Joy arising from the Meeting, which happened soon after, of the whole Royal Family, now restored to Happiness and Security, after a long Train of Misfortunes and Distresses for almost 20 Years. The Day after his Death, the Princess of Orange, Mother of the late King William III. came over into England to visit her Royal Brothers; and having had so great a Share of their Troubles, to take some Part also of their Prosperity. She was soon succeeded by the Queen A.D. 1660. Mother, who arrived here a few Days after from France, with her Daughter Henrietta Maria. These were on the second Day of November conducted to Whitehall. This last was a Visit not only of Kindness, but of Policy; her Business being to promote a Match between her Daughter, and Monsieur, the French King's Brother; and also to help forward another for the King himself. She is said to have proposed the famous Hortensia Mancini, Niece to the Cardinal Mazarin, with a Portion of twenty Millions of Livres. But that Match being below the King's Dignity, and otherwise improper, she promoted the Match with the Infanta of Portugal, which had been set on Foot before. During her Stay, she made her utmost Efforts to get Chancellor Hyde removed, but to little Effect, which made her uneasy. She continued here about three Months, at which Time she returned to France. The Remembrance of the Misfortunes her Pride and Bigottry helped to bring upon the Nation in the late Reign, made her Presence very little desired, or her Absence regretted by the Generality of the People.

September 30. At the publick Entry of the Swedish Ambassador, happened a terrible Rencounter on Tower-Hill, between the French and Spanish Ambassadors, in a Dispute for Precedence. In this Skirmish, the Spaniard got the better: but the Resentment of the French King broke out so furiously, that to prevent a War his Country was not able to sustain, the King of Spain was obliged to pacifie him by a formal Resignation of the Precedence upon all other like Occasions.

The Parliament met November 6. according to the former Adjournment; and one of the first Things done by the House of Commons was, the Appointment of a Committee to attend the Queen Mother with a congratulatory Message, representing the Joy and Contentment this House had received on Occasion of her Majesty's Return to England. To which the Queen in her Answer, acknowledged with Thankfulness the Expressions of the House; desiring the Continuance of their Respects, which, she said, she should never fail to do what lay in her Part to deserve. The Compliment of the Commons was seconded with a Present of ten Thousand Pounds, made to her Daughter Henrietta Maria; as likewise the same Sum to the Prince of Orange, which proved very acceptable at this Time. They proceeded next to disband the Army, whose Continuance was both dangerous and expensive. After that they began with considering of the Revenue to be settled on the King, and agreed upon the Sum of 12000000 l. yearly. For this Vote they received the King's particular Thanks, with Assurance, that he would employ his Revenue for the good of them and the Kingdom. It was at the same Time ordered, that the Bodies of Oliver Cromwell, John Bradshaw, Henry Ireton, and Thomas Pride, should be taken out of their Graves,

The Commons compliment the Q. Mother.

drawn

A.D.1660. drawn on a Hurdle to Tyburn, there to be hanged up, from ten of the Clock till Sun-set, and then be buried under the Gallows. They made besides, an Act for attainting the Blood and Estates of these four, and also the nineteen Regicides who were fled. These last were adjudged guilty, and attainted of High Treason.

A remarkable Transaction.

While the King's Revenue was settling in Parliament, a remarkable Accident happened. Some Persons, whether over-zealous Loyalists, or servile Parasites, had laid a Project to settle by Parliament such a Revenue on the King during Life, as should make it needless for him to depend upon a Parliament for more. The King, and all the unthinking or ill designing Courtiers came into it; and even the good Earl of Southampton, out of perfect Affection to the King, joyned in the Project. But Chancellor Hyde opposed it, which produced a Conference between himself and the Earl. The Chancellor being earnest to bring the Earl to his Opinion, told him, that his long and intimate Acquaintance with the King made him better acquainted with his Temper, than the Earl could be: That he knew the King so well, that if such a Revenue were once settled, they two would become useless; and few Sessions of Parliament were to be expected afterward. This brought over that hearty and unbiassed Patriot; but it coming out, as the most secret Things sometimes do, stuck so by the King, that it induced him to abandon the Chancellor to his Enemies some Years after.

The Parliament dissolved.

Act passed for taking away the Court of Wards.

After a Session of two Months, the King came to the House of Peers December 29. to pass the Bills ready for his Assent, and to dissolve the Parliament. One remarkable Act amongst them, was for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, together with Tenures in Capite, Knights Service, and Purveyance. This put a final End to those many slavish Customs and Dependances that had shackled our Country so long; which having been before broke into, and made to give Place to better Constitutions, were at this Time entirely taken away in this last Remnant of them, and left the English Nation perfectly free and independent.

The Felicity of the Time.

Thus ended the famous Convention about eight Months after the first Meeting, and seven after the Restoration, when it received the Name of Parliament. In the happy Correspondence that appeared at that Time between the King and Parliament, the English Constitution shewed it self in the Perfection of its Beauty; a King blessed in his People's Love, and a People in their Prince's tender Care. The Hearts of the Subjects were so entirely the King's, that they seemed to think nothing too much for them to grant, or him to receive. And the King, surrounded by some of the best Ministers that ever Prince or Country was blessed with, was not wanting in any Demonstration of reciprocal Affection. And those excellent Counsellors not only cultivated this mutual Kindness, but with the utmost Prudence took Care to watch against all future Inconveniences. The A.D.1660. over-flowing Joy of most Men pushed them on to make, or to allow, such great Concessions to the King, that our Liberties had been utterly ruined, if by a Chance, not very frequent, the Government of the Nation had not been directed by some of the best Men in it. But these worthy Patriots saw the Danger that few other Men observed, and by all prudent Methods opposed such pernicious Loyalty. And to the unspeakable Benefit of both Prince and Country, the Influence of these great Men continued, till a firm and secure Establishment was made of our happy Constitution in Church and State.

While the King was busily employed in settling and establishing the grand Affairs of England, in this memorable Year, he was no Ways negligent with Respect to the Peace and Happiness of his two other Kingdoms Affairs of Scotland. As to Scotland, the English Commissioners having been employed as Judges for the Government of that Nation, and having had their Commissions continued for some Time after the King's Restoration, they were at Length, by Letters from the Duke of Albemarle, acquainted with the King's Pleasure, That from the 22<sup>d</sup> of August they should cease to act in this their judicatory Power, in Regard that Kingdom was thenceforth to be reduced to its antient Form of Government; in order to which, Proclamation was made in the King's Name, for the speedy convening of the Committee of the Three Estates of Scotland; and a Parliament also was to be called there within a few Months. In the Interim, the chief Ministers of State were constituted: The Earl of Glencarn was made Lord Chancellor; the Lord Crawford Lindsey, Lord Treasurer; the Earl of Cassiles, Justice General; the Earl of Lauderdale, chief Secretary of State; and General Middleton, the King's Commissioner; with several others. The Committee of Estates being assembled, made it their first Care to keep all Things in Peace and full Obedience to the present Government. For notwithstanding the late Unanimity of the People at Edinburgh, as well as at other Places, in the publick proclaiming of the King; yet after a short Space, a Spirit of Discontent began to discover it self among certain prime Ministers of the Kirk Party, as appeared by their meeting together at an appointed Place, for the drawing up, a Remonstrance concerning certain Things, in which they thought themselves aggrieved: Of which the Committee of Estates having Notice, sent immediately to apprehend them, and secured them in Prison: And to prevent the like Disturbance for the future, they set forth a Proclamation against all unlawful Meetings and seditious Papers. The like Imprisonment happened also to their Countryman, the famous Marquess of Argyll; who notwithstanding that he came to the English Court, with other of the Scotch Nobility and Gentry, upon Pretence of rendering his Service to the King, was found so culpable, that he was committed to the Tower for Tower.

A.D. 1660. for High Treason, and afterwards sent to be tried in his own Country.

But to make a perfect Settlement of the Peace and Prosperity of Scotland, as well as England, the King thought it necessary to summon a Parliament to meet at Edinburgh the 12th Day of December. And to prepare the Way, he issued out a Proclamation in that Kingdom, which shew'd him to be of the same Disposition in all his Dominions. By this he solemnly declared, that he rely'd so much on the Loyalty, Prudence and Care of his Parliament, as absolutely to commit to them the trying and judging the Carriage of his Subjects during the late Troubles, concerning which he would receive Addresses and Informations only from his Parliament, or Committee of Estates. To whom in the mean Time, he recommended the ordering and preparing that Affair, and to whom alone any of his People that were interested, might freely, and should only, make their Application; assuring them, that his own Honour once vindicated, and the ancient Prerogatives of the Crown once asserted, he would grant such a full and free Pardon, such an Act of Indemnity, as might witness, that he desired nothing more than that his People should be settled with abundance of Happiness, Peace and Plenty under his Government.

Affairs of
Ireland.

As to the Kingdom of Ireland, the King very early issued out his Proclamation against all Disturbers of the Peace in those Parts, and with good Effect; and Colonel Eyres, who had endeavoured to raise a Party there, was soon reduced by Sir Charles Coot. The Convention that had assembled in that Kingdom upon the Change of Government, as soon as they had taken Order for the settling of the publick Affairs, and had appointed certain Commissioners to wait upon the King with their congratulatory Addresses, thought fit to dissolve themselves, in Expectation of the King's Pleasure for the calling of a full Parliament, and to make Way for the ancient Constitution of the Government by a Lord Lieutenant, as had been determined by the King and his Council. But in the mean Time, for the present Government of that Kingdom, the King made Sir Maurice Eustace Knight, Lord Chancellor of Ireland; Roger Earl of Orrery, Lord President of Munster; and Charles Earl of Montraith, Lord President of Connaught, to be Lords Justices, who managed and governed there with great Candor and Moderation. So that there was now a general Quiet throughout the King's Dominions.

Insurrection of the Fifth-Monarchy
Men.

While the Nation seemed to be in Peace and Tranquillity, in the Beginning of the new Year there happened a strange Disturbance in London, which took its Rise from the following Cause. Among the Extravagancies which the Confusions of the late Times produced, there sprung up a Set who were called Fifth-Monarchy Men, from the Kingdom said to be set up by God, Dan. ii. v. 44. which was to succeed the four great Monarchies that have been in the World.

These Men took it in their Heads to expect A.D. 1660. this Kingdom in a visible Manner, in their own Times; and moreover, that they themselves were to be the Instruments of beginning this Reign of the Saints upon the Earth. In Consequence of this Expectation they became utter Enemies to all Monarchies of any other kind; and had formerly made an Attempt against Cromwell's Government, but escaped very unexpectedly. The Head of them was one Thomas Venner, sometimes a Wine-Cooper, who by the King's Indulgence held a Conventicle in Coleman-street. At this Place he and others used to preach. And because ignorant Enthusiasts chuse to descant upon those Parts of Scripture which they are least capable of understanding, the Subject of their Discourses used to be the Prophecy of Daniel, and the Revelations. From these Scriptures Venner persuaded himself and his Congregation, that the Time of our Saviour's visible Reign on Earth was come, and therefore that it was their Duty to take up Arms for King Jesus against the Powers of the World; that no Weapon formed against them should prosper, but that one should chase a Thousand, and two put ten Thousand to Flight. 'Tis hard, if not impossible, to broach an Opinion so absurd, that will not find Followers. These mad Exhortations wrought so upon his Auditory, that they seriously undertook this wild Enterprize; and fewer than sixty Men set themselves in good Earnest about conquering the World. They first got a Declaration printed, entitled, A Door of Hope open'd; in which they declared that they would never sheath their Swords till Babylon, as they called Monarchy, became a Hissing and a Curse, and there be left neither Remnant, Son, nor Nephew: That when they had led Captivity Captive in England, they would go into France, Spain, Germany, &c. And rather dye than take the wicked Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance: That they would not make any Leagues with Monarchists, but would rise up against the Carnal, to possess the Gate of the World, to bind their Kings in Chains, and their Nobles in Fetters of Iron. It is strange that Men who could have so little Wisdom as to enter upon so extravagant a Design, should have so much as to take any sober Measures for the compassing it. Yet these Men had the Policy to begin to put it in Execution when the King was absent from London, being gone to attend his Mother and Sister to embark at Portsmouth, for their Return into France. Accordingly on Sunday the 6th of January, being fully animated by the Sermon which hinted to them, that they had been praying and preaching, but not acting for God; they sallied out well armed from their Meeting-House, and marched to St. Paul's Church-yard in the Dark of the Evening. Here they mustered their Party, amounting to above fifty, and placed their Centinels for the Time. One of them kill'd a poor innocent Man, who being stopped and asked who he was for, made Answer, He was for God and King Charles. This alarmed

Their Declaration.

Their first Appearance.

A.D. 1660. alarmed the City; and the Train'd-Bands being upon the Guard, the Lord-Mayor sent some Files of Men against them. But these desperate Men quickly routed them, and then marched on to Bishopsgate, where they passed without Opposition; and from thence to Cripplegate, where they came into the City again, and so to Aldersgate. Here threatening the Constable who was weakly attended, they were let out again. Then they declared themselves for King Jesus, and thus proceeded to Beech-Lane, where they killed a Headborough that opposed them. Thence they went to Cane-Wood, about four Miles from the City, between Highbury and Hampstead, where they spent their Time for that Night.

The Noise of this extraordinary Insurrection caused the General to send thither a Party of Horse and Foot the next Day, who drove them out of the Wood, and took some of them Prisoners, who were committed to the Gate-house. The rest having rallied again, on Wednesday Morning appeared in London, with Assurance by Venner their Leader, that no Weapon formed against them should prosper: Therefore that they might look upon the Example of Gideon; for it was the same Thing to God, whether he saved by a few or a Multitude. Their first Appearance was in Threadneedle-street, behind the Exchange, where they were met by a Party of the Guard whom they beat back. But upon the Advance of more Forces, they retreated to Bishopsgate street; where after a sharp Encounter, two of each Side being slain, they gradually slipped away and disappeared. A while after they were seen again at Colledge-Hill and Maiden-Lane, where they designed to murder the Lord-Mayor. But missing of him, they cross'd Cheapside, and pass'd into Woodstreet. Here they were met by the Trained-Bands, and there began a cruel Fight, in which these wild Enthusiasts shewed great Skill as well as Valour; and having ruffled some Train'd-Bands, and repelled the Horse Guards that came to assist them, they would not give Way, till Venner was knock'd down, and severely wounded; and Tuffney and Cragg, two of their fiercest Preachers and Combatants, were slain: but the greatest Part of them retreated to Cripplegate, yet firing in good Order in their Rear upon the Train'd Bands, as they pursued them. Ten of them were lodged in an Alehouse near the Postern, where getting into an upper Room, they obstinately maintained their Post. Some of the Soldiers untiled the next House, and shot in upon them, but they still refused Quarter. At the same Time another Party of Musketiers got up the Stairs, broke the Door, and entered their Garrison. Six of them had been killed before; another refusing Quarter, was first knocked down, and then shot with a Musket: The rest were made Prisoners. These being asked why they did not beg Quarter before, answered, they durst not for fear their own Fellows should have shot them. In this Insurrection twenty of the King's Men were slain, and as many of the Rebels. Those taken were Venner himself, Hodgkins, Gowler, Allen, Pym, Ashton, Prichard, Fall, Hopkins, Wells and about as many more not much worth the naming; who blasphemously alledged, that if they were deceived or misled, 'twas God that deceived them.

These, to the Number of Twenty, were soon after arraigned at the Old-Bailey for Treason and Murder; which being fully proved, with all the forementioned Particulars, they were all found guilty except Hopkins and Wells, against whom the Evidence was not full; and against one Patshul, only a single Witness. At the passing of the Sentence and Execution, they all behaved themselves with the same Extravagance with which they began their Undertaking; one young Man excepted, who shewed great Signs of Repentance.

April 22. The King was crowned with a Magnificence answerable to the Wealth and Greatness of his Realms, and the Happiness and Glory of the Times. To this End he made several Peers and Knights of the Garter, together with sixty eight Knights of the Bath. We omit the Names of these Gentlemen, and an Account of the Ceremonies of the Coronation, as not consistent with our intended Brevity.

About that Time a very laudable Design was set on Foot; namely, the procuring a friendly Conference between the Divines of the Church of England, and those of the Presbyterian Persuasion. It was hoped that the Peace of the present, and the Remembrance of the Miseries of the past Times, might so dispose Men to a healing Temper, that the Differences in Religion, which had so great a Part in the late Confusions, might be amicably compromised. The King issued out a Commission directed to twelve Bishops, and nine Episcopal Divines as Assistants, on one Side; and to twelve Presbyterian Divines as Principals, and nine others as Assistants on the other Side. The Bishops were Frewen of York, Cosens of Durham, Sheldon of London, Warner of Rocheſter, King of Chicheſter, Henchman of Salisbury, Morley of Worceſter, Sanderſon of Lincoln, Laney of Peterborough, Walton of Cheſter, Sterne of Carlisle, and Gauden of Exeter: Their Assistants were Doctor Earl, Doctor Hexlyn, Doctor Hacket, Doctor Barwick, Doctor Gunning, Doctor Pearson, Doctor Price, Doctor Sparrow, and Mr. Thorn. The twelve Presbyterian Divines were Doctor Reynolds, Doctor Tuckney, Doctor Conant, Doctor Spurſlow, Doctor Wallis, Doctor Manton, Mr. Calamy, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Cafe, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Newcomen: Their Assistants were Doctor Horton, Doctor Bates, Doctor Jacomb, Doctor Lightfoot, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Collins, Mr. Drake, Mr. Rawlinſon, and Mr. Woodbridge. All these were commissioned by the King to act for four Months from the 25th of March; and more particularly to advise upon, and review the Book of Common-Prayer, comparing the same with the most ancient Liturgies which have been

They encounter the Trained-Bands, but are all killed, or taken Prisoners.

A.D. 1660.

They are tried convicted and executed.

A.D. 1661.
The King's Coronation.

The Conference at the Savoy.

A.D. 1661. been us'd in the Church in the primitive and purest Times, and to take into their serious and grave Considerations the several Directions and Rules, Forms of Prayer, and Things in the said Book of Common-Prayer contained; and to consult and advise upon and about the same, and the several Objections and Exceptions which shall now be rais'd against the same; and if occasion be, to make such reasonable and necessary Alterations, Corrections and Amendments, as shall be agreed upon to be needful and expedient for giving Satisfaction to tender Consciences, and the Restoring and Continuance of Peace and Unity in the Churches under his Majesty's Government and Protection. And to certify to his Majesty in Writing under their several Hands, the Matters and Things whereupon they shall so determine.

The Bishop of London's Lodgings in the Savoy were appointed to be the Place of Conference; where they accordingly assembled. But this excellent Design did not meet with a suitable Issue. Some few Alterations were made in the Liturgy, at the Motion of the Presbyterians. But whatever the Reason was, there was so little Openness and so much Distrust on both Sides, that after much vain Altercation, they parted in about two Months, farther from Agreement than they met. To pass Sentence in this Case on either Side as blameable, would be not only invidious but presumptuous. If we suppose in both Parties a great Mixture of humane Infirmary, we shall probably come nearest the Truth.

The Parliament met on the 8th of May, which continued with several Intermissions for seventeen Years; whence it had the Name of the Long Parliament. Its Appearance was fair and promising, the House of Commons being filled with some of the greatest and wisest Men in the King's Dominions; true Friends to their Prince, and hearty Lovers of their Countrey. The Commons having first waited on the King, returned to their House and chose Sir Edward Turner Speaker; a worthy and eloquent Person.

The King having acquainted the Parliament in his Speech, that he had Thoughts of marrying the Infanta of Portugal, both Houses came to a Vote and Resolution concerning the King's intended Marriage, and accordingly attended him at Whitehall with their humble Acknowledgment and Thanks, for the free and gracious Communication of his Resolution to marry with the Infanta of Portugal; which they conceiv'd to be of so high a Concernment to this Nation, that they receiv'd it with great Joy and Satisfaction, and did with all Earnestness beg a Blessing upon, and a speedy Accomplishment of it; and they cou'd not but express their own unanimous Resolutions, which they were confident wou'd have a general Influence upon the Hearts of all his Subjects: That they should upon all Occasions be ready to assist his Majesty in the Pursuance of these his Intentions, against all Oppositions whatsoever. To which the King return'd A.D. 1661. his particular Thanks, declaring, that he did in the Matter of the intended Marriage, as much study their Good as his own.

While this was transacting, the House of Commons order'd all their Members to receive the Sacrament according to the prescribed Liturgy, within a certain Time; upon Pain of being prohibited the House. Then proceeding with the same Zeal, and joining with the House of Peers, on the 20th of May they order'd, that the Instrument of Writing that had caus'd so much Mischief, call'd the solemn League and Covenant, should be burnt by the Hand of the common Hangman, in the Palace-yard at Westminster, in Cheapside, and before the Old Exchange, on the 22<sup>d</sup> of May; and be forthwith taken off the Record in the House of Peers, and all other Courts and Places where the same is recorded; and that all Copies thereof be taken down out of all Churches, Chapels, and all other publick Places in England and Wales. All which was perform'd in Triumph. A few Days after, on May 28, the Act for erecting a High Court of Justice, for trying and judging of Charles Stuart, was burnt by the Hands of the common Hangman in the midst of Westminster-Hall, while the Courts were sitting. Likewise the Act for subscribing the Engagement against a King and House of Peers; another for declaring the People of England to be a Commonwealth and Free State; another for renouncing the Title of Charles Stuart; and also another for the Security of the Lord Protector's Person, were all burnt with the same solemn Abhorrence and Detestation.

During the Debate of the House of Commons on these Subjects, and Matters of the like Nature, the warm Mr. Prynne, against the Privilege of the House, could not withhold from publishing certain Reasons against an intended Bill for regulating Corporations, as contrary to Magna Charta. This was so resented by the House, that after a severe Censure he was obliged to make a publick Submission and Recantation, which, to the Surprise of all that knew his turbulent and obstinate Spirit, he yielded to. And had not his Services in the King's Restoration been very signal, he had scarce escaped so easily.

The good Correspondence between the King and the Parliament made some late Offenders apprehensive. They feared that the King might be moved to call them still to account for former Transgressions; and that the Shelter of the late Act of Oblivion might be taken from them, under Pretence that the Parliament that enacted it was not called by the King's Writ. Therefore they solicited the King for a Confirmation of it by the present Parliament; which his Majesty, who had no other Intentions than to observe it, promised to procure for them. To this End June 20. the King sent the House of Commons a Letter to remind them of this Act, and to recommend to them the Confirmation of it.

This Letter had its intended Effect in prevailing

The Solemn League and Covenant burnt.

And other Acts of the late Times.

Mr. Prynne censured.

A new Act of Oblivion.

A.D. 1661. vailing with the Commons, and obliging the People. But before they entered upon it, they resolv'd to look to the King's Revenue, in order to settle upon him so much as might maintain the Splendor of the Regal Office, and preserve the Crown from Want and the Contempt of its Neighbours. They therefore order'd, that there be provided forthwith a plentiful Supply for his Majesty's present great Occasions, as well as a Settlement of a constant and standing Revenue; and accordingly order'd a Bill to be brought in, to enable his Majesty to send out Commissions to receive the free and voluntary Contributions of his People towards his Majesty's present Supply.

This Bill, and that for Confirmation of the Act of Oblivion, being gone thro' the Houses, the King pass'd them on the 8th of July.

All this Time the Parliament proceeded with Vigour in finishing the other Bills projected and intended; and tho' the Act of Indemnity was the King's Favourite Act, yet they resolv'd to consider the Honour of his injur'd Father in some Particulars, and so proceeded to the Confiscation of the Estates of twenty one Regicides deceas'd, viz. Pelham, Skippon, Edwards, Constable, Dean, Danvers, Moore, Alured, Stapeley, Fry, Allen, Maleverer, Blakestone, Hammond, Burchier, Horton, Purefoy, Norton, Ewer, Ven, and Andrews. They likewise order'd the Lord Mounson, Sir Henry Mildmay and Mr. Robert Wallop, who had been favour'd, as the others had been reserv'd in the Act of Indemnity, to be brought to the Bar of the House of Commons; where confessing their Crimes, a Bill was order'd to be brought in to confiscate their Estates, as also of Sir James Harrington and John Phelps, not yet apprehended: And it was farther order'd, That the Lord Mounson, Sir James Harrington, and Sir Henry Mildmay, should be degraded of their several Honours and Titles, and that those now in Custody, and the other two, when apprehended, should all be drawn upon Sledges with Ropes about their Necks, from the Tower of London to and under the Gallows at Tyburn, and thence convey'd back to the Tower, there to remain Prisoners during their Lives. Which Sentences were solemnly executed upon the 30th of January following.

Bishops Seats in Parliament restored.

Parliament
prorogued.

By the 30th of July the Parliament had prepared other Bills for the Royal Assent. Of these two were particularly remarkable; the first to restore the Bishops to their Seats in Parliament; the second, to declare the sole Right of the Militia to be in the King; and they were pass'd by the King into Acts the same Day; after which the Parliament was prorogued.

The passing the Bill for restoring the Bishops to their Seats in Parliament completed the Re-establishment of the Church. Before the first Meeting of the present Parliament, it had been debated whether the Convocation should be called at the same Time; and the Arguments us'd against it had almost prevail'd. Dr. Heylyn, a Divine eminent for his great Parts, and high Notions of Church Power, is said to have removed the Hindrances that stood in the Way of the Meeting of that Assembly, so that the King sent out his Mandates for a Convocation of each Province; and they met accordingly the same Day with the Parliament. The Convocation at the Savoy promis'd them much Business, in the Consideration of those healing Schemes which were expected from the Divines there assembled. But it was the unhappy Fate of that Assembly to be haunted with a Spirit of Mistrust and Contradiction; and they were so far from agreeing upon any thing, that neither Side seems to have thought of doing so. So that the Convocation was only employ'd in drawing up a solemn Thanksgiving for the King's Birth-day and Restoration, the 29th of May, and another special Form of Prayer to be us'd on the 30th of January. This done, the President intimated to the Assembly the Want of a particular Form in the Liturgy for the Ministration of Baptism to those of riper Years; and referr'd it to a select Committee of both Houses.

They likewise proceeded to examine the Canons already made, and to consider of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and the Regulation of spiritual Courts and Officers; as also to form a Book of Articles of Enquiry to be us'd in the Visitation of every Bishop; with some other lesser Matters. Lastly, since the granting of Money was then their inherent Right, they made a particular Subscription for a Royal Benevolence to be presented to the King, and so broke up at the same Time with the Parliament.

Examine the Canons.

Break up.

While Affairs were carry'd with so much Ease and Success in England, the Parliament in Scotland proceeded with no less Satisfaction to the Court and loyal Party. And first they proceeded to rescind that great Engine of Trouble and Confusion, the Solemn League and Covenant; in which Case they expressly declar'd, that there is no Obligation upon this Kingdom by Covenant, Treaties, or otherwise to endeavour by Arms a Reformation of Religion in the Kingdom of England, or to meddle with the Government or Administration of that Kingdom. They commanded that none of his Majesty's Subjects presume, upon Pretext of any Authority whatsoever, to require a renewing or swearing to the said League and Covenant, or any other Covenants or publick Oaths concerning the Government of the Church or Kingdom, without his Majesty's special Warrant and Approbation. They next proceeded to declare the Power of the Militia to be in the King's Majesty alone, and after that they put a particular Brand upon the Act of the 16th of January 1647. which related to the Sale and Disposal of the King's Person, and declared that it was carried on and concluded by a prevalent Party, against the Judgment of many of his Majesty's loyal Subjects; and that it was a most sinful, disloyal, and unworthy Act, contrary to the Will

Solemn League and Covenant rescinded there.

A.D. 1661. Will and Commandment of God, contrary to all Laws divine and humane, contrary to the Duty and Allegiance of Subjects, contrary to all the Rules of Justice, Honour, Gratitude and Humanity, and highly reflecting on the Honour of this ancient Kingdom, and the Reputation of his Majesty's good Subjects therein. And therefore they do hereby annul and condemn the same for ever; and ordain it to be expung'd out of all Records, and never to be remember'd again but with due Abhorrence and Detestation.

Episcopacy restored in Scotland.

Episcopacy likewise reviv'd in this Kingdom as well as in England: In order to which Mr. James Sharp, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Barwell and Mr. Leighton, all in Presbyterian Orders, came to London; where after being ordain'd Deacons and Priests, they were consecrated Bishops by the Bishop of Winchester, with the Assistance of two other English Prelates. At the Solemnity they expressly disclaim'd the Validity of their former Ordination; and likewise procur'd a Proclamation declaring the King's Pleasure for restoring the Government of the Church by Archbishops and Bishops, as it was establish'd in the Year 1637. It was likewise signify'd in this Instrument, That his Majesty had nominated Arch-bishops and Bishops to their respective Sees, to exercise the same Authority with which the Prelates govern'd that Church in the Reign of his Royal Grandfather. Pursuant to this Proclamation, the Privy-Council of Scotland strictly discharg'd all Ecclesiastical Meetings, as Synods, Presbyteries, &c. till they should be authoriz'd by Arch-bishops and Bishops. Not long after, on the 8th Day of May, the Restoration of Episcopacy, was confirm'd by Act of Parliament. Another Statute was made, which enacted Obedience from the inferior Clergy to their Diocesans, and likewise prohibited all Meetings or Conventicles in Houses for religious Exercises. Another Act was made for reviving the Right of Patronages, which had been seiz'd by the Presbyterian Party. Besides all these, Provision was made by another Act, that all Persons in publick Trust or Office, should sign a solemn Declaration against the National Covenant in 1638. and the Solemn League and Covenant in 1643; in which they declar'd it unlawful to Subjects, upon Pretence of Reformation, or other Pretences whatsoever, to enter into Leagues and Covenants, or take up Arms against the King, or those commission'd by him, &c.

The Marquis of Argyle
tried.

The same Mercy was shewn to Offenders in this Kingdom, as had been in England. The Marquis of Argyle, and one Guthrie a Minister were the only Persons we find executed at this Time. The former had so great a Part in the Confusions of the late Times, and so intimate a Correspondence with Cromwell, as laid him open to that Sentence. He made upon his Trial a very notable Defence which was seconded by his Counsel, and other able Men; so that he was not unlikely to get off. So difficult is it sometimes to find legal Proofs of the most notorious Facts. But at length some Letters of his which were produced turned the Scale against him; and he was condemned to be beheaded; which Sentence was soon after executed. Some Reflections were made up-Executed. on the Death of this Nobleman, as if he had been hardly used by the Duke of Albemarle, who made the Letters publick which were written to him in Confidence. Be that as it will, one can't help thinking his Misfortunes justly deserved, by the barbarous Insolence with which he treated the great Montrose; and look upon them as one of those Retaliations which wise Men have observed in the Ways of the divine Providence.

At this Time an Accident happened, which gave the disaffected an handle for Reflections. The Depredations of the Algerines upon our Merchants, occasioned the King to send the Earl of Sandwich with a Fleet into the Mediterranean to repress them. He set Sail on the 19th of June, and July 29. came before the Port of Algier; whence he sent to the Dey to come out and confirm the League made with England. A Treaty was begun, but those Pirates were so insolent in their Terms, that the Admiral weigh'd, and stood into their Harbour. But this being fortified with a new Mole with Forts and Batteries, the Admiral, after firing some Ships, found it adviseable to bring off the Fleet. So leaving Sir John Lawson his Vice-Admiral to block up the Port, he went away with a Part of the Fleet to Lisbon. The Republicans upon this took Occasion to make triumphant Remarks, that the Naval Power of England under a Monarch was sunk from its former Glory when under a Commonwealth. And to say the Truth, whatever might be the Reason, there was a publick Spirit and Bravery among the Soldiers and Seamen of those Times, which has hardly been since found.

A Fleet sent out against the Algerines.

After a Recess of near four Months, the Parliament met again Nov. 20. it being now complete by the Addition of the Bench of Bishops. The King came to the House of Peers, and in his Speech laid before them the Business of that Session; which consisting of two Parts, a Motion for Supplies, and an Information of seditious Practices, the Parliament set themselves to proceed accordingly. And first, both Houses immediately agreed to Petition for a Proclamation for disarming the disbanded and cashier'd Officers and Soldiers, and to command them to depart twenty Miles from the City of London, for such Time as his Majesty shall think fit. And the Commons to shew their Readiness to assist the King in his Wants, on the same Day voted that the Sum of twelve hundred Thousand Pounds shou'd be speedily paid and rais'd, for the Supply of the King's Majesty's present Occasions, and so proceeded accordingly. For this the King soon after return'd his hearty Thanks, and particularly express'd how exceeding much he was beholden to the House of Commons for their great

The Parlia-
ment meets.

Proceedings of Parliament.

A.D. 1661. great Gift, and the Manner of it in giving to freely.

Some of the Regicides brought before the House of Lords.

The first Parliament having respited the Punishments of several of the Regicides, as well those that lay under Condemnation, as others not so flagrantly guilty of that Crime, the House resum'd the Matter, and on the 25th of November those Regicides that came in upon Proclamation were brought to the Bar of the House of Lords, to answer what they cou'd say for themselves, why Judgment shou'd not be executed against them. They severally alledg'd, that upon his Majesty's gracious Declaration from Breda, and the Votes of Parliament, and his Majesty's Proclamation publish'd by the Advice of the Lords and Commons then assembled in Parliament, they did render themselves, being advis'd that they shou'd thereby secure their Lives; and humbly crav'd the Benefit thereof, and the Mercy of the Houses, and their Mediation to his Majesty in their Behalves. Harry Martin briskly added, that he had never obey'd any Proclamation before this, and hoped he shou'd not be hang'd for taking the King's Word now. New Debates arose about them, and a Bill was brought in for their Execution, which was read twice, but afterwards dropt; and so they were all sent to their several Prisons, and but little more heard of them.

The King passes the Money Bill.

The next Day, which was the 20th of December, the Money Bill, and three other Bills being ready for the Royal Assent; the King came to the House of Peers, where the Commons Speaker presented to his Majesty, a Bill for granting twelve hundred and sixty thousand Pounds to the King, to be levy'd by an Assessment of seventy thousand Pounds by the Month for eighteen Months. At the passing of this Bill, the King in a short Speech gave very hearty Thanks to the House for their great Present, and declar'd that he had receiv'd the Benefit of it before he had it; the Reputation thereof having given him Credit both at Home and Abroad: And that he was not more willing to give his Royal Assent to that Bill, than he shou'd have been to have pass'd any Bills whatsoever which that House should present to him for the People's Good. At this Time he pass'd a notable Bill called an Act for regulating Corporations; by which every Officer in any Corporation was obliged to take an Oath, declaring that it was not lawful upon any Pretence whatsoever, to take Arms against the King; and that he did abhor that traitorous Position of taking Arms by his Authority against his Person, or those commissioned by him.

And the Corporation Act

Reflections on that Act.

This Act did evidently serve to the Purpose intended by it; to keep Men of Antimonarchical Principles out of the Government of the Corporations. But there were some Things in it, which appeared to considering Men of dangerous Consequence. The Position of the absolute Unlawfulness of taking Arms against the King, was a very high Strain of Loyalty, considering the possible Cases in which no other Course but resisting the King can save a Nation. But to extend this Privilege to those commissioned by him was carrying the Matter very far. Nevertheless, the Remembrance of the late Troubles was so fresh, that it left Men no Eyes for any Thing but Precautions against the Renewal of them. It was propos'd indeed in both Houses upon another Occasion, that the Word Lawfully should be set before the Word Commissioned: But this was overruled, and it was answered, that the Word Commission did import it; for if it was not lawfully issued out to lawful Persons, and for lawful Reasons, it was no Commission. But as to the utter Illegality of Resistance of the King himself, the over-strained Loyalty of the Times would not suffer a Suggestion to the contrary. This Act gave the first Birth to the famous Doctrine of Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance; which was first set on Foot by honest Men with a good Design, cultivated by ill Men for wicked Ends, and having first brought our Religion and Liberties into the utmost Danger, proved the Ruin of a Prince who leaned too much upon it. Upon the passing of these Acts the Parliament was adjourned to the 10th of January.

The Republican Party were still busy; and Projects were laid, and Meetings held by them to carry on their wild and impracticable Designs. Upon the Meeting of the Parliament according to the Adjournment, the Lord Chancellor informed them of these Things; which incited the Commons to proceed against Vane, Lambert, Waller, and some others who were still under the Power of the Law; and to hasten the Bill for insuring the Militia to the Crown, and that for settling Uniformity in the Church.

In the mean Time the King's Revenue was not so well attended by the Commons as his Occasions required; so that he thought it proper to send for them on the first of March to Whitehall. He there in an obliging Speech, let them know his Necessities and pressed them to a Supply. This so wrought upon the Commons, that a Bill pass'd the House to enable the King to raise a Tax of 70000*l.* a Month for the three ensuing Years. To this was added another Bill to grant to the King a Duty of 2*s.* per Ann. on every Fire Hearth in all Houses in the Kingdom. This Tax was called Chimney Money, and continued till the first Year of King William III. In the settling the King's Revenue, they took into Consideration the Wants and Necessities of the Loyal Cavaliers, and appointed 60000*l.* to be distributed among them.

While the Parliament was thus employed, the Convocation was busied in reviewing the Book of Common-Prayer in order to prepare it for the Act of Uniformity. They added a new Office for the Baptism of those of riper Years, one for the 30th of January, and one for the 29th of May. They added also the Declaration which is now at the End of the Communion-Service; which had been first inserted in the Time of King Edward VI. and Additions made to the Liturgy by the Convocation.

A.D. 1661. and was taken away under Queen Elizabeth; three Prayers were also added, that for all Conditions of Men, the General Thanksgiving, and the Prayer for the High Court of Parliament. This last, in it self highly proper, became liable to Censure, by the Title of Religious there given to the King. It was objected, that if this Title was ever so well suited to the Prince then reigning, it was not certain it would belong as well to every one of his Successors. Besides that, in Truth, it could fit no Man worse than the present King, which increased the Impropriety. The Work being finished, in other Respects beyond all Exception, was approved by the Members of each House; and the Lord Chancellor returned the Thanks of the Peers to the upper and lower House of Convocation, for their Care and Labour therein.

Act of Uniformity passed. A.D. 1662. The King married. The Act of Uniformity, and several others being ready for the Royal Assent, on the 19th of May the King came to the House to pass them.

Two Days after, the King was married to the Infanta of Portugal, Donna Catharina. This Marriage having caused many Speculations and Conjectures, we shall here give the Reader an Account of what appears most reasonable to be believed relating to it. Till the Peace of the Pyrenees in 1659, the French had assisted the Portuguese, who had shaken off the Spanish Yoke in 1640, and were at War with the Spaniards ever since. But then the Cardinal Mazarine agreeing not to assist the Portuguese any longer, they were obliged to look out for some other Assistance. Their Ambassador in England had the Address to persuade General Monk, when his Intentions to restore the King appeared, to hearken to an Alliance between the King and the Infanta. Upon the King's coming to England, this was proposed; and coming from the General, it was immediately embraced. The Queen Mother also encouraged it, being engaged by Cardinal Mazarine, who desired to continue that Thorn in the Spanish King's Side without appearing in it.

The Lord Chancellor went with the Stream for some Time, till he received Information that the Infanta was not capable of having Children. This Incapacity was, it seems, publicly talked of among the English Merchants at Lisbon, before she left that Place; and was told to the Earl of Sandwich, when he came to bring her into England. Some Whispers of this coming to the Chancellor, that noble Patriot set himself to oppose it with all his Interest. But the King was so set upon the Match, that the Lord Chancellor's Representations were fruitless; and they served indeed to delay the Marriage, but not to prevent it. So far is it from being true, that this Match was set on Foot by him to make Way to the Crown for the Children of his own Daughter, whom the Duke of York had married. He had indeed the Honour to be Grandfather to two crowned Heads, but without the Crime of seeking it by so wicked a Contrivance.

Upon the compleating of this Marriage,

A.D. 1662. the Queen Mother, with the Earl of St. Albans and others, came over a second Time into England, and had a splendid Court settled for her in Somerset-House; which she proposed to be the Abode of her remaining Widowhood. Another Effect of this Marriage was the Sale of Dunkirk, which happened not long after the Consummation of it; of which the Foundation was laid by the very Treaty it self: For the Portuguese had so far prevailed, that by the nineteenth Article of the said Treaty it was expressly stipulated, that Dunkirk should never be parted with to the Spaniard. Which gave France a fair Opportunity to close with the King, and to make a Bargain with him at a Time when he wanted ready Money for the extraordinary Expences of this Year, and particularly the Payment of his Sister's Portion. Many Reasons were urged for the parting with this important Place; and the first Motive to the King, was the great Expence in the keeping of it, which Rutherford the Governour had increased to an exorbitant Degree since the Dismission of Sir Edward Harley. And the Earl of Sandwich particularly alledged to his Majesty, that the Coast was generally so tempestuous, and the Grounds so rowling upon every Storm, that there would never remain a certain Steerage to that Port. These and other Reasons being alledged in Council, tho' opposed by Chancellor Clarendon, and Treasurer Southampton, the King was content to deliver up the Town and Port of Dunkirk, with all the Ordnance and Ammunition, for the Sum of five hundred Thousand Pounds Sterling; one half to be paid down, and the other in a short Time after. Several Books were written in Vindication of this Sale, shewing how useless the Place was to England, unless Millions of Money were expended upon it; and at this Time we do not find many Complaints against either this, or the Portugal Match. But when the ill Effects of both begun afterwards to appear, as the increasing Power of France, and the Queen's want of Issue, great Outcries were made, and Chancellor Hyde was unreasonably charged with the Scandal of both, when he was really free from the Guilt, or rather Misfortune of either.

Three of the Regicides were at this Time brought over from Holland, Miles Corbet, Colonel Okey, and Colonel Barkstead. These having wandered through many Parts of Germany, came to Delft in Holland; from whence they wrote to their Wives to come over to them. Their Letters being intercepted by the Care of Sir George Downing, the King's Resident, he found Means to seize them; and, what was very extraordinary, to get the Consent of the States to send them to England, contrary to the continual Practice of that Commonwealth. They were brought over here, and committed to the Tower.

Shortly after they were carried to the King's-Bench Bar, and being demanded what they could say for themselves, why they should not receive Sentence according to Law,

A.D. 1662. Law, and the Act of Attainder being read to them, they pleaded, that they were not the Persons there mentioned. Upon this Witnesses being called, and a Jury impanelled, they gave Verdict that they were the same; so that Sentence was passed upon them, and soon after executed. Their Ends were much better than those of the other Regicides, and Colonel Okey's Quarters were given to his Friends to be interred.

Sir Henry Vane, and Colonel Lambert tried.

Soon after, Sir Henry Vane and Colonel Lambert were brought to their Trials, in Pursuance of an Address from the House of Commons. Their Behaviour was extremely different. Sir Henry Vane absolutely denied the Jurisdiction of the Court over him, alleging, that as he was a Member of the long Parliament, no inferior Court could try him. He also urged, that the King before the Restoration, being only King de Jure, and not de Facto, he could not be guilty of Treason against him before that Time. He insisted moreover, that the two Houses having joined in petitioning the King to save his Life, and the King having consented to it, this Concurrence of the Legislative Power had the Force of an Act of Parliament. But his Pleas were overruled; and the Jury brought him in Guilty. His Behaviour upon his Trial was the same as had been in the rest of his Life, in which much Acuteness of Understanding was joined with great Extravagancies. Colonel Lambert defended himself in a different Manner, urging with a proper Submission and Deference, what he thought for his Advantage, by Way of Defence or Excuse. But his Part in the late Troubles was too notorious to give him Hopes of an Acquittal. He was brought in guilty, and condemned, but was at the same Time reprieved at the Bar; which Favour the Judges said was designed for Sir Henry, had not his contemptuous Behaviour hindered it. Colonel Lambert was confined, during Life, in the Island of Guernsey, where he continued a patient and discreet Prisoner above thirty Years.

Sir Henry Vane beheaded.

Sir Henry Vane was beheaded on the 14th of June following. What the Reason was that moved the King to take away his Life is uncertain; whether it were the Part he had in the Death of the Earl of Strafford, or his Behaviour at his Trial, or the Danger arising from a Man whose Temper inclined him to turbulent Designs, and whose great Parts enabled him to carry them on. He died as he had lived, full of Enthusiastick Notions. And as the Blood of the Earl of Strafford, in which he had so great a Part, was the first that introduced the shedding of those Streams which were so cruelly poured out on Account of the Rebellion, so his own was the last that closed that horrid Scene.

The next remarkable Transaction we meet with, is the putting in Execution the famous Act of Uniformity. This Act obliged all who held Ecclesiastical Preferments to declare before St. Bartholomew's Day, 1662. their unfeigned Assent and Consent to all Things contained in the Book of Common-Prayer; and to make the Declaration above-mentioned required in the Corporation Act of the Unlawfulness of resisting the King, under Pain of Loss of Preferment. These two Obligations bore hard upon the Presbyterian Divines, who still held their Benefices; and they were indeed levelled at them. Many Consultations were held in City and Countrey, and Resolutions of different kinds taken by those Ministers, as Conscience in some, Humour in others, and Interest in a third Sort, directed. At last upon the Day on which the Term of Consultation expired, about 2000 Ministers chose to leave their Benefices rather than comply with the Act.

A.D. 1662.

2000 Ministers turned out by the Act of Uniformity.

The Justness and Seasonableness of this Law was much debated. On one Side the Convenience of one Form of Worship was insisted on; and the Inconveniencies arising in the late Times from the universal Licence then taken, were an obvious Topick of Declamation. Besides this, it was said, that no Person can reasonably hope to enjoy the Revenues of a Church, to which they are Enemies upon Principle; as they must be who thought its Worship unlawful. That the Conference at the Savoy had shewn the Dissenters to be so perverse, that they were not to be satisfied; and therefore since gentle Means would not do, other Courses must be taken. That they were Intruders upon the Episcopal Clergy ejected during the Rebellion; so that they were only obliged to leave what they had unjustly wrested from others. That the solemn League and Covenant which they refused to abjure, was a Seed Plot of Rebellion; and the Consequences of that fatal Engagement were copiously insisted on: And that therefore the King could not be secure, if those who were so fond of it were left with the Authority and Influence that attends the Ministry. On the other Side it was said, that it was unchristian and barbarous to impose Commands so little necessary, and then to turn out so many Persons from the Settlements they had so long enjoyed, into Want and Poverty, because they could not in Conscience comply with them. That it was as imprudent as it was cruel; since these Men who were still by many Persons highly valued, were now obliged by their Circumstances, as well as led by their Inclinations, to set up separate Congregations in Opposition to the Church; by which Means the Schism must be propagated, and grow wider and wider. That an Union of Opinions is certainly very desirable; but that an Union of Charity will serve the same Purpose; and that the latter of these might have been easily brought about, whereas the Nature of Mankind makes the other absolutely impracticable.

Reflections on that Act.

After the Establishment of the Church by the Act of Uniformity, some Consideration was had of the Case of many of the Clergy. It has been, and still is, the Disgrace of our Countrey, that so many of those Men, whom we reverence as Representatives of our spiritual Lord and Master, live in such low Circumstances,

A.D. 1662. cumstances, as renders them mean and contemptible in their outward Appearance, and obliges them to descend too often below the Dignity of their Function. This Abuse it was proposed to remedy by providing a better Maintenance for the Clergy. A Bill was therefore brought into Parliament for Rules and Orders to be observed in the Augmentation of poor Vicarages, and other insufficient Cures. But some interested Persons found Means to refer this Matter to the King's Instructions. The King therefore sent his Letters to the Archbishops, Bishops, Deans and Chapters, requiring them, that Provision be made forthwith for Augmentation of all such Vicarages and Cures, where the Tithes and Profits are appropriated to them and their Successors, in such Manner, that they who immediately attend upon the Performance of ministerial Offices, in every Parish, may have a competent Portion for their Maintenance. These Letters were cheerfully complied with; and considerable Augmentations were made in most Parishes appropriated to Ecclesiastical Corporations. But the Lay Impropiators were more self-interested, and refused to obey the King's Directions. It had been to be wished that some Care had been taken to apply Part at least of vast Sums, that arose at this Time from the Fines paid upon Church Lands, towards this Augmentation. For the Church having been twenty Years deprived of her Possessions, the Leases for Time had most of them determined; and by the Wars that had raged so long, many Leases for Lives too were fallen into the Hands of the Incumbents. The Sums that arose from the Renewal of these Leases, are said to have amounted to a Million and half; which properly applied, might have effectually removed that Scandal from our Church. But this was either not thought of, or neglected; and so this vast Treasure came into the Hands of the Bishops, and other Dignitaries, who got great Wealth into their private Purses, which might have been more usefully employed. Thus all the Hopes and Means of redressing this great Evil vanished one after another. The House of Commons seemed well disposed to a Remedy, and made several good Resolves to that Purpose. But either the publick Affairs requiring their Care, or private Avarice of Lay Patrons and Impropiators, or the Irreligion and Profaneness which began to shew it self at Court, or all together, brought these hopeful Advances to nothing.

We took Notice above of the fruitless Attempt made last Year, to bring the Algerine Pirates to Reason. A Resolution was taken to make them more sensible than before of the Power of an English Fleet. Sir John Lawson sailed with a strong Squadron into the Streights upon the same Errand, to demand a Treaty from the Pirates upon the African Coast, and their Agreement to former Articles. The King was now possessed of Tangier, in the Mouth of the Streights of Gibraltar; where his Fleets having a near and safe Retreat, he was like to become a troublesome Neighbour to those Pirates, who could hardly move without Danger of falling in with the King's Ships, so long as he was their Enemy. Therefore when Sir John Lawson appeared, they were glad to make Peace upon as good Terms as they could. Upon this Occasion a noble Collection was made among the Clergy to redeem the King's Subjects who were in Slavery at Algier. This was carried by two of their own Body, the Archdeacon of Bath, and a Prebendary, who ransomed an hundred and fifty English, Scotch, and Irish Slaves: A Charity that cannot be too much admired or commended.

The Corporations were now modelling by Commissioners according to the Act above-mentioned, and the Walls of Glocester, Conventry, Northampton, Taunton, Leicester, and other Places that had held out against the late King, were ordered to be demolished; the County Troops and Militia attending the Demolition. A Plot was discovered about the End of the Year to destroy the King, the Duke of York, the Duke of Albemarle, and Major General Brown; to seize the Tower of London, and Windsor-Castle; and to bring about an Insurrection under Ludlow, and other Republican Officers in the late Army. The Persons concerned were Anabaptists, and Fifth-Monarchy Men, all of mean Condition; of which six were taken, arraigned and convicted at the Old-Bailey, and four executed. These confessed their Knowledge of the Design; but some alledged they were drawn in by others. The Names of those who were executed were George Philips, Thomas Tongue, Francis Stubbs, and Nathaniel Gibbs.

Hitherto the Government of these Kingdoms held on its Course with a prosperous Gale, and fair Weather. But now those Vapours which had so long floated about in the Air, invisible and unperceived, began so to increase, that they could no longer conceal themselves. There appeared a little Cloud in the serene Sky, which, tho' dissipated for a Time, gathered again, and grew at last into so violent and dangerous an Hurricane, that the fair Ship of the English Constitution had like to have been shipwreck'd in it. The Causes of this unhappy Change we shall lay before the Reader with all the Clearness we can.

The King, tho' he made hitherto so good an Appearance outwardly, was not at the Bottom the Man he seemed to be. He had given himself up to Lewdness and Debauchery, and had shaken off all Principles of Religion. He hated Business, partly out of a natural and indulged Laziness, and partly because it interfered with his Pleasures. His Aim was to spend as much Time in Amusements or Diversions, as he possibly could; without considering or regarding any other End of Life. There is Reason to believe he had professed himself a Papist at the Pyrenean Treaty; not out of any Conviction of Conscience, but in Hopes of getting Assistance from

The Care of the Parliament for the Clergy.

They submit.

A Plot discovered.

Frustrated.

The publick Happiness interrupted.

Another Attempt on the Algerines.

The Causes of this Alteration.

A.D. 1662. from the French and Spanish Ministers there met together. But that Project failing, this was kept a great Secret, and known to very few. His favourite Companions were the Duke of Buckingham, and other dissolute Persons; so that by his and their Example, the whole Court became by Degrees abandoned to all Debauchery and Vice. 'Tis no Wonder that a Prince, thus disposed, and thus accompanied, was easily induced to make an Alteration in his Measures for the worse.

Those excellent Counsellors who had advised him hitherto were still consulted by him; but the Earl of Southampton being very much incommoded in his Health, began to withdraw from Court; the Duke of Ormond was removed, by being made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and Secretary Nicholas, another of that excellent Body, was obliged by his Age to resign his Place. The Lord Chancellor, whose Confidence with the King had been entire and absolute hitherto, could not but decline in his Interest, by the Absence of so many kind Supporters and Friends. And besides, his inflexible and strict Sentiments of Virtue and Religion could not be agreeable to the Companions and Sharers of their Prince's unlawful Pleasures, whose Wit and Industry were therefore employed to lessen him in the King's Favour. And the Checks he had given to the inconsiderate Loyalty of some, and the infamous Servility of others, who were for loading the Crown with such Revenue and Prerogative as would have ruined the People's Liberties, had been deeply rooted in the King's Mind; who grew weary of the Courtship necessary to obtain those Supplies of Treasure, which must be by Law the free Gift of his Subjects; and could have been content to sacrifice the Liberties of a brave and generous People that loved him, to a Desire of Ease, and an Aversion to Trouble. This added Force to the other Impressions made to the Disadvantage of this great Man; who by the unavoidable Fate of those high Stations, was envied by all below him, and made to bear the Blame of many Things in which he had no Hand; and by his Virtue and Integrity, became hated by all those vicious and ill-designing Persons, who are too often hovering about the Ears of Princes. But he was now only nodding; his Interest indeed was declining, but it was slowly and insensibly.

The King publishes a Declaration dispensing with the Act of Uniformity.

The King published a Declaration in December, in which, amongst other Things, he dispensed with the Penalties imposed by the Act of Uniformity on Dissenters. This was done upon an Application made to the King by the Presbyterians to that End. What the Reason was that moved the King to be so favourable to the Dissenters, was then uncertain. But it has since appeared that it was brought about by the Papists, of whom the Earl of Bristol had great Confidence with the King. That Earl, either not apprehending the Opposition that was made to it afterwards by the Parliament, or hurried on by the notorious Impetuosity of his own Temper, pushed the King upon this disagreeable Step; in A.D. 1662, hopes that the same dispensing Power which was used to the Dissenters, might in Time be extended to the Roman Catholicks.

About a Month after this Declaration was published, the Parliament met. The King in his Speech took Notice to them of his Declaration; which he told them he had issued out to cure the Distempers and Differences that were then abroad; at the same Time declaring his own particular Affection for the Church of England. But he said, that for the same Reasons that he had issued out his Declaration, he could wish that he were furnished with a Power of Indulgence, to be made Use of upon some extraordinary Occasions. The Parliament heard these Things with less Compliance than the King seems to have expected from them; whether it were that they had any Suspicion of the true Reasons of issuing this Declaration; or whether it proceeded from the little Tendernefs they generally shewed to the Nonconformists; or whether they conceived it was too great a Stretch of the Royal Prerogative, is uncertain. The House of Commons appointed a Day to consider of the King's Declaration Speech; and resolved thereupon, to present to the King their humble Advice, that no Indulgence be granted to the Dissenters from the Act of Uniformity: and presented accordingly their Address, and Reasons against the same. The King was not pleased with this; but received them however with great Civility, and told them he believed he was not rightly understood, but that he would send them an Answer in some Time; which he did in about a Fortnight after, signifying, that he would make no Reply to the Reasons they had given against his Declaration; and thus this little Gust of Wind passed off.

During this Session of Parliament, an Attack was made upon the Lord Chancellor from an unexpected Quarter. The Earl of Bristol and He had been great and fast Friends for many Years. In the Lord Clarendon's excellent History of the Rebellion, their Friendship is frequently mentioned; the Earl of Bristol being then Lord Digby. This Lord was a Man of very great Parts, but by an Impetuosity of Temper, he either could not, or would not govern, capable of equal Extravagancies. This Nobleman was of the Church of Rome; which though it produced a Difference of Sentiments as to Religion and Politicks, between himself and his Friend, had no Effect while the King was in Banishment, and stripped of his Power. But upon the Restoration, the Chancellor's unmoveable Care of the Church of England, and other Differences in State Affairs, began to cool the Friendship of the Earl of Bristol to him. At length, as 'tis said, upon a Denial the Lord Chancellor made to a Request of the Earl's which he thought unjust, the Earl broke out into a declared Enmity with him, with all the Fury that could be expected from his fiery Temper, and a long Friendship dissolved. Accordingly he made an artful

An Attack upon the Lord Chancellor.

A.D. 1663. ful and bitter Speech against him in the House of Lords; and July 10. exhibited Articles of High-Treason, and other Crimes against him.

The Articles would take up too much room if they were inserted at Length; which we think besides unnecessary, since they had no Consequence. They were exactly suited to the vehement and ungovernable Passion of the Accuser; for no Man who was Master of himself, would have offered them. They were sixteen in Number; all doubtful, many trifling, others contradictory. The fourth Article is particularly remarkable, and may serve for a Specimen of the rest. He there lays it to his Charge, that in pursuance of the Chancellor's traitorous Designs, some Friends and Dependants of his had said aloud, that were it not for his standing in the Gap, Popery would be introduced into this Kingdom. Had this been ever so true, to make a Minister accountable for all the weak Things his Friends or Dependants may say, would be very strange. In the ninth Article he is charged also with the Discourses of his Emissaries.

Coldly received.

This Accusation was very coldly received, it appearing from the Articles themselves, that it was the Effect of private Rancour, and not of any deliberate Concern for the King's Honour, or the publick Good. An important Question also arose about it; whether this Charge were regularly and legally brought in; for it was directly against a Statute then in Force, that one Peer should bring Articles of High-Treason against another in the House of Lords. So that the Manner, as well as the Matter of this Charge evidently shewed how much the Author was blinded by his Passion.

These Things being so clear, the House instead of entering into the Merits of the Cause, made the following Order: "That a Copy of the Articles exhibited by the Earl of Bristol against the Lord Chancellor, be delivered to the Lord Chief Justice; who, with all the rest of the Judges, were to consider whether the said Charge hath been brought in regularly and legally; and whether it may be proceeded on, and how; and whether there be any Treason in it, or no; and make Report to the House."

Rejected.

The Judges shortly made their Report, that by the Laws of this Realm, a Charge of High-Treason cannot be originally exhibited by one Peer against another Peer in the House of Lords; so that the abovementioned Charge was not regularly and legally brought in: And that if the Matters there alledged were admitted to be true, there was no Treason in them. Some Lords who were Friends to the Chancellor inferred, that if it was not regularly and legally brought in, it was a Libel, and ought to be condemned, and the Author of it censured. The Earl of Bristol finding the Effects of his inconsiderate Rashness, endeavoured to extenuate what he had done, by saying he meant it not as a Charge, but as an Information. The Lords upon the whole unanimously declared their Concurrence with the Judges; so that the Chancellor came off with Victory and Honour. His Adversary quite lost his Reputation, being ever after looked on as capable of the greatest Extravagances.

These Proceedings were not long finished, when the King resolving upon a Recess, on the 27th of July came to the House of Peers, and having passed the Bills ready for him, put an End to the Session.

The Parliament breaks up.

The Parliament did not meet again till eight Months after; part of which Time the King spent in a Progress. But about the same Time a Discovery was made of a Plot by some Republicans; the Scene of which lay in the North of England. Their Design was, to re-establish the Long-Parliament, to disannul the Excise and all Subsidies, and to reform the Lawyers and Clergy; and to this Purpose several of them appeared in Arms at Farnley-Wood in Yorkshire. But some of the principal Conspirators being secured, and the Times and Places of their Rendezvous known, the Militia were drawn out, and some regular Troops sent into Yorkshire, which took several of them, and prevented the Execution of the Design. A Commission of Oyer and Terminer was sent down to York, to try the principal Leaders, most of whom were Conventicle-Preachers, or old Parliament Soldiers. It appeared by the Evidence, that the Plot had been in Agitation near two Years; that the Rising was to begin in Ireland, and to follow next in England, and then in Scotland; and that Lambert and Ludlow were to be at the Head of it. One and twenty Persons were found guilty; of which the greatest Part were executed.

A Plot by the Republicans.

This was the only material Occurrence that happened before the Parliament met again. The King in his Speech mentioned to them this Conspiracy; telling them, that though it was disappointed, he was not yet got to the Bottom of it. He then mentioned to them the Act for Triennial Parliaments passed in the late Reign; and in a very obliging Manner, desired them to consider the dishonourable Clauses it contained, and how unsuitable they were to the Dignity of the Crown.

The Parliament meets.

That the Act for Triennial Parliaments, passed in the Time of King Charles I. bore indeed very hard upon the King's Prerogative, may be seen by the Account of it above. The Commons having a Confidence in the King's Honour, or thinking it too great a Diminution of the Crown to be so cramped, obliged the King by passing a Bill for the Repeal of it. By the late Plots against the King, the Dissenters, who were thought by their Principles Favourers of such Disturbances, were exposed to the Resentment of the Houses. Therefore a Bill was passed against Conventicles; by which a pecuniary Mulct was laid on them. For the first Offence the Penalty was five Pounds, or the suffering three Months Imprisonment; for the second, ten Pounds or six Months Imprisonment;

The Triennial Act repealed.

A Bill against Conventicles.

A.D.1664. prisonment; for the third, an hundred Pounds, or Transportation to some of the Plantations.

Reflections thereon.

This Act was variously approved and censured. It was said, that the Dissenters were of so perverse a Disposition, that they would be sooner crushed and extirpated than satisfied. That the Church could never be safe, if her Enemies were allowed the Liberty of drawing unwary Persons from her Communion; which would be continually done by the Dissenters if they could get their Way of Worship tolerated. That the Church and State were so closely united, that the Enemies to the one must be so to the other. That the Injuries the Dissenters offered to the Church in the Times of Rebellion would fully justify any Severity that could be used to them now. All the Disloyalty and Enthusiasm between 1640. and 1660. was remembered with full Aggravation: So that the Conventicles of the Dissenters were looked on as Nests of Sedition; and according to some, it was impossible for a Dissenter not to be a Rebel. It was said, that by a strict Hand held over them for some Time, they would moulder away by Degrees, and the Nation would arrive at that desirable Union in religious Matters, which alone could preserve a State secure and quiet. On the other hand it was said, that imposing a Penalty on a Matter of Conscience, serves only to put a Sword into the Hands of Knaves and Fools; the most violent Prosecutors of such Laws being always fetched out of those two Classes of Mankind. That the Dissenters were a considerable Part of the Nation, and chiefly concerned in Trade; and therefore it would be very impolitick in a Countrey whose Wealth depends on Commerce, to make so great a Number of trading Subjects uneasy, who might be tempted for the Sake of Quiet and Security in their Religious Worship, to go over to Holland or to some of our Plantations; which could not be done without inconceivable Damage to the Publick. That admitting a great Perverseness in some of the Leaders, it was both uncharitable and ridiculous to suppose all of that Body to be possessed with such an unaccountable Spirit of Contradiction, as some suggested. That even supposing they were so, such a Prosecution was not the Way to mend them; since the Nature of Mankind is, ever to cling the faster to those Opinions which others seek to extort from them by Violence. That in Matters of Policy the middle Way is always pernicious; Prosecutions for Conscience Sake must be either quite let alone, or be cruel and rigorous to the utmost Degree. In Spain and Italy, the Inquisition against Hereticks, by stopping their Ears to all the Cries of humane Pity or Christian Charity, have indeed thoroughly rooted out all Differences in Religion. But if this Barbarity appears, as it certainly ought to do, shocking and monstrous, there is no middle Way to be taken; lighter Prosecutions only serving to increase and inflame the Evil; they provoke, but do not terrify.

A.D.1664. And therefore the only Way left was to treat the Dissenters with Gentleness and Tenderness; which, whether it had Success or no, was the only fit Method that could give Hopes of it.

When these Parliamentary Affairs were over, the next Concern that took up Mens Thoughts was, the Probability of a War with Holland. In Prospect of this, the King endeavoured to strengthen himself by an Alliance with Spain; whither he sent Sir Richard Fanshawe as Ambassador. But a weak Prince being at the Head of the Councils there, he found them busied in extravagant Designs. They were entirely bent upon an Enterprize absolutely impossible in their Circumstances, the Reduction of Portugal; and their Eagerness that Way, added to the Loss of Jamaica and Dunkirk, made them deaf to any Overtures of another kind, and especially coming from the King. So that the imminent Danger of their Monarchy from their powerful and ambitious Neighbours of France, the dying Condition of their King, and the Prospect of a weak Successor, was not sufficient to waken them from their Dream, or to appease their Resentment so far, as to induce them to accept the Offer of an Alliance with England.

The Lord Hollis was sent to France, to keep as good a Correspondence there as he could. But that Court was now setting forward that great Project of an universal Monarchy, which was for forty Years together the Terror, and afterwards the Scorn and Derision of Europe. This Scheme began to be executed by an Agreement with the Dutch for a Partition of the Austrian Netherlands; which those Provinces came into, without considering that they divided with the Lion. But the Power of France, which has since been so formidable, was then in its Infancy; and the Hatred that had continued so long between the Dutch and Spaniards made the former greedily embrace a Project which seemed attended with so much Advantage to themselves, and so much Prejudice to their old Enemy. Therefore the Lord Hollis did nothing of Importance at the French Court; which was united in Interest with the Hollanders. And besides the French were well pleased to set on the Quarrel between these two Maritime Powers, in hopes that by the Ruin of the Naval Force on both Sides by a bloody War, their own, which they increased and cultivated with the utmost Industry and Care, might come the nearer to an Equality with them.

On the 24th of November the Parliament met again according to Prorogation. This Session was opened by a Speech from the King; containing little more than usual Civility. When he had finished his Speech, he told the Houses, that he did intend the Lord Chancellor should have made a Narrative concerning the Treaty and Proceedings with the Dutch; but that the Chancellor being laid up with the Gout, he had caused the Narrative to be put in Writing, which was delivered to both Houses. The Parliament went

A War with Holland approaching. Negotiations with Spain.

With France.

Fruitless.

The Parliament meets.

A.D. 1664. on with their former Vigour, and the next Day after the King's Speech, both Houses resolved, that their Thanks be given first to his Majesty for his Speech and Narrative, and secondly to the City of London, for a Loan of Money they had advanced to the King before the Meeting of the Parliament, to carry on the Dutch War. At the same Time the House of Commons resolved, notwithstanding the Difficulty of raising such a Sum, to grant the King a Supply of 2500000*l.* in three Years towards the Dutch War. Having spent three Weeks in finding Ways and Means to raise this Money, they adjourned; and during their Recess the King published a Declaration for allowing Letters of Marque, or Reprisals upon the Dutch.

War declared against Holland. The Parliament meeting again after Christmas, and the King having passed the great Money-Bill, a Declaration of War was drawn up by his Order against the States-General, containing in Substance, Complaints of many Wrongs suffered by his Subjects by the Depredations of the Hollanders, and of the fruitless Demands made by him for Reparation and Satisfaction. Some Time after, some Bills of no great Importance being made ready for the Royal Assent, the King came and passed them; and prorogued the Parliament to the 21st of June, after which they were again prorogued to the 1st of August, and a third Time to the 9th of October. And here ended the fifth Session of this Parliament. Two Days after their breaking up, the Declaration of War against the Dutch was proclaimed with the usual Forms.

The Causes that moved the two Nations to fall out with that Heat and Fury that afterwards appeared, are not so evident. On our Side, the Wrongs received were manifest; otherwise the Parliament and City had not so zealously concurred, the one in granting Supplies, the other in Loans of Money, as they did. Yet 'tis observable that the Chancellor and Earl of Southampton were against it, and therefore declined setting their Names to the Declaration of War. The King is said not to have been very warm in it; but the Duke of York promoted it with all his Power; and to him, and the ill Arts of Sir George Downing, our Minister in Holland, this War is chiefly attributed. What it was that moved the Dutch to be guilty of those Injuries that so provoked the English Nation is not clear. It is most probable, that a Jealousy of the Increase of our Trade from a Spirit of Industry and Parsimony arising at that Time in England, more than usual, and their secret Correspondence with the King of France, moved and encouraged them to offer those Insults; and the more, because in the Reigns of former Kings such Actions of theirs had passed with Impunity thro' the Weakness or Negligence of our Government.

A.D. 1665. On March 4. the King's Declaration of War was published; and the latter End of the same Month, the Duke of York set out to go on Board the Fleet. When he arrived there, the Dutch were not ready to come out.

They had found themselves mistaken in their A.D. 1665. Measures, and now declined the War they had so inconsiderately provoked. The French King being their secret Ally, they solicited his Mediation. Tho' he desired in his Heart the Continuance of the War, he could not refuse them that Appearance of Friendship; and sent two Ambassadors to England, whose Arrival stopped for some Time all hostile Proceedings. But the Propositions they made (being, perhaps too, not sincerely insisted on) were not assented to. The Popish Party at Court, whose Influence was great tho' secret, took the Opportunity to encourage such extravagant Demands, as could not but produce a War, which they knew would weaken the Protestant Interest, and perhaps ruin the Commonwealth of Holland. It is said also, that some of the Ministers thinking the Dutch would submit to any Thing rather than stand a War, encouraged those Demands in Hopes of being bought off.

In May the War began; and the English Cruisers took several Dutch Ships. The Duke of York set Sail with 109 Men of War and Frigates, and 28 Fireships and Ketches, and made over to the Coast of Holland. They lay some Time before the Texel, but a Storm arising so damaged their Sails and Rigging, that they were obliged to return to the English Coast. The English were no sooner gone than the Dutch put out to Sea. Their Fleet consisted of 112 Men of War, and 30 Fire-Ships and Tenders, commanded in Chief by Admiral Obdam. They met nine rich English Ships coming from Hamburg, which they took. The Value of those Ships was between two and three hundred Thousand Pounds.

The Duke of York having repaired the Damage done in the late Storm, put out to Sea. He met the Dutch Fleet not far from the Coast of Harwich on the 2<sup>d</sup> of June; but the Dutch avoided fighting, because they had received a terrible Overthrow from Admiral Monk on that Day twelve Years. Next Day the Fight began at three in the Morning. The Fleets charged thro' each other several Times, without any remarkable Advantage. At last they came to a close Fight. The Duke of York in a Ship of eighty Guns, and Admiral Obdam in one of eighty four, fell Side to Side, and a fierce Engagement arose between them. The Duke was in great Danger. The Earl of Falmouth, the Lord Muskerry and Mr. Boyle standing by his Side, were all killed by one Cannon-Ball. At last in the Heat of the Fight, the Powder aboard the Dutch Admiral taking Fire, the whole Ship with all that it contained, was carried up into the Air in a Moment. Out of five hundred Men that were aboard only five were saved; all the rest either perished by the Blast, or were thrown into the Sea and drowned. About the same Time the Earl of Sandwich with the blue Squadron, fell into the Centre of the Dutch Fleet which put them into Confusion. Four of their Ships, one of sixty, one of

The French King mediates.

To no purpose.

The beginning of the War.

The Dutch Admiral blown up.

A.D.1665. of fifty, one of forty four, and one of forty Guns, fell foul on each other; which the English perceiving, sent out a Fireship, which, as they were so entangled, burnt them all together. Soon after, three others of the best Dutch Ships suffered the same Fate. A Ship of seventy five Guns, being disabled, was also burnt by the English. So many of their Ships flaming on every Side, made it seem as if the whole Dutch Fleet were on Fire, and they had lost their Admiral and two Vice-Admirals; so that being now no longer able to withstand the Fury of the English, they sought their Safety in their Flight. About eight in the Evening thirty or forty of their Ships went off, and left the rest to follow as well as they could. The Loss on both Sides is, as usual, differently represented. It is certain that the Dutch received a terrible Defeat, and that their Loss was vastly greater than that of the English.

The Dutch
fly.

The Victory
ill pursued.

This Overthrow was so entire, that if the English Fleet had pursued the Dutch, their whole Fleet must have been destroyed. But the Cause of that Omission is variously told. Some say that the Wind blew cross, and besides that the English had spent all their Fire-Ships. Others say, that the Servants of the Duke of York had Directions to keep him as much as could be out of Danger. That the Duke being fatigued with the Labour of so long and fierce an Engagement, laid him down to Sleep, ordering all the Sail possible to be made after the Dutch; and that he should be waked when they came up with the Dutch Fleet. But one of his Domesticks remembring his Directions in England, took upon him to order Sail to be slackened in the Duke's Name, without his Knowledge. So it came to pass, that when the Duke awaked, the Dutch had made so much Way before him, that it was in vain to follow.

This Victory brought great Honour to the Duke. His Personal Courage, which was truly remarkable, being set off by the Varnish that is always used to the Actions of Persons of his Rank, gave him universally the Character of an Hero. At the same Time it filled Holland with Consternation. The Pensionary De Witte was obliged to appease it, by laying this Defeat to the ill Behaviour of the Officers. Some of them were punished with Death, and some with Ignominy; and he resolved to go aboard the next Fleet in Person.

While the Losses sustained in the last Action were repairing in England, it was agreed not to suffer the Duke of York to hazard himself any more. Therefore the Command was now given to the Earl of Sandwich. On the 5th of July he weighed from Solebay, and stood for the Coast of Holland, to wait for the Dutch Admiral De Ruyter, then upon his Return home from an Expedition he had made against some of our Factories and Colonies in Africa and America. But he having Intelligence of this, went round by the North of Scotland, and crept home by the Coast of Norway and Denmark.

A rich Fleet from the Streights and the East-Indies, of the Value of some Millions, took the same Course as De Ruyter, not daring to venture thro' the Channel. When they were come into the German Ocean, they had Intelligence of the late Defeat of their Countreymen at Sea, which making their Return home dangerous, they chose to take Shelter in the Port of Bergben in Norway, under the Protection of the King of Denmark, till a secure Convoy could be sent them.

A.D.1665.
An Attempt upon the Dutch East-India Fleet in the Harbour of Bergben in Norway.

The Earl of Sandwich hearing this, detached Sir Thomas Tiddiman with twelve or fourteen Men of War, and three Fireships, to attack them, himself following them. The Dutch had Notice of his coming beforehand, and provided themselves to receive him. They raised Batteries on the Shore, ranged their largest Ships in a Line to defend the rest, presented the Danish Governor with 12000 Rix-Dollars to make him more hearty in their Defence, and assisted him in fortifying the Citadel and Fort. Tiddiman came before the Place, and boldly went in with his Squadron. But when he had gained the Entrance of the Port, the Wind chopping about obliged him to drop Anchor within half Musket Shot of the Citadel; where he began to fire upon the Dutch Ships in the Harbour. The Danish Governor of Bergben was obliged to defend the Dutch, to preserve the Honour of his Master, under whose Protection they had put themselves. So that the English were not only shot at from the Dutch Ships and Batteries, but from the Danish Citadel and Fort. The Fight was furious and obstinate. But the Citadel stood so low, and the English Ships were obliged to anchor so near it, that the Cannon there battered them so terribly that they could endure it no longer. Several Men of War were disabled, and Tiddiman's own Ship was just ready to sink. The Wind that hindered their farther Entrance into the Port, proved now an Advantage, by giving them an Opportunity of getting out; for if they had continued there a little longer, the Ships had been all destroyed. So they slipped their Cables, and made haste to join the Grand Fleet.

The English
retire.

This is the Account given at that Time of this Transaction. But it is now known, that the Kings of England and Denmark had agreed to share between them the Spoils of that rich Fleet. To this End it was concerted, that as soon as the English attack'd the Dutch, the Danish Governor should at first storm and threaten furiously, but afterwards under Pretence of his Inability to resist the English, abandon the Dutch to them. But this Project, which was no very honourable one, was disappointed by the English Commanders, who looking upon the Dutch Fleet as a sure Prey, would not wait the Arrival of the Orders from Copenhagen to the Governor. This obliged him to defend the Dutch in the Manner he did; since without particular Directions, it would have cost him his Head had he tamely suffered such an Affront to

The Secret
History of that Transaction.

A.D. 1665. to be offered to his Master. The next Day the Orders came. The Governor sent Notice of this to the English, but at the same Time let them know, that by their Precipitation they had made them useless; for that he must be obliged to send an Account of what had passed the Day before, and wait for the Return of the Express, with fresh Orders for his Behaviour upon this new Occurrence, which could not be done in less than twenty Days. However, he said, if they would stay so long, he would engage to keep the Dutch there. But the English Captains were fullen upon their Disappointment, and sailed away. These rich Ships were afterwards fetched off by the whole Dutch Fleet of Men of War. But in their Return home they met with such a violent Storm, that many of them fell into the Hands of the English, being parted from the main Body by Strefs of Weather.

The Plague
in London.

But while these Things were done abroad, the Nation was visited at home by a dreadful Judgment from above. A fierce Pestilence raged in the City with such Fury, that near an hundred Thousand Persons were carried off by it, in the City of London alone. But its Ravages stopped not there, but spread themselves from Town to Town throughout the Kingdom. It first appeared in the middle of May, in the City of London; being occasioned, as some say, by infected Goods brought from Holland. It continued there many Months with so great a Mortality, that the City was turned into a Wilderness and a Solitude; almost all Persons who had Means and Opportunity of escaping, flying into the Country from the fierce Destroyer; insomuch, that the Grass was said to grow in the middle of Cheapside. This Desolation continued for six or seven Months in the City; after which Time, by the usual Providence which it pleases God to shew in these Calamities, the Fury of it abated, and a new Face of Things gradually came on. It spread at last into the Country, with a Violence almost equal to that in London; and it was not thoroughly over till the End of the next Year.

The Bishop of Munster joins with the King against the Dutch.

About August the King received Assistance in the Dutch War from an unexpected Quarter. The Bishop of Munster, whose Territories are contiguous to those of Holland on the German Side, sent over to the King a Proposal, to enter into an Alliance with him against the Dutch. He saw that State engaged with a powerful Enemy, and upon the losing Side: And being a bold and resolute Man, very ambitious, and incited by a mortal Hatred he bore them, for some Injuries real or pretended, he thought it a proper Opportunity to gratifie his Revenge by attacking them, and his Ambition by making a Noise in the World. His Proposal was easily complied with, and the famous Sir William Temple was sent over to cultivate the Correspondence.

The Bishop of Munster was better furnished with Men, than with Money to pay them; he therefore agreed with the King, upon the Payment of certain Sums of Money, to take A.D. 1665. the Field with a good Army, and fall upon the Dutch. This Undertaking promised great Effects. The Dutch so little expected an Attack from that Quarter, that the Bishop had raised an Army of 16000 Men, without giving them the least Umbrage. And their Republick was in a very ill Condition to receive such an Invasion; having more than enough upon them by the War with England, and their ill Success in it. But as it often comes to pass, that the Success of Enterprizes does not answer the Expectations conceived, so it happened here.

The War with Holland gave Hopes to the Republican Party, who were now busy in concerting Matters with their Friends in England, and Holland, for an Invasion and Insurrection. But it all ended in Smoke. De Witte saw the Impracticableness of any such Undertakings; and besides that, if by any Chance that could not reasonably be hoped for, the Design should succeed, it must end in the Ruine of Holland, which had felt before the Power of an English Republick. And his Influence was more than sufficient to quash so difficult an Enterprize. Besides, the Court of England had such Intelligence of their Designs, that by the apprehending of some here, all Things were kept quiet.

The Parliament met at Oxford, October 9. The King's Speech to them tended to shew the Necessity of fresh Supplies, and to give the usual Assurances of their being carefully and frugally managed. The Chancellor, according to his Custom, made a long and excellent Speech; in which he took some Notice of the secret Machinations of the Republicans abovementioned.

The Parlia-
ment meets.

The House of Commons immediately voted their Thanks to the King, in which the Lords concurred with them. And being firmly resolved to maintain the Honour of their Prince and Countrey, they voted a Supply of 1250000*l.* and a Bill was brought in to that Purpose. And upon the Information they had received from the Chancellor of the Transactions of the English fugitive Republicans, they ordered another Bill to be brought in, by which they were enjoined to return by such a Day, or be attainted of High Treason. They also brought in a third Bill for a Present of 120000*l.* to the Duke of York.

Their Proceedings.

But the most remarkable Act passed this Session was, that which is called the Five Mile Act. By this, the Oath abovementioned, of Illegality of Resistance to the King, &c. was imposed upon all the silenced Ministers, under Pain, in Case of Refusal, of not coming within five Miles of any City, or Parliament Borough, or of the Church where they had served, unless upon a Journey. This Act gave Room for the same Disputations as have been mentioned before upon the other Acts against the Nonconformists. It was also added, that Oaths of a doubtful Nature, enforced by a Penalty, always bring the greatest Inconvenience to those who least deserve it, the sincerely conscientious, and truly thereon.

Reflections

A.D.1665. ly religious. That as such Oaths are therefore very improper, so also of little Use; because those who suffer by them, are of all Persons the least obnoxious to Governments, as being so wholly taken up in a silent and calm Provision for a better Life, as to have no Leisure to attend the turbulent Affairs of this. Whereas restless and ambitious Persons who have Designs to carry on, from whom Governments have the most to fear, never suffer those Oaths to stand in their Way. This Act being also passed in a Time of War, and of a general Calamity, made it the more hardly censured. And as it always happens, the Compassion of the Party was so much raised, that those who suffered by it were more plentifully assisted at that Time than ever. On the 31st of October the King came and passed these Bills, and others of less Importance, and prorogued the Parliament to February 20.

The Parliament prorogued.

The Bishop of Munster invades Friesland.

The two warring Powers of England and Holland, were now preparing for the Actions of the next Year. The Dutch had very manifestly the worse the last Summer in the Fight at Sea; and they were as hard pressed by Land. For the Bishop of Munster, in Consequence of his Agreement with the King, had advanced into Friesland, defeated several Parties of the Dutch, and taken some Towns. The Dutch applied themselves for Succour to the French King, on the Score of their late good Correspondence; and to the Dukes of Lunenburg, and the Elector of Brandenburg, as Persons concerned to quench a Fire kindling in their Neighbourhood. The Dukes of Lunenburg at first seemed warm, and the Bishop of Osnabrug of that Family, threatened to take Arms against him of Munster. But afterwards they laid aside these Intentions, and sent to excuse themselves to the King. The Elector of Brandenburg was more zealous. Himself, with the Elector of Mentz, and the Duke of Nieuburgh, seeing this Flame break out, which must draw foreign Armies into the Empire, used first their friendly Offices with the Bishop, to prevail on him to make a Peace with Holland. But this failing, the Elector of Brandenburg drew his Forces into the Field, and resolved by joining with the Dutch, to compel him. The French added their Interposition to the same End; so that at last a Treaty was begun at Cleve. The Payments the King was to make to the Bishop, by several Accidents were not regularly performed: and this had a great Weight in disposing him to Agreement. Accordingly, after a short Treaty the Peace was signed; and thus this great Affair, which had made such a Noise in the World, ended in Smoke.

But soon after concludes a Peace with Holland.

The French King declares War against England.

The French King was sensible of the Superiority of the English at Sea; and being pressed by the Dutch to declare War against England, he began to listen to them. The French Court, as well as the Dutch, were drawn in upon a false Supposition, that the Discontents arising from the severe Treatment of the Dissenters, and the Remains of the ancient Republican Spirit, made the King so feeble and insecure, that he would neither be able to raise Money, nor dare to enter into a War with two such Powers, who were so able to foment and assist those ill Humours. The Lord Hollis presented a Memorial to the French King, testifying his Master's Inclination to Peace; but at the same Time with a true English Courage, letting them know that he had no Reason to fear a War, tho' against two such mighty Powers. Nevertheless the French King published his Declaration of War, which was shortly after followed by that of the King of Denmark. This last took its Rise from the following Cause. The English Sea Officers, to excuse their own Misbehaviour in the Affair of Bergben, had found the Way so to misrepresent that Prince here, that the King thought his Conduct insincere. This Mistake produced a very unkind Remonstrance, reflecting on the Conduct of his Danish Majesty, which exasperated the ill Humour that King was already in, upon the Loss of so great a Booty; and laid him open to the Solicitations of the Dutch. So that a Treaty was secretly concluded with that Republick, upon the Payment of a great Sum of Money. And the Affair being kept close while under Agitation, it was not known till it shewed itself in a dishonourable Seizure of all the Effects of our English Merchants throughout the Danish Ports. The King of France was more honourable, giving three Months Time to the English Merchants to transport themselves and their Goods out of his Dominions.

A.D.1665.

And the King of Denmark.

Shortly after this, the Queen had a Miscarriage of a Child; which shewed the Falsity of those Reports that had been spread of her Inability of conceiving Children. So that the Alienation of the King's Affections to her, did not arise from her Incapacity that Way, as is commonly thought; for the Marriage was certainly consummated, and we are told besides, that the King was well pleased with her upon the Wedding Night. But her Person and her Temper being not very agreeable, it could not be expected that they should fix a Man who was naturally a Rover, and made it his only Business and Care to study and gratify all his Inclinations.

The Queen miscarries.

The King now published his Declaration of War against the French; and upon this Occasion the English Courage shewed itself remarkably. After a devouring Pestilence had carried its Ravages through the Kingdom, they heard not only without Fear, but with the utmost Alacrity, this Declaration of War, which made two of our most dangerous Neighbours our Enemies. The Maritime Countries, with the greatest Readiness and Cheerfulness put themselves in a Posture of Defence; and offered the continual Attendance of their Militia in Arms; but the King would not put them to that Trouble and Expence.

The King declares War against France.

The Season of the Year was now come that called upon both Sides to prepare themselves for Action. The Duke of Tork being restrain-

A.D. 1665. restrained from hazarding his Person any more, and the Earl of Sandwich being sent Ambassador into Spain, Prince Rupert, and the Duke of Albemarle, were jointly made Commanders for this Summer.

A.D. 1666. When the Fleet was in the Downs, Prince Rupert had Orders to go with the whole White Squadron towards the Mouth of the Channel, to meet and stop the French Squadron, which were then reported to be coming from Belle-Isle to join the Dutch. And this Separation of the Fleets was made upon another Report, that the Dutch would not be able to come out in six Weeks. But both these Rumours proved false, which had like to have been attended with fatal Consequences. The Duke of Albemarle stood over to the Coast of Flanders, and found there contrary to Expectation, above ninety Men of War fit for Action; whereas there were with himself fewer than sixty. It was nevertheless debated in a Council of the Flag-Officers, whether he should attack them, or not; and carried that he should. The Dutch so little expected such a Resolution, that being taken on the sudden, they were obliged to cut their Cables to put themselves in a Posture to receive him. This was done on the first of June, and the Fight was not quite ended till the fourth at Night.

A second
Fight at Sea.

The first Day.

Sir John Har-man's Bravery.

It began with the most furious Efforts on both Sides. The Dutch hoped by the Inequality of Numbers, to revenge upon the English their former Losses and Disgraces; and the English strove to maintain their former Glory, and to justify by Success the daring Enterprize they had begun. The Battle continued till ten o'Clock at Night, with such loud Roarings of the Cannon on both Sides, that the Thunder of the Fight was heard in the City of London. The English had the Weather-Gage, by which the Wind cleared their Ships of those Clouds of Smoke, and that insupportable Stench of Powder that arises from the Discharge of the Cannon, and drove it in the Faces of the Enemy. On the other Hand, the Wind being high, bent their Ships so much towards the Side next the Dutch, that their lowest Fire of Guns lay so near the Water, that they became useless; whereas the Dutch Ships being bent towards that Side which lay from the English, could fire their whole Broadfides. Tromp pierced furiously through the English Squadrons, till his Ship lost all her Masts, and was so shattered, that he was forced to leave her. De Ruyter lost his Main-Top-Mast. One Dutch Ship was burnt; and Rear Admiral Staghower was killed. On the English Side, the Vice Admiral of the White, and two other Ships were taken by the Dutch, after the Loss of almost all their Men. Sir John Harman, Rear Admiral of the White, was disabled, and forced to retire to Harwich, but not without escaping great Dangers. After his Ship had been terribly shattered by the Cannon of the Dutch Men of War that surrounded her, they sent a Fire-Ship to complete her Destruction. It came close up to her Side, and being first grappled fast to her, was set on Fire, that they might consume together. There arose at first such a thick Smoke from the Fire-Ship, that it could not be seen where the grappling Irons were fixed. But when the Fire burst out, the Boatwain of the Rear Admiral perceiving by the Light of the burning Ship, where those Irons were fastened, sprang on Board her amidst the Flames, and with incredible Dexterity and Activity got them loose, and having freed his own Vessel, came on Board her again. For this he was afterwards made a Captain. The Dutch then sent off a second, which grappled with the Rear Admiral, and set her on Fire. Fifty of the Seamen seeing their Ship on Fire, leaped into the Sea. But Sir John himself, with his Sword drawn, ran amongst his Men, threatening to kill all that should refuse to assist him in quenching the Flames, and getting loose from the Fire-ship. This so roused the Spirits of those who were left, that, surrounded with Enemies, and in a flaming Ship, they took Heart, and at last quenched the Fire. The Enemy seeing this, having in vain summoned him to surrender, sent off a third Fire ship. But before she came to board him, four Pieces of his lower Tire of Guns sent her to the Bottom. And firing another Broad-side, he killed the Dutch Vice Admiral Evertsen; after which the Enemy left him, and he got off safe to Harwich.

It was an extraordinary Thing that fewer than 60 Ships should stand so long against 90: But it was still more so, to find them the Aggressors the following Day: for the next Morning the English renewed the Fight. It continued all Day with terrible Destruction on both Sides, but with little apparent Advantage on either.

But the Dutch receiving that Evening a Reinforcement of sixteen Ships, the Admiral thought of retiring the next Day. He had held out a long Time against a great Inequality of Numbers. But that Disadvantage increasing by the Loss of his own Ships, and the Recruits the Enemy had received, he found himself unable to hold up against such mighty Odds. He therefore began his Retreat in good Order. But his Rigging was so much damaged, that he found himself under great Difficulties in making it. The Dutch had in this Fight made Use of a new Invention, said to be of M. de Witte. Instead of a single Shot as usual, they loaded their Guns with two Cannon Bullets, joined together by a strong Chain, which being discharged, spread themselves on each Hand; and carrying the Chain between them, cut every Thing to Pieces as far as that extended. This Contrivance made terrible Havock among the Sails, and Shrouds, and Yards of the English Ships; so that their Retreat was very slow, and dangerous; they being close followed by the Dutch. The English defended themselves like Men who had but little Hopes of escaping, and were resolved to make the Enemy pay dear for Victory. But towards the Evening they were encouraged with an unexpected Reinforcement.

The English
Fleet in Danger.

The English
reinforced.

A.D. 1666. forcement. For Prince Rupert, directed by the Thunder of the Cannon, which was heard over all the neighbouring Seas, hastened to their Assistance, and was now in Sight, and quickly joined them. And such was the undaunted Spirit of the English Seamen, that tho' they were yet inferior to the Dutch, upon the Arrival of this Recruit, they turned about and attacked the Enemy. But the Night quickly came on, and parted them.

The fourth Day.

The fourth Day the Dutch were almost out of Sight; so that our Fleet, which was still inferior in Numbers, might have easily avoided the Fight. But the English Spirit was not yet tamed. Instead of retiring, they fiercely pursued a superior Enemy. About eight o'Clock in the Morning they overtook them, and the Fight began with new Fury; on the English Side, to revenge the Losses and Disadvantages of the former Days; and on the Side of the Dutch, to keep the Honour they had won. The Battle continued all Day with little Advantage on either Side. But at seven o'Clock a sudden Mist parted the two Fleets, leaving the Victory disputed. They were both so ill handled in the furious Combats they had been engaged in for four Days together, that they were well pleased to leave each other; and so retired to their several Coasts.

The Fleets retire.

The Advantage of the four Days Fight was plainly on the Dutch Side. The Courage of the Duke of Albemarle in attacking an Enemy so much superior in Number, was certainly to be admired; but the Hazard run by it, made his Conduct justly blameable. But the great Victories he had formerly obtained against the Dutch, made him despise them too much; and the same contemptuous Opinion of that Nation was spread through the whole English Fleet, which had like to have proved fatal to them. For had not Prince Rupert come up to their Assistance, in all Appearance the whole Fleet under the Duke of Albemarle had been destroyed, or taken.

The Dutch, who had hitherto been on the losing Side, were mightily elevated with the Advantage they had gained over the English. On the other Hand, tho' the Loss was on our Side, M. de Witte confessed, that the invincible Courage of our Countrymen shewed it self so gloriously in these Engagements, that our Nation got more Honour by these Losses, than by the former Victories. He said, he was sure their own People could never have been brought on the following Days, after the Disadvantages of the first; and that he believed no Nation was capable of it, but the English.

Both Parties were busie for some Time in repairing their Damages; and the Dutch having received the least Hurt, put out to Sea first. The English Fleet was not yet ready; so that the Enemy came before the Thames, and with great Ostentation, dated their Letters and Passports from on Board their Ships, in the Mouth of the River of London. But they had not been there long, before they saw the English Fleet coming down the River to meet them; upon which they immediately retired towards the Coast of Holland. A.D. 1666.

The English Fleet consisted of about eighty Men of War and Frigates, and eighteen or nineteen Fire-ships. The Dutch had eighty eight Men of War and Frigates, and about twenty Fire-ships. The former was divided into three Squadrons; the Red under Prince Rupert, and the Duke of Albemarle, who were together in one Ship; the White under Sir Thomas Allen, and the Blue under Sir Jeremy Smyth. The Dutch were also divided into three main Squadrons, under the Command of De Ruyter, Evertson, and Tromp.

On the 25th of July about Noon, the English came up with the Enemy, to the North East of the North Foreland. Sir Thomas Allen with the White Squadron, began the Fight. He attacked the Dutch Vice-Admiral Evertson. Prince Rupert and the Duke engaged de Ruyter. Tromp fell upon the Blue Squadron, under Sir Jeremy Smyth. Sir Thomas Allen put to Flight the Friesland and Zealand Squadrons under Evertson, who was killed, together with his Vice-Admiral, and Rear-Admiral. The Ship of the Zealand Vice-Admiral Bankert being left, was taken by the English and burnt; as also a Ship of fifty Guns. Prince Rupert and the Duke were less successful, being obliged to leave their Ship, after a Fight of three Hours, and go on Board another. But being roused by the Example of the White Squadron, they redoubled their Fury against de Ruyter, and engaged him, Ship to Ship. And now the Victory inclined to the English on this Side also. The Ship Guelderland of sixty Guns (one of de Ruyter's Seconds) was quite disabled; and three Captains of his Squadron killed. The rest began to disengage themselves and trust to their Sails. De Ruyter, and his Vice-Admiral bravely stood the Shock as long as they could, but at last were forced to follow the others. De Ruyter's Ship was so disabled, and his Men were so fatigued, that he could make no Resistance.

When Tromp attacked the Blue Squadron, they soon gave Way to him. This is supposed by the Dutch Writers to have been done by Stratagem, to draw off Tromp's Squadron, which was the strongest of the Dutch, from the Assistance of his Friends. For the English there afterwards fought so well as to kill his Rear-Admiral, and to do much Damage to his Vice-Admiral. The Advantages gained by the English against the rest of the Dutch Fleet, turned the Scale here also.

Before the Fight ended there fell a great Calm, which hindered the Dutch Ships from making off, and the English from boarding them. This continued all Night and the next Day. Prince Rupert, and the Duke of Albemarle followed De Ruyter close; but not being able to board him for want of Wind, sent a Fire-ship against him, but without Effect. Then they began to cannonade him with great Fury; which he not being able to return,

A third Fight at Sea.

A.D. 1666. return, between Shame and Grief, and Anger, was reduced to Despair. He is said to have cried out, O my God, am I thus unfortunate? Is there not one Bullet among so many Thousands to put a Period to my Life? But before the English Cannon could destroy his Ship, he was come so near to the Shallows on the Dutch Coast, that the English were obliged to give over the Chase.

They afterwards sailed along the Coast of Holland, alarming the Country, and taking Ships at the very Mouths of the Harbours; the Dutch being terribly surprized to find an Enemy they thought entirely disabled from appearing again that Year, insulting them upon their own Coasts in six Weeks after. Intelligence was brought to the English Fleet when it came before the Vlie, that upon that Island, and the Island of Schelling, there were vast Magazines belonging to the States, and the East-India Company; besides a great Number of rich Merchant Ships lying at Anchor. Hereupon a Part of the Fleet was detached to destroy them. Sir Robert Holmes commanded it, who came the next Day to anchor before the Vlie. He sent in a Ketch for Discovery, which returned with an Account of two hundred Sail of Merchant Ships, with two Men of War that had been Convoys, all at Anchor there.

The Dutch Ships burnt at the Vlie.

It was resolved in the first Place to burn these Ships. The lightest Frigate Holmes had with him, was sent with five Fire-ships into the Vlie. One of these immediately grappled the largest of the Convoys, and fired her; the Dutch Captain being drowned as he endeavoured to save himself in the Boat. The other Convoy was burnt by another Fire-ship; the Captain, and Part of the Crew escaping. The Merchant Ships seeing this, cut their Cables, and sought for Security among the Shallows: But being followed by three other Fire-ships, several of the richest Ships were burnt. And the rest being pursued by twenty Pinnaces, sent off by Sir Robert Holmes, with Orders not to lose Time in plundering, on Pain of Death, were almost all overtaken and set on Fire; very few Ships escaping out of this numerous Fleet.

He afterwards endeavoured to make a Descent upon the Island of Vlie. But a hard Rain making the Fire-Arms unserviceable, he was forced to lay aside that Design.

On the Island of Schelling, he succeeded better. For landing his Men, he laid the Town of Brandaris in Ashes; which was the chief of the Island, and contained about six or seven hundred Houses. He had formed a Design against two other Towns of the same Island; but the Execution of it was found to take up too much Time. So he ordered his Men on Board, and rejoined the Fleet.

The Mischief done the Hollanders by this Enterprize was prodigious. Their Ships, with their own Ladings, were valued at 1,100,000*l.* Sterling, besides great Quantities of their most valuable Goods, which upon the first Alarm the Inhabitants of the Vlie had put on Board, thinking them safer there than on Shore. The Houses, Goods, and Magazines burnt at Schelling, added to this Account, make the Damage vastly greater. All this was done without the Loss of twenty Men, on the Side of the English. After these Successes, and the taking of a few Prizes, the English Fleet returned home.

The Dutch afterwards put to Sea with seventy nine Men of War and Frigates, and twenty seven Fire-ships, under de Ruyter, about the End of August; and September 1. they passed by Dover, and made for the Coast of France; with Design to join the Duke of Beaufort, the French Admiral, who lay at Rockelle with forty Men of War. The English Fleet stood after them, to prevent it. The Dutch, to avoid an Engagement, got into the Road of Bulloign, and hauled in close with the Shore. The English designed to attack them there; and had probably destroyed them, had not a sudden Storm obliged them to leave the Enemy, and stand for St. Hellen's Bay. The Duke of Beaufort several Times endeavoured to join the Dutch, but without Success; and the Dutch perceiving that they could not meet, retreated to their own Coasts.

Four or five of the French Men of War fell in with Sir Thomas Allen, who took two of them; and this Loss gave the French a Pretence not to stir out again this Year.

From this glorious Scene of Triumph and Victory abroad, we must look back towards a dismal one of Terror and Destruction at home. In the Beginning of September broke out that Fire, which in less than four Days Time, laid almost the whole City of London in Ashes.

On the 2<sup>d</sup> Day of September, Between one and two in the Morning, a Baker's House in Pudding-Lane near New-Fish-Street, took Fire from a Cause unknown, and was burnt down; the Master and his Family escaping with great Difficulty. The Wind was at that Time extremely high, the Lane it self was very narrow, and full of old Timber Houses; so that as soon as the Flames made their Way into the open Air, they began to spread themselves with great Fury. The Neighbourhood was alarmed; and all rose out of their Beds in haste, to save their Lives and Goods, and to quench the Fire. But the Wind being very strong, and the Houses old and rotten, and fit Fuel for the Flames, they increased so fast, and spread themselves with that Rapidity, that all Endeavours to extinguish them were in vain; and those who lived near the Place where it began, thought themselves happy in having saved their Lives.

The Morning came, and still the Conflagration went on farther and farther. The Alarm now reached more distant Places, and Assistance came from all Parts: The Pipes under the Streets were broken up, and the Engines began to play. But to increase the Mischief, it came to pass that the Water quickly failed them. That Part of the City was chiefly supplied with Water from the Thames, by the Engine at the North End

A.D. 1666. of London-Bridge, not far from the Place where the Fire began. This Engine was at that Time not in perfect Order; and besides, after a few Hours, the Wind, blowing from the East, had driven the Fire to that End of the Bridge where it stood; by which the Machine it self was quickly consumed. This Water failing, the Pipes of the New-River Water were broken up; but these also proved dry, the Cocks, by some Accident, not being turned into the City, tho' it always had been the Custom on Sundays so to do. An Express was immediately sent to Islington, to let that Water on running into the City; but some Time was spent before this could be done, and before the Water came.

In the mean Time, the Fire meeting in its Progress with Magazines of Pitch, Tar, Hemp, and other combustible Wares (which Commodities, for the Conveniency of the Shipping, are chiefly stowed and vended in those Parts of the Town) was dreadfully increased in Rage and Strength. All the Water the Engines could furnish, was too little to restrain it; it prevailed over all Opposition, and continued burning all Sunday, and Sunday Night; spreading it self in that Time to the North as far as Lombard-street, to St. Swithin's Church in Canon-street Westwards; and thence Southward to the Three Cranes by the Water-side. On the East, the Wind setting from that Quarter, it went on but slowly; yet it had got as far as Billinggate by Monday Morning.

The City was by that Time in the utmost Confusion and Distraction, from one End to the other. The Wind was driving the Flames towards the very Heart of it; and the vast Extent of the Conflagration, the Fury with which it still raged, and the fruitless Opposition that had been hitherto made to it, took from the Inhabitants all Hopes and Heart to resist it any longer. They thought now no more of any Thing but saving their movable Effects; in the doing of which, many who lived near the Fire, were prevented by the Rapidity of its Course. Some carried out their Goods into the Fields, where they were obliged to watch them Day and Night; others to the Houses of Friends in remote Places; in many of which, the Fire afterwards overtook them.

The King, the Duke of York, and those of the Nobility who were near, came into the City. So terrible a Sight awakened the King from that Lethargy of Pleasure and Indolence he had indulged himself in, and he is said to have been more deeply struck with it, than with any other Accident of his Life. He expressed the utmost Sorrow and Concern, and was continually present, directing and encouraging those who had so much Heart left as to use Endeavours towards stopping the Progress of the Fire.

So many Houses were now burning together, and in so many Places at once, that Water could no longer be had in sufficient Quantities where it was wanted. The only Remedy left, was to blow up Houses at convenient Distances from those which were on Fire, and to make by that Means void Spaces, at which the Fury of the Conflagration should spend it self for want of Fuel. But this Means also proved ineffectual. For the Fire in some Places made its way, by means of the combustible Part of the Rubbish of the ruined Houses, not well cleared; and in others, by Flakes of burning Matter of different Kinds, which were carried through the Air by the impetuous Wind, to great Distances. And the City being at that Time almost all of Timber, and that generally very old, which had been besides parched and scorched by the Sun the whole preceding Summer, one of the hottest and dryest that had ever been known; it came to pass that wherever any such fiery Matter chanced to light, it seldom wanted fit Fuel to work and feed on, among Wood that had been dried with so great and lasting a Heat.

In this manner the Fire went on from Street to Street, all Monday and Tuesday; burning to the Southward as far as the Thames, and almost to the utmost Bounds of the City on the North; so that it made a Train of Fire of above a Mile long. It proceeded along Cornhill, the Poultry, Cheapside, and St. Paul's Church-yard, consuming every Thing in its way. Abundance of People had put their Effects into St. Paul's Church, as thinking the Materials of the Fabrick, and its standing disengaged, might save it from the common Fate. But the Fire spared it no more than the rest. The Flames took hold of the Timber Part of the Building, and spread themselves throughout the Church wherever they found suitable Nourishment; while the Stone Work either fell down for want of Support, or cracked and flew with the vehement Heat. So that great Numbers of Persons had the Misfortune to stand by, and see all they were worth consumed there before their Eyes. Thence the Fire went on through Ludgate-street, Fleet-street, and on both Sides of them to the North and South, laying all waste as it went; and leaving a dismal Track of Ruines behind it.

The Fields about London were covered with Crowds of People, who had been driven from their Dwellings by the Fire; some watching the Goods they were able to save; others lamenting the Loss of those they once had. Many of these were forced to spend several Days and Nights without any Covering but the Sky; and those were happy who could get Shelter in any House of the neighbouring Villages. Those whose Houses were yet standing, lived in Expectation of the same Fate; the Wind, which kept the Fire alive and drove it forwards, blowing still from the same Quarter, and with the same Violence. So that it seemed as if nothing was to put an End to this Conflagration, but the open and empty Fields.

But the divine Providence was pleased in Justice to remember Mercy. About ten of the Clock on Tuesday Night the Wind slackened, which prevented the Fire from propagating it self into distant Parts, and retarded

A.D. 1666. tarded its Progress in those that were contiguous to it. So that by blowing up of Houses in proper Places, its Course was stopped in many Parts; and in some it went out as it were of it self. It ended to the Westward in Fleet-street, the Inner-Temple and Fetter-Lane; to the North at Holborn-Bridge, Pye-Corner, Aldersgate, Cripplegate, the lower End of Basinghall-street, by the Postern, and at the upper End of Coleman-street; to the East, at the End of Bishopsgate-street and Leadenhall-street in Cornhill, in Fenchurch-street, Mincing-lane, Mark-lane, and at the Tower-Dock. And thus by Wednesday Morning, this dreadful Conflagration entirely ceased, and went out; leaving only a Heap of smoking Ruins in the Place where a great and noble City stood but three Days before.

The Fire extinguished.

On Wednesday Night, an Alarm was given by its breaking out afresh in the Inner-Temple. But the Duke of York, who watched there that Night, gave such seasonable Directions, that before Day it was quite extinguished.

The Loss occasioned by the Fire.

The Damage done by this Fire may be easily supposed in general to be immense and inconceivable; the Particulars are scarcely to be fumm'd up. We have in the late Edition of Stow's Survey, an Estimate of no less than ten Millions of Money in Damages, Losses and Expences of one kind or other, occasioned by this terrible Visitation.

Whether by Design or by Accident, examined.

But a Question here arises, which having been so much canvassed, it is necessary to take some Notice of, which is this: Whether this Fire were the sole Effect of the Will of Heaven, or whether the Wickedness of Men was the Instrument of Providence to bring on this dismal Calamity. To prove the latter, it has been observed, that the Extent and Violence of the Fire was so great, and it seemed to break out in so many different Places, as makes it hardly credible that it should have prevailed so far, and after that manner, against the vigorous Opposition made to it, had not the Mischief been propagated by some other Cause than its own Strength. It is certain besides, that there were some Persons of the Republican Party accused of such a Design, and executed for it not long before, namely John Rathbone, an old Army Colonel, and some others of the same Stamp, who were convicted of a Design to kill the King, and overthrow the Government; to effect which, they had agreed to set Fire to the City of London in several Places; and had pitched on the third of September for the Day. There was also one Hubert, a French reputed Papist, who acknowledged himself guilty of the same, and was hanged by his own Confession, no other Evidence appearing against him. On the other Side, though the Devastation made by the Fire was so prodigious, yet the Causes that propagated it were so numerous and powerful, as to seem commensurate enough to the Mischief done. The Vehemence of the Wind, the Oldness and Dryness of the Houses, and the Narrowness of the Streets, have been above touched on; and it is no great Wonder that the Fire should become very fierce, A.D. 1666. when it had so great Helps. And though its breaking out in Houses at a Distance from those that were on Fire, seems to intimate that it was industriously carried on; yet it is in Truth no more than often happens upon the like Occasions. When the Town of Warwick was burnt about thirty Years ago, several Persons, who thinking themselves safe, went out to assist their Neighbours, found their Houses burnt down in their Absence; the Wind being extremely high, and scattering the Flakes of Fire to such great Distances, as could not have been imagined till it was found by that fatal Experiment. And in a late Fire in London a like Accident happened; a low Shed, at the Length of a middling Street from a House that was burning, being set on Fire by some flaming Matter carried thither by a high Wind, as happened within the Writer's Knowledge. As to Hubert, the Man appeared to be not very well in his Senses; so that what he said cannot be depended on. Nor does it seem likely that those of Rathbone's Party should venture on it, after so many of their Accomplices were put out of the Way; and their Scheme, no doubt, utterly disappointed. For these Reasons, and because no solid Evidence appears to prove the contrary, it seems most reasonable to incline to the favourable Side, and to look upon this Fire as the Act of Providence, intended as a Punishment to those Times and a Happiness to our own; the Beauty, Regularity and Healthfulness of the new City remaining to ours, and as we may hope, to many distant Ages; while the Loss and Calamity of the old one, was confined to a very few Years after this signal Disaster happened.

On the 21st of September, the Parliament met at Westminster, with great Expectations from Friends and Foes. The one feared and the other hoped, that the late Devastation of the City, joined to that which the Pestilence had made there before, and was even then making in some Parts of England, would have brought our Nation so low, that they could not have born any longer the Weight of a War, against the most powerful of their Neighbours confederate against them. But those who thought so, did not sufficiently understand what the Vigour of an English Parliament was capable of.

The Parliament meets.

The King having in a moving Speech set forth his Wants and Fears, in that sad State of Things, the Parliament was so far from being discouraged by the one, or daunted by the other, that the Commons unanimously resolved, "That the humble and hearty Thanks of this House be given to his Majesty for his great Care in the Management of the present War; and that this House will supply his Majesty proportionably to his present Occasions; and that the Concurrence of the Lords be desired to this Resolution;" which that House agreed to. And soon after the Commons voted a Royal Aid of 1,800,000*l.* for carrying on the present War. That invincible

Their noble Resolution.

Spirit

A.D.1666. Spirit we admire in the Romans after the Loss of the Battle of Cannæ, was equalled by this Resolution and Vote of an English Parliament. Four Days after, the two Houses attended the King in a Body, to manifest their hearty Concurrence in the Vote to supply his Majesty with whatsoever was necessary for carrying on the War; and were received by the King with reciprocal Kindness.

An Insurrection in Scotland.

In November News was brought of an Insurrection in Scotland. The Western Part of that Kingdom had been remarkably Enemies to the Episcopal Church; and that to a Degree that was very difficult to be managed. The Government, which was labouring to fix Episcopacy in Scotland, thought the best Way of treating them, was to reduce them by Force. Therefore Soldiers were quartered upon them; who took Care to obey the Orders they had, to be as troublesome and oppressive as they could. This exasperated Matters; and four of their Ministers (a Sort of People they hold in great Veneration) inflamed them still more. On the 13th of November they met in Arms. At Dumfries they seized Sir James Turner, Commander of the Soldiers quartered upon them, whom they intended to have hanged. But finding also the Instructions he brought with him, which were more severe than his Usage of them had been; they resolved to spare him. These Rebels came to be called Whigs, which Name from thence came into England, and proved one of our unhappy Terms of Distinction. They marched towards Edinburgh, and came within two Miles of it. But finding none declare for them they lost Heart, and from above two Thousand dwindled to eight or nine Hundred. So they resolved to turn back to the West, where they should be among their Friends; and have besides Opportunities of escaping into England or Ireland. But in their March thither, the King's Forces, who were in pursuit of them, overtook them at the Top of Pentland-Hill.

The Fight at Pentland Hill.

The Rebels finding they could not get off, stopped their March. Their Ministers did all they could by preaching and praying, to infuse Courage into them; and they sung the 74th and 79th Psalms. Then they turned upon the King's Forces, and received the first Charge that was given by the Troop of Guards so resolutely, that they put them in Disorder. But that first Heat being spent, they lost all Order, and ran for their Lives. About forty were killed on the Spot, and an hundred and thirty were taken. The rest escaped by Favour of the Night, and the Weariness or Compassion of the King's Forces.

The Rebels defeated.

The Act of Supply goes on heavily.

The good Correspondence that had continued so long between the King and the Parliament, began to decline. They had passed a noble Vote and Resolution to supply the King, as was said above; but the passing of this Vote into an Act went on heavily. What the Reason of this was, does not so clearly appear; whether the Commons disliked the Measures the Court pursued, or thought the Luxury and Expensiveness there carried off the Money appointed for the A.D.1666. Publick Service; or whether there was some other more secret Cause. But be that as it will, we are here come to an End of that perfect Harmony and happy Agreement between the King and his Parliament, that began at the Restoration. Mistrusts and Jealousies, first succeeded them, and afterwards more open Disagreement.

The King sent a Message on the 15th of December to the House of Commons, to quicken the Supply; for almost three Months had passed since that Vote. But they were so busy in the Enquiry after Misdemeanors of different Kinds, that they either could not, or would not, make the Dispatch the Court desired. At length before the 18th of January, the Bill for supplying the King had passed the Houses, under the Form of a Poll Bill; and therefore the King came on that Day to the House of Lords, to pass that Bill and some others; upon which Occasion he made a Speech to them filled with an unusual Resentment. And not long after this he came a second Time, and prorogued them; no material Business having intervened. The King represents it. The Parliament prorogued.

The two Powers of England and Holland began to be weary of the War, which cost so many Lives and so much Treasure on both Sides. The Dutch made the first Overtures for Peace, in a Letter they sent about disposing of the Body of Sir William Berkley, who was killed in the four Days Fight, and his Ship taken. This produced an Answer from the King, which was succeeded by an Interchange of Letters on both Sides on the same Subject. At length a Treaty was appointed at Breda, to commence at the Beginning of May 1667. But at first very little was done; both Parties waiting to be determined in their Pretensions by the Events of the War. A.D.1667. A Treaty at Breda.

They proved this Year both ignominious and pernicious to our Countrey, in that shameful Affront we received at Chatham. That Enterprize was contrived between de Witte, and the French Ambassador d'Estrades; and the Project was signed by that Ambassador on one Part, and the Deputies of the States on the other, April 25. By this Agreement the French, to set on the Dutch more earnestly upon an Undertaking they thought would for ever separate the two Nations, promised to send a Squadron under the Duke of Beaufort, to assist in the Execution of it. But for the same Reason they promised this, they did not perform it; leaving the Dutch to be the only Actors in this Affair, and to draw upon themselves alone, the Hatred and Revenge of the English.

This Design met with as much Success as No Fleet at the Enemies of England could reasonably expect, for the King set out no Fleet this Year. Those who judge most softly of the Actions of this Prince, attribute this to the Expectations he was under of the Conclusion of the Peace at Breda, which he was made to believe was as good as over. It is also said, that it had been

A.D. 1667. been often proposed to the King by knowing Persons, and particularly by Sir John Lawson, that since the Life of the Dutch consisted in Trade, a Piratical War would prove more detrimental to that Nation, as well as cheaper to our own. We are told also, that the French Ministers imposed upon the King, by getting the Queen-Mother of England, at that Time in France, to write a Letter to him, to inform him that the Dutch were looking so entirely towards the Treaty at Breda, that they would put out no Fleet to Sea this Year. But others less favourable to the King say, that the true Reason was, that the Supplies given by the Parliament had been so ill husbanded, that there was not enough left to discharge the necessary Expences in the setting out a Fleet. We leave this Matter to the Reader's own Judgment, and go on with the unpleasant Relation of the Consequences of these ill Measures.

The Disgrace
at Chatham.

The Dutch understanding that they would find no Fleet to oppose them, were the more diligent in getting ready their own; and with great Speed fitted out seventy Men of War, with which they came over to the Thames Mouth.

Having rode here in Triumph for some Time, they at last entered the River Medway, to destroy the Royal Navy laid up at Chatham. The Duke of Albemarle was dispatched thither in all haste, who applied himself to the securing the Fleet with that Diligence and Activity he had been accustomed to. But his Care and Endeavours were eluded by a strange Neglect and Remissness of those whom he had to do with there. An Attempt of this Nature had been expected; to prevent which, the Castle of Sheerness, at the very Mouth of the Medway, and of Upnore, situate farther up the River, were ordered to be fortified; and a Chain was ordered to be drawn across the River between those Castles. But the Orders had been so negligently executed, that these Fortifications were not completed by that Time the Dutch Fleet came thither. They first attacked the Fort of Sheerness, to secure their Passage up the Medway; which after a brave Resistance by Sir Edward Spragge, they made themselves Masters of. Then they sail'd up the River. The Duke of Albemarle had sunk several Ships in the Way by which they were to pass; and had given Orders to sink more, which would have effectually hindered their coming farther had it been done. But this was neglected, and one Passage being left open which the Duke had commanded to be stopped with a great Ship, the Dutch got through and came to the Chain, where they found three Ships placed behind it to annoy them, if they should attempt to break through. This Appearance so discouraged them, that it was a long Time before any of the Dutch Captains dared attempt to force their Way. But at last one Captain Brakel (to atone for some Offence he had committed) offered to make the first Attempt; and putting himself aboard a Fire-

Ship, went with full Sails against the Chain, A.D. 1667. the Wind and Tide both favouring him, but stuck fast. Nevertheless the Shock he gave to it was so great, that being followed by another larger Ship, the Chain gave Way to the Weight of them both. Then the Dutch Men of War came up; and of the three Ships that guarded the Chain, two were burnt, and one taken; after which, they went higher up the River, where they found the noblest Ship of the English Navy, called the Royal Charles; which was deserted by the Men, who had set her on Fire: But the Dutch put out the Fire, and carried off the Hull of her. After this, they came up as high as Upnore-Castle, where there lay three Capital Ships, the Great James, the Loyal London, and the Royal Oak, all which they set on Fire and burnt, notwithstanding the great Fire of the Castle; which being done, they failed back with the Turn of the Tide without making any farther Attempt.

During the Continuance of the Dutch in the Medway, the City of London was in the utmost Consternation, with the Apprehension that they might come up the Thames as high as the Bridge. All Hands were set to Work; the Militia was raised; nine Ships were sunk at Woolwich, and four at Black-Wall; besides which, Batteries were raised on the Banks of the River, and furnished with great Guns. But these Precautions proved for some Time unnecessary; for the Dutch did not as yet make any such Attempt, but failed away for Portsmouth, with Design upon the Ships in that Harbour; but such Provision was made against their coming that they made away. From thence they went to Plymouth, and soon after made an Attempt upon Torbay; but were beaten off. But now again they stood Eastward, and came a second Time to the Mouth of the Thames; which they entered, and came with about twenty five Sail into Tilbury-Hope; where they found eighteen English Ships, to which they did considerable Damage. But Sir Edward Spragge coming thither, and being joined by a small Squadron commanded by Sir Joseph Jordan, they fell down the River again, and failed away to Harwich, and landed three thousand Men on the Coast of Suffolk, but with no Effect. Then they returned to the Thames, which they entered again, and came up as far as Hull-Haven; where meeting Sir Edward Spragge, an Encounter passed between them, in which they obliged Sir Edward to stand up the River for Gravesend. But they dared not adventure any farther, but failed out of the River to the Western Coasts, which they terrified by Attempts and Offers of Landing, till the News of the Peace at Breda, which was signed during these Alarms, became so publick, that at last de Ruyter the Dutch Admiral ceased Hostilities, and sent to some of the Cornish Gentlemen a friendly Invitation to come on board him; and having entertained them handsomely, and excused what was past, he returned with his Fleet to his own Country.

The Dutch alarm all the Coasts of Eng- land.

A.D. 1667. The News of the Blow at Chatbam gave an ill Turn to the Treaty at Breda. The Plenipotentiaries of the States began to insult, and to say, that tho' their Masters had consented to conclude a Peace upon certain Conditions, yet they did not know whether the Change of Affairs might not make the States alter their Minds; and therefore they could not promise for the Ratifications of them, or that new Articles and Demands might not be added. This was very exasperating, but all wise Men saw so clearly the Necessity of a Peace in the present Situation of Affairs, that they were more Intent upon that, than the Thoughts of Revenge: So that they were well pleased to hear that the Plenipotentiaries on both Sides, had at length agreed and signed a Treaty of Peace on the 29th of June.

The Peace concluded at Breda.

The Felicity of this Reign at an End.

And at the Conclusion of this Peace we may date the final Period of that national Happiness, which begun at the Restoration of the King, and continued for a long Time the Admiration of our Neighbours, and the Glory of our Constitution and Countrey. The Unanimity and Confidence that was then so conspicuous between the King and the Parliament, became changed into a mutual Distrust and Disagreement. The universal Love of the People to the King was much diminished by the severe Prosecutions, which alienated the whole Body of the Dissenters from him. Wise Men who were heartily the King's Friends, were also very ill satisfied with his Behaviour, by which he shewed himself more and more bent upon his vicious Pleasures, and averse to the laborious Duty of the high Station he was placed in. And because the Subjects form their Manners upon the Model of their Prince, and the Nature of Man is more inclined to Evil than to Good, his Example encouraged and nourished all the Vices of a debauched and corrupted Court, whence they gradually spread thro' the Nation.

Upon that Occasion the Duke of Albemarle is said to have remembered what some Republicans told him before the Restoration; that by bringing in the King he would put the Kingdom under Pimps and Whores, and all would decline into Infamy and Decay. And the good old Man said with some Resentment, he found them the truest Prophets he ever met with in his Life. Secret Intrigues in Favour of Popery were suspected by prying and sagacious Men; and the late Dishonour at Chatbam, caused heavy Reflections to be made on the Government; which by all these Discontents was so unsettled, that the Peace of Breda, tho' not very honourable, was very acceptable to the Lovers of their Countrey.

The Earl of Clarendon removed.

That Peace was quickly succeeded by the Removal of the Earl of Clarendon. That worthy Patriot, by a Misfortune that has happened to other wise and good Men, was fallen from that Favour with his Prince, and Reputation with the People, which he had for some Time enjoyed, and always deserved, into the greatest Disgrace with the one, and Hatred of the other. That his inflexible Virtue should be disagreeable to a dissolute and vicious Court, is not at all strange. But it was, no doubt, a great Mortification to him, to find that faithful Sollicitude with which he had watched over his Countrey, and guarded it against so many Dangers as it lay exposed to from different Quarters, requited with Aversion and Ill-will. It will not be amiss to enlarge a little upon the Causes that brought upon this excellent Person, Misfortunes so undeserved.

To the Fall of this great Man many different Causes, as usual, concurred. One was the Marriage of his Daughter to the Duke of York. This was done entirely without his Privy or Consent, nor did he know any Thing of it till it broke out; and the King upon this Discovery assured him with great Kindness, that he should still continue the same good Opinion of him that he always had, as believing him entirely unacquainted with it. But this gave a Handle to his Enemies to suggest, that he had set on the Match with the Infanta of Portugal, with design to bring his own Descendants to the Crown upon the King's Want of Children by that Princess, who was reported to be incapable of bearing them.

The Causes of his Fall.

The great Interest he was known to have with the King, did also contribute to bring on him the Odium of some unpopular Acts, which he was so far from advising, that he strenuously opposed them. Besides the Marriage with Portugal, the Sale of Dunkirk, when the Importance of that Place began to appear, was also laid to his Charge, tho' most unjustly; since himself and his Friend the Earl of Southampton opposed it to the utmost at the Council-Board. And for the same Reason, other Miscarriages and Misfortunes were, without Reason, laid at his Door.

Moreover, at the King's Restoration, the Cavalier Party, who came laden with Expectations of Rewards for what they had done and suffered for the King's Cause, found themselves very much disappointed. Every Man thought the King would have so much Leisure as to attend to the Recital of his Services, and so much Wealth as to be able to satisfy all his Hopes; and, as is usual, those were most forward with their Pretensions who had deserved the least. Whereas the Wealth of the Nation could not compensate all the Losses and Sufferings of the loyal Party; nor had the King much to spare from the necessary publick Expences. So that many were sent away with their Expectations frustrated, and by Consequence full of Complaints. These were increased by seeing several of those who had been the late King's fierce Enemies in high Posts, bestowed on them for their Services at the Restoration; which could not have been brought about so easily, had not many who were Enemies formerly, become at that Time Friends. But those who would not be paid with Reason, raised a great Outcry thereupon against the Chancellor; and a wicked Piece of Policy

A.D. 1667. licy was fathered upon him, by which he was said to advise the King to prefer and advance his Enemies, to make them his Friends; for that those who were already his Friends, would continue so by their Principles only. This Report was hastily taken up, and spread thro' the Nation to his great Disadvantage; tho' he utterly disowned any such Counsel.

His Firmness to the Church of England made the rigid Dissenters his utter Enemies; and on the other Hand, his Endeavours to introduce a Coalition between them and the Church, got him the ill Will of the strict Church-men. So that by studying the Good of the Whole, he offended each Particular.

To these Causes, an Accident concurred to make him unpopular, which had a great Effect in a short Time. He had a Grant from the King, of a Piece of Ground by the Park to build a House upon. The Vintners Company designing to gain his Favour, were at the Expence of the Building; which was begun in the Plague Year. He consented to this, thinking that the Employment of so many Workmen as were necessary about this Structure, and the Circulation of their Wages, which were regularly paid them, would be a publick Convenience in that universal Calamity. But his Enemies gave it a wrong Turn, representing this as an Insult on the publick Misfortunes, by building himself so fine a Palace in a Time of general Mourning. And besides, the Undertakers made it much more magnificent and pompous than he intended, which added to the Clamour. He was sensible of this, but it was when it was too late; for the Building was carried on in his Absence. But coming to see it, when the Case was finished, and the Work was too far advanced to go back, he immediately perceived the Consequence, and with a Sigh said, This House will one Day prove my Ruine. His Enemies gave it the Name of Dunkirk House, as if it were built with the Money taken for the Sale of that Place. But we have already shewn how little Reason there was for that Imputation.

These Things impaired his Reputation among the People. The King resolving to give himself up to dissolute Pleasures, was very willing to get rid of one who was a continual Check upon them. Those Causes which rendred him unpopular, had their Effect in the Houses of Parliament; which was increased in those two Assemblies, by the Envy of particular Persons to the high Station and Favour he had so long enjoyed.

Some Part this great Man had in his own Fall, by a Haughtiness of Temper, and Contempt of others, which he did not sufficiently guard against. This lost him the good Will of all those who wanted either Judgment to know, or Opportunities to observe those excellent Qualities which made Amends for that Fault. And it happened unfortunately for him to be in a Station that made this Infirmary the more conspicuous. For by his Office of Lord Chancellor, and his Authority as chief Minister, he must of Course receive many Petitions and Applications; and of Course reject many. And in A.D. 1667. doing this, instead of softening his Refusals with Condescension and Affability, by treating Men with an Air of Pride and Contempt he sent them away as much offended with the Manner of the Refusal, as with the Thing it self. And this made him disliked and unpopular; the Pride every Man has in his own Heart, making that of another insupportable.

The King had promised the Parliament against their Meeting, to do something that would not be unwelcome to them; by which 'tis likely he meant the Removal of this great Man, who for the Reasons above-mentioned, was not at all gracious. On the 21st of October the Parliament met. The Speeches of the King and Chancellor having nothing very remarkable, we omit them. In the Address of Thanks of both Houses that followed them, particular Thanks is given to the King for removing the late Lord Chancellor; and the King in his Answer, told them he would never employ him again in any publick Affairs whatsoever; so that he was fairly abandoned to be run down by his Enemies.

On the 26th of October, Mr. Seymour began the Charge against him in the House of Commons, and accused him of many great and heinous Crimes; and was followed by a great many others. The Accusation was soon agreed upon, but a Debate arose, whether they should impeach him before, or after the particular Articles were prepared against him; and the latter was agreed on. Then the Articles were drawn up, being twenty three in Number; in which he was charged with designing to govern the Kingdom by a standing Army; corresponding with Cromwell; selling of Dunkirk; arbitrary and illegal Imprisonments; extorting great Sums of Money illegally; procuring exorbitant Grants to himself and his Relations; and in the last Place, betraying the King's Counsels to his Enemies. The Earl was so little concerned at this Accusation, that the next Day after the Articles were brought into the House, he ordered his Son, Mr. Hyde, to acquaint them, that if they who best knew their own Evidence, would pitch upon any one of those Articles, which they thought they had the strongest Proof for, and make that single one good, he would submit to the Censure due to them all. But the Grounds of their Accusation were so slender, it being built on nothing but flying Reports, and vulgar Prejudices, that they dared not accept of this noble Challenge. Instead of that, they put the Matter upon a Point, which produced insuperable Difficulties. They sent up a general Charge of High-Treason against him to the House of Lords, and desired he might be secured, till the Commons should exhibit Articles against him. But this the Lords would not consent to. They looked on a general Accusation as a meer Clamour; and thought their Dignities of little Value, if a Clamour could send them to Prison. So they acquainted the Comment meets.

The Parlia-

The Earl of Clarendon fallen upon.

The two Houses differ about him.

A.D. 1667. mons in a Conference, that they had not secured the Earl of Clarendon, because there was no Matter particularly charged upon him. The Commons were all in a Fury upon this; and the more violent, because their Anger was unjust; and after a hot Debate resolved, that the Lords, by not sequestering the Earl of Clarendon, according to the Desire of the House of Commons, occasioned an Obstruction of publick Justice, and brought in a Precedent of dangerous Consequence.

He withdraws.

An Act passes for banishing him.

The Earl of Southampton dies.

But the Lords continued firm, and though the King used his utmost Interest to bring them to comply, he could not procure a Majority. At last the Breach being so wide, and likely to increase, the King spoke to the Duke of York, to desire the Earl of Clarendon to go beyond Sea, as the only Expedient left to make up the Difference between the two Houses; and let fall some Words of Kindness, in Case he would comply with this. The Earl was all Obedience and Submission, and was charmed with those tender Words the King had said of him. So, partly to serve the King, and save himself and his Family, but chiefly that he might not occasion any Difference between the King and the Duke, who heartily espoused his Interest, he went privately beyond Sea. From Calais, he wrote an excellent Apology for himself to the House of Lords, protesting his Innocence in all the Points objected to him; and that he had not left the Kingdom for Fear, or out of any Consciousness of Guilt; but only that he might not be the Occasion of any Difference between the two Houses, or of obstructing publick Business.

Soon after this, the Lords were prevailed on, by Way of Compromise, to send down a Bill to the Commons for banishing him, and making it Treason to correspond with him; which Method of Proceeding was much objected against, as attended with great Hardships. It was disliked by the Earl's Friends in the House of Commons, as too heavy a Penalty; and by his Enemies, as too light; but the Power of the latter, and their Animosity against him, carried it thro' the House; and the King, being beset with the Associates of his debauched Pleasures, was easily prevailed on to give the Royal Assent to the banishing of a Man, whose Virtues and Authority were a perpetual Check upon them. The Earl continued in Exile, in different Cities of the Kingdom of France, till the Time of his Death, which happened seven Years after.

The Nation could very ill spare this worthy Minister, having but just before lost another excellent Patriot, the Chancellor's great Friend and Supporter, the Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Southampton; a most admirable and accomplished Nobleman, adorned with all the Virtues of a Christian, and every Endowment of a wise and great Man. He was an entire and true Englishman, a loyal Subject, and firm Patriot; and both in the highest Degree. In the late Reign, when the Crown was so depressed, that the Head that wore it was sentenced to be cut off, this Earl, A.D. 1667. with the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, and the Earl of Lindsey, offered his own Life to save that of his Royal Master; and after that impious Blow was struck, performed the last Duties to him, and attended him with Tears to his Grave. And after the Battle of Worcester, as the present King was wandering through England, he had the Courage to seek him out, and to make Provision for his Escape; though with the utmost Danger to his own Safety. But when after the Restoration, he found the popular Stream run so fiercely on the Side of the Prerogative, that the publick Liberty was in Danger of being overthrown and carried away with the Torrent; he then appeared as zealously against this new popular Madness, as he had done before, when it took the opposite Course; and joined with the Earl of Clarendon, to frustrate and elude all the Attempts made by imprudent or ill-designing Men, to raise the Throne on the Ruines of the Freedom and Happiness of the People. Though the Chancellor and himself were linked together in a firm Friendship, and the most perfect Harmony and Concurrence of publick Counsels, he had the Happiness to escape those Gusts and Storms of Obloquy and Detraction which beat so furiously on his Friend; and he never lost, what he always deserved, that most noble Character, of a great and good Minister of State; which Justice the Earl of Clarendon was not able to attain, till Length of Time had cleared away those Blots and Stains which the poisonous Breath of Envy had cast upon his Name. But the Earl of Southampton knew how undeserved those Aspersions were; and did his utmost, on all Occasions, to justify and support his sinking Friend. The last Time he was at the Council-board, when some Reflection was made on the Chancellor, he stood up, though his Age and Infirmities would scarce permit him, and with all the Force his Weakness allowed him, said: This Man is a true Protestant, and an honest Englishman, and while he is in Place, we are secure of our Religion, Laws and Liberties; but if he be removed, England will feel the ill Effects of it. And we shall find by what follows, that it was not very long before this Prediction came to pass.

The Year 1668. began with the Project A.D. 1668. of the Triple Alliance; a Counsel much applauded, but short lived. The Occasion of it was this. The Scheme laid by France for an universal Empire broke out during the Treaty of Breda, in a sudden and powerful Invasion of the Spanish Netherlands. This alarmed all Europe, and with great Reason; for every one saw, that if the Spanish Netherlands fell into the Hands of the French, the Republick of Holland would be changed into a maritime Province to France, which would put the Fleets and Riches of that State in the Power of the French King. And when he had obtained this Addition of Strength, no Power was left in Europe able to stop the Rapidity of his Conquests, which Way

A.D. 1668. Way soever he should think fit to turn them.

With great Probability of Success.

And the Success of this Enterprize appeared infallible. The Spaniards in Flanders were weak, and unprepared for Resistance. England and Holland, whose Union alone could check the French Ambition, were to the last Degree exasperated against each other, by the Damages the latter had received in the War, and the Insult offered to us at Chatham; which the French had set on to make the Breach irreconcilable. And they succeeded in this so well, that tho' a Treaty of Peace was on Foot, the Insolence of the Dutch, and the secret Resentment of the English, had taken away all Likelihood of any future Confidence for many Years to come. And thus the Liberties of Christendom seemed like a Criminal at an Execution, only waiting for the fatal Blow. But that All-ruling Providence, which delights to controul the Pride of mortal Men, defeated these hopeful Schemes laid by France, by a Train of surprizing Incidents.

But is disappointed.

When the Designs to invade Flanders were first made publick, the Danger appeared so sudden, so great, and so remediless, that had the French immediately proceeded to the Execution of them, that whole Country had been swallowed up the first Campaign. The Spaniards had neither Heart, nor Means to resist. But by an unaccountable Slowness in the French, they had Time to recover their Courage, and to make Provision against the impending Storm: So that the first Campaign ended without that Progress on the French Side, that was at first expected and feared.

The Treaty of Breda was also quickened by the Sight of this new Danger; which besides put the two Nations in a better Disposition to a future Agreement than could otherwise have been expected.

But, what was above all extraordinary, the King and Court of England, from whose usual Indolence and Fluctuation of Counsels the French had the least to apprehend, became inspired on a sudden with a wonderful Spirit of Vigilance, Activity, and Resolution. They were first aware of the Danger, and stirred vigorously to prevent it. The Steps they took were well considered, and attended with a surprizing and quick Success.

Sir William Temple was sent by the King into Holland towards the End of the last Year to M. de Witte, to ask his Opinion about the Affairs of Flanders, and so to introduce a Confidence between the ruling Powers of both Nations. The Report Sir William Temple made, gave the King so much Satisfaction, that he was now sent again to conclude a defensive League of the greatest Strictness, and to concert other Measures for the Preservation of Flanders. And a wonderful Coincidence of Events favouring this Counsel, an Alliance was concluded and signed in five Days Time, by the English Minister, and Dutch Commissioners.

The Articles of this Treaty were contained in three Instruments. The first was a defensive Alliance between England and Hol- land. In the second, they agreed to oblige the French King to stand to an Offer he had made of an Alternative to Spain; either of keeping what he had gained the last Campaign, or receiving in Exchange, Luxemburg, the Cambresis, Cambray, Douay, Aire, St. Omar, Winoxberg, Furnes and Lincken. In Case that Prince should recede from that Offer, and make higher Demands, the two Allies were to declare War against him, and compel him to accept it by Force. They were to do the same to the Spaniards, in Case they refused to agree to this Offer. The third contained separate Articles tending to the same End, the preserving the Tranquillity of Europe. And three Days after these Instruments were signed, the Swedish Ambassador signed an Act, by which the King his Master acceded to this Alliance.

This Triple Alliance is justly reckoned among the most happy Counsels any Prince or State ever entered into; and the incredible Dispatch with which this important Treaty was concluded, added very much to the Felicity that attended it. It choaked and extinguished, as it were in a Moment, a War, that at its first kindling, threatened all Europe with Desolation and Ruine; and this in the most glorious Manner, by the pure Force of Wisdom and Counsel, without drawing a Sword, or firing a Gun. It was carried on with that Celerity, that the King of France could hardly know it was begun, till he beheld the Work complete and perfect; and saw a formidable Mound, sprung up as it were by Enchantment, which at once controuled his Ambition, and defied his Power. He soon found there was no Remedy, but Submission; and the Alternative being proposed to him, and the King of Spain, they agreed to enter upon a Treaty, which was accordingly begun at Aix-la-Chapelle.

On the 10th of February the Parliament met at Westminster, and on the first Day of their Meeting the King came to the House of Lords. In his Speech he acquainted them with the Triple Alliance; made between himself, and Holland, and Sweden, to repress the growing Power, and dangerous Designs of France; took Notice of his Debts and want of Money, ending with a Motion for some Course to beget a better Union and Composure in the Minds of his Protestant Subjects in Matters of Religion.

The Parlia-
ment meets.

The Counsel of making the Triple Alliance against France was received with great Applause. But the Motion for Supplies, was neither immediately nor chearfully considered. And that for an Union among the Protestant Subjects by giving Ease to the Dissenters, was interpreted, like all other Motions of the same Kind from the Court, to be intended to introduce a Toleration for the Papists.

Their Proceedings.

The Business at Chatham, and other Miscarriages of the late War, stuck so close to every Englishman, that the Commons put off the particular Consideration of the King's Speech, that they might have Time to examine in-

The Triple Alliance concluded.

A.D.1668. to the Misconduct of those who were concerned in those Affairs; and they impeached Commissioner Pett for ill Conduct upon that Occasion; but the Impeachment had no Effect.

These Affairs took up the Commons so much, that they did not mind the Supplies with that Diligence the King wished. He was obliged to send them three Messages to quicken their Pace. At last they prepared a Bill for granting 310000*l.* to be raised by an Imposition on Wines and other Liquors.

The Declaration the King had made in his Speech in Favour of the Dissenters, raised the Spirits of those People; and Informations were brought to the Commons from some Counties, and particularly Staffordshire, of the insolent Carriage and Abuses committed by Persons in several Places, in interrupting and disturbing of Ministers in their Churches, and holding Meetings contrary to Law. The Commons upon this presented a Petition to the King, desiring that he would issue out his Proclamation to enforce the Laws against Conventicles; and that Care might be taken to prevent all unlawful Assemblies of Papists, and Nonconformists. The former were added to the other, to let the Court see the Commons firm Resolution to shew no Favour to that People.

A Quarrel about Privileges happened this Session between the two Houses. It was occasioned by a Sentence given in the House of Lords in Behalf of one Mr. Skinner a considerable Merchant. This Gentleman had brought his Petition into that House, against the East-India Company for Damages done him, and was relieved in 5000 Pounds Costs. Mr. Skinner was ordered to Custody of the Serjeant at Arms; and the Difference rose so high, that the King was forced to come to the House of Lords; where having passed the Money Bill, and six others, he adjourned them for three Months.

About this Time the Queen miscarried a second Time, as we find in a Letter of the Lord Arlington.

At the Beginning of May, the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle was signed, which put a Stop to the French Conquests, and the Fears of Europe. The Marquis of Castel-Rodrigo, Governor of the Spanish Netherlands, chose to leave those Places in the Hands of the French, which they had taken the foregoing Campaign. And the King and the States of Holland obliged themselves to guaranty the King of Spain from all future Pretences or Invasions to be made by the King of France, in any of his Territories for ever hereafter. So that a firm and lasting Repose seemed established in Christendom; with universal Praises of the King of England, who had so great a Part in it.

This Peace was succeeded by a long Quiet and Tranquillity in our own Countrey; a State of Things, which as some have observed, is the best to live in, but the worst to write of. The King made a Progress this Summer through a great Part of the Kingdom, diverting himself when in the Inland Towns, and in the Sea-Ports surveying and examining the naval and maritime Affairs, which he understood to a wonderful Exactness. In this Calm almost the whole Year was spent; while Trade, encouraged by Peace, thrived and flourished; and the Arts and Sciences were every where promoted and encouraged. The City of London rose from its Ashes with an Expedition that surprized all Europe, and a Beauty incomparably beyond what it had known in its former State; the abundant Matter of Contention at Law, which such an Accident furnished, being cut off by an admirable Strain of Wisdom in the Parliament, who provided a Judicature to determine briefly and finally all such Controversies. So that new Buildings sprang up every Day and Week. Care was also taken to make the Streets more spacious and airy, and the Houses more regular in their Form, and more magnificent in their Appearance than before. And to the prudent Management then used, next to the Divine Goodness, we may reasonably attribute the Freedom of the City for so many Years from those two dreadful Visitations of Pestilence and Fire; the Openness of the Streets, by giving the Winds a free Entrance into, and Passage through them, preventing the Stagnation of any unwholesome Steams or Vapours; and the Materials of the Houses, which are Brick or Stone, added to the Separation of Brick, interposed between each House, as the Law directs, seeming to be, under God, an effectual Security to the new City, from that Disaster which destroyed the old one.

But the Happiness which attended this peaceful State of Things, was much obscured by an excessive Corruption of Manners that accompanied it. The King's Example, as is usual, drew others to Imitation, till Religion, Virtue and Sobriety became Things out of Fashion, and out of Countenance. He had put himself under the Direction of the Duke of Buckingham, a Man utterly lost to all serious or considerate Thoughts. Pleasure, Frolick, and extravagant Diversion was all he laid to Heart; and being of a Rank, Fortune and Capacity that administered to him the Opportunities to gratifie himself in whatever he had a Mind to, he gave the Reins to his Inclinations and Appetites, and let them carry him as they pleased, without giving himself a Moment's Care for any Consequences, either in this World, or the next. He had just such another Associate, the Earl of Rocheſter; a Man of a bright and sparkling Wit, but abandoned to every Vice his Fancy led him to; (tho' some Time before he died, he became an exemplary Penitent.) And these two joining with the King, very easily introduced a Scene of Immorality and Debauchery at Court, beyond the Example of any Time that had gone before. By Encouragement from thence, the Stage became vicious and corrupt to the utmost Degree; and the Wit and Parts of those who wrote for it, were employed in setting Vice and Prophaneness

The Parliament adjourned.

Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle.

An universal Tranquillity.

Attended with a grievous Corruption of Manners.

A.D. 1668. phaneness in an agreeable Light, and turning every Thing sacred and serious into Ridicule. And thus a Depravation of Manners was propagated throughout the Nation; and Religion and Virtue, which at other Times had at least the Countenance and Sanction of the general Voice on its Side, became exploded and unfashionable, and looked on as the Mark of those, who wanted either Wit or Spirit to know and do better.

Nevertheless, it pleased God that by a happy Turn, much Good was produced from all this Evil; and it is to the Corruption of this Time, that we are indebted for those invaluable Works which have been published since, by the Divines of the Church of England; in which the Grounds and Foundations of Religion, and the Motives to the Practice of it, are set forth with that resistless Force of Reasoning and Persuasion, as will make those Writings an Honour and a Blessing to our Countrey, while the World shall last. Before this Time the Pens of Divines were much more conversant in discussing particular Controversies among Christians, than in establishing the Foundations of Religion in general, and enforcing the Motives of Practice; the Truth and Necessity of those Things being then allowed by common Consent. And from thence it came to pass, that whatever was published on these latter Subjects, wanted that Spirit and Force which Opposition would have administered; for Men seldom lay out their Strength to prove a Matter which is hardly ever contested. But now the very Principles of Religion in general being questioned, and the Practice of it laughed at, the Clergy were obliged to examine into these Things more strictly; and since Men had broke through the weak Bands of Authority and Fashion, to bind them to their Duty by the everlasting Chains of Right Reason. And thus, being put into a rational Method of Proceeding, and having Truth on their Side, the natural Consequence was, that many excellent Things were produced by Men of their great Talents and Abilities. And no doubt to this just and exact Method of Search and Enquiry, it was very much owing, that in the following Reign they laid open the Errors of Popery, with the same Acuteness and Success as they now did those of Infidelity and Profaneness.

A.D. 1669. At the End of March 1669, Cosmo de' Medici, Prince of Tuscany, who was travelling thro' the most considerable Parts of Europe, came into England. In his Progress he saw Plymouth, Exeter, Salisbury, London, Newmarket, Cambridge, Oxford and Windsor; being received every where with great Respect. After he had stayed here about nine Weeks, he embarked for Holland. He was so pleased with the noble and polite Reception he met with from the publick Bodies, and the private Noblemen and Gentlemen of our Countrey, that he ever after retained a particular Respect and Affection for the English. And he always kept a Correspondence to the End of their Lives, with those private Persons who entertained him at their Houses, by a Present sent to them every Year. He also built, and presented to the King, two large Gallies for a Guard of the Coasts about Tangier, which proved very serviceable.

About a Month after Prince George of Denmark, after a short Tour in France, came to visit the Court of England: And after an honourable Reception there, went back again to Denmark. As also Prince George of Denmark.

In July the Theatre at Oxford, built at the Expence of that munificent Prelate, Dr. Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury, was opened with great Solemnity, at which Time the Archbishop resigned his Office of Chancellor of the University, and recommended the Duke of Ormond, who was chosen. The Theatre at Oxford opened.

The Lord Keeper, Sir Orlando Bridgeman, being a virtuous Man, and a true Lover of his Countrey, was moved to try the Spirits and Principles of the Nonconformists, in hopes to find some Expedient to remove the Division in the Church, which had so ill an Effect upon the State. Dr. Manton and Mr. Baxter being sent for, waited upon him, to consider of some good Methods to introduce a Comprehension and Toleration. Upon this Occasion Dr. Wilkins conferred with them. But the Proposals on both Sides not being exactly palatable to either, the Conferences broke off without any Effect. Unsuccessful Expedients offered to heal the Divisions in the Church.

On the 19th of October the Parliament met. In the Lord Keeper's Speech an Union with Scotland was proposed, which was also set forward in that Kingdom. But the Heats arising between the two Houses about their Privileges, kept them employed during this Session; and the secret Machinations of the Court being nearly ripe, took them off afterwards from prosecuting this excellent Design. The Parliament meets.

The Commons put off the Consideration of the King's Speech, and fell upon the Examination of the Accounts of Publick Monies. Sir George Carteret was found so faulty, that he was expelled the House. They thanked the King afterwards for his Proclamation against Nonconformists, to whom this House was irreconcilable. They also voted him a Supply of 400000*l.* but it did not pass into an Act, the Commons reviving the late Debate about Skinner's Case. The Dispute between the Houses could not be compromised, and therefore the King on the 11th of December prorogued them to the 14th of February. The Parliament prorogued.

The King's Proposal for an Union, was well received in Scotland. But England for the Reasons abovementioned not going on the same Pace, it stood still till the next Session of our Parliament.

This began on the 14th of February. The King recommended to them in his Speech, Supplies, Unanimity, and the Union with Scotland. The Differences between both Houses rose again to a great Height. But at last they were quieted by an Expedient proposed by the King, to raze out all Records in the Council Books, the Exchequer, and

A.D. 1669. and both Houses of Parliament, that related at all to this Matter. This pacified all; and the Houses concurred in their humble Thanks to his Majesty for his Royal Interposition.

Their Proceedings.

Act against Conventicles.

This Compromise being made, the Business of the Dissenters came before them. New Complaints and Informations concerning them were brought to the House. After a Debate thereupon, they resolved to desire the King to give Order for the speedy suppressing them, and for putting the Laws in Execution against Popish Recusants. For they always placed these together. A Bill was also brought in for suppressing and preventing seditious Conventicles. It was there enacted, that if any Persons upwards of sixteen, should be present at any Assembly, under Colour of any Exercise of Religion, in any other Manner than according to the Practice of the Church of England, in such Case the Offenders were to pay five Shillings for the first Offence, and ten Shillings for the second. And the Preachers and Teachers in such Meetings, were to forfeit twenty Pounds for the first, and forty Pounds for the second Offence. And those who knowingly suffered any such Conventicle in their Houses, Barns, Yards, &c. were to forfeit twenty Pounds.

A Bill was also passed, for authorising Commissioners of England to treat with those of Scotland, for an Union of both Kingdoms. Two Bills also passed for Supplies; and a third for rebuilding the City of London, and its Cathedral and Parochial Churches, and the uniting of Parishes. These Bills, and others of less Importance, were passed into Acts on the 11th of April.

This Act against Conventicles was the last made against Dissenters. What was said pro and con upon the Subject of these Acts, has been above taken notice of. We may only add in this Place, that the Experience of our own Times has abundantly shewn the Mistake of those Notions, that the Church could not be safe without a Prosecution of the Dissenters. On the contrary, we have lately been obliged to them for their hearty and useful Assistance, in Defence of our Holy Religion against the common Enemies of Christianity.

The Treaty for an Union with Scotland fruitless.

Duke of Albemarle dies.

The Commissioners for the Union met on both Sides. But after many Conferences, they parted with mutual Jealousies and Dissatisfactions. So that the perfecting and compassing this desirable Union, was left to shine among the other Glories of the victorious and happy Reign of Queen Anne.

On the 4th of January the Duke of Albemarle died, by whose Conduct and Prudence the King was restored to his Crown, and the Constitution in Church and State to the Nation. He had enjoyed almost ten Years the Honours and Favours his great Services merited; and tho' he seems to have been fitted by Nature rather for the Field than for the Court, he found the Way to preserve to himself during his Life, the Respect his Merits demanded at first. An Happiness not usual with those who have done Services of so high a Nature to Princes; who are commonly well pleased with their Subjects Merits, so long as they are capable of a Recompence; but when their Services exceed those Limits, reward them with Hatred instead of Thanks.

He was no polite Man in his Address or Way of speaking; but the great Things he compassed before the Restoration, and his prudent Behaviour after it, shew that this Defect was made up with sound Judgment. When the Restoration was brought about, it required no small Dexterity, to hit upon such a Temper as without Ostentation should keep up the Dignity due to his eminent Merit. He had an intrepid Courage, and a great deal of Fire; of which he gave many Proofs in the Dutch Wars.

What Time his first Intentions to serve the King rose in his Mind, is controverted; as also, whether the Restoration was owing to his good Inclinations, or was the Result of casual Events, which rather directed him, than were directed by him. The first of these will remain a Dispute, till we have some better Lights; as to the second, we may in a doubtful Case incline to the most charitable Side. It is hardly to be imagined that he had a Design to set up himself, as his Enemies have given out. He could not but see the Danger of such an Undertaking. And therefore he wisely chose to make his Way to Honours, inferior indeed, but more lawfully acquired, and more securely possessed.

His Funeral was performed with great Solemnity at the Expence of the King, who gave his blue Garter to his Son.

This Year also the Queen Mother of England, Henrietta Maria, Daughter of Henry the Fourth of France, and Wife of King Charles the First of England, died in France. This Lady had the ill Fortune to be as little popular in her Son's as in her Husband's Reign, so that her Death was little regretted.

The King was now insensibly changing his Measures. The King of France, who was stopped in the Career of his Victories by the Triple Alliance, was too restlessly ambitious not to make his utmost Efforts to break it.

Our King's vast Expences upon his Pleasures, his Aversion to the Trouble of Courtship to get Money from the Parliament, and the natural Levity and Inconstancy of his Temper, gave him a fair Encouragement, as well as a Direction to proceed by. The King was governed by five Ministers, who were afterwards called the Cabal, which Word happened to arise from the initial Letters of their Names and Titles, Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale; the Lord Keeper Bridgeman, who was an honest and worthy Patriot, decaying in his Interest.

M. Colbert, who, soon after the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, at which Place he had been Plenipotentiary for the French King, came over into England Ambassador, easily found the means of applying himself to the Humours and Necessities of the King, and the Ambition or Avarice of his Ministers. That glorious Counsel of the Triple Alliance was rather a sudden Start, than the Fruit of solid and deliberate Advice; which last was seldom

A.D. 1669. dom made use of at the English Court to any good Purposes, since the late excellent Ministry had ceased to preside in the Councils there. So that the French Ambassador found it no hard Matter by his Arguments and Representations, seconded by a liberal Hand in Bribes, to introduce a Change in Measures entered into with so little Steadiness. He brought over the King, by laying before him the Dependence he was continually in, upon the Inclinations and Humours of his Parliament; and by Promises of concerting Measures with him to deliver him from that Slavery, by reducing his People to an absolute Subjection to him. The Ministers, who were Men void of all Principles of Honour or Virtue, or Concern for the Publick Good, were easily wrought on by proper Applications made to their Avarice or Ambition. And the Progress made by Colbert was such, that in less than a Year after the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, he was able to send an Account of his Success in such Words as these: I have now made them (speaking of the English Ministry) feel the whole Extent of his Majesty's Liberality.

A.D. 1670. When the Treaty was advanced so far, the French Court thought fit to ratify it by a very extraordinary Ambassador, the Duchess of Orleans the King's Sister, who had so entirely forgot her Native Countrey and Religion, as to become the Bearer of Proposals for the Ruin of them both. The King had a particular Tendernefs for this Sister of his; and as she was become perfectly French as to her Religion and Principles; and was besides a Woman of uncommon Wit and Parts, the French Court made use of her to carry on and further this Negotiation. In order to make this Visit appear accidental, the French King set out under cover of seeing the vast Works that were carrying on at the Port of Dunkirk. She attended him thither, and being arrived so near the English Coast, it was natural to desire to see her Brother and Native Countrey. As soon as the King heard she designed to visit him, he resolved to meet her at Dover; whither himself, with his Brother and other Persons of the highest Quality rode Post. On the 15th of May she arrived at Dover, where she continued about a Fortnight. The secret Negotiations she then carried on were concealed under that Profusion of Magnificence and Variety of Entertainments that are usual upon Interviews between such eminent Persons. These Diversions were continued without Intermission till she went away, the better to conceal the real Occasion of her coming.

This Journey gave Room at that Time for many Suspensions, and for many various Conjectures since. The most authentick and credible Account of this Matter was published in 1682. by the Abbot Primi, a Person employed by Monf. Colbert himself, who allowed him a Pension for collecting his Memoirs. This Abbot says in plain Terms, that she made a Proposal to her Brother in the Name of the King of France; first, to render him absolute Master of his Parliament, and to establish the Roman Catholick Religion in the three Kingdoms: And secondly to make an Alliance in order to the Conquest of Holland. The King had a Mind to begin with the Enterprize at home; so soon had he forgot the ardent Love and Zeal with which that People he desired to enslave had called him to one of the brightest Crowns in Europe. But she opposed this, as being a very difficult Undertaking, whilst the other was as yet unaccomplished, whereas the latter would make an easy Way for the former; and her Advice prevail'd. With Respect to the Dutch Republick it was agreed between them, to reduce that whole State to the small Province of Holland, properly so called, of which the Prince of Orange should be Sovereign, or at least perpetual Stadtholder; that the King of England should have Zealand to retreat to in case of Necessity; and the King of France should have the rest of the Provinces. This was the Scheme settled before Madame returned to France. To complete the Mischief she did, she is said to have left behind her the famous Louise de Queroualle, afterwards Duchess of Portsmouth; who gaining in Time the Ascendant over the King, proved a constant and dangerous Snare to him in his publick Counsels; the Interest of England, and of Europe it self, being too often sacrificed to the Arts and Wiles of that loose Woman.

But this Negotiation proved soon after very fatal to Madame. That Lady, with her

Wit and Beauty, had a great Inclination to that which in civil Language is called Gallantry. How far she had indulged herself this Way, or what Stories, true or false, had been carried to Monsieur her Husband, is unknown; this is certain, that she survived her Return but a little while. On the 19th of June, having eaten very well at Dinner and continued so for some Hours, about four in the Afternoon she called for a Glass of Succory-Water which she used to drink regularly at that Time of the Day. Having drank it off, she immediately complained it was very bitter, and presently found her self very ill, and fell into dreadful Fits of the Cholick; upon which she said, she was sure she should die, and sent for her Confessor immediately, and passed through all the Forms of the Romish Church. And her Illness and Pain increasing, she died about two in the Morning. Her Body being opened in the Presence of several Persons, and among them of the English Ambassador, they could find no manner of Cause for so sudden a Death. We are told that Sir Thomas Armstrong, who was Gentleman of the Horse to the King, went immediately to St. Clou, where she died, and though he got thither by six the same Morning, her Corps smelt so strong, that he could hardly bear the Room. He thence rode Post into England, and acquainted the King with what he had seen, with his Opinion upon the whole. The King at the Relation burst into Tears, and in a

A.D. 1670. Passion said, her Husband was a —; to which he added a Charge to Sir Thomas not to speak of it.

The Duke of Buckingham goes to France.

Shortly after the Duke of Buckingham went into France, in order to confirm the Agreement made at Dover, and to concert Measures for the carrying on the Design. The King of France knowing his Interest with the King, was willing to secure him; and therefore shewed him all the Tokens of Respect and Esteem he thought necessary to gain him. This Courtship used to one who was known to have an Interest with the King of England, gave much Umbrage, especially to the Dutch. Their Ambassador at Paris went in great Haste to M. de Lionne, and desired to be informed, whether the numerous Troops that were raised were designed against his Masters. But the Secretary answered him with the polite Dissimulation of a Courtier, that there were no Grounds for such Apprehensions; and that if those Troops were used in any Expedition, it would be far enough from their Territories.

The War against Holland agreed on between England and France.

The Treaty being now concluded and confirmed, the next Care was, to find means to execute the projected Scheme. To this End, the King of France who was to invade Holland by Land, took the first Step. From France to the United Provinces there are but two Ways to conduct an Army, one of them thro' the Spanish Netherlands, the other thro' the Territories of those German Princes that lie upon the Rhine. A Passage through the first of these was not to be hoped for or attempted. To force the Way by Violence would be both slow and hazardous, and infallibly produce a War with the whole Power of Spain; and it could not be expected that a free Passage should be peaceably granted by the Spaniards to a numerous Army of an ambitious Neighbour. It remained therefore to take the other Way thro' Germany, which lies in separate Dominions of several petty Princes; who by reason of their Weakness would be either safely insulted, or easily corrupted.

The Seizure of Lorrain by the French.

The Duke of Lorrain was first attacked, as having his Dominions contiguous to those of France. This Prince had been driven out of his Countrey many Years before, under Cardinal Richlieu's Administration; but by the Peace of the Pyrenees, was restored to a kind of shattered Possession of his Duchy again. The Remembrance of the past Injuries received from France, was supposed to stick so close to him, that his Concurrence in the French Designs was not to be depended upon. The French King therefore resolved to seize at once upon his Duchy, which was in it self a valuable Acquisition, and lay conveniently for the Execution of other Enterprizes. And this was accordingly done by invading his Dominions in the Height and Security of Peace, without any previous Declaration of War, or any Shadow of Right to the invaded Countrey. An Act of such Injustice and Treachery, that a Mahometan or Pagan would have blushed at it. But no Wickedness is too great to increase Dominion and Power. The Duke was reposing himself with so much Confidence on the universal Peace, that the French Troops narrowly missed his Person, and his Duche's fell into their Hands. He retired to a strong Place in the mountainous Part of his Countrey, and made a Shew of Resistance for some Time; but his small and hastily-collected Force not being able to encounter the numerous and disciplined French Troops, he was soon driven out.

All Europe was now a second Time alarmed at this new Violation of Peace by the French King, which was also accompanied with such foul and dishonourable Circumstances. The Thing was not only bad in it self, but a Sign of something worse than yet appeared. Discerning Men suspected, and their Suspicions were just, that France had not dared to have taken this Step, without having first concerted Measures with England. And a Conjunction of those two Powers threatened the utmost Danger to the Liberties of Europe. In the mean Time few or none guessed aright at the real Designs of the French. Every one conceived the Storm was to fall upon Flanders, and the other Spanish Dominions on that Side; the Situation of Lorrain being such, that it lay as conveniently for the Enterprize of Flanders, as for that of Holland. None thought it possible that the King of England should, without any Injury or Provocation, violate his Honour so shamefully, as to betray the Republick of Holland, with whom he was then in Alliance, to the King of France, whose Greatness they were united to oppose. So that this Acquisition not only furthered the French Enterprizes then in Hand, but did it also without giving Umbrage to those who were concerned in them. The French King having gained this important Point, lay still for the next Year; as well to give the present Alarm Time to cool, as to pursue some gentler Methods by which he proposed to clear and open the remaining Part of his Passage.

On the 14th of October the Parliament met. Little or nothing remarkable passed in this short Session. The most observable Thing is the King's Speech with which it was opened; in which he mentions his concluding the Triple Alliance, as a Motive for Supplies, though he knew that he was taking Measures for the effectual Dissolution of it. This seems to be the Reason why this Speech was not printed as usual; the Court having still so much Shame as not to suffer so lasting a Monument of their Fraud and Double-dealing, to be so publicly recorded. The Speech being in the Strain of former Times, the Commons believed it, and voted a large Supply, but they did not bring it into a Bill this Session.

The Prince of Orange shortly after came to England, and was received both by the King and Nation with all the Tokens of Kindness and Respect. He stayed in England three Months, which he spent partly at Court, and in Town, and partly in visiting the two Universities. The Bishop of Salisbury

It alarms all Christendom.

The Parliament meets.

England.

A.D. 1670. Salisbury tells us, that the King let him know the Secret of his Religion, and would have persuaded him to a Change; and that this Account was given to the Bishop by the Prince himself. It seems strange that the King should open himself in an Affair of that Consequence to one so young. But as Sir William Temple says besides, that the Prince once told him he had private Reasons to believe the King was a Roman Catholick in his Heart, so how far these two Accounts confirm and illustrate each other, the Reader will judge.

The Duke of Ormond assaulted in the Street.

On the 6th of December, an Assault was made in the open Streets upon the Duke of Ormond, of a very singular Nature, whether we consider the Boldness of the Attempt, or the Villany and Barbarity of the Design. The chief Contriver and Manager of this monstrous Enterprize was one Blood, a Blacksmith's Son in Ireland; a Fellow of a fearless Courage, but of that worst Sort, which is equally undaunted at Dangers or at Crimes. He had signalized himself once before by a bold Attempt, in which he rescued one of his wicked Comrades in Yorkshire from the Sheriff's Men, as they were leading him to the Gallows. After this, he laid a Design in Ireland to surprize the Castle of Dublin, and the Magazine there, and to usurp the Government. But this being discovered by the Duke of Ormond the Night before it was to be executed, some of his Accomplices were taken, and executed as Traytors. The Deaths of these, Blood and the other surviving Rogues, bound themselves by solemn Oath to revenge upon the Person of the Duke. That Nobleman lived at Clarendon House; and was observed by Blood to go usually late home, and attended with only two or three Footmen; which gave that Villain Occasion to lay a Plot for the working his intended Revenge. To this end, himself, with five or six more of his Associates, well mounted and armed, waited at the Bull-Head Tavern at Charing-Cross till the Duke came by, and then all took Horse and galloped after him. They overtook him near his own Gate, knocked down his Footmen, took him out of his Coach, forced him up behind one of the Horsemen, to whom they tied him, and were riding away with him. The Coachman and Servants crying out, the Porter came forth, and seeing what was done, pursued them. The Duke strove so violently to free himself, that at last he got loose, and threw himself with the Villain he was tyed to, off the Horse. The rest turned back, and finding it impossible to carry him away, discharged two Pistols at him; but it being so dark that they could not see to take Aim, they missed him both Times. The Porter and other Assistance coming up, they were glad to make haste away, leaving the Duke much bruised with his Fall. Their Design, as it was afterwards found, was to carry him to Tyburn, and there to hang him with a Paper pinned to his Breast, expressing the Reasons of this monstrous Piece of Villany. The King offerred a Thousand Pounds for the Discovery A.D. 1670. of any one concerned in it. But with so horrible a Fidelity were these Wretches linked together, that so great a Reward produced no Discovery; and they had been for ever unknown, had not another Attempt equally bold and wicked, accidentally made known the Authors of this; as we shall hereafter relate.

A few Days after, another Assault was made upon a Person also of Figure, Sir John Coventry, Knight of the Bath, and Member of the House of Commons. The Occasion of it we find thus related. Sir John was one of those who struggled much against the giving Money. The common Method in such Opposition is, when it fails in carrying the main Vote, to get the Money laid on Funds that will be unacceptable, or prove deficient. In a Debate for raising Supplies, some who opposed the giving Money, had moved to lay a Tax upon the Play-houses. This was opposed by the Court Party, who said, the Players were the King's Servants, and a Part of his Pleasure. Upon this, Coventry stood up, and asked whether the King's Pleasure lay amongst the Men, or the Women there. Every one knew that the King had two Women Players for his Mistresses; so that this was easily understood, and carried with great Indignation to Court. It was said, this was the first Time the King was personally reflected on; if it was passed over, more of this kind would follow, and it would become a Fashion to talk so; and that therefore it was fit to take such severe Notice of this, that no body should dare to talk at that Rate for the future. With these Sollicitations they raised the King's Passion to that Degree, that he resolved, though the Duke of York dissuaded him, to send some of the Guards to watch in the Streets where Sir John lodged, and leave a Mark upon him. There are never wanting about Courts those who are servile enough to obey the Commands of the Prince, how unlawful soever. Sir Thomas Sandys, Mr. Obrian, and some others, went thither; and as Sir John was going home, they all drew about him. He stood up to the Wall, snatched the Link out of his Servant's Hands, and with that in one Hand, and his Sword in the other, defended himself with a Courage that got him great Credit. He wounded some of them; but being so much overpowered with Numbers, he was soon disarmed. And then they cut his Nose to the Bone, to teach him, as they said, to remember what Respect he owed the King; and so left him. They went back to the Duke of Monmouth's, who had given the Orders for this barbarous Attempt; and there Obrian's Arm, which was wounded in the Scuffle, was dressed. But Sir John Coventry's Nose was so well needled up, that the Scar was scarce discernible.

This Action put the House of Commons, when they afterwards met, into a furious Up-roar, as may well be supposed. Bills of Indictment had been found against Sir Thomas Sandys, Charles Obrian Esq; Simon Parry, and

A.D. 1670. and Miles Reeves; who all fled. The Commons passed a Bill of Banishment against them; and a Clause was inserted, that it should not be in the King's Power to pardon them. And this Quack Remedy only served to produce more bitter Reflections upon the Court; being often remembered, and much improved by all the angry Men of that Time.

Soon after this the two Houses joyned in an Address to the King, concerning the Growth of Popery, to which they received a kind Answer; and the King published his Proclamation, commanding all Jesuits and Popish Priests to depart the Kingdom, and the Laws against Popish Recusants to be put in Execution.

Proceedings
of Parliament.

From thence the Commons proceeded to the Money Bills, which they passed so freely, that the Lords began to complain of them. A notable Speech was made by the Lord Lucas against the giving so much Money; but the Court had such Interest as to get it burnt by the common Hangman, though that Peer had been an eminent Loyalist. One of these Money Bills produced a remarkable Controversie between the two Houses. This Bill was entitled, An Act for an additional Imposition on several Foreign Commodities. When it had passed the Commons, the Merchants of London presented a Petition to the Lords, complaining of some Hardships and Inconveniencies brought on Trade by that Bill. Their Complaints seemed so well made out to that House, that they made some Alterations in the Bill, and sent them down to the Commons. But after an amicable Conference or two on both Sides, the House of Commons declared, that the House of Peers have no Right to make Alterations in Money Bills. This produced Resolutions on both Sides, urged and confirmed by very acute Reasoning. This Controversie would have been long in deciding by Arguments alone; but the King finding the Bill at a full Stop by this Diffension, and wanting the Money given by the other three, came to the House; and having passed several Acts, prorogued the Parliament; which was not suffered to sit again till almost two Years after, the Court falling now into Measures to which a sitting Parliament would have proved very thwarting.

The Parliament
prorogued.

A.D. 1671.

The Death of the Duchess of York.

The Year 1671. began with the Death of the Duchess of York. She was a Woman of very good Parts and Understanding; and of great Strictness in Religion. She had been bred in that Way during her Youth; and to her great Praise it is said of her, that her Alliance to the Royal Family, and the Honours attending that high Elevation, did not change her in that Respect. But some Years afterwards, howsoever it was, she left the Church of England, of which she had continued a constant and zealous Member, and went over to the Church of Rome. The Reasons of this Change, (such as they are) she gives an Account of in a Paper which was afterwards made publick. Yet she took Care to conceal it so well, that it continued undiscovered for a long Time. She died after a lingering Indisposition of Body, that had hung upon her many Years; and was thought by some to have been the Effect of the Duke's vagrant Amours. For in the former Part of his Life he was as much a Libertine as his Brother. She bore him four Sons, and four Daughters, of whom six died; and only two Daughters, Mary and Anne, lived to full Age. These were those two excellent Queens who afterwards wore the Crown of these Realms, whom Heaven preserved alive to make them Blessings in After-Times, to our native Countrey, and to the Christian World; the divine Providence having delivered Britain by the one, and Europe by the other.

Shortly after the Duke thought fit to abjure the Protestant Religion in Form. He had concealed his Religion for some Years; though as Truth will discover it self, it began of late to be more and more suspected. He had no Mind yet to make this formal Profession, but he was brought to it by the Contrivance of the Romish Priests, from a peculiar Inducement. The King, who disliked the Queen's Person upon many Accounts, had long entertained a Design of being divorced from her. We are told that this came before the Court of Rome, who gave into it, in Hopes, as we may suppose, of obliging the King to make them some suitable Return for so great a Favour. And the Affair went on so successfully, that the Divorce was concluded on at Rome. This startled the Duke, who saw himself shut out from the Crown, if the King by this Divorce, should bring a fruitful Consort to his Bed. And the Romish Priests, willing to make themselves secure of so important a Convert, took this Opportunity to promise, upon his formal Abjuration, to stop that Negotiation. This Motive prevailed on him, and they were as good as their Word; the Divorce being soon after laid aside, and forgot.

A new Star began to shine at this Time at Court. The King had begun his loose Amours with one Mrs. Lucy Barlow, alias Walters, when he was about nineteen Years of Age. He had by her a Son named James, whom he loved with a great Tenderness. He made him first Duke of Monmouth, at the Age of thirteen; and afterwards loaded him with all the Honours and Wealth so great a King could confer. He was now come to his full Age, and adorned in his Person and Behaviour with all those Ornaments and Accomplishments that make a Figure in Courts. He had all in him that goes to the making of a perfectly handsome Man; and was Master of those bodily Exercises that set off a well-made Person, and form the complete Outside of a fine Gentleman. And to this, a natural Sweetness of Temper being added, which took off all ungraceful Pride and Stiffness, his Appearance and Behaviour could not be otherwise than engaging and captivating. So that he increased daily in the Affection

A.D. 1671.

The Duke of York abjures the Protestant Religion.

The Duke of Monmouth
begins to appear.

A.D. 1671. fection of the King, and the Love of the People. But with less of both he had been more happy. For the high Situation to which he was carried up by the King's Favour, and the popular Breath, exposed him to the Sollicitations of ill designing Men; which he was too easie to attend to, the Solidity of his Judgment not answering to his outward Accomplishments. And these engaged him in turbulent and perilous Intrigues, which at last proved fatal to him.

Blood steals the Crown out of the Tower.

A strange and bold Attempt was made about this Time to steal the Royal Crown and Scepter out of the Tower of London, by Thomas Blood, and his Associates abovementioned. It seems that Blood had insinuated himself under the Character and in the Habit of a Clergyman, into the Acquaintance of Mr. Edwards, who had the Regalia in his keeping, under Pretence of helping Mr. Edwards's Daughter to a good Match. Under this Colour he became intimate in the Family; and on the Day appointed for the Execution of the Design, he brought two or three of his Associates to dine with Mr. Edwards, one of whom was the pretended Lover; at which Time all Things were to be settled. While they were waiting for Dinner, Blood proposed to carry his Friends to see the Regalia, to pass away the Time; Mr. Edwards going with them. But as soon as they were entered the Room, Blood and his Companions shut the Door, and put a Gag in the old Man's Mouth, telling him if he offered to stir, or make the least Noise, he should be killed. Then they took the Crown and put it into a Bag, and the Scepter into another, having first filed this last into two Pieces for the easier Carriage. But while this was doing by some of them, Mr. Edwards struggled so to make a Noise, that they were obliged to give him so many Stabs as laid him for dead. When all this was done, they went away quietly, and unsuspected. But it happened that the poor old Man had so much Strength left, that he was sensible when they went away; and got up, and gave the Alarm; and they were so closely pursued, that Blood, and the others who carried the Regalia, were seized, and every Thing brought back safely.

Blood was brought soon after before the King and Council, where he behaved himself with a fearless Audacity. He confessed himself to have been the Author of the late Attempt on the Duke of Ormond; and added, that he had several Times designed to kill the King. And this he did without any Necessity, but by Way of boasting, to shew himself capable of any Thing. Nevertheless so mysterious were the Proceedings of the Court at this Time, that this desperate Villain was soon after released, had a Pension settled on him, and became a Person of Weight and Interest among the ruling Great Men.

The Designs of the Cabal were now ripe for Execution. The Parliament had given the King Money, and a great Sum had been received from France. But it being necessary, or at least usual in a Declaration of War, to assign some Reasons for declaring it, they were much put to it to find them. This gave them Trouble for some Time. For though it is not unknown to the World, that Wars are more often begun to gratifie the Ambition, or Humours of Princes, or sometimes of their Favourites, than for any solid Cause; yet Men are apt to expect some Pretences at least, to serve as an Excuse for the shedding of those Streams of Blood, and for introducing those numberless Mischiefs that attend a State of War.

While the Cabal was in this Difficulty, an Incident happened which gave them some Relief. One of the King's Yachts was sent to Holland to bring over Sir William Temple's Lady; her Husband's Embassy being at an End. The Dutch Fleet were at that Time in the narrow Seas; and the Captain of the Yacht had Orders, if he came in Sight of them, to sail through them, and shoot at those Ships which were next him, till he made them strike Sail, or till they shot at him again; and then to pursue his Course. He passed into Holland without seeing the Fleet, but as he returned he met with them. He sailed through them, and they did not strike; upon which he fired several Shot at them. They either did not, or would not understand him; and sent a Boat on Board him to enquire if he were in Distress. The Captain told them he had been sent to bring back the English Ambassadors, with her Family from Holland; and that he had Orders to make the Dutch Fleet strike, if he met them in the Channel. Upon this, the Dutch Vice-Admiral came on Board the Yacht; and having made his Compliments to Lady Temple, desired to know the Reason of the Captain's Shooting. He received the same Answer as before; to which he replied, that he had no Orders from his Masters in that Point, and did not know how that Affair was agreed between the King and the States: But even though it were settled, yet he said the Captain could not pretend that the Fleet and Admiral should strike to a Yacht, which was but a Pleasure Boat, or at least served only for Passage, and could not pass for one of the King's Men of War. The Captain said he had his Orders, and was bound to follow them. The Dutch Admiral went away, and left the Captain in great Perplexity. It was dangerous to provoke so great a Fleet by firing at them, till they shot at him again; and perhaps too he was not well satisfied with his Errand, which was plainly to pick a Quarrel. Yet on the other Hand his Orders were positive. So he went to Lady Temple, and desired to know what she pleased he should do, hoping to excuse his farther shooting by the Lady's Fear. But she answered him, that he knew his Orders best, and what he was to do upon them; which she left him to follow as he thought fit, without Regard to her or her Children. However, the Captain without firing, pursued his Course, and landed her in England.

The News of this both pleased and disappointed the Court. They were pleased that the Dutch refused to strike to the King

The Dutch refuse to strike Sail to the King's Yacht.

A.D.1671. of England's Flag; but disappointed, because they did not fire at the Yacht. And the Captain was severely censured for not firing till he provoked them to shoot at him. However, here was a Foundation laid for a Complaint, which was what they wanted.

The King makes a Progress.

In September the King made a Progress into the Eastern Parts of his Kingdom, which he had not yet seen. In his Progress he visited Norwich, Yarmouth, and Cambridge; with the second of which he was so delighted, that he said, He did not think he had such a Place in his Dominions. After a Progress of about a Month he returned to White-hall; and on the Lord Mayor's Day was formally invited to dine in his City of London, now just recovered from its Ruins.

The shutting up the Exchequer.

The Dutch War was to begin the next Spring; and as the Grounds of the War were very bad, so the Preparations made for it were suitable. The first dishonourable Step the Court took, was the shutting up the Exchequer. The Parliament had given the King a great deal of Money the last Sessions; and, we are told, the King of France had remitted hither seven hundred thousand Pounds. But all this was by this Time laid out in Expences, necessary and otherwise, and Money began again to be wanting. No fresh Supplies were to be expected from the Parliament to maintain a War so universally odious. So that the King and Ministry were left to help themselves by their own Inventions and Devices. The King being under these Difficulties, in a private Meeting with his Ministers, declared that if any of them could invent a Method to raise about fifteen hundred thousand Pounds, without a Parliament, he should have the Lord Treasurer's Place. The next Day the Lord Ashley told Sir Thomas Clifford in Confidence, that there was a Way to supply the King immediately with such a Sum; but it was hazardous, and might have ill Consequences, by inflaming both the Parliament and People. Clifford, who was of a bold and daring Temper, and feared no Consequences, was on Fire to get this Secret. To this End he plying Lord Ashley with Visits, and by drinking him to a proper Height one Night, got his Project from him, which was, to shut up the Exchequer. Clifford immediately left him, went to White-Hall, and without going to Bed, waited till the King rose. He then went into him, fell on his Knees, and demanded the White Staff. The King cried out, God's Fish! I'll be as good as my Word, if you can find the Money. Sir Thomas then told him, if he would shut up the Exchequer, he might have fifteen hundred thousand Pounds. The King soon fell in with this Project; and Clifford was made Lord High Treasurer, and a Peer for this Service, which in Justice deserved a very different kind of a Recompence. The Lord Ashley was not pleased to be thus circumvented; but the Thing was done, so that his Complaints came too late. However to satisfy him, the King made him first, Earl of Shaftsbury, and sometime after Lord Chancellor. A.D.1671.

The shutting up the Exchequer produced universal Murmurs and Complaints, for all the Nation felt it. Most of the Bankers in London were ruined by it, and many others by Consequence. The Way in those Times was, that the King furnished himself with Money from the Bankers, who had great Sums always lying in their Hands; assigning the Revenue over to them. They drove a very gainful Trade by this Means; for the Money they had of others bore Interest only at the Rate of six per Cent or less; whereas they received eight per Cent for that they lent the King. From hence it came to pass that the Exchequer was very full; the Bankers carrying all their Money thither, on Account of the great Profit they made of it there. But now all Payments to them out of the Exchequer being stopped, they could no longer answer the Demands of their Creditors. So that many of them broke; and the private Persons who had Money in their Hands losing it, it occasioned a general Concussion amongst all the trading and monied Men. In the same Declaration in which this Stop of Payments was signified, the King promised that it should continue no longer than that Year; but he was not so good as his Word.

Raises great Discontents.

This Business of the Exchequer was a violent Strain upon the King's Honour and Faith, and yet was succeeded immediately after with another of the same kind as extraordinary. A Fleet of seventy two Dutch Merchant Men were coming from the Streights so richly laden, that the Fleet was valued at a Million and half. The French Court, who were willing to ease themselves of the Payments they were forced to make to the King, represented to the Court how easily the King might take this Fleet; and how such a Prize would, perhaps, serve his Occasions during the whole War, without giving him Trouble to raise Money any other Way. This was indeed proposing a very perfidious and dishonourable Action, it being contrary to the Law of Nations to attack another State, without a Declaration of War; and besides, by the Treaty of Breda, it was stipulated, that in Case of a Rupture, no Merchant Ships should be molested for six Months after such Declaration; which was done for the Security of Trade. But the French knew they had to do with Persons not very scrupulous. The Proposal was closed with, and Sir Robert Holmes was ordered to attack them.

A.D.1672.

But as this Enterprize was begun with Treachery, it was executed with ill Conduct, and ended in Disappointment. The Secret was so ill kept, that the Dutch had Intelligence of the Design, and had sent Advice of it to the Fleet, with Orders to them to avoid the Channel, and come round by the North of Scotland. But when these Advices came to the Fleet, it was advanced so far into the English Seas, that they could not change their Course, the Wind being contrary. So they went on, but put themselves into Attempt on the Dutch Smyrna Fleet.

A.D. 1672. into as good a Posture of Defence as possible. They strengthened their Fleet by some Spanish Ships, and an Amsterdam Man of War they met with; and cleared the Decks of the Merchant-Men for Fight, by throwing great Quantities of Goods overboard.

Another Piece of ill Conduct was this. Holmes, in his Passage to the Isle of Wight, where he was to wait for the Dutch Fleet, met Sir Edward Sprag returning from the Streights with a Squadron of Men of War; who told Holmes that he had sailed along with the Dutch the most Part of the Way, and that they would pass in a Day or two. Holmes let Sprag pass on without acquainting him with his Design, that he might have none to share with him in the Booty he thought himself sure of. This saved the Dutch Fleet; for had Holmes been assisted by that Squadron, not a Ship would probably have escaped.

Besides all this, the fitting out the Squadron designed for the taking this Prize was carried on with that Remissness and Negligence, that when the Approach of the Dutch was given Notice of, all the English Ships were not ready. Only seven or eight were in a Condition to put to Sea, a Force rather unequal than superior to that of the Dutch. But Sir Robert Holmes either not knowing, or not regarding the good Order they had taken for their Defence, resolved however to attempt them.

The Dutch Fleet attacked. March 30. He came in Sight of the Dutch Fleet. He gave the Signal for forming a Line, and soon after came up with a Ship of eighty Guns, and, as it were by Way of Compliment, sent to desire the Dutch Admiral to come on Board him. His next commanding Officer did the same to the Dutch Rear-Admiral; Holmes's Intention being to maim the Convoy by seizing the principal Officers under Cover of Friendship and Civility. The Dutch Commanders were upon their Guard, and De Haas, the Admiral, sent his civil Excuses for not leaving his Ship, and ordered his Pilot to wait upon the English Admiral with them, and to shew him all Manner of Respect. Du Bois, the Rear-Admiral, sent Word more roughly, That if the English Commander had any Thing to say, he might come to him. This Project failing, Holmes began the Attack openly, saluting the Dutch Admiral with a Broadside; and immediately the other English Ships fell upon the rest.

The Dutch Merchant-Men, being between seventy and eighty in Number, had divided themselves into three Squadrons, disposed in the Form of a Crescent, each Squadron being guarded with two Men of War. In this Order their Fleet made one great, firm, and stable Body; which the few English Ships failed round and round, attacking them sometimes in one Place, sometimes in another, in order to break the Line, and put them in Confusion. In this manner the Fight continued till Sun-set. But the Dutch Merchant-men being many of them provided with Cannon, defended themselves so well, that with the Assistance of their Convoys, who very bravely covered and protected them, they drove the English from Place to Place, and kept them from making any Impression; so that Holmes's Ships having often renewed their Attack, and being every where repulsed, were obliged to stand off, under Pretence of the Night coming on. The Dutch Commadore De Haas, was killed in the Fight.

The following Day Sir Robert Holmes being reinforced with four Frigates, and a Ketch or two, renewed the Fight. It continued all the Morning in the same Order and with the same Success as before. But in the Afternoon, Holmes, ashamed and vexed to see himself defeated, and disappointed of a Victory and Prey he had thought so certain, made a more furious Attack than ever, in which he cut off from the Dutch Line a Man of War of fifty four Guns, which he boarded and took. By this means four of the nearest Merchant Ships fell into his Hands, two of them richly laden, the others of less Value. But during this Action, the Night came on; which not only hindered the English from pursuing their Advantage; but gave an Opportunity to the Dutch to escape, who soon after got safely into their Ports.

The News of this Action startled and amazed all Europe. Wise and thinking Men could scarce believe, that the King of England, who had gained so much Honour by the Triple Alliance, could be persuaded to break it; and that too in such a Manner, that the Glory of concluding it was utterly effaced by this infamous Step by which it was broke. All Foreign States were in the utmost Astonishment, to see the King who had with so much Applause saved Flanders from the French, proceed by Counsels so opposite, as to deliver Holland up to the same Power he had so wisely curbed and restrained before. The Dutch themselves could not believe it, till this Blow was given; but expected the Unkindness the King had lately shewn them, would end in Demands of Money, or of restoring the Prince of Orange. Even the French Court, who had so ill an Opinion of our Ministers as to make this dishonourable Proposal to them, had yet so good an one as to believe they could not be brought to it; so that till the News arrived, that very Court did not think such an Attempt would have been made. But now the Conjunction of England with France, which was hitherto only suspected, and that but by few, became apparent to all by this Attack upon the Dutch Smyrna Fleet. The Pensionary of Holland, M. de Witte, was so startled at it, that while the Letter giving an Account of it was read in an Assembly of the States, he fell back into his Chair, almost in a Swoon; and in Truth the United Provinces were never in such Danger since their first Settlement.

Four Days after this, the King's Declaration of War against the Dutch was published in Form. But the Time being fruitful of uncommon Occurrences, there was taken in the

A.D. 1672. the short intermediate Space a third very extraordinary Step, which was the issuing a second Declaration for Liberty of Conscience to Dissenters. The ill Success of the first has been above taken notice of; but the Cabal, who had promised the King to set him above Parliaments, were not to be discouraged by that Consideration. They had engaged to set the King's Power above the Laws; and by this Step they not unreasonably had Hopes of doing it.

The Declaration for Liberty of Conscience to Dissenters.

The Purport of this Declaration was, that the King by Virtue of his supreme Power in Ecclesiastical Matters, did suspend the Execution of all penal Laws against Nonconformists and Recusants. That to prevent seditious and illegal Meetings, he would allow a certain and sufficient Number of Places throughout the Kingdom, for their assembling in order to the Exercise of their Worship; and that none should meet in any Place till it was so allowed, and the Teacher approved by the King. That this Indulgence should extend to all Sorts of Nonconformists and Recusants, except the Papists, who were utterly excluded from any publick Places of Worship, which was only to be suffered in their private Houses.

The wicked Designs of that Declaration.

Scarcely ever were such pernicious Counsels concealed under so specious a Disguise as were in this Declaration. Liberty of Conscience is a Thing so reasonable, so humane, and so christian, that 'tis hard to think any Inconvenience could arise from granting it. Yet under this Cover our whole Constitution in Church and State was to receive a secret and deadly Wound. For the King having here openly assumed a Power of dispensing with Acts of Parliament, which is no Ways different from a Power of repealing them but in Name; this Declaration put all the Laws of our Countrey at his Mercy. The Transition was easy from one Law to another, and the Precedent equally applicable to all of them. And the giving Ease to scrupulous Consciences, which was the Pretence, made the Action indeed more specious, and therefore more dangerous; but not more legal, nor its Consequences less fatal.

All this was very well seen and known, both by the Court and those who opposed it; and it produced a very odd and unusual Conduct on both Sides at the Meeting of the next Parliament; where an arbitrary and Popish Ministry were striving violently on the behalf of Toleration, while the Patrons of Liberty as eagerly contended to abolish it.

But the Intentions of the Court by this Declaration, were not only to make a Precedent to the Advantage of the King's Prerogative for the future, but to carry on more easily their present Designs. The King was entering into a War universally odious to the Nation, of which the Dissenters make a considerable Part. These were ill affected to the Government on account of the severe Laws made against them, and their Clamours were like to increase the universal ill Humour. And by this Declaration the Ministry hoped to byass them so far, that they might rather weigh in the Court Scale than on the contrary. They added also Pensions of fifty and a hundred Pounds a Year, to the most noted of them. These Arts were not without Success; for the Dissenters were generally quiet and complying enough, some few excepted. They made use of the Indulgence, and had their Meetings regularly. The Presbyterians came in a Body, and Dr. Manton at the Head of them thanked the King for it. Yet the Court was not so successful as they could have wished. The Acknowledgments made by the Dissenters were not so general as they expected. The wiser Sort saw that all this Kindness was not shewn out of pure Love; it not being natural to suppose that a Set of Men, among whom those who had any Religion at all were Papists, should be so much concerned on a sudden for the Quiet and Repose of tender Consciences. Baxter refused his Pension, and Manton, who thanked the King for the Indulgence, was much blamed by the more prudent amongst them, for giving that Countenance to an illegal Act.

A.D. 1672.

Four Days after the Attack of the Smyrna Fleet, the Declaration of War was published in Form. The Reasons alledged for it, were some Wrongs said to be done in the East and West-Indies to our Countreymen; some abusive Pictures, and Medals derogatory to the King's Honour; and the refusing to strike to the Yacht last Summer. Of these Articles the first had been in Agitation a long Time; and Sir William Temple tells us the Dutch Reasons seemed to him but too well grounded. The second scarce deserved the Representation of a Minister, much less a Declaration of War; they being the Effects of the Petulancy of private Persons inseparable from free States. And as to the third, the Dutch had offered Satisfaction for the future. But when a Quarrel is resolved on, Pretences are easily found or made.

The War declared by England.

The Court of France had been quiet ever since the Seizure of Lorraine; and had even laid the Dutch asleep in some Measure, with Promises that their great Preparations were not designed against their State. But in the mean Time, they had been secretly negotiating with the Elector of Cologne and the Bishop of Munster, who are Neighbours to the Dutch, and succeeded so well, that those Princes were persuaded to join themselves to France; and the Elector of Cologne was prevailed on to receive French Garisons into his Towns. This made a clear Passage from France to Holland, and struck such a Terror into the other Princes and States on the Rhine, that none dared to move to assist the Dutch. He then published his Declaration of War against them; in which he was not so scrupulous as our Court, who alledged some Pretences at least for their Declaration, however trivial. But his Most Christian Majesty acted more sincerely, and was content to say, that he had long been offended with the States, and could not without Diminution of his Glory, dissemble his Indignation any longer;

And by France.

A.D. 1672. er; or, in plain English, that he fell out with them because he had a Mind to do so.

The French King invades Holland. The Way through Germany to Holland being made clear by the Alliance of the Elector of Cologne and the Bishop of Munster, and England having openly declared it self against that State, by the Attack of the Smyrna Fleet followed by a Declaration of War, the King of France at the Head of 120000 Men, attended by his chief Ministers and Generals, came down like a Torrent upon those Provinces that lie on the German Side. He found every Thing there entirely unprepared to resist so powerful an Invasion. The Towns were ill fortified and ill supplied; commanded by Governours that had no Courage or Practice in military Affairs, who only looked on their Governments as Places to make their own private Advantage of. These Towns and Fortresses had been reckoned impregnable during the Wars of the Republick with Spain; but now being so ill provided and commanded, not one of them made any Shew of Resistance. So that the French became Masters of the Inland Provinces, in as little Time as Travellers usually employ to view and consider them. The Provinces of Guelderland, Overysfel, and Utrecht, fell entirely into the Hands of the French; and the Bishop of Munster was making a formidable Impression on Groningen, and at last besieged the City of that Name. So that almost four of the seven Provinces were totally lost; and the King of France was making an Impression upon the others, having taken Naerden within three Leagues of Amsterdam.

The Dutch lay all their Country under Water.

Amsterdam saved by a wonderful Accident.

The Dutch were now in the utmost Extremities. All the Opposition they could make was to break down their Dykes, and set open their Sluices, and to lay the whole Country under Water, to the unspeakable Damage of thousands of their People. But it was the only Defence they had; and it proved the saving of what remained, and of the whole State with it. Amsterdam was preserved by it as it were miraculously. That City upon the taking of Naerden, and the Approach of the French still nearer towards them, was filled with the utmost Consternation and Despair. Nothing was thought of but Treating and Submission. The French had advanced within about five or six Miles of Amsterdam to a little Town called Muyden, the Keys of which were delivered to them. But the Place appearing inconsiderable, they in Contempt threw the Keys into the Ditch, and went back to Naerden. This saved Amsterdam. For this Town of Muyden had the Command of so much Water as would overflow the Country as far as that City. And the Prince of Orange sent in all haste, as soon as the French were gone, two Battalions to secure it. The French soon afterwards understood the Importance of the Place, and sent another Party to seize it; but they found themselves prevented, and their Progress checked by the Inundation that had been let loose during their Absence. In like Manner, throughout the three remaining Provinces all the Water that could be collected was poured out upon the Land; so that all those flat Countries became a Sea, in which the Cities and Towns appeared like Islands.

This gave the Dutch a little breathing Time, but their Case was still very deplorable. They had a mighty King in their Country possessed of above half of it; they were attacked at Sea by the English; their State was divided into most violent Factions of Friends and Enemies to the House of Orange; their Troops were few, dispirited, and undisciplined; and the Water that had saved them hitherto, was likely to fail them when the Frosts of the Winter should come.

They thought there was no Remedy but to send Ambassadors to the King of France; who kept his Court at Utrecht, with the same Order and Splendor as if he had been at Versailles. They came like those who were rather to receive his Commands, than to enter into a Treaty. The French King's Council was divided upon their coming. M. Pomponne proposed Terms in Appearance very moderate; namely that the King should restore all that he had taken that belonged to the seven Provinces, and should require only the Surrender of Maestricht, Boisleduc, Breda, and Bergen-op-zoom, which are not in any one of them. This he proposed, as supposing that this Shew of Moderation would put a Stop to the Commotion all Germany was in; for the Princes and States there, seeing their own Ruin in that of the Dutch, began to move vigorously to their Assistance. And yet by this Means the French King would have effectually compass'd his Ends, by separating Holland and the Empire from the Spanish Netherlands; which would be of consequence an easy Prey at any Time. These Terms the Dutch would have yielded to without Difficulty; though it was easy to see that such Concessions would have only delayed, not prevented their Chains. So low were they brought at that Time. But M. Louvois insisted upon harder Terms. His Advice was that the King should demand of them over and above, a vast Sum for the Charge of that Campaign; the giving the chief Church in every Town for the Exercise of the Papish Religion; that they should put themselves under the Protection of France, and send an Ambassador every Year with a Medal acknowledging it; and enter into no Treaties or Alliances but by the Direction of France. The Dutch Ambassadors were amazed when these imperious Demands were proposed to them. One of them swooned away when he heard them read; he could not bear to yield to them, nor see how they could be refused. One Article was put in for Form that they should give the King of England full Satisfaction. But the other Demands were made without any Concert with England; the French Court not apprehending the King's Resentment, though they gave him so much Reason for it.

The more rigorous Advice prevailed in the French

The deplorable Condition of the Dutch.

They send Ambassadors to the French King.

The slavish Conditions imposed on them.

A.D. 1672. French Council; and by prevailing, defeated their Design. The former Terms, tho' in Conclusion they would have brought about the same Thing, had nevertheless been certainly complied with. But the others carried those Marks of Slavery with them, that no free People could bear to submit to them, while their Submission could be deferred an Hour. The Dutch being as yet secured by the Waters that surrounded them, rejected those imperious Conditions, and chose rather to abide the Power of their Enemies. And their Constancy was rewarded by the Expulsion of the French, and their perfect Restoration to Freedom and Security.

Those Conditions bravely rejected.

A great Revolution in Holland.

In the mean Time, the Danger and Consternation they were in, according to the Custom of Democratical States, put them in a Rage with those who had the Administration of Affairs. M. de Witte had administered that State as Pensionary of Holland about eighteen Years with great Honour to himself and Advantage to his Country. But now the Misfortunes they fell into threw the common People, who in Holland are the Masters, into a violent Fury against him. That Republick had been long divided into two Parties. The first of these was for giving to the Princes of Orange those Honours and Commands which their Ancestor Will. I. had purchased by setting up and preserving their infant Republick. The other Party thought those Princes too powerful for a free State; and they did not want Examples of the Hazard their Liberties had sometimes run from the too great Power of the House of Orange. The former Party was brought very low by the Declension of that Family; which consisting only of one Prince of a weakly Constitution, and born after his Father's Death, was utterly unable to support or assist their Party during his Childhood. But now the imminent Peril the State was encompassed with, turned the Multitude on that Side. They cried out that the Reason of their present Misfortunes was that the Prince of Orange was kept from the Honours due to him; and throughout all the Towns that remained unconquered, the general Voice ran, that they should never be delivered till he was restored to the Dignities his Ancestors had enjoyed. In extreme Distress Men are glad to find Fault with the present Measures whether with Reason or not; because a Fault either discovered or supposed in them, gives hopes of Relief from a Change of Counsels. For in Reason little Help could be expected from a Prince scarce one and twenty, towards freeing an oppressed, or healing a divided Nation; though it proved so happy in the Event. Their Love to the Prince exasperated the People still more against M. de Witte who was known to be the Head of the Party opposite to his Interests; and their Hatred to him increased to that Fury, that at length that Minister and his Brother were, in a popular Tumult, murdered with the most dreadful Circumstances of Rage and Cruelty.

The Murder of the two De Witte's.

The tragical End of the two De Witte's, A.D. 1672. though a most horrible Act in itself, produced this Benefit, that their Faction being suppressed, the Magistracy in all the Towns of Holland was almost unanimously conferred upon those who were Friends to the House of Orange. This produced Union among the States, who became all of the same Party. The Prince of Orange was set at the Head of the Army; and he took such prudent Measures as put a Spirit and Courage into them they had not been used to. He posted himself so advantageously to cover that part of the Country that was not defended by the Inundation, that the French could never force him. Nor was he only serviceable to his Countrymen in the Field, but in their publick Councils infused new Life into them by his prudent Advices and noble Sentiments. And such was the Resolution he put into them to maintain their Freedom, that they bravely resolved, if the French Arms should at last prevail, to leave their Country, and seek new Seats in the East-Indies, where they might enjoy Liberty, though in Exile, rather than bear a Tyrant's Yoke in their native Land. The State of the Shipping capable of so long a Voyage was examined, and it was computed that they could transport above two hundred thousand People thither.

The admirable Conduct of the Prince of Orange.

A noble Resolution taken by the Dutch.

But they had no occasion to execute that Resolution. The King of France went away from Utrecht in July, against the Advice of the wisest of his Counsellors, to receive the Flatteries prepared for him at Paris. He so diminished his Army by the Troops he took away with him, the Garrisons he placed in the Towns he had taken, and by a Detachment sent against the Elector of Brandenburg who came to assist the Dutch, that he wanted Forces enough to penetrate farther. And thus that Enterprize proved abortive at last. He also gave the Command of the Forces he left there to the Duke of Luxembourg, which was another false Step; for he was a Man of a fierce and cruel Nature, without Bowels of Pity, or Sense of Justice; and the Barbarities and Perfidiousness he was guilty of, fixed the Dutch in those obstinate Resolutions they had taken.

The French Enterprize frustrated at last.

A remarkable Deliverance happened to the Dutch during the Winter. It was expected by the French that the Frosts, which in Holland are very severe, would make a Way over the Ice to those Places that were inaccessible before. Accordingly, all things were prepared for an Invasion against that Time; and with such Dexterity that the Dutch did not suspect it. The Frost came; and it froze and thawed by Turns for some Time, which they reckon makes the Ice firmest. At last a Frost continued so strong for some Days, that upon piercing and examining the Ice, they concluded it could not be dissolved by any ordinary Thaw in less than two Days. With this Encouragement the Duke of Luxembourg marched out of Utrecht towards Leyden with 16000 Men at Midnight. They no sooner began their March, but

A strange Escape the Dutch met with.

A.D.1672. but a Thaw-Wind blew very fresh. They yet marched on till Day-light, but the Ice melted under them so fast that they could get no farther. Two little Towns, Swammerdam and Bodegrave, had the Misfortune to be near the End of their March; which Towns they gained with some Difficulty. Luxembourg, enraged to see his hopeful Scheme thus disappointed, revenged it upon the poor Inhabitants of those two Towns. All the Barbarities that monstrous Lust and inhumane Cruelty could put into the Heads of Men, as pitiless as Tygers, were exercised there. Mean while the Thaw still continued, so that it was not possible to return by the Way they came; the Ice over which they had passed before being dissolved to the depth of three Foot. They were obliged to come back over the Causeys; but in their Return, they met a Fort built so across their March, that they must needs pass through it. Had the Governor had the Courage to have stayed to defend it, they had been all taken Prisoners; being shut up on all other Sides by the Water. But not knowing what had happened to them, and seeing them come from that Side of the Country where they had never entered before, he thought all had been lost; and therefore forsook his Post, leaving the Passage free to them. He was afterwards put to Death for it.

This narrow Escape, and the Loss of 600 Soldiers that were drowned by venturing too far, frightened the French from making any more Attempts to invade this watery Country during the Winter.

The Affairs
at Sea.

The Misfortunes of the Dutch on Land were somewhat alleviated by the State of their Affairs at Sea; in which Element, tho' they really gained no Advantage, yet they defended themselves so well, as to defeat their Enemies Designs. The Success that attended the English Fleets in the former War, seemed now to have forsaken them. The English Courage was damped by the Foresight every one had, that the Ruin of Holland must necessarily weaken the Protestant Interest, and increase the French Power, which was universally odious and suspected. So that several of the bravest and most experienced Sea-Officers, who had signalized themselves in the former War, declined the Service, or engaged in it unwillingly. Those Notions being also spread among the common Seamen, made the Service odious. The English Sea Forces were also weakened instead of being augmented, by their Conjunction with the French, who made Part of the Fleet without affording any Assistance. For the King of France was not afraid to mock our King so openly, as to send his Ships under Pretence of assisting the English, and yet with secret Orders to forsake them at the Beginning of every Fight.

Under these Disadvantages the War began at Sea this Summer. The English Fleet being ready, was soon after joined by a French Squadron commanded by the Count d'Estrées. This Confederate Fleet lying at Anchor in Sould-Bay, May 28. between two and three in the Morning, the Scout Ships by firing their Cannon, gave Notice of the Approach of the Dutch Fleet. De Ruyter who commanded it, hearing that the English were at Anchor there, and thinking more of the Rejoicings usual on the 29th of May, than of engaging an Enemy, steered towards the Bay. He found them there perfectly secure of any Attack; it not being usual for the Dutch to be the Aggressors. But as soon as he appeared they were forced to cut their Cables in all Haste, and range themselves in as good Order as the Time would permit. De Ruyter intended to have sent Fire-ships among the Confederate Fleet; which being confined in a narrow Bay must have been in great Danger from them. But the Earl of Sandwich (who had foreseen the Danger of being surprized there) immediately sailed out, almost alone, to keep off the Enemy; and presently after there fell a sudden Calm, which prevented that Design. After the Calm the Wind came to the South-East, and the Engagement began between seven and eight in the Morning. De Ruyter attacked the Duke of York, and they were engaged Ship to Ship above two Hours. Bankert attacked the French under the Count d'Estrées; and Van Ghent fell upon the Blue Squadron under the Earl of Sandwich.

The Earl advanced before his Squadron, and interposed between the Enemy and them, to give them Time to put themselves in Order. He was attacked by Captain Brakel, (the same that began the Attack at Chatham) who depending on the Assistance of his Friends, sailed up boldly and grappled with the Earl. The Dutch had entirely the Advantage of the Wind, which blew directly into the Bay, and by that means kept the English from coming out to assist him, at the same Time that it gave Opportunities to the Dutch of continually supporting his Adversary; so that this brave Earl was forced to stand alone against the greatest Part of Van Ghent's Squadron, his own not coming to relieve him.

The French soon fled, not for Want of Courage, but by Orders from their Master, who desired to see the Naval Forces of England and Holland ruined by each other, that they might come nearer an Equality with his own. Bankert the Dutch Admiral pursued them till he thought they durst not return to the Fight. But this was more than needed, for they had no Intention so to do; and when Bankert ceased his Pursuit, and went back to attack the English, they still kept off, and never stirred to assist their Allies, though oppressed with such inequality of Numbers.

The Red Squadron where the Duke of York was, maintained a furious Combat with De Ruyter. The Duke of York's Ship suffered so much, that he was forced to leave it. The Fight continued with little Advantage on either Side; till Bankert returning from the Pursuit of the French, joined himself with De Ruyter. The Red Squadron was now overlaid with the Odds of two to one; which

A.D.1672.
The Fight in
Sould-Bay.

The French
abandon the English.

The Duke of York in Danger.

A.D. 1672. which caused several Ships in the Blue to leave their Squadron, and go to assist the Duke of York who was in such great Danger.

The Earl of Sandwich in Danger.

In the mean time their brave Commander the Earl of Sandwich had been engaged with almost the whole Squadron of Van Ghent for above two Hours; Brakel, who had grappled with him at first, still keeping his Hold. The Earl sunk three Fire-ships, and a Man of War, that would have laid him on Board on the other Side; he killed Van Ghent the Admiral of the Dutch Squadron, made himself Master of Brakel's Ship above Decks, the greater Part of the Officers and Men aboard being killed or wounded, Brakel himself being among the latter; and at last he disengaged himself from that Ship entirely. He might now have made an honourable Retreat; but 'tis said that a Reflection the Duke of York had made upon him the Day before the Battel, stuck so close to him, that it proved his Death. It seems, the Day before the Fight, himself with other Flag Officers being on Board the Duke of York at an Entertainment, the Earl observed to them, that they might be surprized by the Dutch in that Bay; and therefore advised, that they should weigh Anchor, and stand out to Sea. This Observation, in the midst of Jollity, was interpreted as if only Fear made him think of the Enemy, in that Height of Mirth, and at a Time when there was so little Expectation of such an Attempt. The Duke of York was so ill advised, as to cast this Reflection himself; which the Earl so deeply resented, as made him regardless of his Life. So that he still continued the Fight, though against such mighty Odds; till about Noon a fourth Fire-ship, covered by the Smoke of the Enemy's Fire, grappled his Ship, and set her in a Flame. The Earl continued on Board so long as there was the least Hopes of saving her, till he was almost left alone, surrounded by the Fire; when finding his Endeavours fruitless, he leaped through the Flames into the Sea and ended his Life. His Body was afterwards found, scorched and disfigured, and interred in King Henry the Seventh's Chapel at the publick Expence.

The Death of the Earl of Sandwich.

A Part of the Earl's Squadron came to his Assistance when it was too late. They found Van Ghent's Squadron in Disorder by the Death of their Admiral, so that by a furious Attack those Ships were put into such Confusion, that they were obliged to hold off a considerable Time. This gave the Blue Squadron an Opportunity to join the Red, and to assist the Duke of York, who was engaged with one Squadron against two of the Enemy. On this Occasion Evertson the Admiral of Zealand was killed, and De Ruyter himself narrowly escaped being burnt. But Van Ghent's Squadron coming in to their Assistance, prevented the English from pursuing their Advantage. The Fight was then renewed, and continued with equal Obstinacy and Damage on both Sides. The English Courage scorned to fly, and the Dutch were ashamed to retreat from an Enemy so inferior in Numbers. At last the Night parted them, when nothing else could. Both Fleets were so sorely handled in that Day's Fight, that they had no Mind to meet again on the Morrow; and so each retired to their several Coasts.

A.D. 1672. The Night parts the two Fleets.

This doubtful Fight, which in Holland was represented as a Victory, served to keep up a little the Spirits of that People under their Misfortunes.

The Dutch not long after sent Ambassadors into England to sue for Peace. They came in Hopes of procuring it upon the easy Terms of admitting the Prince of Orange to the Office of Stadtholder, and the other Honours which his Ancestors had enjoyed. But they found much harder Conditions insisted on. It was demanded that they should pay the Honours heretofore required to be shewn to the King's Flag; and this was to be done not only by single Ships, but by whole Fleets. That they should pay a Million of Pounds Sterling for Reparation of Damages, and towards the Charges of the War; and ten thousand Pounds a Year for Fishing on the British Coast. That the Sovereignty of such of the United Provinces as were not demanded by the Confederate Kings (or at least the Office of perpetual Stadtholder, Captain and Admiral General) should be given to the Prince of Orange and his Male Issue. That they should admit the English to a Share of the whole East-India Trade; to the Possession of the City of Sluys in Flanders, and of the Islands of Cadzant, Walcheren, Goeree and Voorn. These Demands were too rigorous to be immediately agreed to; which gave the Dutch Ambassadors Occasion to make some Stay in England. During that Time, they were not idle in the Service of their Masters; conversing secretly with those who were displeased with the present Counsels; and sparing no Money where it might be proper to get useful Intelligence. But these Intrigues proved of ill Consequence to them at last. For the Court being informed of those secret Consultations and Correspondencies, ordered them to leave the Kingdom immediately. And when the News came to Holland that their Ambassadors were returning without making Peace with England, the Multitude was so enraged, that they assembled at their Landing Place, with Design to cut them to pieces; which they narrowly escaped by taking a different way.

The Dutch send Ambassadors into England.

The Confederate Fleet being refitted, they steered to the Coast of Zealand, with Design to make a Descent there. But they found the Coast defended by the Dutch Fleet, which lay so close within their Sands that they could not be attacked. They therefore proceeded to block up the Maese and Texel, hoping by that means to draw the Hollanders out of their advantageous Situation.

When the Fleet came before Scheveling, their Intention was to land some Forces there.

They are ordered to leave the Kingdom.

The Confederate Fleet before Scheveling.

A.D. 1672. there. But it chanced that when they appeared in Sight of the Place, and were making up to the Shore, the Tide of Ebb was begun, which hindered their advancing farther on a Coast full of Sands and Shallows. Messengers were immediately dispatched from Scheveling to the Prince of Orange, to send some Regiments to hinder the Descent. But the French were so near him, that he could spare but few Men. This put the Inhabitants in the utmost Consternation, who expected that upon the Turn of the Tide the Countrey must be lost. The only Hope they had was, that De Ruyter, who was upon the Coast to watch the Motions of the English, might chance to come to their Relief. But he did not appear, and the Tide of Flood was now returning, which was to deliver them to their Enemies. But to the Amazement of all, after the Water had flowed two or three Hours, an Ebb of many Hours succeeded, which drove the Confederates again from the Shore; and before this was spent, De Ruyter came in View. A Descent could not be undertaken while an Enemy's Fleet was on the Shore; so that the Confederates were obliged to leave that Design.

A wonderful Accident.

They went on alarming the Coast after this Manner, in order to draw the Dutch to a Battel; but de Ruyter knew how to avoid it. They also waited some Time near the Dogger Sand, in Hopes to intercept a rich East-India Fleet of fourteen Ships, which they had Intelligence of. But those Ships sailed home so close by the German Coast, that they missed them also. So that being disappointed in two important Designs, they returned to the Coast of England, and the Dutch retired into their own Ports. And this ended the Transactions at Sea for this Year.

The Parliament meets.

During the former Part of the Winter little happened worth Notice. The Parliament stood prorogued to the 30th of October; but the Ministry not caring to meet them, procured another Prorogation till the 4th of February, tho' the King began to be in great Streights for Money. This made him, contrary to his promise, continue the Stop of the Exchequer till the first of the next May; which he did by a Declaration dated December 4. But this proved but a short Reprieve to the Ministry; the King's Wants increasing at such a Rate, that there was no staying longer. So that on the 4th of February, they were obliged to let the Parliament sit to do Business.

A.D. 1673.

Their Proceedings.

The Houses met, with Resentment enough for the Exorbitances committed by the Cabal. The King in his Speech to them, took Notice of the War he had entered into, and of the Justice and Necessity of it, adding the customary Motion for Supplies. After that he mentioned his Declaration of Liberty of Conscience, of which he said, that having found its good Effects, he was resolved to stick to it. He observed that the Favour he there granted to Papists of having private Worship in their own Houses, was the least he could do to reward the Services done by them to his Father and himself, and concluded with the usual Assurances of protecting Religion and Liberties. The Lord Chancellor's Speech tended to the same Purpose, enlarging upon the Heads the King had spoke to; and concluding with an Exhortation to Confidence, Loyalty and Affection, in very handsome and eloquent Language. At the Time when the Cabal was set upon advancing the King's Prerogative, the Earl of Shaftsbury being Lord Chancellor, had begun a new Method of issuing out Writs for Elections of Members in the House of Commons, to sit in the Room of those who died during the long Interval of Parliament; by which the Court obtained some Influence over such Elections. But Things being since altered, the King, after the Chancellor had spoken, took Notice of these Writs, and having excused them by Precedents, which he said were found for so doing, left them however to the Sentence and Determination of the House.

A.D. 1673.

The Commons went back to their House, very little wrought on by the Chancellor's Eloquence, or the King's Condescension in the Matter of the Writs, and assembled in a very ill Humour. The very next Day they fell upon the Business of the Writs, with great Heat; and the Members returned by Virtue of them were every one expelled. After this was done, they took into Consideration the King's Motion for Supplies. They knew the King's Necessities were very great, and were loth to forsake him; yet they were as unwilling to give Money to carry on a War that was odious and suspected. They therefore took the middle Way, and voted to the King the Sum of 1260000 Pounds, but with this Title only, To supply his Majesty's extraordinary Occasions, not deigning to mention that War to which they were so much averse. But what was of still more Consequence, after having passed this Vote, the House agreed not to turn it into a Money Bill, till they had perfect Satisfaction with Respect to all their Grievances, and Security against the Designs in Favour of Popery; which the Duke of York's Religion, and the Indulgence the King had openly shewed the Papists in his Declaration, and vindicated in his Speech, gave them Reason to apprehend.

The Commons quickly after fell upon the Declaration. The Right claimed there by the King, of dispensing with Penal Statutes, so evidently tended to the Subversion and frustrating of all Law, that very little could be said in Favour of it by the Court Party. They only pretended that the King, by Virtue of his Supremacy in Ecclesiastical Affairs, had a particular Privilege with Respect to those Penal Laws that related to religious Matters. But this was only a Subterfuge, and was fully and clearly answered. So that a very unanimous Resolution passed the House, that the Declaration was against Law.

The Commons vote the Declaration to be against Law.

While this Debate was carrying on, the Court Party, finding their Reasonings too

A.D. 1673. weak to withstand those on the other Side, endeavoured to divert the Debate by Artifice; and to set the House upon a farther Prosecution of the Writs, the issuing of which was justly resented as an high Breach of Privilege. The Earl of Shaftsbury was very obnoxious to the House upon that Account, and the Court suspected and disliked him; so that they hoped, and were willing, by making him a Sacrifice to the Resentment of the Commons, to divert their farther Enquiry into the Business of the Declaration. But this Artifice only served to bring yet greater Inconveniences on their Side. For the Earl was too cunning not to be aware of this; so that this Project made him for his own Safety fall in the more quickly, and more eagerly with the Countrey Party. And the House was too warm upon the Pursuit of the Declaration to be diverted from it.

The Earl of Shaftsbury turns against the Court.

The Commons address the King against the Declaration.

The Cabal breaks to Pieces.

The King in Perplexities.

On the 19th of February the House of Commons presented an Address to the King, in which, after a very dutiful Manner, they represented to him, that Penal Statutes in Ecclesiastical Matters could not be suspended but by Act of Parliament; and therefore they humbly intreated his Majesty, that the Laws might have their free Course, till by Act of Parliament it should be otherwise provided. The King's Answer at that Time was only, That their Address was of Importance, and he would return them an Answer in Writing.

Mean while the Cabal was breaking to Pieces, and they began to commence Enemies to one another, as is usual with such Combinations of ill Men. The Lord Clifford and Duke Lauderdale, who were hot furious Men, stuck close to the violent Measures they were at first pursuing. The Lord Arlington was of a more fearful Temper, and began to dread the Fury of the House of Commons, to whom he thought the King must at last submit. The Earl of Shaftsbury also found himself in great Danger from the same Quarter; and besides, resented the Behaviour of the Court Party, who would have diverted the House from the Business of the Declaration, by turning the Storm upon him. He therefore resolved to secure and revenge himself by going over to the Countrey Party. The Duke of Buckingham needed no more than his natural Levity to make him break with all the others.

The King had now a very disagreeable Choice to make. He was to consider, whether he would give up the Dutch War abroad, or the Declaration. He summoned not only the Cabal, but other more faithful Counsellors to give him their Advice in this Perplexity. The Duke of York, the Lord Clifford, Duke Lauderdale, and the Duke of Buckingham were for having the King stand his Ground; and 'tis said the last of these proposed to bring the Army to Town, and take by Force out of both Houses the Members that made the Opposition. On the other Side, the Duke of Ormond, and other true Patriots, with the Earls of Shaftsbury and Arlington of the Cabal, advised the

A.D. 1673. King to give the Parliament Content; the two last giving him Hopes of bringing them back to Submission; when by Help of the Money they would give, the Dutch should be subdued.

The King, though as yet unresolved, thought himself obliged to take Notice of the Parliament's Address; and therefore four Days after sent them an Answer. It was so drawn up that it might be equally applicable to any Determination he might finally make on that important Head, whether of yielding, or standing firm. Therefore when it came to the House of Commons, they were not satisfied with it. However they resolved to return him Thanks for the general Assurances and Promises they found in it. But in three Days after they thought fit to desire a more explicit Answer, in an Address then presented to him. The King's Answer was, that he would take their Address into Consideration.

The Commons address him a second Time.

While these Things passed, the Court was willing to try what could be done in Favour of the Declaration in the House of Lords, which occasioned a remarkable Incident. Lord Clifford had prepared Heads of a Speech to be spoken in that House, which he shewed to the King, who approved them. With this Speech he began the Debates, and fell upon the Vote of the Commons with very great Heat, and many indecent Expressions, which the ungoverned Warmth of his Temper suggested. The Earl of Shaftsbury laid hold of this Opportunity to declare himself; and when Lord Clifford had done, he stood up. All the House expected he was to go on to confirm and enlarge upon what Clifford had said. But to the Amazement of them all, he began his Speech with saying, He must differ from the noble Lord that spoke last, toto caelo. He said that so long as those Matters were debated without Doors, he might think, with others, that the King's Supremacy would warrant such a Declaration. But now that so loyal and affectionate an House of Commons were of another Mind, he submitted his Reasons to theirs; that they were the King's great Council; they must advise and support him; they had done it, and would do it still, if their Laws and Religion were secured to them. The King who was present, was in a Fury to be thus forsaken by his Chancellor, and told Lord Clifford how much his Speech pleased him, and how highly the other had offended him.

The Declaration considered in the House of Lords.

Lord Shaftsbury declares himself.

It seems incredible, that after this the Lord Clifford should lose his Place upon Account of this very Speech, while the Earl of Shaftsbury kept the Chancellorship. Yet thus it happened; so capricious are the Winds and Currents by which those are driven who navigate in the Court-Oceans. For in the Afternoon of that very Day, the Lords Shaftsbury and Arlington got those Members of the House of Commons they could influence, to go one after another privately to the King, and persuade him, that upon Lord Clifford's Speech,

A strange Court-Turn.

A.D. 1673. Speech, the Commons were so inflamed, that they would have gone to high Votes and Impeachments, had not they been calmed by Lord Shaftsbury's Speech, which they supposed was the Sense of the King, as the other was of the Duke. This was so dextrously managed, that before Night the King was quite changed, and said, that though Lord Shaftsbury had spoken like a Rogue, yet he had quenched a Fire which Clifford's Indiscretion had kindled to that Degree, that he could use that Lord's Service no longer. And not long after Clifford laid down the White Staff, which was given to Sir Thomas Osborne, afterwards Earl of Danby. Lord Shaftsbury continued Chancellor till the next Sessions of Parliament, in hopes of his doing some Service there.

The Court of France advise the King to recall the Declaration. The Affair of the Declaration was quickly after this Ruffle determined. Lord Arlington found means to bring over the Court of France to his Side; who fearing to be left with the whole Charge of the War against Holland upon them, advised the King to comply with the Parliament for the Sake of the Money. So that the King at last recalled the Declaration, and with his own Hands broke the Great-Seal annexed to it.

The Test Act set on foot. While this Affair was in Suspence, the Commons went upon another Act, well known by the Name of the Test Act; which obliged all Persons in Office to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, to receive the Sacrament according to the Usage of the Church of England, and declare against Transubstantiation. This was levelled chiefly against the Papists, though it also affected the Dissenters. The Court Party opposed this Bill with all their Might, but in vain. When they found themselves over-numbered in Votes, they tried to quash the Bill, by setting the strict Church Party and those who favoured the Dissenters at Variance. To this End they moved to have some Things inserted in Favour of the latter which they thought would be opposed by the former. The Artifice was dangerous, and might have taken Effect, had not Alderman Love, a City Member, and a noted Dissenter, stood up and said, that though his Persuasion was well known, he had vigorously opposed the Declaration, as chusing rather to continue liable to the Penalties of the Laws, than to be relieved by illegal Methods; that out of the same Concern for his Countrey's Safety, he heartily opposed this Motion also; and desired that nothing relating to the Dissenters or their Concerns might stop the Progress of a Bill so necessary for the Security of the Protestant Religion; adding, that in these Things he knew he spoke the Sense of that whole Body. His Speech was heard with Applause by all the Countrey Party, who unanimously rejected the Motion, and carried the Bill through the House in a very short Time. The House was so pleased with the prudent Conduct of the Dissenters on this Occasion, that they ordered a Bill to be brought in for their Ease and Relief; which went through the House of Commons. But in its Passage A.D. 1673. through the Lords House, it being retarded on account of some Amendments proposed by the Peers, it came to pass that before it could be perfected, it was stopped by the Parliament's breaking up.

In the House of Lords, a like Instance of Publick Spirit was found in a Roman Catholic. The Earl of Bristol, who was known to be of that Church, made a Speech in Favour of the Bill for taking the Test; urging the Necessity of it to remove the Fears and Apprehensions of the People; and concluding, after a Manner very unusual, that he gave his Advice for passing the Bill, at the same Time that by some Scruples of Conscience he found himself obliged to vote against it.

The Commons having secured their Religion by the recalling of the Declaration, and the Bill for the Test, began to think of the Money Bill. It passed the House with this Title only, to supply his Majesty's extraordinary Occasions; and for their greater Security they tacked a Proviso to it, that no Papist should be capable of holding any publick Employment. March 29. the King came to the House of Peers, and passed the two Bills for the Supply, with some others of less Importance. He then adjourn'd the Parliament to October 20.

The Test Act removed the Duke of York from all his Employments; and the Lord Clifford from the Treasury sooner than had otherwise been done. He was so much disgusted at the ill Success of the Designs of the Cabal, that he retired into the Countrey in Discontent. All Popish Officers, Civil and Military, were obliged to quit their Posts in like manner throughout England, which quieted the Minds and Fears of the People.

The Dutch were very much discouraged and disappointed at what passed in the Parliament this Sessions. They were in hopes the Parliament would have brought the King to a Peace with them; whereas on the contrary they had given him a Supply for carrying on the War. But to make them amends, Fortune this Summer began to turn to their Side at Land.

Soon after the breaking up of the Parliament, the Campaign began at Sea. The Duke of York being removed, Prince Rupert was put in his Room. The Dutch being first ready, made an Attempt to dam up the Mouth of the Thames, by sinking several Vessels there laden with Stones. But they found us this Time better upon our Guard than at the Expedition at Chatham, so that they were obliged to return without attempting it.

On the 16th of May our Fleet got out, and joined the French off the Coast of Sussex at Rye, where the King came to see them; and on the 19th he left them ready to sail.

On the 22<sup>d</sup> of May, the Confederate Fleet came in Sight of the Dutch; who standing only on the Defensive to hinder the Descent on Zealand, had placed themselves on the Coast of that Province. Their Fleet consisted

The Money Bill passed.

The Trans-actions at Sea.

A Sea-Fight.

A.D.1673. fisted of about seventy Men of War and Frigates, which lay extended at a Place called Schoonewelt, in an advantageous Post between two dangerous Banks or Shelves of Sand. But the Confederates having found an Opportunity, by favour of the misty Weather, to sound the Depth of Water thereabouts, it was resolved in a Council of War to attack them notwithstanding. But being hindered, first by a Calm, and then by a Storm, they could not come to an Engagement till the 28th.

The Confederate Fleet was more numerous than that of the Dutch, consisting of eighty four Men of War and Frigates, besides Fireships. Of these the French made about a third Part. But the English were so ill satisfied with their Behaviour at Sould-Bay, that they would not suffer them now in a Body, or separate Squadron, but dispersed them in Divisions through the whole Fleet, which put them under a Necessity of Fighting.

The first Squadron of the Confederates, called the Red, was commanded by Prince Rupert, as Chief Admiral; the second, being the White, by Count d'Estrees, as Vice-Admiral; the third or Blue Squadron by Sir Edward Sprag, as Rear-Admiral. The Dutch Fleet was divided in like manner into three Squadrons under De Ruyter, Tromp, and Bankert.

The Fight began with great Fury on both Sides; and the two Fleets continued thundering at each other with equal Loss and Bravery, till the Darkness parted them at about ten o' Clock at Night. Two French Men of War were sunk in this Day's Action; and one Dutch Man of War, which with several others was disabled and towed out of the Fleet, sunk quickly after.

The next Day, the two Fleets rested to repair their Damage. The Dutch had the Advantage of being near their own Coast, so that they could easily clear themselves of their wounded Men, receive Reinforcements of fresh Ships in the Room of such as were disabled, and be plentifully supplied with all other Things they might want. But the Confederates were embarrassed with a great Number of Soldiers they had taken on board, and the Wind being then West, they could not send home their wounded Men, who remained in the Ships, to the great Hindrance and Discouragement of the others.

These Circumstances were not unknown to the Dutch; who for four Days together had lain expecting that the Confederates should take Advantage of the Wind to renew the Fight. But now having some how learned the uneasy Condition of the Confederate Fleet; and the Wind veering to the North-East on the 4th of June, the Dutch took the Opportunity of the favourable Gale, and came out of their Sands towards the two Fleets. About Noon, they came near to them. The Confederates to draw them farther from their Sands, into the wide Sea, went under Sail towards the English Coast. At last having gained that Point, they turned about, and a second Battel began about five in the Evening. It continued for five or six Hours together, till the Darkness of the Night gave Room to the Dutch to retreat unperceived. No Ship was lost on either Side, though many were damaged. The Confederates, as soon as the Light of the Morning shewed the Enemies Retreat, stood after them, and continued the Chase till six. But during the intervening Time, the Dutch had got so far that they could not be overtaken till they were secure within their own Sands. So that the Confederates gave over the Chase, and steered towards the English Coast.

Having landed the wounded Men, and taken in Provisions and Ammunition, they put to Sea again in about a Fortnight, with a Body of fresh Troops to the Number of seven Thousand, with Design to make a Descent on Zealand, as in the preceding Year. They came before the Maese on the 23<sup>d</sup>, and on the 24th appeared before Scheveling and Zandvoort. Soon after they posted themselves before the Texel. From thence they passed along the whole Coast of Holland and Friesland, to the Vlie, Ameland, and the Western Ems. On the second or third of August they appeared again before the Texel.

By these Motions they harrassed the Dutch Troops on Shore, and fatigued their own on board; their intended Project of a Descent being found impracticable. In their cruising thus to and fro, they had the Fortune to meet with a Dutch East-India Ship, very richly laden, who was separated from a very rich Fleet come from the same Parts. That whole Fleet was in no small Danger of falling into their Hands in the same manner, but had the good Luck to escape.

At last the Dutch resolved to venture on a third Engagement in hopes to free themselves from the perpetual Dangers and Alarms they were in, while the Confederate Fleet remained upon their Coasts. On the 10th of August the two Fleets came in Sight of each other.

The English were sixty Men of War, and the French thirty; the Dutch (according to their own Accounts) were but seventy. The Fight began in the same Order as in the last Engagement.

The French having behaved themselves well in the last Fight, were trusted by the English to compose a separate Squadron, as they did before at the Fight of Sould-Bay. But they quickly shewed their Courage then to have been the Effect of Necessity only. For they were scarcely attacked by Bankert, but they fled immediately in the same manner as before, and abandoned the English a second Time to the Inequality of their Enemies Numbers; standing aloof like unconcerned Spectators. One Ship only amongst them, commanded by Rear-Admiral Martel, still remained with the English, and fought bravely; for which he was committed at his Return to the Bastile. So secure was

A.D.1673.

A second Fight.

A third Sea-Fight.

The French abandon the English again.

A.D. 1673. was the French Court of the King's Resentment, though of the most scornful and barefaced Affront.

Prince Rupert and De Ruyter met together at the Beginning of the Fight, and a fierce Engagement rose between them. De Ruyter at last began to be sore pressed, which Bankert perceiving, and finding the French had no Intention to return to the Fight, he left them, and bore down with his Squadron to De Ruyter's Assistance. Hereupon the Prince, overlaid with Numbers, made a retreating Fight to the Westward. De Ruyter and Bankert by this means finding little Advantage to be gained by pursuing him, turned back to assist Tromp against Sprag, which two were hotly engaged together. Prince Rupert seeing this, and that Sprag would be greatly over-matched, steered after the Dutch to the Assistance of Sprag.

The Battel between Tromp and Sprag had begun about Nine o' Clock. These two great Commanders engaged Ship to Ship. Tromp, though he had the Weather Gage, avoided a close Fight, though he had it in his Power when he pleased; and this Conduct gave him a great Advantage. For the Smoke of the Powder being carried in Clouds towards Sir Edward Sprag's Ship, took away the Sight so, that he could not take so true an Aim as Tromp, whose Ship was continually cleared by the Wind. After a Fight of three Hours, Sprag was forced to leave the Royal Prince in which he was, and go aboard the St. George. And Tromp's Ship being also damaged in the Fight, he hoisted his Flag on Board another. Then the Combat was renewed with the utmost Fury, between two of the bravest Sea Commanders of their Time. After a sharp Dispute, the St. George being also much damaged by the Enemies Cannon, Sir Edward Sprag left her, and got into a Boat with Design to go into another Ship. But he was not got six Boats Length, before a Cannon Shot, which passed through and through the St. George, struck the Boat in which he was, and sunk it. This was the unhappy End of one of the bravest Admirals our Countrey has ever produced. His Body was afterwards found, with his Fingers clasped about the Sides of the Boat so close, that they could scarce be got loose.

Sir Edward Sprag drowned.

In the mean time Tromp's Squadron was joined by De Ruyter and Bankert, and Sprag's by Prince Rupert, and the Fight was renewed; while D' Estrées and the French kept their Station, without offering to bear down to the Assistance of the English. The Fight lasted without any remarkable Advantage, till the Darknes of the Night parted them. The English seeing how ill they were used by the French, and how little Dependence could be had on them, went back to their own Ports, without renewing the Fight next Day; and the Dutch on the other hand, satisfying themselves with seeing their Coasts clear of their Enemies, did not care to follow them. This proved the last Fight of this War, the Peace being made by the A.D. 1673: next Summer.

The Progress made by the French at Land this Campaign, was not answerable to that of the last. Spain and Germany who were so much concerned in the Safety of Holland, had begun to move to their Assistance, when the Torrent of the French Invasion abated of its Fury; and when they found the Dutch were able to give some Check to it, they entered into Alliance with the States, and declared War against France. This obliged the French to weaken their Army, by dispersing it on one Side towards Flanders, on the other towards Germany. So that all they did this Summer was to take Maestricht; which was recompensed to the Dutch by the Recovery of Naerden by the Prince of Orange, which eased Amsterdam of a troublesome and dangerous Neighbourhood. Though this Siege lasted but four Days, yet it was easy to see, that the Recovery of all the Towns that had been taken by the French, must be a Work of great Time, Difficulty and Expence, both of Lives and Treasure; and the more, because the French having determined to secure their Conquests, had filled the fortified Towns with Garrisons, and been at the Expence of strengthening many of them with new Works. But the Prince of Orange found a Way to make all these Precautions useless, by a glorious Strain of Conduct and Courage. For towards the Winter, leaving a Part of his Army to guard the chief Post, he marched with the rest into Germany, and joining the Confederate Troops, besieged and took Bonne, a City upon the Rhine, which the Elector of Cologne had put into the Hands of France. The taking this City cut off all Supplies from such French Garrisons in Holland, as lay upon the Rhine and the Yffel; which made it very difficult for them to subsist. And besides, a free Passage was opened over the Rhine at Bonne, to the German Forces, who were every where in Motion, into Flanders; on which Side France lay more open than on the Side of Germany. So that in a short Time the French were obliged to abandon all their Conquests in Holland, as suddenly as they made them; retaining only Maestricht and the Grave, of all that belonged to the Dutch.

The French
unsuccessful
at Land.

The Prince of Orange's glorious Conduct.

During this Summer a Treaty of Peace was set on Foot at Cologne by the King of Sweden's Mediation. But this Assembly did little or nothing, and in a short Time broke up. For the Elector of Cologne having made Furstemburg, Dean of that Place, his Plenipotentiary, he was seized upon by the Emperor, who claimed him as his Subject, and a great Sum of French Money with him. The French were provoked at this, as being a Violation of the Pass-ports, and refused to treat till he were set at Liberty, and the Money restored. The Emperor on the other hand was as positive to do neither; so that the Meeting broke up without any Effect.

The Treaty
at Cologne.

A.D. 1673. The Duke of York began to think of another Wife. He had first made his Address to Lady Bellasis; who gained so much upon him, that she got a Promise under his Hand to marry her. But the King hearing this, told the Duke it was too much for him to play the Fool a second Time, and at his Age. This broke off all; and the Lady was so threatned, that she gave back the Duke's Promise. He then proposed Marriage to the Arch-duchess of Inspruck; but the Emperor becoming a Widower at that Time, married her himself. After that a Match was proposed to the Duke of Modena's Daughter, which took Effect after some Time.

Which is opposed by the Commons too late.

On the 20th of October the Parliament met. The Commons were scarce assembled before they fell upon the Duke's Marriage, which alarmed the Nation. They presently voted an Address to the King, to prevent the Consummation of that Marriage; and to desire that he might be married to none but a Protestant. Upon this the Duke got the King to prorogue the Parliament for a Week. On the 27th, the King at their Meeting made them a Speech, consisting of Complaints of the Dutch, Motions for Supplies, and Assurances and Promises in Matters of Religion; to which was added a Motion, to satisfy the Debt the King was in to the Bankers. The Chancellor after him went on in the same Strain. On the 30th Secretary Coventry brought the King's Answer to the Address about the Duke of York's Marriage; importing, that the Marriage was already compleated in the Forms used by Princes, and with his Consent; and that a Marriage being negotiating the last Sessions with another Catholick Princess (the Arch-Duchess of Inspruck) without any Exceptions taken; he could not have believed the present would have been so disagreeable. It was certainly a false Step of the Commons to let that Alliance pass on so quietly, when it might have been prevented without Difficulty; and now to be warm against this, when it was really too late. However they went on; and the next Day passed a Resolution to give no Money, till an effectual Security be had against Popery, and other Grievances be redressed. Two Days after they presented another Address against the Duke of York's Marriage; importing in substance, that finding by the Opinions of very learned Men, that Treaties and Contracts by Proxy are dissolvable, the Commons humbly besought his Majesty to put a Stop to the Consummation of that Marriage, to prevent the Dangers of Popery. The King's Answer was, he would take it into Consideration, and return an Answer. The Commons went on, and voted the standing Army a Grievance; and prepared an Address against it. This was to have been presented Nov. 4. but on that Day as the Speaker was entering the House, the Black Rod and he met at the Door. It was known by the Commons, that the Black Rod was come to summon them to a Prorogation; so that as soon as the Speaker, who was a little the foremost, was got in, some of the Members shut to the Door and cried, To the Chair, to the Chair! whither the Speaker was immediately hurried. Some cried out, the Black Rod is at the Door; but they were not regarded. Three Motions were made in an instant: 1. That our Alliance with France was a Grievance. 2. That the evil Counsellors about the King were a Grievance. 3. That the Duke of Lauderdale was a Grievance, and unfit to be employed. Upon this arose a general Cry, To the Question, to the Question! But the Black Rod still knocking earnestly at the Door, the Speaker leaped out of the Chair, and the House rose in a great Confusion. When they came before the King, he told them of the Reluctancy with which he then called them; but that to prevent farther Breaches, he found a short Recess was become necessary; assured them of his Care against Popery, and of his Designs to give them Satisfaction. He then prorogued them to the 13th of January following.

A.D. 1673. The House of Commons in a Tumult

The Parliament prorogued.

Soon after the breaking up of the Parliament, the Seals were taken from the Earl of Shaftsbury. The Advances he had made to the Countrey Party were not unknown at Court; and the Test Act was said to be his Project, and aimed by him chiefly against the Duke of York. Immediately upon his Removal he threw off all Reserve, and declared himself an open Enemy to the Court. And by communicating the Secrets he was acquainted with during his Administration, he enflamed Mens Minds, and increased their Jealousies to a higher Degree than could have been done by any but himself. So that no Man created the King more Trouble than this Earl, who was his great Instrument in contriving and executing all the wicked Projects of the Cabal. For the Change is easy from a Counsellor of Tyranny to a seditious Incendiary; and those who are unfaithful to their Countrey, are not to be depended on by a Prince.

The Earl of Shaftsbury removed.

On the 21st of November the Duke of York was in Person married to the Princess of Modena, who lived to be afterwards his Queen. She found the Way to disguise herself so artfully while she was Duchess of York, that she deceived the most penetrating and jealous; and made it believed, that she gave herself wholly up to innocent Cheerfulness and Diversion. So that her Behaviour removed the Uneasinesses the Publick conceived on account of her Religion; and so long as she was Duchess, she was universally beloved and esteemed.

The Duke of York married.

On the 7th of January the Parliament met. The Speeches of the King and Chancellor consisted principally of the usual Motions for Supplies, and Exhortations to Confidence and Affection. But the Parliament was so uneasy at the Continuance of the War with Holland, the exorbitant Power of France, and the Prevalence of Popish Counsels, that they were little wrought on by either. The Lords soon

The Parliament meets.

A.D. 1673. soon addressed the King, to require by Proclamation all Papists within five Miles of London, not being Houholders, to repair to their Dwellings, or else to depart ten Miles from thence, during the Session. With this Address the King complied. Soon after the two Houses joined in an Address for a general Fast, for averting the Dangers of Popery; to which also the King consented.

But still the Commons were so unsatisfied, that when they came to consider the King's Speech, they resolved to proceed in the first Place to the Redress of Grievances, the securing of Religion, Liberties and Properties, the suppressing of Popery, and the Removal of Popish and dangerous Counsellors. Of the five Members of the Cabal, Lord Clifford was dead, of Discontent, 'tis said, to find the hopeful Schemes laid by the Cabal, all dissipated, and brought to nothing. The Earl of Shaftsbury had made his Peace with the Country Party, and began to distinguish himself in Opposition to the Court, so that he was effectually covered. The other three were left exposed to the Indignation of the Commons.

They began with the Duke of Lauderdale. It was resolved, nemine contradicente, that an Address should be presented to the King, that he might be removed from all his Employments. The Duke of Buckingham came next; but while the Debate concerning him continued, he sent a Letter to the Speaker, desiring to be heard; which was granted. He appeared before the House two Days together. The first Day his Speech was so wild and rambling, that the House did not know what to make of it. But the next Day they obliged him to answer to some Queries drawn up in Writing, relating to the several ill Steps taken by the Cabal. He disowned the shutting up the Exchequer, the raising the Standing Army, and the Attack of the Smyrna Fleet; but acknowledged that he concluded the Treaty with France, and advised the Declaration. The House was so little satisfied with his Denials, and with his Confessions, that they resolved to address the King to remove him from all Employments, and from his Presence and Counsels for ever. The Earl of Arlington received but little Encouragement from the Duke of Buckingham's Success, to hope to make his Peace the same Way. But the Duke having begun, he thought himself obliged to follow; and the rather, because the Duke had charged him with the Standing-Army, and the Attack of the Dutch Fleet. We do not find any Account of what he said in the House; except that the Duke having assumed the Honour of making the Triple Alliance, the Lord Arlington gave it to Sir William Temple. This Lord's Defence was as ill received as the Duke's; and they drew up Articles of treasonable, and other high Crimes against him. But this Prosecution was stopped by an Act of Grace shortly after. To exclude effectually all Papists from the Means of doing hurt, they went about a Bill, imposing a strict Test to distinguish between Protestants and Papists, containing a formal Declaration against the Pope's Supremacy and Infallibility, the Doctrine of Transubstantiation, and the Invocation of Saints; which those who refused were to be incapable of any Office, or to come within five Miles of the Court. But they wanted Time to perfect this.

The Dutch were too much streightened by A Peace England, not to desire a fair Riddance from so powerful an Enemy. They found the Opportunity favourable for an Offer of Peace, the Parliament and People being averse to the Court Measures. So they procured the Marquis del Fresno, Ambassador from Spain, to present to the King Proposals for a Peace on their Part. To make these more effectual, they were accompanied with a Memorial, in which the Crown of Spain (which though in Alliance with the Dutch, was still at Peace with England) in Terms very soft let the King know that Spain also must declare War against him, if a Peace were not made with Holland. The King found himself hard pressed. He was unable to carry on the War without those Supplies, which he plainly saw the Parliament would not give to that End, and France alone was not able to bear the Expence. A War with Spain would ruine our Mediterranean Trade, and increase those Clamours and Discontents that were but too great already. He therefore made a Virtue of Necessity; and to put on the best Face the Matter would bear, presented the Proposals and Memorial to the Parliament, desiring their Advice. They returned it, that the King should proceed to a Treaty thereupon.

The Court hoped by this Condescension to put the Commons in a better Humour. But that House was so well informed of the dangerous Designs that had been carried on during the Intervals of Parliament, that they resolved to secure themselves while they had the Power in their Hands. They proceeded to vote the Standing Army a Grievance, and resolved to petition the King to disband all the Soldiers raised since 1663.

The Court was not pleased with this Behaviour of the Commons, but no Remedies but Gentleness and Compliance being to be found, the Peace went on. The Marquis del Fresno received full Powers from the States to treat and conclude a Peace. Sir William Temple was ordered to negotiate with him, and at three Meetings the whole was concluded. The King upon the 11th of February carried this News to the Parliament, acquainting them at the same Time, that he had given Orders for disbanding the Army.

The Commons returned their humble Thanks to his Majesty for the making Peace, and complying with their Addresses about the standing Forces. But still they were so warm upon the Scent of Grievances, that no other Thoughts could enter them; and resolved that a Committee be appointed to examine the State of Ireland. They appointed another

Their Proceedings.

The Duke of Buckingham is heard by the Commons.

And the Lord Arlington.

Farther Proceedings of the Parliament.

A.D. 1674. another Committee to inspect the Laws, and consider how far the King might commit any Subject by his immediate Warrant; as also how the Law stood touching Commitments by the Council Table. This Enquiry produced that noble Law, called the Habeas Corpus Act, the Shield of English Liberty, and the Glory of our Constitution; which was first thought of upon this Occasion, though it did not pass into an Act till six Years after.

The Parliament prorogued.
The Peace proclaimed.

The King, though he found but little Prospect of Money, thought it best to part with his Parliament. He saw they were got into the endless Subject of Grievances, and Provisions against them, and did not know when or where they might stop. He therefore chose to prorogue them, but with fair Words. He told them the Peace with the Dutch was ratified; and that upon that Account, their sitting longer being not so necessary as before, he thought it necessary to make a Recess. They were then prorogued to the 10th of November.

Four Days after this the Peace with Holland was proclaimed with universal Joy and Satisfaction. And this put a Period to the second Dutch War, which was entered into upon the wickedest Motives, begun with Treachery and Dishonour, and carried on with Success, that at best was doubtful. The only good Circumstance that attended it was at the Conclusion; in which the Article of the Flag was carried to all the Height the truest Englishman could desire, and by that Means the fullest Acknowledgment made of the Dominion of our Crown over the narrow Seas.

A new Period of this Reign.

The State of Europe after the Peace with Holland.

At the Conclusion of this Peace, a new Scene of Affairs began in our own Countrey, and throughout Europe; ending with the Peace of Nimeguen, and the breaking out of the Popish Plot; and making a new Period in this Reign of about four Years. But before we proceed to relate the particular Occurrences therein, it may be proper to take a View of the Situation of Affairs, and the Dispositions of those concerned in them. And because the Transactions abroad ruled our Counsels and Measures at home, we shall begin with them.

The Attempt upon Holland had stirred up against France a very formidable Confederacy of the King of Spain, the Emperor of Germany, and the Elector of Brandenburg. These Princes easily saw that the French Ambition was not likely to satiate it self with the Conquest of Holland; so that when the first Fury of the Invasion was checked by the Inundation of the Countrey, and the bold Stand made by the Prince of Orange, they entered immediately into Leagues with the Dutch. By this Alliance the Progress of the French was restrained, and they were at last obliged to evacuate the Countrey, in the Manner above related. But though this was done, the French Power continued very formidable; so that Flanders lay now exposed to the same Danger that Holland had escaped. This kept the Confederates together, after the Cause of their first Union had ceased. They had two Things to compass for their own Security, and that of Christendom; the first the Restitution of Lorrain and the Franche-Comté, in order to cover Germany; and the second, to regain the Conquests made in Flanders by the French, before the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, which were confirmed to them by that Treaty. For very important Concessions were then made to France, in Prospect of securing the rest of the Netherlands by the Guaranty of England. But that Security having failed, other Measures were requisite to cover Flanders from its ambitious Neighbour. And this was to be done by restoring those conquered Places to the Spaniards; by which Means the Netherlands would have been put in a Condition to defend themselves upon a sudden Attack, till Succours should arrive.

On the other Hand, France would not let the World be quiet upon such reasonable Terms. The Plan there laid for an universal Monarchy was to be executed by the Conquest of Flanders in the first Place. And because the German Powers were like to interpose for its Preservation, the French resolved to cover their own Territories on that Side, by making Lorrain and the Franche-Comté their Frontier. And though upon View of so strong an Alliance, to which they could not be sure that England might not at last accede, they were willing to make a Peace; yet they determined, unless the utmost Necessity compelled, not to make it without leaving Flanders open to a fresh Attack; when the Peace had dissolved the Confederacy, and one bold Push might carry that whole Countrey before any Assistance could be sent.

The Preservation of Flanders, and restraining the Power of France, were found as necessary by all wise and honest Men with us, as they were abroad. So that they became popular Topicks, in which all true Patriots heartily concurred. The Parliament therefore having weakened France by inducing the King to forsake his Alliance with that Crown, was desirous to complete the Work by engaging him to accede to the Confederacy against her; to which they were the more excited, because through the Weakness and want of Conduct among the Allies, it appeared that France was more than a Match for them; so that a mighty Weight, like that of England, was required to turn the Scale on their Side. And this Point all good Men were labouring unanimously and earnestly, for the following four Years, till the Peace of Nimeguen put an End to all Projects of that Kind. But as the Interests, Humours and Passions of private Men will always mix themselves with publick Counsels, it came to pass that the Prosecution of this excellent End in Parliament, did not keep a true and steady Course; but was carried on with an irregular and uncertain Motion, in Proportion to the Influence those variable Winds chanced to have upon it. There are never wanting amongst those who oppose a Court, though

A.D. 1674.
The Views of the Confederates.

The Views of France.

The Dispositions of the People and Parliament of England.

A.D. 1674. though for the justest Reasons, such as are much more factious than publick-spirited; more solicitous to distress the Governors, than to benefit the Subjects; and these Men, in the most excellent Medicines of State, are sure to mix some unfavoury Compositions of their own. So that many good Things were spoiled during the Parliament's sitting, by the Indiscretion and ill Grace that accompanied them; and many just Complaints and Representations came to be rejected, by being offered in an ungracious Manner.

Of the King.

The King on his Part was unwilling to break with France; and though the popular Stream running so much that Way, obliged him in his publick and formal Acts to express a Partiality to the Allies, he still lived under the Dishonour of a Pension from that Crown. For the Court of France, finding that his Necessities had induced him to make the Peace, feared that the same might at last engage him to accede to the Confederacy; which was only to be prevented by keeping those Necessities from pressing him too hard. And the King, who regarded nothing but the Ease or Pleasure of the present Moment, chose the Shame of becoming Pensioner to his Equal, for the Sake of a few idle and thoughtless Hours; rather than to make himself for ever glorious, by that Vigour and Activity his high Station demanded. And besides, his immoderate Weakness towards Women, laid him open to the Snares of the Duchesse of Portsmouth; who being thoroughly French, by Inclination as well as Birth, used all her Charms to keep him in that Interest. And being perfectly skilled in those Female Arts and Allurements, by which beautiful Women can enslave and lead Captive even the wisest Men, she was so far Mistress of his Heart, that she seldom failed to carry him as she pleased. Sometimes indeed his natural good Sense, or the Necessities of his Affairs made him weary of being dependent any longer, and to struggle with the Chains that held him. But these Efforts were either not vigorous, or not lasting; the Indolence of his Temper soon melting all his Strength, and throwing him down again into his former Supineness.

The Consequences of this Disposition in the King and Parliament were, that our Conduct in Foreign Affairs was very irregular and fluctuating, and therefore of little Honour or Advantage to us. And at home the Counter-paces between the King and the Parliament, destroyed what little Remains of Harmony and Confidence were left between them. So that the Dispositions on both Sides became fit Fuel for that Fire which afterwards broke out upon the Popish Plot.

After the Peace was made, Sir William Temple, who had concluded the Triple Alliance, was thought the fittest to cultivate a good Understanding between the King and States. His Instructions were to assure the States of his Britannick Majesty's Friendship, and to offer his Mediation for a general Peace. And because the Prince of Orange was the King's Nephew, and besides by the A.D. 1674. many great Things he had performed, was become the great Wheel upon which the whole Alliance turned, Sir William was ordered to repair to his Highness, who was then in the Field, to acquaint him with the King's Intentions, and to desire him to second and forward the same.

This Step of the King's was received with great Coldness by the Confederates. The Spaniards in the Netherlands were of Opinion, that the King had made the Peace with Holland by Consent of France, with Intention to serve that Crown more effectually as a Mediator, than he could do as an Ally. And besides, the House of Austria seeing France abandoned by England, and attacked by so mighty a Confederacy as could hardly be brought together again, hoped by the War to reduce its great Rival to that State of Equality in which the Pyrenean Treaty left it. So that after Sir William Temple had been at the Hague, and set out to wait on the Prince of Orange, the Spanish Governor, in Concert with his Highness, found Means to prevent their Meeting.

This obliged him to return to the Hague, where he entered into Conference with the Pensionary, and laid open the Subject of his Commission. The Pensionary told him in Substance, that the States having now recovered all the Towns they had lost in the terrible French Invasion, except Grave which was then invested, and Maestricht which was to be given to the Spaniards, they were now in the same Condition as before the War; and for themselves, had nothing to wish but a Peace for the Sake of their Trade. But that Spain and Germany having entered into the War to save their Republick, the States could take no Measures but in Concert with them, who were not like to be so easie in their Expectations, or Demands.

This Answer put the Hopes of Peace on some great Action of the War, which was hourly looked for. And soon after came News of the Battel of Seneffe. But it proved not so decisive as was expected, for the Loss and Disadvantage on each Side was so nearly equal, that it was followed by no Consequences. And when, after the Damages received in that fierce Encounter were repaired, both Armies took the Field again, a Division that happened among the Confederates prevented any farther Action. Only the Prince of Orange towards the End of the Campaign besieged and took Grave, which was the last Town the French held in the Seven Provinces; and soon after came to the Hague.

Sir William Temple attended him there, and laid before him the King's Desires of making a general Peace, and of acting entirely in Concert with him in the Progress of the Treaty; concluding with a Request to know the Mind of his Highness thereupon. The Prince answered him with Expressions of Duty and Respect to the King; and as to the Peace, gave it as his Opinion, that the States could not with Honour make a Peace without A.D. 1674. without their Allies; that a general Peace could not be made without leaving Flanders in a Posture of defending itself against any sudden Invasion; and that Spain could go no lower than the Pyrenean Treaty. Sir William reply'd, that the King having been the Arbitrer and Guarend of the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, and not having seen the French beaten out of any Town yielded to them by that Treaty, could not handsomely propose Terms to France lower than those, unless it were upon some Equivalent. But the Prince answered resolutely, 'twere better going on with the War, till some Change happened that should make a Peace more necessary to one of the Parties, than it was at that Time.

The Campaign in Germany. In Germany little passed of Consequence. The French having cruelly ravaged the Electors Palatine's Countrey, provoked all the neighbouring Powers to assemble their Troops to make head against them; and their Superiority to the French gave them Hopes of great Successes. But by the Conduct of that great Commander, Mareschal Turenne, all the Efforts of the Confederates were eluded, so that the Campaign, when it ended, left all Things in the same Condition as before it began.

This Year proved very barren of Transactions at home: the Parliament being prorogued by the King with so much secret Resentment, that he would not suffer them to sit till fourteen Months after. Hence a Rumour arose that the King intended to dissolve the Parliament, which false Report it was thought fit to obviate by a Proclamation. And at last the Parliament actually met on the 13th of April, in the next Year 1675, after a long Interval of Inaction.

A.D. 1675. The Speeches of the King and Chancellor contained little more than the customary Assurances in relation to Religion and Liberties, and Exhortations to Unanimity and Confidence. The House of Commons voted their humble Thanks to the King for his gracious Promises; to which they received an obliging Answer.

Proceedings of the House of Commons. Little of Consequence passed in that House this Session. They addressed the King against the Duke of Lauderdale, and began to prepare Articles of Impeachment against the Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Danby. The first of these was frustrated by the King's Answer; in which he excused taking Notice of the Things laid to his Charge, as being committed before the Act of general Pardon. The Articles against the Earl of Danby were seven in number; but they found the Proofs so weak, that when the Articles came to be examined particularly by the House, they struck out first one, and then another, till at last they concluded, that there was not sufficient Ground for an Impeachment. The House afterwards addressed the King to recall his Subjects that were in the French Service; and to forbid any others from going thither. The King excused himself as to the former Part of this Address, but issued out his Proclamation in compliance with the last.

But the great Scene of Affairs lay in the A.D. 1675. House of Lords; which was taken up with a long and important Debate upon a Bill of the utmost Consequence brought into that House, entitled, An Act to prevent the Damagers that may arise from disaffected Persons. By this Bill all such as enjoyed any beneficial Office, Ecclesiastical, Civil or Military, with all Privy Counsellors and Members of Parliament, were to take the following Oath: That they declared it unlawful upon any Pretence to take Arms against the King; that they abhorred that traiterous Position of taking Arms by his Authority against his Person or those commissioned by him; and that they would not at any Time endeavour the Alteration of the Government in Church or State. The former Part of this Oath is the same with that imposed in the Corporation Act in 1662; the abjuring any Change of the Government being now added.

This Bill was warmly opposed; out of Pique and Spleen by the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Shaftsbury, and out of a Concern for the publick Safety by others of the Peers. When this Oath was first imposed, the Nation was in a Fury of Loyalty, so that it was no Wonder it passed so easily; but that hot Fit was now over, and Men began to consider Things more calmly. So that many true Patriots fell in with the discontented Party, thinking the Oath imposed by the Bill bore too hard upon the Liberties of a free Countrey. The first Reading of the Bill passed with little Opposition: But the second Reading produced one of the longest and most strenuous Debates that had ever been known, continuing sixteen or seventeen Days; during which the House sat often till nine at Night, and sometimes till Midnight.

On the Side of the Bill were urged those Arguments for the Oath. standing Topicks, of the Necessity of making a Distinction between the Friends and Enemies of the Government, and of keeping the latter out of all Places of Trust and Power, and of a seditious and turbulent Spirit reigning among the People, which ill Governors first raise, and then complain of. It was said, that in such Circumstances the Nation was not to be trusted with chusing its own Representatives, in case another Parliament should be called, without guarding by some new Precaution against an ill Choice. On the other side it was argued, that Oaths Arguments of this kind are perfectly insignificant and against it. useless; because as no Man would sleep with his Doors open, or omit the least Precautions for his own Security, though all the Town were sworn not to rob him, so no Government receives any Security from such Tests, because the Bulk of Mankind ever will break through them, and every one knows they will do so. Some few conscientious Persons indeed may suffer by them; but these of all others least deserve it. So that such Oaths only serve to multiply Perjuries, without doing the least Good. That as to the Position of the Unlawfulness of resisting the King in any Case whatever, they could

A.D. 1675. could not see if it were allowed, how it left any Distinction between a bounded Monarchy like ours, and the absolute Power of the King of France. That it was necessary that Princes should have not only the Fear of God, but of humane Resistance too before them; it being pretty clear from History, that the former of those Motives, singly applied, has not always its due Weight with crowned Heads. That it was a high Infringement of the Privileges of the Peerage, and a Violation of the Liberties of the People, to impose a Test that might shut out the former from the Place their Birth entitled them to, and the latter from their Right of a free Election of their own Representatives, for so slight Reasons. It was shewn also, that in some Cases it was not only possible, but the Subject's Duty to take up Arms by the King's Authority against his Person. As when Henry the Sixth was kept Prisoner in the Camp of Edward the Fourth, and gave Orders as they pleased, yet his true Friends took Part with his Son and Wife, and by opposing his Person in Battle, rescued him from his Enemies. And it was obvious to mention the several Instances of tyrannical Power that might be exerted, if this Privilege of being unresisted should be extended to the King's Commission as well as his Person. As to the Declaration against a Change of Government, this was also objected against, as imprudent and absurd. For none could foresee in the uncertain Flux and Change of humane Affairs, what might in future Times prove necessary; and besides since every new Law makes an Alteration in the Government, either little or great, the Meaning of the Declaration was so loose and uncertain, that it might be construed to hinder the enacting of any new Laws or the repeal of any old ones; which is an Absurdity in it self.

These were the Objections made to the Bill. But the Miseries of the Rebellion being yet fresh in Memory, and Mens Minds still heated with the high Notions of Loyalty that entered at the Restoration, these Reasons proved too weak for such strong Prejudices. So that the Bill was in a fair Way to have passed; when a sudden and unexpected Accident put a Stop to all farther Proceedings in it.

The Bill quashed by a Difference between the two Houses.

It happened at this critical Time, that one Dr. Shirley brought a Petition of Appeal from the Court of Chancery to the House of Lords, against Sir John Fagg, a Member of the House of Commons; who was in Consequence of that Petition served with an Order to attend the House of Peers. The Commons thought it an Infringement of their Privileges, that any Member of their House should be obliged to attend on the Lords; and flew into the Heats usual on such Occasions; and ordered Dr. Shirley to be taken into Custody of the Serjeant at Arms. The Lords on the other hand were as jealous of the Privileges claimed by them as supreme Court of Judicature; so that the Warrant to confine Dr. Shirley was by the A.D. 1675. Lord Mobun forcibly taken away from the Serjeant's Deputy. This fired the House of Commons, who sent to the Lords to demand Justice against that Peer. But the Lords sent back in Answer, that the Lord Mobun had done nothing but his Duty. The Commons sent a Message to desire, that there might be no farther Proceedings in that Cause before their Lordships; who returned them another, desiring to know whether the House of Commons owned the Warrant for taking Dr. Shirley into Custody. The Commons answered, that they would consider of it; and immediately resolved, that the Message last received from the Lords was an unparliamentary Message; and that whoever should appear at the Bar of the Lords House, to prosecute any Suit against any Member of theirs, should be deemed an Infringer of the Privileges of Parliament. Soon after they received this Resolution of the House of Peers, that it is the undoubted Right of the Lords in Judicature to receive and determine, in Time of Parliament, Appeals from inferior Courts, though Members of either House be concerned. The Commons on the other Side resolved, that it is an undoubted Right of their House, that none of its Members be summoned to attend the House of Lords during the Session and Privilege of Parliament; and that a Conference be desired with their Lordships thereupon. The Lords sent answer, that they consented to a Conference, provided nothing was offered against their Lordships Jurisdiction. Upon this the Commons voted, that this was not a Grant of a Conference as it was desired; and proceeded so far as to resolve, that there lies no Appeal to the Jurisdiction of the Lords from Courts of Equity. And further, they committed to Custody of the Serjeant at Arms, Serjeant Pemberton, Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Porter, Council in the Cause; and Sir John Fagg, for his Compliance with the Lords, was sent to the Tower.

This Attack of the Commons upon the Judicature of the House of Lords, which has ever been looked on by that House as the fairest Jewel that adorns the Peerage, dissipated in a Moment all Thoughts and Debates about the Test, and united the whole Body of the Lords in Defence of their common Concern. So they ordered the Black Rod to set at Liberty the Counsellors abovementioned; and prohibited the Lieutenant of the Tower, and all other Keepers of Prisons, to molest those Gentlemen upon this Account. On the other hand, when the Commons were informed of their Enlargement by Virtue of an Order from the Lords, they ordered them to be retaken into Custody of the Serjeant at Arms, and to be committed to the Tower.

These Disputes running very high, and The King more like to increase than to come to an Accommodation, brought the King to interpose between them. He was much set upon the Test;

A fierce Contest between the Lords and Commons.

A.D. 1675. Test; which was in a fair Way to have pass'd both Houses, had not this Accident happened. This made him do his utmost to compromise the Quarrel; and to this purpose he sent for both Houses to White-hall; where he advised them to admit of such free Conferences on both Sides, as might at length, either by the Force of Reason bring over one Side, or bring the Question to such a State that himself might be able to judge between them; in doing which he promised to be a fair and equal Arbitrer.

But in vain.

The Commons on their Return voted their Thanks to his Majesty for his gracious Speech to the Houses; but resolv'd at the same Time, that it did not appear to them that the Blame of the present Differences could lie upon any Member of their House. The Lords on their Part sent the Black Rod to the Tower, to demand the four Lawyers committed by the Commons; but the Lieutenant, Sir John Robinson, refused to deliver them. This the Lords violently resent'd, and address'd the King to remove him; to which the King return'd them an uncertain Answer. Soon after the Lieutenant was serv'd with four Writs of Habeas Corpus to bring those four Lawyers before the King and his Parliament at Westminster the next Morning. The Lieutenant was very much perplexed; and immediately advis'd with the House of Commons, who promis'd him Protection; and resolv'd, that no Commoner committed by that House for Breach of Privilege or Contempt, ought without Order from the Commons, to appear before the House of Peers, to answer, to do, or receive any Determination therefrom, during the Session of Parliament in which such Persons are committed.

Upon which the Parliament is prorogued.

But the King finding this Affair entangled with inextricable Difficulties, resolv'd to put an End to the Session and Dispute by a Prorogation. Accordingly he came to the House of Peers June 9, and acquainted the two Houses that he found no other Expedient for quieting the Differences between them, but a Prorogation; and that in hopes of meeting them again in a better Temper, he prorogued them till the 14th of October next.

It is uncertain whether this extraordinary Event, which defeated so important a Bill, happened by Contrivance or by Chance. Lord Shaftsbury said, it was laid by himself. But he was a Man of such extreme Vanity, that what he said of himself was not always to be credited. This is certain, that it was a very wise Strain if it was contriv'd, and a very happy Accident if it came in Course. For the high Principles of Loyalty were still so warm, that this slavish and unreasonable Test had probably pass'd both Houses, had not the Prosecution of it been stopp'd by this violent Conflict of Privilege and Jurisdiction.

The Prince of Orange was alarmed by a sudden Illness that seized the Prince of Orange, the Life and Soul of the Confederacy, which proved to be the Small-Pox, and put all the Affairs of Europe at a Stand while it lasted; the two contending Parties waiting with equal but contrary Hopes and Fears, till the Danger was past. As soon as the Prince was able he took the Field. But the Summer proved unactive in Flanders where he commanded. In Germany the Confederates had very great Success. The great Turenne was killed by a Cannon Shot; and not long after the French Army was entirely defeated. But for want of Conduct, or Fidelity, or both, these great Successes pass'd over without any Consequences. In this Campaign, Captain Churchill, afterwards the victorious Duke of Marlborough, began to learn the first Rudiments of War in the French Army.

The Confederates have great Success in Germany.

About the Time this Campaign was ended, the King met his Parliament again. He exhorted them to forget all former Differences, and recommended to them the Care of the Church of England. He then took notice, that he had been oblig'd to anticipate his Revenue; confessing at the same Time, that in the Management of it he had not been so frugal as he should have been, and was resolv'd to be.

The Parliament meets.

After a Week's sitting, the Commons took into Consideration the Supply desired by the King. This bred warm Debates. It was found, that the War with Holland had cost but 2040000 l. as appeared by the Accounts; whereas the Money given by Parliament by the Dutch at the End of the War, and that arising from the Customs, and from the Dutch Prizes, amounted to 3040000 l. so that a whole Million had been wasted or misapplied. No doubt if the Management of the Publick Treasure had not been exceedingly corrupt, the King would not have condescended to mention it in the manner he did. Upon the Debate it was urg'd on the Side of the Court, that though the Management was confessedly so ill as to be without Excuse, yet that it was the Part of wise Men to consider what was to be rightly done for the present, rather than to complain of what had been done wrong in Times past, which could not now be hindered. That either the Dignity of the Crown must be supported, or the Constitution of the State be dissolved. On the other Side it was said, that though the Revenue had suffer'd a shameful Diminution, the Loss was not too great to be recovered by a prudent and skilful Management. That if the Parliament should consent to pay Debts contracted by ill Husbandry, it would seem to authorize and approve them; and so make a Precedent for perpetual Demands of the same Kind. Upon the whole, they refus'd to grant a Supply to take off the Anticipations on the King's Revenue. But they gave 300000 l. for the building of twenty Ships. They also appropriated the Tonnage and Poundage to the Use of the Navy.

Their Proceedings.

While

A.D. 1675.
The Infolence of a Popish Priest.

While these Things were doing, the House was alarmed with a surprizing Piece of Infolence in a Popish Priest. One M. Luzancy, a Person of some Note, formerly a Papist, had embraced the Protestant Religion, and taking Orders, had publickly preached upon that Occasion. But to that Height of Boldness had some of the Romish Church arrived, that not long after, he was set upon in his Lodgings by one Monf. St. Germain, a Jesuit, and others, who by Threats of assassinating him, or carrying him by Force beyond Sea, compelled him to transcribe and sign a Recantation of what he had so preached. This Matter was laid before the Secretaries of State, from whom it came before the House of Commons; who were fired with Indignation at such an unexampled Affront to the Religion of our Country. The King soon after issued out his Proclamation, with Promises of Protection to Monf. Luzancy, and a Reward of 200*l.* for the apprehending of St. Germain.

The Dispute between the two Houses
revived.

The Parliament was so incensed by the Boldness of the Popish Party, that they grew the more tender towards Protestant Dissenters. So that upon a Motion made by the Duke of Buckingham, the House gave him Leave to bring in a Bill of Indulgence to those of the several Persuasions. But this and all other Proceedings were soon after stopt by the Revival of the Dispute between the Houses; Dr. Shirley having continued his Process against Sir John Fagg, and the Lords adhering to their first Hearing of his Appeal. This the Commons again voted a Breach of Privilege, and laid their Commands on Sir John Fagg not to attempt any Defence at the Bar of the House of Lords. They afterwards desired a Conference with the Lords; in which they only desired that House to put off all Proceedings in that Cause, till some Bills of great Concern were dispatched; after which they would give their Lordships such Reasons against those Proceedings, as they hoped would prove satisfactory. But whatever was the Cause, this calm and moderate Request was succeeded the very same Day by a warm and hasty Resolve, by which it was declared, that no Appeals from any Courts of Equity, ought to be prosecuted before the Lords against any Commoner of England, and those who did so should be deemed Betrayers of the Rights and Privileges of the Commons of England. This Resolution was ordered to be affixed to the Lobby, Westminster Hall Gate, and all the Inns of Court and Chancery.

This threw all into a Flame again; and the Lords presently voted, that the Paper posted up in several Places against the Judicature of the House of Peers, was illegal, unparliamentary, and tending to the Dissolution of the Government. Matters were at last carried so high, that the Lord Mobun proposed to address the King to dissolve the present Parliament, and call another. And this Proposal was so well seconded and received, that the Negative passed A.D. 1675: by two Voices only. At last the King, wearied with an endless Dispute, which he found no other way to silence, came to the House of Peers; and sending for the House of Commons, prorogued the Parliament till the next 15th of February Twelvemonth; which made a Prorogation of almost Fifteen Months.

The Parliament prorogued.

This long Prorogation made the Year 1676, which we are now entering upon, altogether unactive at Home. The King's Mediation had been accepted Abroad by all the contending Powers; France being well pleased to have a Mediator so partial to their Side, and the Confederates willing to oblige him by that Mark of Confidence. And the City of Nimeguen on the Frontiers of Germany, was appointed for the Place of Congress. But this Matter of Form being past, the Treaty, by reason of the various Dispositions of the several Powers, went on very heavily. The Germans hoped for great Successes in the Campaign; and the Spaniards were infatuated with an Expectation, that the King of England would at length be driven into the Alliance, by the Humour of his Parliament and People. So that these two Powers were very slow in making Steps towards any Treaty. On the other hand, the French were in the Height of Success; and desired no better Peace for themselves, than the present Situation of Things gave Room to demand; so that they readily concurred in every Thing that might forward a Congress. The Dutch too, having recovered all their Country, were willing to be freed from a War, which ruined their Trade and drained their Treasure, though they had now no Interests of their own to prosecute by it. But they dared not break with their Allies, while the French Power was yet hovering over their State. Sweden having suffered much by the War, was desirous of a Treaty; in which they hoped the Success of their French Allies might help to procure them those Advantages they could not hope for by the War. But Denmark and Brandenburg; encouraged by their Success against the Swedes; hoped to drive them out of Germany this Summer; and so were averse to all Thoughts of Peace.

The pacifick Powers were the first to send their Ministers to Nimeguen; the French hoping by that Forwardness to find an Opportunity of concluding a separate Treaty with some of those Powers, who they knew were impatient for the Peace; and the Dutch, that their Example might influence the other Allies. Sir William Temple and Sir Leoline Jenkins were Ambassadors from England. But though the Congress was now begun, it was plain from the different Views of the several Parties, that its Motions would be directed by the Events of the War.

The Campaign began in April, and was attended throughout with such great Successes on the French Part, as were naturally to

A.D. 1676.

A Treaty of Peace begun at Nimeguen.

The Campaign in Flanders;
be

A.D. 1676. be expected from the excellent Management on that Side; and the supine Neglect and Weakness of the Spaniards. The King of France at the Head of a brave Army, besieged Conde, and took it before any of the Confederates were in the Field. He afterwards sent the Duke of Orleans to besiege Bouchain. The Prince of Orange struggled with a thousand Difficulties to get his Army into the Field to relieve that Place. But the King of France posted himself so advantageously with the Strength of his Troops, that the Prince could neither relieve the Place, nor fight without Disadvantage. So that on the eighth Day of the Siege the Town was surrendered.

The Prince after this besieged Maestricht, and pressed the Siege so vigorously, that it was expected to be taken. But a Sickness falling into his Army, weakened it so much, that being also disappointed of the Forces the Germans had promised him, he was obliged to raise the Siege upon hearing that Mareschal Schomberg was coming to relieve the Town; which ended the Campaign. During this Siege the Prince of Orange was wounded by a Musket-shot in the Arm; but it happened luckily that the Wound was only in the Flesh, the Bone being safe; so that it was quickly healed.

And on the Rhine.

On the Rhine the Imperialists took the important Place of Philipsburgh, which was yielded for want of Provisions; and this was the Total of all the great Successes they expected on that Side.

The Confederates begin to fall asunder.

After this Campaign the State of the Alliance began to change, and the Union of the Confederacy to be weakened; as is generally the Case of such Leagues after they have continued a long Time. Spain had a weak Head, and was ruled by suitable Counsels; so that the whole Administration there was full of Disorder, Negligence and Remissness. And their Revenues were so ill managed or misapplied, that no Care was taken for the Payment of their own Troops in Flanders, or the Subsistence of those of their Allies. Thus the whole Burden of the War lay upon the Dutch, and the Trouble of it upon the Prince of Orange; who was forced to bear a thousand Mortifications through the ill Conduct of the Spaniards, which broke all his Measures. The German Princes had also failed in all they undertook to perform on the Side of the Rhine. So that the Dutch seeing their Money drained, and their State exhausted by a War, which the Behaviour of their Allies rendered perpetually unsuccessful, grew quite tired of it, and began to think of a separate Peace. This was a perilous Step to take; it being the same Thing as to give up Flanders to the French, since the Spaniards there were too weak to hold out long against the Power of France: And in that case the Republic of Holland must have become at once the Neighbour and Dependent of that potent Crown. But it was said, that by the ill Conduct of their Allies this must be the Consequence, if the War were continued; and that it was better to undergo that Inconvenience while their State had something left, than when it should be exhausted by a fruitless War.

However they resolved first to make one Effort on the Side of England. Every one believed that our King had it in his Power to make the Peace when and how he pleased; and that France would never stand the Shock of the English Force united with the Confederacy. They knew too, that the Preservation of Flanders was as necessary for us as for Holland; and that we were obliged to save it by all the Motives of Honour, Interest and Safety. The Prince and Pensionary therefore desired Sir William Temple to lay before the King the Necessities they were under; and the great Obligations they should have to him, if he would bring about a safe and honourable Peace; which they conceived to be in his Power to dictate when he pleased; France not being in a Condition to disobey him.

The Dutch desire the King to propose Articles of Peace.

These Representations from Holland to the King, though in themselves highly just and reasonable, and seconded by the Voice and Cry of the whole English Nation, were not forcible enough to break those Ties that engaged him to the French Interest. He returned them indeed an Answer with Terms of Peace; but they were found so evasive and unsatisfactory, that nothing was done upon them.

But to no purpose.

In the Campaign that soon followed, Things went on in the usual Way. France took care to provide for an early Campaign; while Spain neglected every Thing. So that about the End of February, the King of France blocked up Valenciennes, and took that Town and Cambray before any of the Allies could come to assist them. The Prince of Orange was active and vigilant; and upon the first Motions of the French made his utmost Efforts to meet them. He also pressed the Spaniards to have their Troops in Readiness to join with his; but nothing of that was done. The Conduct of that Crown grew worse and worse; and the more the Danger of Flanders increased, the less Care they took of it. For they went upon this Principle, that England being so much concerned in the Safety of Flanders, would not suffer the French to make themselves Masters of it. And they were so far in the right, that the true Interest of our Country directed us that Way; but they forgot that the Humours and Inclinations of Governours too often steer a quite contrary Course to the Safety and Interest of those they govern; as was too plainly the Case in England.

The Campaign in Flanders.

A.D. 1677.

The ill Conduct of the Spaniards.

The Consequence was, that the Prince of Orange was unable to come up with the French before Valenciennes and Cambray were taken. But he found them employed in the Siege of St. Omer, which they attacked in the next Place. This Siege the Prince resolved to raise at what Disadvantage soever; which brought on a Fight at Mont-Cassel. But the Dutch Army had the worst

in

A.D. 1677. in the Encounter, though by the Conduct of the Prince of Orange, their Retreat was made with little Loss. So that St. Omer was soon after taken.

The Campaign in Germany. On the Side of Germany the Campaign was as unsuccessful. For the French intending to make a great Push in Flanders this Summer, took Measures to secure themselves from being diverted in that Enterprize by the German Forces. Very early in the Year they broke into the Parts of Germany on the other Side of the Rhine, and ravaged the Countrey in a cruel manner, burning and spoiling in every Place. This established the Designs of France, and broke those of Germany; the Troops of the latter being deprived of Subsistence, by the universal Desolation made in those Countries which supplied them before. So that the Campaign on that Side was entirely unactive. But we shall now turn to our Affairs at Home.

Affairs at Home. The Prorogation of the Parliament for fifteen Months, gave a Handle of Complaint to the discontented Party. There

Some discontented Lords endeavour to prove the Parliament dissolved. was an ancient Statute yet unrepealed, by which it was enacted, That the King must hold a Parliament once a Year, or oftener if need be. This was laid hold on by the Earl of Shaftsbury and Duke of Buckingham, who were become Heads of that Party; and they pretended from thence to force a Dissolution of the Parliament. They argued, that the Houses could not sit but by virtue either of the King's Prorogation, or an Adjournment; that the latter was not pretended to; and therefore if they could sit at all, it must be by virtue of the former. But they said, that though a Prorogation was indeed made, yet that the same was illegal, and by consequence null and void; as being extended beyond the Term appointed by the Law. So that it was concluded upon the whole, that the Parliament must be dissolved, and another called; there being no legal Authority existing, by virtue of which the old one could meet again. But others of the same Party opposed this. They said that the Words if need be, were capable of being applied to the Words once a Year, as well as to the Word oftener. That this Meaning seemed to be confirmed by later Practice; the long Parliament in making the Triennial Act, having appointed the same only once in three Years. And besides, they insisted on the Imprudence of proposing such a Question, which must be determined by a Majority of both Houses; who could not be expected to dissolve themselves by their own Votes. But the others were too obstinate to be persuaded; and immediately after the Session was opened according to the Prorogation, the Duke of Buckingham took the first Opportunity to speak on that Subject in the House of Lords; insisting and enlarging upon the Argument abovementioned. He was seconded by the Earl of Shaftsbury, who was followed by the Earl of Salisbury and Lord Wharton. But when it came to be decided by a Question, those of their own Party who were against them, being joined with the Court Lords, carried it for the Prorogation. But when this Question was carried, another Debate arose, whether those Lords were not liable to Censure, for proposing a Question that might raise Doubts and Jealousies in the Minds of the King's Subjects, concerning the Legality of the Parliament. This was opposed by several Lords; who said, they apprehended such a Censure might prejudice the Freedom of Debate. That in a numerous publick Council, it was not to be expected that every Man in it should be so wise, as never to say a foolish Thing, or make any impertinent Motions; it was sufficient to check all such as soon as they were proposed. That it would make a bad Precedent; by which a Majority might upon any Occasion garble the House in what manner they pleased. But these Arguments did not prevail; and the four Lords were ordered to be committed to the Tower, during the Pleasure of his Majesty and the House. The Earl of Shaftsbury continued there above a Year; but the other three, upon their Submission, were sooner discharged.

These violent and rash Proceedings of the discontented were resented by the Commons; and put them into a more giving Temper than they had been. So they granted a new Tax of near 600000*l.* towards building thirty Ships of War. And because an additional Excise upon Beer and Ale, granted after the Triple Alliance, was to expire on the 24th of June this Year, they passed a Bill for continuing it three Years longer. But the News from Flanders soon turned their Eyes that Way. The Advantages there gained by the French, and the Feebleness of the Confederates, alarmed them with greater Fears than ever. They saw plainly, that without the Interposition of England, Flanders must be lost, or left in apparent Danger by a Peace. They laid this before the King, in an Address, requesting him to take Measures for the Preservation and Security of that Countrey. The King answered them, that he was of the same Opinion as they; that the Preservation of Flanders was of great Consequence; and that he would use all Means for the Safety of his Kingdoms.

This Address was succeeded by another March 30. to the same Purpose, in which they farther promised to assist him with Supplies, in Case the Steps made on his Part towards that great End should draw him into a War. This Address was probably not very acceptable, for they did not receive an Answer to it till twelve Days after. The Spanish Minister told some of the Commons, that the King said the Authors of it were a Company of Rogues, which made a great Noise in the House. But this might possibly be only an Artifice. The King's Answer was but general. He told the Commons, that having considered their Address, he must put them in Mind, that the only Way to prevent

Who are sent to the Tower.

The Proceedings of the Commons.

They address the King to protect Flanders.

The King gives them an uncertain Answer.

A.D. 1677. prevent Dangers to the Kingdom; was to enable the Crown to make such Preparations, that he might be able to take proper Measures with Safety.

The Temper of the House of Commons.

But now appeared again the fatal Consequences of those ill Counsels that had been followed during the Ministry of the Cabal. The King had at that Time broken his Word and Honour to that Degree, that no Confidence could be safely reposed in him. The Commons were willing to give whatever Supplies should be necessary for the Safety of Flanders; but they were afraid to trust the King with them. They remembered that in the Tenth Session of this Parliament, the King had received Supplies for maintaining the Triple Alliance, and had made Use of that very Money to break it. And this Breach of Faith was improved by peevish or factious Men, to increase the Backwardness of the House in that Affair. For as some were unwilling to give Money out of a reasonable Suspicion that it would not be applied to the Uses intended; so there were others who thwarted the Court out of Pique or Design, with very little real Concern for the publick Good; a Disposition of Mind that is to be met with sometimes among the Leaders in Popular Councils. And these had agreed among themselves to hinder and oppose the giving of Money during the Lord Treasurer's Ministry, whatever Occasions might call for it.

The King and Parliament mistrust each other.

From these Causes it came to pass that the Parliament was very sparing in the Grant of Supplies, though upon an Occasion acknowledged by themselves to be of the utmost Importance. So they drew up an Address in two Days after, in which they acquainted the King, that in the Bill for the additional Excise, they had provided a Security upon which he might borrow 200000 Pounds. And they farther promised, that if he would be pleased to call them after their intended Recess at Easter, they would not only reimburse his Majesty in such Sums as he should have laid out upon extraordinary Preparations in Pursuance of their Addresses, but also assist him with such farther Supplies, as should maintain whatever Alliances he might enter into. The King in two Days returned his Answer by a Message, that it was necessary for him to be sure of 600000 Pounds before he could enter upon any Measures to answer the Ends of those Addresses.

The Demand of this great Sum perplexed the House. They were unwilling to refuse the King, and as fearful of trusting him. At last they drew up an Address, in which they told him, that a great Number of their Members being gone to their Countries in Expectation of an Adjournment, they thought it would be unparliamentary to grant such a great Sum when so few Members were sitting. That therefore they desired his Majesty to suffer their House to adjourn for such a short Time, that before that 200000 Pounds were expended they might meet again; and that the King by Proclamation, would then command all the Members to be present at the Day of Meeting. By that Time; they said, they hoped his Majesty would be able so to order his Affairs, and fix his Alliances, that they might be imparted to the House; after which they promised him all the chearful Assistance he could wish. A.D. 1677.

This brought the King to the same Dilemma the Parliament was in just before. He was indeed, to a most inexcusable Degree, linked to the Interests of France; but as he was still more devoted to his own Ease, that Consideration seems to have inclined him at this Time to a War. What Part his own natural good Sense might have too in that Inclination, is hard to say. For none knew better what was fit to be done, had he but acted accordingly. But he saw on the other hand, that if he entered into the War without ample Provision before-hand, he must be left at the Mercy of the House of Commons, during the Continuance of it. And though he was too discerning not to see the Reasonableness of the Representations they made to him; yet he knew that the designing Men amongst them would make Use of the new Wants which a War must bring upon him, to distress his Ministers and Counsels. So he resolved to do nothing on his Part without a previous Grant of Supplies.

But there being ready the two Money-Bills abovementioned, he hastened to secure them; and on the Evening of the Day on which he received the Address, he went to the House of Peers, and passed them. After this was done, the Lord Chancellor acquainted the Houses, that the King gave them Leave to adjourn themselves till the 21st of May.

The Parliament adjourns.

When the Parliament met again on that Day, after a Recess of five Weeks, the Commons received a Message from the King, intimating that he expected they should enter into the Consideration of his last Message; he having summoned the Members according to their Request in their last Address, that the House might be full. That Message being read, a Debate began. The Country Party said they came thither in Expectation to hear that the King had formed Alliances, and taken Measures in Pursuance of their last Address, but to their great Surprise they heard nothing of all this. Instead of that a Demand was made for Money, without the least Account of the End it was to be employed to. That if any Treaties were in Agitation, but not yet ripe, they would adjourn themselves till such Time as they were fit to be imparted. But if nothing of this was done, they were not called to the Purpose they desired, and hoped to meet upon. To this the Court Party answered, that Alliances were Things of great Weight and Difficulty, and the Time was but short; and that even if they had been finished, it might not be convenient to publish them, till the King was in a Readiness and Posture to maintain them; which he could not be without receiving the 600000 Pounds according to his Message. This brought Meets again.

The same Jealousies remain.

A.D. 1677. brought the Question to a Pinch; but the Country Party evaded it by adjourning the House for two Days.

The Reason of this Delay of the House was too plain not to be perceived by the King. He therefore sent to them upon their first Meeting after their Adjournment to attend him at Whitehall; where he took Notice of the apparent Distrust they had of him, and assured them upon the Word of a King, that they should not repent the Confidence they should repose in him. That the Supplies he asked were absolutely necessary to enable him to speak or act with Safety; and farther, that he had not lost one Day since their last Meeting, in doing what he could for their Defence.

The Commons upon their Return entered into a serious Debate upon this Speech, in which the former Topicks were insisted on by the two Parties. The Court Party argued on the Necessity of giving Money before any Alliances were made; and the other Side continued as obstinate to give none till afterwards. This last got the better; and an Address was at last agreed to, in which the Commons excused themselves from granting the Supplies his Majesty desired, by alledging that it was unprecedented so to do, till the Alliances they were to support were signified in Parliament. Then they besought him to conclude a League Offensive and Defensive with the States General; and make such Leagues with other of the Confederates, as he should think proper for that End. They then assured him he would always find, after such Alliances were signified in Parliament, such cheerful Supplies and Assistance, as his Occasions and Honour should require.

This Address was presented to the King on the 26th of May. But he resented it so highly, that two Days after he sent for the House to attend him at Whitehall, and told them, that they had in their Address intrenched upon the Royal Prerogative of making Peace and War, in such Manner as never was done before, when the Sword was not drawn. That not content with directing him to make Leagues, they must assign what kind of Leagues he must make. That if he suffered his Prerogative to be thus invaded, his Title of King would be looked on by Foreign Princes as an empty Sound. That he hoped so well of them, that he would believe those ill Consequences were not intended by them; and that he should yet go on to do all in his Power for the Security and Satisfaction of his People. He then let them know his Pleasure, that the House should be adjourned till June 16. He told them he would give them Notice by his Proclamation when they should sit again; but added, that would hardly be till the Winter, unless some extraordinary Occasion called.

The Campaign in Flanders was not yet quite ended. The Prince of Orange had a Design upon Charleroy, and sat down before it. But the French with great Expedition assembled an Army for the Relief of that Town, and obliged him to raise the Siege; which ended the Campaign. The Prince having found himself disappointed in all his Measures the three last Years, by the Weakness and ill Conduct of his Allies, saw plainly that the End proposed by the Confederacy would never be compassed without the Assistance of England; and though the Partiality of the King to the Side of France, gave him but little Encouragement to make such a Step, he resolved, if the King would permit him, to come in Person into England, to make his last Efforts to induce his Majesty to interpose on their Behalf in the Terms of Peace. He had also another Design in this Voyage, which was to make Suit to the Lady Mary, eldest Daughter to the Duke of York; concerning which he had written to the King above a Year before, and received a favourable Answer. He had sent to the King in the Summer to desire his Permission to come over, and had received the same. So in September, about the End of that Month, he set out for England.

After his landing at Harwich, he went Post to Newmarket, where the Court then was; and was very kindly received by the King, and the Duke. After the first Days Civilities were over, they both invited him often into Discourses of Business. But they found he so studiously avoided it, that the King ordered Sir William Temple to find out the Reason of it. The Prince said he was resolved to see the young Princess before he entered into a Treaty about his Match with her; and also to finish that Affair, before he began to speak about the Peace. And the King was so obliging, as for his Sake, to leave Newmarket some Days sooner than he intended.

The Prince upon his Arrival in Town, having seen the Princess, was so taken with her, that he immediately made his Suit to the King and the Duke, which was very well received; and assented to with this Condition, that the Terms of a Peace should be first agreed on between them. The Prince excused himself, and said, he must end his first Business before he began the other. The King and Duke were both positive in their Opinion, and the Prince resolute in his; who at last said, that his Allies, who were like to have hard Terms of the Peace as Things then stood, would be apt to believe he had made this Match at their Cost; and for his Part, he would never sell his Honour for a Wife. But this prevailed not, and the King continued so positive for three or four Days, that the Lord Danby and Sir William Temple, who were the only Persons acquainted with this important Deliberation, were doubtful that the whole Business would break off upon this Punctilio. But at length the Fortune of England prevailed. Sir William Temple chanced to go about this Time to the Prince after Supper, and found him in a very ill Humour. He told Sir William, he repented he had come into England, and resolved to stay but two Days longer, and then

The Misunderstandings increase, and the Commons present an improper Address to the King.

The King answers the Commons angrily.

The Parliament adjourned.

The Prince of Orange weary of the War.

He comes to England.

Makes his Suit for the Lady Mary.

The Match near breaking off.

A.D. 1677. then be gone, if the King continued in the Mind of treating the Peace before he was married; but that before he went, the King must chuse how they should live hereafter; for he was sure it must be either as the greatest Friends, or as the greatest Enemies. This he desired Sir William Temple to tell the King the next Morning. He did so; and with the Earnestness of a Man who had the Affair at Heart, laid before the King the ill Consequences that would attend a Breach between them, when our late Measures with France had raised such an universal ill Humour. The King heard him attentively; and when he had done speaking, said, Well, I was never yet deceived in judging of a Man's Honesty by his Looks; and if I am not deceived in the Prince's Face, he is the honestest Man in the World, and I will trust him, and he shall have his Wife; and you shall go immediately, and tell my Brother so, and that 'tis a Thing I am resolved on. The Duke was surprized at first; but soon recovered himself and said, the King shall be obeyed. From him Sir William Temple went to the Prince, who received the News with that Mixture of Surprise and Joy that attends unexpected good Fortune.

But is at length concluded.

The News of it received with universal Joy.

The Match was declared at the Committee that Evening, and the next Morning to all the Privy-Council summoned on Purpose; who went that Afternoon in a Body to compliment and congratulate the Lady first, and then the Prince. From the Court the News flew into the City, and was received there and throughout the Nation with the utmost Joy. For many anxious Fears and Cares had long disquieted all true Englishmen on Account of that Princess and her Sister, which this Match put an end to. For there appearing little Probability that the Duke of York should have any Children (at least any long-lived) by his new Duchesse, and still less that the King should have any by the Queen, the Lady Mary and Lady Anne were now regarded as the rising Hopes of England. Hence, when the Duke's Religion came to be suspected, every Mind was filled with Sollicitude for the Fortune of those young Princesses, whose Sex made them subject to the Disposal of their Father, and by Consequence to Popish Alliances; which all considering Men trembled at the Thoughts of. And thus, those Ladies became insensibly the Darlings of the English Nation; every Man being accustomed to look upon them with a Mixture of Tenderness and Anxiety; as seeing the Dangers their Sex exposed them to, and our Country's Fate involved in theirs. But now the King having bestowed the eldest of them on so renowned a Prince, who was besides, the Head of the Protestant Interest abroad, those Apprehensions were dissipated; and the Nation broke out into such Raptures of Joy, as naturally attend a Deliverance from a long and perplexing Disquiet, and Sollicitude.

The News of this intended Match was received with the same Pleasure in Holland, when the Prince of Orange sent over to the States for their Approbation. The Celebration of the Marriage was delayed till this was received; but the same Day it came, being Nov. 4. the Prince's Birth-day, the Marriage was solemnized at St. James's about Eleven o'Clock that Night, by the Bishop of London, Dr. Henry Compton. The King gave the Bride, the Duke and Duchesse of York, and some of the principal Nobility being present. This renewed through the City and through England, the Rejoicings that had been made before upon the same auspicious Occasion.

Soon after the Marriage was consummated, the King and Prince fell to deliberate upon the Terms of the Peace. They agreed at last, that the Peace should be made upon these Terms: All to be restored to the Emperor and Empire that had been taken during the War; the Duchy of Lorraine to that Duke; all on both Sides between France and Holland; and to Spain, the Towns of Aeth, Charleroy, Oudenarde, Courtray, Tournay, Conde, Valenciennes, St. Ghislain, and Binch. That the Prince should endeavour to get the Consent of Spain, and the King that of France; who to that End should send some Person immediately over with the Proposition, and demand a positive Answer in two Days; and that Time expired, immediately come back. The Lord Duras was sent, but the Prince could not attend his Return, being called to Holland by his Affairs there. So he embarked a few Days after with the Princess for his own Country; the King at parting assuring him he would not swerve from the least Point of the Scheme sent over, but would declare War against France if they refused it.

The King and Prince agree upon the Terms of the Peace.

The Prince embarks for Holland.

The Court of France was no doubt very much puzzled with this unequal Conduct of the King. But by the Force of good Management they warded off the Blow. They answered Lord Duras very civilly, that the King was always Master of the Peace; that some of the Towns in Flanders, especially Tournay, upon whose Fortifications vast Treasures had been expended, were very hard to part with; and that they would take some short Time to consider of the Answer. Lord Duras told them, he was tied to two Days Stay: But they found means to get him to stay some Days longer; and to come back at last with the same evasive Answer they gave him at first. That the Most Christian King hoped his Brother would not break with him for one or two Towns; but even upon them too he would send Orders to his Ambassador at London to treat with his Majesty himself. Thus by drawing the Affair into Treaty without any positive Refusal, this Blow came to be eluded. And the Prince being gone, who was the Life and Vigour of the Resolution, the Treaty began to draw out into Messages and Returns from France.

The Court of France ward off the Blow.

The King seems to have been now much inclined to satisfy his People by those Steps he knew would be agreeable to them. He anti-

A.D. 1677. anticipated by Proclamation the Sitting of the Parliament, which had been prorogued till the Spring, and appointed the same to meet on the 15th of January. About the End of December he also told Sir William Temple, that he could get no positive Answer from France; and therefore had resolved to send him into Holland, to make a League with the States, in order to force both France and Spain to a Peace upon the Terms he had proposed. Sir William Temple was not satisfied with the Project, and declined it; but the King being set upon it, Mr. Hyde (afterwards Earl of Rochester) then at Nimeguen, had Orders sent him to conclude the Treaty, which he did accordingly; and the Treaty was signed on the 16th of January.

The King calls the Parliament.

And makes a League with the States.

A.D. 1678. The Parliament met the 15th of the same Month; but the Treaty abovementioned not being then ready, the King sent to them to adjourn till the 28th. The King having by that Time Notice of the Conclusion of that Treaty, communicated the same to them in his Speech; laying before them the Necessity there was of standing by him with full Confidence, in order to reap the Fruits of that Negotiation. He told them, that no fewer than ninety Ships of War, and an Army of thirty or forty thousand Land-Men were requisite to support that Treaty. He then took Notice of other great Supplies he stood in need of; and afterwards mentioned the Security he had given of his good Inclinations, by marrying his Niece to the Prince of Orange; concluding with a Motion for a plentiful Supply.

But their ill Humour continues.

But this Speech was not so well received in the House of Commons as was expected, and as it deserved. This was partly owing indeed to the notorious Breaches of Faith he had formerly been guilty of, and to the Partiality he had shewn till now to the Side of France; which made Men suspect, that so sudden a Change was not to be depended on. But much is to be attributed to the Envy and Hatred of private Persons to the favourite Minister at that Time, the Lord Treasurer, who was supposed to aim at Popularity, or at least Security, by putting the King on these Measures. And those Gentlemen, thinking less of the Publick Good than their own private Humours, opposed all Things that came from him. And instead of taking the present Opportunity to carry the Point they had laboured so long, they strove to keep up the former Distrust and Dissensions, when they seemed in a fair Way to be removed.

They were but too successful in their Endeavours. For after the Commons had taken into Consideration the King's Speech, they agreed upon an Address, in which they just thanked him in very cold and slight Expressions for his Care of the Protestant Religion, in marrying his Niece to the Prince of Orange; which was all the Notice they took of his Speech. They then went on to desire him to admit of no Treaty of Peace, unless France were reduced to the Terms of the Pyrenees; and to provide that none of the Alliance should depart from the Confederacy till France were so reduced; that himself and the Confederates should forbid all Trade with France; and that no Ship or Vessel be suffered to come out of any Port of that Kingdom, but that the Ships and Men be seized, and the Goods destroyed: And that in making such Confederacies his Majesty should never doubt of the Affections of his People. They then assured him in general, that when such Alliances were imparted to the Parliament, they would give him all the Assurances he could desire. This Address was presented on Jan. 31.

The King was provoked to see by this Address, that the nearer he came to them, the farther they went from him. So in four Days after he sent them an Answer in Writing, in which he told them that he was not a little surprized to find in their Address so much of what should not be, and so little of what should. That in their Address of May 26. they invited him to a League offensive and defensive with Holland for the Preservation of Flanders; promising him speedy Assistance upon the Declaration of such Alliances. But now this Alliance was declared, they forget that Promise and offer him new Conditions, upon which he shall be supplied. That he told them of their Invasion of his Prerogative in that Address, but they only second it with new ones. That they desire him to oblige his Confederates never to consent to a Peace till France were reduced to the State of the Pyrenean Treaty; a Determination fit only for God Almighty, since none can tell the Terms of Peace, but he who knows the Events of War. That however, if they would assist him, he would never be weary till Christendom were put into such a Condition, that it should not be in the Power of any single Prince to disturb it. That if they would encourage him to go farther in Alliances, they must think of speedy Supplies; for from the Consideration of those he must take his Measures.

Shortly after they resolved upon a Supply, but with some strict Limitations. They also took away all written Protections granted by their Members, which grew to be an intolerable Grievance, by the vast Numbers of them sold by needy Persons of the House; and they ordered that Protection should extend to menial Servants only, actually in Service, and without any written Certificate.

At this Time the Earl of Shaftsbury was discharged from his Confinement in the Tower. He had several Times petitioned for his Release, but it was constantly refused, unless he would make a formal Recantation, which his proud Spirit would not stoop to. At last he had Recourse to the Court of King's Bench, and was brought thither by a Habeas Corpus on the 27th of January; himself as well as his Council pleading very notably for his Enlargement. But it was agreed by the Court, that they could not help him; so that he was remanded to Prison. This made him worse than he was before.

The King resents their Behaviour.

The Earl of Shaftsbury discharged.

A.D. 1678. fore. For as this Motion in Westminster-hall was a direct Opposition to the Authority of the House of Lords, it obliged him to a double Submission. However he chose to undergo that Mortification rather than continue a Prisoner. So being brought to the Bar of the House to answer for that Contempt, he offered to acknowledge both his former and last Offence. This was accordingly done by him at the Bar of the House upon his Knees, in a Form read to him by the Lord Chancellor, which he was obliged also to subscribe. Then by the Intercession of the House with the King, he was set at Liberty.

The French King takes Ghent.

About this Time the King of France made a sudden Step, which filled the City and Parliament with new Alarms. For having amused the Confederates by an intricate Scheme of Marches and Countermarches, on a sudden he crossed the Countrey, and sat down before Ghent; and soon after made himself Master both of that great City and of Ypres. This brought the Town of Ostend into so much Danger, that the King sent over some Forces under the Duke of Monmouth to secure that Port.

The Parliament adjourned.

Meets again.

But in the same Temper as before.

The Commons went on with the Poll-Bill for raising of Money; and March the 14th agreed to address the King to proclaim War against France. This Address was sent up to the Lords for their Concurrence; but never presented. For the Money-Bill being pass'd, the King came to secure it on the 20th, and adjourned the Parliament for three Weeks, till April 11. and then for a Fortnight longer, till April the 29th.

On that Day the Lord Chancellor told them, that the King was informed that the Dutch were negotiating a Treaty with France without his Consent or Privy; and desired the Advice of the two Houses what he should do thereupon. Five Days after, the Commons voted to advise the King to join with the Confederates, and enter into the War against France. They afterwards voted, that the late Leagues made with the States General, were not pursuant to their Addresses, nor consistent with the Kingdom's Safety. The King was disobliged at these Votes, and let them know it by a Message sent two Days after; but added, he should take no farther Notice of what was done by that single House, because the Advice he desired was to come from both the Houses.

But the ill Humours in the House of Commons grew worse and worse; and they seemed more inclined to pick a Quarrel with him, than to assist him. And five Days after this Message they presented him an Address, in which they thanked him for demanding their Advice, which they had given him, and desired to know his Resolutions thereupon. That they conceived the present Inconveniences might have been prevented, if his Majesty had accepted of their Advice in the Addresses of May 26. and January 31. That therefore they requested that he would be pleased to remove those Counsellors, that advised him to answer those Addresses in the manner he did; and that he would remove the Duke of Lauderdale from his Presence and Council. The King was provoked at this to the last Degree; and immediately returned them Answer, that he was much surprized at the Extravagancy of their Address, and unwilling at present to give them such an Answer as it deserved. And soon after he came to the House of Peers, and prorogued the Parliament for ten Days.

The Parliament prorogued.

During this last Session, and since the passing the Poll-Bill, which was no more than six Weeks Time, the King had prepared a Navy of Ninety Men of War, and raised an Army of Thirty thousand Men, the most compleat, and in all Appearance the bravest Troops, that could any where be seen. All Europe stood amazed at this Example of the Power and Greatness of England; and all the Foreign Ministers here confess'd, that no other King in Christendom could have made and compleated such a Levy in so short a Time.

A remarkable Instance of the Power of England.

But the Measures of Holland cooled the Ardour with which the War against France seemed to proceed. The French had found Means to instil into many leading Men of that State, Jealousies of the Prince of Orange; making them believe, that in his Journey to England he had been brought over by the King and Duke of York into their Opinions; and that his Marriage with the Lady Mary, was the Sanction of some secret Measures concerted between them. These Insinuations found too easy Belief; the great Power of the Princes of Orange being ever looked on there with a suspicious Eye; for which the Attempts of some of those Princes had given but too much Reason. When his Interest was thus weakened, it was easy to turn the Inclinations there violently towards a Peace, the Necessity of it being apparent, and the Prince, who was the great Obstacle, unable to hinder it. So that the King had Word sent him from thence continually, of the strong Dispositions there towards a Peace. And besides, the French fearing the King of England's declaring the War, might overturn at once all they had been doing in Holland, endeavoured to shake his Resolutions, by offering a great Sum of Money for his Consent to the Peace concerted between them. This was at first refused; but the ill Humours of the House of Commons increasing at such a rate, that the King found he could not trust them, this Offer began to have its Effect. He saw he had lost his Time of entering into the War; and therefore said, since he found the Dutch would have a Peace upon the French Terms, and France offered Money for his Consent, he did not see why he might not take the Money. He ordered Sir William Temple to treat with the French Ambassador about it; but he thinking the Affair dishonourable, resolutely declined it.

The Dutch become jealous of the Prince of Orange.

The King lays aside his Thoughts of War.

The Parliament met again on the 23<sup>d</sup>. But

The Parliament meets.

A.D. 1678. But throughout this Session little was done to the Honour or Advantage of our Country. The fencing that had passed between the King and his Parliament had produced a mutual Diffidence; a State of Things in which a Foreign War is not very desirable. And the Steps made in Holland towards a Peace, had superseded and rendered fruitless all the King's great Preparations for entering into that War. So that the King and Parliament were only employed in that ridiculous and unprofitable Work, of undoing all that had been done in the foregoing Session.

The King in his Speech told the Parliament, that he was resolved, as far as he was able, to save Flanders either by a War or by a Peace. That in either Case he thought it would be necessary to keep up the Army and Navy for some Time; but that he left it to them to consider of Supplies either for their Continuance or Disbanding; and concluded with a Motion for some other Supplies.

Their Proceedings.

The House of Commons upon considering the Speech, resolved, that if his Majesty would enter into the War against the French King, that House would support him; otherwise they would consider of providing to disband the Army. This Vote being presented to the King, he returned them Answer, that the French King had proposed a Cessation which he believed would end in a general Peace; but since that was not certain, he thought it would be most advisable to keep up the Army and Fleet till that Time. But the Commons either were, or pretended to be, afraid of the keeping up the Army; and therefore voted, that all Forces raised since September 29. last, be forthwith paid off and disbanded.

June 4. They voted 200000*l.* for disbanding the Army by the End of that Month. Next Day they voted 200000*l.* more for the Fleet. Soon after they received a Message from the King, in which he told them he was of the same Mind as before when he made his Speech, that the Army and Fleet should be kept up till the Peace were concluded: and left it to them whether it would not be dishonourable to recal his Forces in Flanders so soon from those Places he had taken under his Protection. Upon this the Term for disbanding those Forces was prolonged to July 27. But on June 15. they resolved, that after the Tuesday following, no Motions should be made for Supplies till after the next Recess.

On that Tuesday the King sent for them to the House of Peers, and told them that the Peace was near Conclusion, at least with Spain and Holland. That Spain had written to him, that they were not in a Condition to support Flanders long, unless England would bear the Charge of maintaining it, even after the Peace; and that to that End it was necessary to keep up the Navy at Sea. That besides, if they would either consult the Honour of the Crown, or his Quiet, it was necessary to add to his Revenue a Fund of 300000*l.* per Annum. In the last Place he desired them to enable him to pay his Niece's Portion which was now become due, and demanded.

But this made no Impression on them. They thanked the King indeed for his gracious Expressions; but absolutely denied the additional Revenue. And when the Lords had added a Clause to the Bill for Disbanding the Army, enlarging the Term for a Month, they refused to agree to it. So that the King, growing more and more uneasy with them, resolved to prorogue the Parliament; which he did July 15. passing at the same Time one Act for a Supply of 600000*l.* They were prorogued till August 1. but were not suffered to sit till October 21.

The Peace was soon after signed at Nimeguen between the French and the Dutch; these latter finding that no Dependence could be had on England, from the irregular Conduct of the Parliament, and the Uncertainty and Fluctuation of the King's own Councils. And in about five or six Months, the other Allies were obliged, by the Desertion of the Dutch, to come one by one into the same Measures. And thus the Peace of Europe, after having been a second Time broken by the French Ambition, was again restored, though upon a sandy and tottering Foundation. For the Acquisitions made by France in the War were so great, by their Conquests in Flanders, and by the Seizure of Lorraine, and the Franche-Comté towards Germany, that the Netherlands on one Side, and the Empire on the other were left exposed and open to the first Attack; so that it could not be expected this Peace should be lasting, when fair and defenceless Countries tempted the greedy Eyes of an ambitious Neighbour. And it accordingly happened so about ten Years after.

The Peace of Nimeguen concluded.

The dangerous State in which it left Europe.

Just at the same Time the Peace between the French and Dutch was signed, the famous Popish Plot first broke out. And here begins another and the last Period of this Reign; the Consequences of this Plot continuing to the King's Death; and introducing a total Change in the Face of Affairs. For as this Plot was universally believed, it inflamed to the utmost Fury the Jealousies and Discontents the Nation was already in about the Dangers of Popery, and kindled such Alarms and Fears about our Security at home, as left us no Leisure to attend the Affairs abroad; with which we had very little Communication from this Time till the Revolution. And this Temper was made use of by Shaftsbury and other wicked Politicians to carry on their secret Designs; and they found the Way by Means of it to give the King so much Uneasiness, as obliged him, almost in his own Defence, to stop the Torrent of popular Licence by such Arts and Counter-mines, as indeed suppressed those factious Cabals, but were near destroying the Liberties of England too. We shall now go on with the particular Narration of the Circumstances attending these extraordinary Events.

The Popish Plot breaks out.

A.D. 1678. On the 13th of August of this remarkable Year, as the King was walking in the Park, as it was his Custom to do every Morning for three or four Hours, he was addressed to by one Kirkby, a Person known to him, as being an Operator in a Chymical Laboratory which the King maintained for his private Amusement. For he delighted much in natural Knowledge, and was well versed in it. This Man acquainted the King that his Enemies had a Mind to take away his Life; and that for ought he knew he might be in Danger, in that very Walk. The King rather surprized than afraid, asked him, how that could be? The other replied that he might be shot at, but added, that he must be private to give a particular Account. The King was so little concerned at the Information, that he resolved to continue his Walk as before; and only ordered him to wait his Return out of the Park. The King took him aside when he came back, and asked him what he knew? He answered there were two Men, called Honest William and Pickering, who were to shoot him; and that Sir George Wakeman, Physician to the Queen, was hired to poison him. That he heard this from a Friend, who was ready to appear and give a fuller Account. The King ordered him to bring him at eight that Evening; when Kirkby came, and with him one Dr. Tongue, a City Divine. This last presented to the King Papers containing forty three Articles relating to a Plot of the Papists and Jesuits to kill the King and restore Papery in these Kingdoms. The King looked over the Papers; but told them that he was to go to Windsor the next Day; and therefore ordered them to go next Morning to the Lord Treasurer; with whom he said he would leave the Papers.

When they came, the Lord Treasurer desired Kirkby to withdraw; and then Dr. Tongue told him he found the Originals of those Papers thrust under his Chamber-door, but did not know by whom; but that he guessed it was a Person he had some Time before had Discourse with in Relation to such Matters. Being then asked if he knew where to find that Person? He answered he believed it would not be long before he saw him again. Three or four Days after the Dr. brought more Papers to the Earl, telling him he had found the Man; who had given him other Informations, but desired not to be known for fear the Papists should murder him. The Earl asked if he knew those two Men mentioned in the Papers who were to kill the King; and where they lived? He said they used to walk frequently in St. James's Park; and if he had one sent with him, he should be able to shew that Person one or both of them in a little Time. That he did not know where they lived, but he would inform himself as soon as he could, and acquaint his Lordship very speedily.

The Lord Treasurer gave Ear to the Information; and went to Windsor to the King; and acquainted him with what had passed, and that he had left a Servant in London to get a Sight of the Men there said to be appointed to kill the King. He desired also that one of the Secretaries of State might send a Warrant for apprehending them; and that some more of the Council might be acquainted with it. But the King was more discerning than his Minister; as in Truth his natural Talents were admirable, had he made right Use of them. He knew how the Nation would be inflamed by such a Story; and foresaw the Consequences that afterwards appeared. So that he absolutely refused to have the Men apprehended, or the Matter known, till a farther Enquiry should manifest either the Truth or the Falshood of these Advices. The Earl went to his Seat at Wimbleton not far from Windsor; but being warm upon the Scent of this Discovery he left Orders that if Dr. Tongue had any thing to say of that Matter he should come to him; or send the Servant the Earl had left with him. This Person went to and fro for some time every Day from London to Wimbleton; bringing new Informations to the Earl, and at last an Account of the Lodgings of those two Men who were to kill the King. He brought Word also that the Doctor would be able to give notice beforehand, when the Assassines were to go to Windsor. Of all these Things the Earl gave the King an Account from Time to Time.

At last, Tongue went to Wimbleton himself one Night, and told the Earl, that some of those Assassines were to go to Windsor next Morning; but that he could so order it that the Earl's Servant might go with them in the Coach; or if that was full, on Horseback in their Company, and watch them so as to give notice of their Arrival; that they might be taken upon the Place; and discovered for want of giving a good Account of their Business there. This was so very particular, that it seemed convincing. The Earl went immediately to Windsor; acquainted the King with it, and gave Orders for seizing those Men upon their Arrival. But all this Expectation was cooled by a new Account from Tongue, that something had prevented their going that Day; but that they would set out again in a Day or two Days at farthest. But when this Time came, News was brought again that one of their Horses was slipt in the Shoulder, which had prevented them a second Time. These Evasions one after another gave reasonable Cause of Suspicion; and the King was more and more convinced that the whole was a Fiction and Contrivance. But the Earl knowing that he stood very ill with the House of Commons, thought he should ingratiate himself there by shewing his Diligence in the Discovery of a Papist Plot; whether it proved a true or false one; so that he still urged to have this Business communicated to others. But the King positively refused it, saying, he should alarm all England, and put Thoughts of killing him into People's Heads, that did not think of it before.

Thus the Matter rested for some Time. But

The Manner of its being discovered.

One Kirkby first acquaints the King with it.

After him Dr. Tongue.

Tongue informs the Lord Treasurer of it.

Who gives Ear to his Story.

A.D. 1678.

But the King does not believe it.

Farther Discoveries.

A.D. 1678. But in a little while the Earl was again sent to by Dr. Tongue, with an Account of a Pacquet of Letters, to be left at the Post-House at Windsor and directed to one Mr. Bedingfield a Priest. The Earl was then in Oxfordshire; so that this Letter came late to him. Upon the Receipt of it he made haste to Windsor, and acquainted the King with the Contents. But he found the King had heard of it already. For Bedingfield to whom that Pacquet was sent, finding the Letters to be of a dangerous Nature, desired to wash his Hands of them, and carried them immediately to the Duke of York, to whom he was Confessor, protesting that he did not know from whom they came, nor what they meant; and that he was sure they were not the Hand-Writing of those whose Names were subscribed to the Letters. These Letters had such evident Marks of Forgery, as confirmed the King in his Disbelief of the whole Information given by Tongue; it being reasonable to suppose those Letters came from him, or his Associates, in Hopes that being found in the Custody of a Popish Priest, they would corroborate his Intelligence. So that the King still persisted to refuse the Earl his Leave to produce those Papers, which he was so earnestly set upon doing. The Duke of York on the other hand, feared some Imputation might be laid upon himself, if those Papers, directed to his Confessor, should be stifled. This made him desirous to clear himself by laying them before the Privy Council; and the Earl joining with him, they prevailed upon the King at last.

Which occasions the Story to be made publick.

Titus Oates now first appears.

His Information.

It was then a Secret no longer; and from the Council the News flew into the City and Countrey. Every one was immediately busy in telling or hearing of strange Reports, which the Inventions of some, or the Mistakes of others had produced out of the real Truth. And these Rumours falling in with the Jealousies and Apprehensions Men were under before, met with an easie Belief. Soon after Kirkby and Tongue were ordered to appear before the Privy Council, and deposed to what they had heard, or pretended to have heard; and Tongue named for his Informer one Titus Oates, a Person who had been dignified with holy Orders, though very unworthy of that sacred Function. He was sent for to the Council, and there swore to the Truth of the Papers delivered by Tongue, with a great many other Matters not therein contained. These Depositions were so well received, that the Council ordered him and Doctor Tongue Lodgings in White-hall, the King's own Palace, with Guards for their Security, and a plentiful weekly Salary for their Subsistence.

The Sum of what he then swore was, That he had been privy to many Consultations and Discourses of the Jesuits about killing the King. That at one Time they designed to shoot him, which was to be done by two Men, whose Names were Grove and Pickering, the one a Priest, the other a Lay Brother. That afterwards it was thought better to do it by poisoning; and this was to be done by Sir George Wakeman, a Papist, and A.D. 1678. Physician to the Queen. He said also that many Jesuits had disguised themselves, and gone into Scotland among the Field Conventiclers, to distract the Government there. That he himself was sent first to St. Omers, then to Paris, and afterwards into Spain, to negotiate this Design. That upon his Return with many Letters and Directions from beyond Sea, to the Jesuits here in England, there was a great Consult held by them in different Rooms, in a Tavern behind St. Clement's Church, in which he was employed to carry the Resolutions from Room to Room, and so to hand them round. That at that Time a fixed Resolution was taken to kill the King, in one or other of the Ways abovementioned. That while he was going on, waiting for some certain Evidence to accompany his Discovery, he found he was suspected by them; and so durst not trust himself among them any more.

These Things were sworn by him the first Day he appeared before the Council. Upon this he was sent that very Night with a Guard to seize upon the Jesuits and their Papers. And for two or three Days after, he was almost perpetually employed Night and Day, either in apprehending Persons he had sworn against, or in attending the Council. This Fatigue he made Use of afterwards for an Excuse to palliate several gross Inconsistencies, that appeared in the Evidence delivered by him at different Times. Upon his Oath there were apprehended Sir George Wakeman abovementioned, Mr. Edward Coleman Secretary to the Dukes of York, Mr. Richard Langborn, an eminent Counsellor at Law; all Papists and Laymen; Thomas Whitebread, John Gavan, Anthony Turner, William Ireland, William Marshall, William Rumley, James Corker, and Thomas Pickering, Jesuites and Monks, who were accused by him of being Actors in, or privy to the Plot.

That this Plot, as sworn to by Oates, was a wicked Forgery and Imposture, is, I believe, little doubted at present by thinking and unprejudiced Men. The Character of the Informer is no small Diminution of its Credit. For though he had worn the Habit of a Clergyman, he was a Fellow of a most infamous Life. He had been once presented for Perjury. He had been made a Chaplain in one of the King's Ships, but was dismissed upon a Complaint of some unnatural Practices, not fit to be named. He afterwards procured a Qualification to be Chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk. And that Duke being a Roman Catholick, Oates expressed soon after an Inclination to the Popish Religion, not from any Motive of Conscience, but thinking probably to reap some small Advantage by that vile Condescension. He was soon after instructed in the Principles of the Romish Church, and became a Member of it. But he found himself disappointed; for he quickly perceived he had lost all Hopes from the Church of England, to starve in that of Rome; for he had but Ninepence a Day allowed him. At last he was sent to the Reflections on the Plot.

Oates's Character.

A.D. 1678. the English Seminary of Jesuits at St. Omers in Flanders, where he was treated with great Contempt. From St. Omers, he had been sent through France into Spain; and from thence returned to England, where soon after he broached this Plot. Whether in this he were animated by a Spirit of Revenge for the ill Usage he had received from the Jesuits, or by Hopes of Reward for the Discovery, or whether he was an Instrument of others to swear what was prepared for him, has been variously thought; but must remain a Doubt till the Great Day, when all Secrets shall be revealed. On the other hand, that there has been, and ever will be, a Popish Plot for the restoring that Religion amongst us, will be easily believed by such as know the restless Temper of the Church and Court of Rome, and the great Ease with which they can carry on such Designs. For being united under one supreme Head, whose Interest always points the same Way, their Counsels must needs be steady and uniform. And their numerous Religious Orders affording many Thousands of single Men, bound by Vows of Poverty and blind Obedience to Superiors, joined most commonly with furious Zeal and Bigottry, they can never want such Instruments as will be always fit and ready to execute those Designs with the least Trouble imaginable to the Principals. It is no wonder then if with these great Advantages they are continually pushing forward the Interest of their Church in Protestant Countries; as having much to get, and nothing to lose. But that they should design to compass this by killing the King, or by the violent Methods sworn to by Oates and his Associates, appears incredible from the palpable Falshoods and Inconsistencies in their Evidence.

Two Accidents confirm the Belief of the Plot.

Coleman's Letters.

But there were two Things that happened accidentally to confirm the Belief of the Plot. The first was the seizing of several Letters written in Cypher in Coleman's House, which plainly shewed he was really employed in concerting Measures for the restoring the Popish Religion with us. Not that those Letters had any Relation to this Plot, the latest being written in 1676. and the Designs there mentioned being of a quite different Nature. But it was said that here it was plain that such a Design had been formerly carried on; what Change had been made in the Measures since, no body could tell. And no Papers relating to the present Time appearing, it was supposed they were destroyed; and upon this Supposition every Man took the Liberty to imagine what he did not see.

And the Death of Sir Edmond bury Godfrey.

The other Accident that furthered the Belief of the Plot, was this. The Day before Oates, Tongue and Kirkby went to the Council, they had prepared a Narrative of the whole Plot, which was afterwards printed by the Title of Oates's Narrative. Three Copies of this they brought to one Sir Edmond bury Godfrey, a Justice of Peace; and Oates made Oath to the Truth of it before him. This was done on September 27. and thirteen Days after, October 12. being Saturday, this Gentleman went out from his House in the Morning, and was met near St. Clement's Church at one o' Clock, but was never seen afterwards. He was a Man punctual to good Hours; so that his Family were surprized when he did not come at Night. But as he had an ancient Mother at Hammer-smith, they fancied she was dying, and that he was gone to see her. Next Morning they sent thither, but heard no News of him. They sent then to his Brothers, who lived in the City. His Brothers were unacquainted with his Affairs, and did not know but he might have stepped aside for Debt; for People at that Time were busie in calling in their Money, and many broke. But no Creditors appearing about the House, on Tuesday they published his being lost. He was an eminent Justice of Peace, and had stayed in London to keep Things in order during the Time of the Plague, for which he was knighted; so that he was well known in the City. The Town was for two Days together filled with many different Conjectures, and odd Reports, as Mens Fancies or Inventions suggested. At last, on Thursday Night late, the whole City was alarmed with the News, that he was found murdered upon Primrose-Hill near St. Pancras Church, about a Mile out of Town. His Body was there discovered lying in a Ditch; his Sword was thrust through him, but no Blood was on his Clothes, or about him. His Shoes were clean, his Money was in his Pocket, and his Rings upon his Fingers. There was nothing about his Neck, but there appeared a Mark all round it, an Inch broad, which shewed he had been strangled. His Breaſt likewise was all over marked with Bruises, and his Neck was broke. There were Drops of Wax-lights upon his Breeches; and his Cane and Gloves were near him. It was plain that his Sword was run through his Body after he was dead, because no Blood appeared; and the Mark about his Neck shewed he was strangled. The Body lay exposed for two Days; great Crowds going to see it, as is usual upon such Occasions.

Who is found murdered.

It soon became known in the Town that he had taken Oates's Depositions; and he had, it seems, let fall in Discourse some ambiguous Words, that testified an Apprehension of Danger for having done so. Every one upon this concluded that he was murdered by the Papists; for his Money and Rings being found about him, it was plain he had not been in the Hands of common Robbers. And when Mens Minds were thus possessed, and their Passions raised by the moving Sight of his dead Body, it is no Wonder if they flew into the utmost Fury against the supposed Authors of so barbarous an Act. And when their Spirits were thus inflamed, it could not be thought they were in a Condition to examine coolly the Evidence of the Plot. So that every Thing Oates said went down easily; and a Man who could keep his Temper so far, as to reason upon Oates's Informations, was hated like an Accomplice in the Murder. The People thought

Which raises a great Ferment.

A.D. 1678. thought they could not do Justice to that unfortunate Gentleman, unless they believed, without Examination, all that was sworn against the Papists. So that the popular Torrent ran on the Side of the Plot, with a Violence that nothing could withstand.

Reflections
on this Mur-ther.

As to the true Reasons of this Murther, and the Actors in it, they must (in my Opinion at least) be given up as an impenetrable Mystery. That the Papists should really murder this Gentleman because he had taken Oates's Depositions, seems not likely. For the only Motive they could have for it must be Revenge; for these Depositions being immediately after laid before the Council, could not be suppressed by killing him. And there could be no Grounds even for Repentment, for he was entirely passive in the Matter; and it was not without Reluctancy that he was brought to do what he did. And he lived in good Terms with them before. So that it seems improbable that the Papists should at so critical a Season do such an Act which must enrage the Fire already kindled against them, only for the Sake of an unprofitable and unprovoked Revenge. On the other hand, here was a Magistrate murdered in such a Manner as could not be done by himself, nor was likely to be done by Robbers. No private Enemies of his were ever thought of: So that there remained none likely to do this but the Papists; who might be supposed to be provoked, though unjustly, at the Part he had in this formidable Mischief that was breaking out upon them. 'Tis true indeed, that a Discovery was shortly after given in upon Oath of the Persons concerned in this Murder, who were apprehended and suffered Death for it; but in Return there were other Informations given in, upon Oath also, a few Years after, of many foul and enormous Practices with the Author of that Discovery and with others. And in those Times (I speak it with Horror) Perjury and Subornation grew so common, that no Dependence can, I think, be reasonably had on any Informations of that kind. And as little Weight can be laid on some Expressions of Apprehension and Fear which this Gentleman used to some of his Acquaintance, they being so ambiguously worded that nothing particular can be drawn from them. I leave it to the Reader to judge and take Part on either Side as he thinks fit: I was willing to throw these impartial Reflexions together for his Information, to supply the Want of clear Evidence in this dark and important Matter.

The King published his Proclamation October 20, with a Pardon and 500*l.* Reward to the Discoverers of the Murther. And because it was insinuated, that many might be willing, but afraid to discover, for fear it should be revenged upon them, he published another four Days after, with a Promise of all reasonable Security to the Persons of such Discoverers.

The Parlia-
ment meets.

The Parliament met October 21, the true Patriots being full of real Fears and Apprehensions, and the discontented under the same Appearance concealing Hopes of carrying their Ends by the Heats raised throughout the Nation by this Plot. The King was perplexed upon their Meeting; fearing that Affair would be brought into the Parliament, and be made use of to give him a great deal of Uneasiness. For that Reason, in his Speech, he took as little Notice of it, as could at such a Juncture be conveniently done. He also laid his Commands upon the Lord Treasurer, not to communicate the least Thing to them.

But that Lord was so strongly set upon doing it, that the King's Admonitions, and even Commands, were in vain; and the very first Day he brought Oates's Informations before the House of Commons. But this Step had an Effect quite different from his Expectations. Without obliging the Commons it ruined him in the King's Affections; who when he heard of it, fell into a Passion with the Treasurer; and, with more Wisdom than Men generally shew in that Temper of Mind, said to him, Though you do not believe it, you will find you have given the Parliament a Handle to ruin your self, as well as to disturb my Affairs; and you will live to repent it. And this Prophecy of the King's proved a very true one.

The House of Commons was all in a Flame upon these Advices. They sat whole Days from Morning to Night; and proceeded with so much Secrecy that their Minutes and Votes were forbidden to be divulged. The Houses addressed the King jointly; first for a general Fast; secondly, for the banishing of all Popish Recusants ten Miles out of London; and thirdly, for preventing the Access of unknown and suspicious Persons to the King, and for the raising the Militia of London and Westminster to be Guards during the Session.

The King in his Heart disbelieved the whole Plot; but the Stream ran so fiercely, that he was obliged to fall in with it. He issued out the Proclamations desired by the Houses, and seemed to vye with them in Zeal against Popery. Soon after these Proclamations he added two of his own; the first to renew his Commands to all Papists to remove from the Cities of London and Westminster; the other offering a Reward for Discovery of Papists among the King's Guards. The first of these had very terrible Consequences, in driving out great Numbers of that Religion from their Trades and Settlements into strange Places, and Ways of Living they were unpractised in; and was indeed a Piece of Cruelty that nothing can excuse but the Fury of the Times, and its short Duration.

In the mean Time Oates was sent for to the Commons; and at the Bar of that House made a new Edition of his Discovery. He said the Pope had declared England his Kingdom, and had sent over Commissions to several Persons. That he had made Lord Arundel of Wardour Chancellor, Lord Powis Treasurer, Sir William Godolphin, then in Spain, Lord Privy-Seal, Coleman Secretary

The Earl of Danby brings Oates's Informations before the Commons.

The Commons in an high Ferment.

The King
obliged to fall in with them.

Oates sent for to the Commons.
His Discovery
there.

A.D. 1678. tary of State, Lord Bellasis General, Lord Petre Lieutenant-General, Sir Francis Ratcliffe Major-General, Lord Stafford Paymaster-General, and Langborn Advocate-General. He said also, that General Lambert, the famous Leader under the Rump-Parliament, was to be Adjutant-General. And whereas before he only charged Coleman and Wakeman by Hearsay, he now swore upon his own Knowledge, that Coleman gave eighty Guineas to four Ruffians that went to Windfor the last Summer to stab the King; and that Sir George Wakeman had undertaken to poison him, and was to have 15000*l.* for it. But this last Charge proved a fatal Blunder to Oates; and was the first Thing that shook his Credit. For he had solemnly protested before the Privy-Council, that he could say nothing upon his own Knowledge against those two. And the Excuse he made on Account of his great Fatigue, though it served him at Coleman's Trial, when Men were yet too warm to reflect, failed him at the Trial of Wakeman, when Length of Time began to restore the Use of Reason.

Many Things therein incongruous.

Many other Things in his Evidence were very incongruous. It was a strange Thing that but twenty Guineas apiece should be given Men to stab the King; and that Sir George Wakeman was to have 15000*l.* for killing him a much easier and safer Way. His Commissions too seemed very ill distributed. Lord Bellasis was perpetually ill of the Gout. Lord Petre had never had any military Command. Sir Francis Ratcliffe was a Man who lived at his Ease upon a great Fortune in the North of England, and had never stirred from home all that Summer. It was very strange too to see a Rump-Officer, like General Lambert, receiving his Commission from the Pope. But besides, that Person through his long Imprisonment was become a Child, and had lost his Memory and Sense. These Things might reasonably have shocked People's Faith in Oates's Discovery; but Men were now in a Fit of Believing. So that all he said was greedily swallowed, and the Houses concurred in a Vote, that there hath been a damnable and hellish Plot, contrived and carried on by Popish Recusants, for assassinating the King, subverting the Government, and destroying the Protestant Religion.

An Act passed to disable Papists from sitting in Parliament.

The violent Heats of both Houses against Popery, gave occasion for a remarkable Act to disable Papists from sitting in Parliament; which was at this Time brought in to the House of Commons. And soon after it was debated in that House, to address the King to remove the Duke of York from his Presence and Councils. But this Debate was adjourned some Time after it was entered in to till the eighth Day following.

The King gives a gentle Check to the Violence of the Commons.

This Debate made the King uneasy. For he saw that Address would be used to make Way for a Bill to exclude that Duke from the Crown; which the King was resolutely set against. He therefore came to the House of Peers, and sending for the Commons,

A.D. 1678. made a Speech to the Houses, in which he thanked them for the Care shewn by them for his Person; and assured them of his Readiness to do all they could wish for the Security of the Protestant Religion. He then obliquely let them know his Mind, telling them he came to promise his Concurrence in any Laws to secure them in the Reign of his Successor, provided those Laws did not tend to impeach the Right of Succession, and the Descent of the Crown. This was the first Wind that was felt about that important Affair; which proved only a transient Blast: but in succeeding Parliaments grew into so terrible a Storm, as almost shook our Constitution to pieces.

That Design of Exclusion was at this Time not ripe; so that the Bounds the King had set to his Condescension, though well understood, were not taken Notice of; and the Commons addressed the King in a very dutiful Manner to return their Thanks for his most gracious Speech.

Soon after this, Oates's Discovery was confirmed by a new Evidence, perfectly suited to the old one. His Name was William Bedloe, a Person who had gone thro' many various Circumstances of Life, and had been very infamous in every one of them. He was thoroughly possessed of all those Qualifications that go to the completing of an eminent Rogue. He was of a base Birth, and mean Parentage, so that little Care being taken of his Education, or of any Provision for him, he was forced to make his Way in the World by himself. He might have done this in an honest Way; being not without Capacity. But a certain natural Bent towards Wickedness, which is found in some Dispositions, made him chuse a contrary Course. He was first a poor Foot-boy or Runner on Errands; and afterwards got into a Livery in the Family of the Lord Bellasis. After this he turned a kind of Post, or Letter Carrier beyond Sea, in which Condition he got acquainted with the Names and Concerns of People of Fashion. He made use of this to put in Practice an hundred Rogueries, being of a bold and daring Temper, with a good Turn of Wit and Address. Thus he run through all the Arts and Methods of Sharping; going under false Names, and borrowing Money, or other valuable Things, by forged Recommendations, or by personating Men of Figure. He travelled over France and Spain, under the Character of a Person of Quality, robbing and cheating wherever he went. In the Course of this Sort of Life he had been put into several Prisons, where he suffered great Hardship and Want; so that being used to Wickedness and the Punishments consequent upon it, he was become very dexterous in one, and hardened to the other.

A new Evidence, one Bedloe; his Character.

He was just got out of Prison, where he was fed out of the Alms-Basket, when the Reward and Encouragement abovementioned were offered to the Discoverers of Godfrey's Murder. Upon this he went from London to Bristol, and in his Way thither sent a Letter Pretends to discover the Murderers of Sir Edmond-bury Godfrey.

A.D. 1678. ter to Secretary Coventry, with a Desire that he might be seized at Bristol. This was done accordingly with great Noise; that he might be looked on as a great Discoverer. Nov. 5. he was sent to London, where he was dubbed a Captain, and the King's Evidence; and like Oates before him, had Guards, and Subsistence at the King's Charge at White-hall. When he was examined before the Secretaries of State in the King's Presence, he said he had seen Godfrey's Body at Somerjet-House; and that a Servant of Lord Bellasis offered him 4000 l. to assist in carrying it away. That upon this he went out of Town to Bristol, but that his Conscience so haunted him that it forced him to discover it. Being asked if he knew any Thing of the Plot, he denied it upon Oath. He said indeed, that he had heard of 40000 Men to be sent from Spain, who were to meet as Pilgrims at St. Jago's, and to be shipp'd from thence for England, which was all he knew. This was a strange Story: Forty thousand Pilgrims was an Army in Disguise, never heard of but in Bedloe's Evidence, and the Comedy of the Rehearsal. And he could not give any Account of the Fleet that was to transport such extraordinary Invaders. But it plainly appeared he had been better instructed before the next Day. For being then brought before the House of Lords, he abounded in Discoveries, and accused Lord Bellasis, Lord Powis, Lord Arundel of Wardour, and Coleman, of a Design to kill the King; and told the House he had begun to put a Narrative of the Plot in Writing, and desired Time to finish it. When he was asked whether he knew Titus Oates, he positively denied it; but afterwards he brought himself off, by saying he knew him only by the Name of Ambrose.

Four Days after, his Discoveries were much enlarged. He said, forty thousand Men were to be ready in London; that ten thousand Men were to be sent from Flanders, besides the Pilgrims from St. Jago's in Spain. That Hull was to be surprized just at the critical Time the Plot was discovered. That he was told, that all the Roman Catholics of any Figure in England were acquainted with this Plot, with many other Particulars too long and trivial to be enumerated.

There cannot be a more surprizing Example of the Force of universal Prejudice, than that such an Evidence should gain Attention, much more Belief, among so many wise Men as heard it. How could it be thought that forty thousand effective Men should be ready in London for such a Design, when probably there is not that Number of Papists to be found throughout the City, tho' we take in the Women and Children? Or that Spain should send over thirty or forty thousand Men to conquer England, who would scarce afford half the Number in the late War to defend their own Territories in Flanders? But this is not the only Instance when popular Madness has infected very wise and judicious Heads.

The Parliament believed all these strange

Stories, and the King was forced to drive with the Tide, and appear as zealous as they. Through the Course of this Month, nothing was heard of but Addresses and Proclamations against Papists. And on the 30th of November, the King came and passed the Bill for disabling Papists from sitting in either House of Parliament. Another Bill was presented to him for raising the Militia; but the King rejected it, thinking it intrenched upon his Prerogative.

The next remarkable Occurrence was the Trial of Mr. William Staley, a Popish Banker, for treasonable Words. One Carstairs a Scotchman, a Man of a very ill Character, happened to be in an Eating-house in Covent-Garden, where Staley was at Dinner in the next Room to him. Carstairs pretended he heard him say in French, that the King was a Rogue, and persecuted the People of God; and that he would stab him if no body else would. These Words he wrote down, and went next Morning to Staley, telling him he would swear those Words against him; and demanded a Sum of Money of him. Staley was much perplexed: He saw the Danger of such an Accusation at such a Time, but he was under Difficulties, and refused to part with the Money. So he was apprehended, and five Days after tried and cast. The Evidence against him was positive; and being Strangers, he did not know their Character. He could only urge how improbable it was he should say such Things in a publick Room, and that in a Part of the Town where French was so well understood. He was asked while under Condemnation, whether he knew any Thing of the Plot; but he denied it, as also the Words sworn against him. He was executed at Tyburn, where he behaved himself very decently. His Quarters were given to his Friends; but they acted so indiscreetly, as to make a pompous Funeral for him, which gave such Offence, that his Quarters were ordered to be taken up and set upon the City Gates.

His Trial was succeeded by that of Mr. Edward Coleman. This Gentleman was Secretary to the Duchess of York as was said above; a great Bigot in his Religion, and of a busy Head. This engaged him in many Projects for the restoring of Popery here; or at least procuring a Liberty of Conscience for those of that Profession. He had been engaged in a Correspondence with P. la Chaise the French King's Confessor since the Year 1674. in the Course of which he was continually entertaining him with Schemes and Projects for advancing the Interest of the French King, and the Church of Rome. He found Means to draw a great deal of Money from the French Court upon those Accounts; and 'tis hard to say how far that Consideration might lead him into such Correspondences. For he lived at a vast Expence; and he afterwards confessed himself, that he had diverted some Part of those Sums to his own Use. And his Letters found of nothing but the Necessity of the

And gives some Account of the Plot.

He makes new Discoveries.

Staley's
Trial.

An Account of Coleman.

A.D. 1678. the French King's Purse to carry on his Designs. He seems to have had very good Luck in bartering his Intelligence for ready Money; for his Notions appear but airy and chimerical; the Undertaking he engaged in, being a Matter of more Difficulty than he took it to be.

His Trial.

The Day after Staley's Execution his Trial came on. The Evidences against him were Oates and Bedloe, with his own Papers. The two first charged him with having been privy to several Consults for killing the King, and to another for raising a Rebellion in Ireland; and that he had received a Commission to be Secretary of State. As to his Letters they shewed beyond Contradiction, that he had been busy in Projects for introducing Popery; and some warm Expressions which his Zeal let fall, were made use of to represent him as a more dangerous Person than he really was. But all this had no Manner of Relation to the Plot; there not appearing throughout all his Letters the least Intention of hurting the King, or of using Violence of any Sort to compass his Undertakings; but much that implied the contrary.

He pleaded this himself when he came to make his Defence. As to Oates and Bedloe he observed (which was very true) that when he appeared before the Council, Oates did not know him. Oates excused himself by alledging the Weakness of his Sight, the Candle-light, and Coleman's Change of Wig and Habit; but as soon as he heard him speak he said he knew him. He observed also that when Oates first appeared before the Council, he charged him only with a Letter, and some Matters so slight, that the Council was ready to let him go at large; whereas had he known these Things he now swore against him, that was the proper time to mention them. Oates answered this by complaining of the great Fatigue he had undergone for two Days and Nights before in seizing Jesuits and other accused Persons; which he said had so exhausted his Spirits that he did not know what he said. This was a wretched Evasion; but it went down at that Time. In the third Place he said, that whereas Oates swore he was privy to a Consult about the 21st of August in London, he desired Oates might fix upon some Day, and offered to prove that he was out of Town the greatest Part of that Month. But Oates avoided this, by saying he could not fix upon the Day, but only upon the Month. As to Bedloe, he could only answer him by solemnly protesting he had never seen him till then in his Life; and concluded his Defence with an Affirmation, that he had seen Oates but once before, and Bedloe never.

He is executed.

He was found guilty and condemned; but before his Execution many were sent to him from both Houses, with Promise of a Pardon if he would make Discoveries. But he either would not, or which is as probable, could not make any such. So that some Time after, he was executed, and suffered with great Composedness and Devotion, deny-nying all that had been sworn against him. A.D. 1678.

There went about an idle Story, that he refused to confess upon Promise of a Pardon from the Duke of York; and that when he found his Death unavoidable, he cried out in a Passion; There is no Faith in Man! But it was very plain, and he could not be ignorant, that the Fury of the Times was such, that the King had it not in his Power to pardon him, if he had been ever so willing.

Oates and Bedloe finding their Evidence greedily received, and themselves respected like the Deliverers of their Country, were filled with such Insolence that they proceeded to accuse the Queen herself. Whether they were moved to this by their own Pride to make themselves famous by so illustrious a Criminal, or whether they were set on by others, is uncertain. But now they began to talk of something they had to swear against her. And being examined before the Privy Council, they both deposed that she was privy to the Consult for killing the King. They differed a little in the Circumstances; the one saying that she spoke with great Resentment of the Violations of her Bed, and promised with great Passion to assist in the poisoning; the other, that she wept when she heard the Proposal, and consented with Reluctancy.

The House of Commons upon this Information broke out into a new Flame, and immediately addressed the King to remove the Queen and all reputed Papists from White-Hall. But the King, instead of returning Oates and Bedloe Thanks for the Discovery, was highly provoked at their Insolence; and acted upon this Occasion with great Generosity. It would have been an easy thing at that Juncture for him to have freed himself from a Wife he did not at all love; which is an Opportunity that Men of his Character are generally pleased with. But he refused to gratify himself by such Cruelty. He knew she was incapable of such an Action as was laid to her Charge, and was touch'd with Compassion for an unhappy Princess, who had left her own for a strange Country, to be there neglected and ill used; and at last brought in Danger of her Life by a false Accusation. And remembering how faulty he had been towards her in other Respects he could not bear the Thoughts of forsaking her in this Peril. So he resolved to protect her; and to give some Check to the growing Boldness of these Informers; not knowing where they would stop, when all they said was so readily believed. A stricter Guard was put upon Oates than before. But an Address came the next Day from the Commons that he might be freed from that Restraint. And thus there arose a struggle between the King and Commons about him. But the King was so incensed at Oates's Boldness in approaching so near the Throne, that he would not suffer the Accusation against the Queen to go any farther.

Oates and Bedloe accuse the Queen.

The King checks their Insolence.

A.D. 1679. At this Time came on the Tryal of William Ireland, and Thomas Pickering, both Priests, and John Grove a Lay Brother. There were arraigned with them Thomas Whitebread and John Fenwick, both Jesuits. Oates and Bedloe swore against Ireland directly, that he had been present at a Consult held in August for killing the King; and Oates swore the same positively against Whitebread and Fenwick. But Bedloe charged those two only by Hearsay, so that for want of two positive Witnesses they must have been acquitted by the Jury in Course. Upon this Occasion the Court committed a most enormous and crying Act of Injustice. For when they saw these two must be cleared, they, by a Quirk in Law, pretended to discharge the Jury of them, and put off their Tryal to another Time; though they had pleaded to the Indictment, and the Jury was sworn, and the Witnesses examined. They pretended indeed they had Precedents for this; but as a great Man observes, Precedents against Reason only prove that the like Injustice has been committed before. As to Pickering and Grove, Oates and Bedloe swore that they were appointed to shoot the King; and that the latter being a Layman was to have 1500*l.* and the former who was a Priest 3000*0* Masses, which at a Shilling a Mass amounts to the same Sum. That they used to walk together in St. James's Park with Pistols for that Purpose. That one Time Pickering had an Opportunity to shoot at the King, but that the Flint of his Pistol was loose. Another time there was no Powder in the Pan; and again a third time the Gun was charged only with Bullets; by which Accidents the King's Life was saved. These Disasters one upon another, made a very unlikely Story; but it was all imputed to a special Providence; which solved the Difficulty at once.

The Prisoners absolutely denied the whole, and Pickering averred that he had never shot off a Pistol in his Life. Ireland brought Witnesses to prove, that he was in Staffordshire at the Time Oates swore he was in London. But Oates producing a Woman, who said she saw him in Town about the middle of August, which was the Time he swore to, this Defence was overruled. So that they were found guilty, condemned, and executed; but denied stedfastly to the last Moment all that was sworn against them. Pickering, whether in Hopes of Discovery, or for other Reasons, was kept alive for above three Months after the others, but nothing was ever got from him.

Some secret Negotiations of the King discovered to the House of Commons by Mr. Montague. About the Time of this Trial, there broke out a sudden Flame in the House of Commons, on Account of some mysterious Proceedings of the Court about a Year before, which were now laid open upon the following Occasion. A Quarrel had happened between the Lord Treasurer, and Mr. Montague, who had been Ambassador for a considerable Time at the French Court. During his Stay there, those dishonourable Negotiations about Money, which the King submitted to with that Court, passed through his Hands. They being Affairs that required Secrecy, were entrusted to none but the Lord Treasurer; by which Means Mr. Montague came to have several Letters of his upon that Subject. Upon this Misunderstanding Mr. Montague struck in with the Countrey Party. The Lord Treasurer knew what Secrets he had been entrusted with, and how capable he was of doing him a Mischief by the Letters he had under his own Hand. So he found a Pretence to charge him with a dangerous Correspondence with the Pope's Nuntio; and upon that Ground sent to seize all his Papers, intending to lay hold on his own Letters and destroy them. But the other was too cunning for him, and had taken Care to put the Treasurer's Papers and Letters out of the Way, in safe Hands. The House of Commons, of which Mr. Montague was a Member, resented this seizing of his Papers as a high Breach of Privilege; and while they were in that Heat, Mr. Montague stood up, and told them he had some Papers of the Lord Treasurer's to communicate to the House, that were of the utmost Consequence. A Committee was presently sent for them; and Mr. Montague being ordered to select such as he thought proper to be communicated to the House, he took out two which were immediately read.

The first of them was dated January 17, 1677, at which Time the King was making a Treaty with Holland, as has been above related. This tended only to shew, that at the very Time when the King was about that Treaty, the French Court was well persuaded of his Firmness to them, and had also a good Opinion of the Lord Treasurer. In the second, which was dated March 25, afterwards, the Lord Treasurer orders Mr. Montague expressly to stipulate with the Court of France for the Payment of six Millions of Livres for three Years to the King, upon the Conclusion of the Peace which was then in Agitation. At the Bottom of this Letter was written in the King's own Hand, This Letter was written by my Order. C. R.

The Contents of these two Letters, especially of the last, were very startling. There was in the first an Indication of a good Correspondence with the French King, at the same Time that we were in Treaty for an Alliance against him. And the vast Pension demanded in the other, not to mention the Infamy of it, implied that some very great Consideration was to be paid in Return. And this, at the Juncture in which these Letters were written, could be no other than giving up to the French the Interests of the Allies, and with them our own Safety, and that of Europe. These were Reflections which the most loyal Patriots could not forbear making; and the Indignation they conceived, joined with the Clamours of those Enemies which every Prime Minister keeps by his Place, set the House in a Flame; which was not at all lessened by seeing the King's own Hand and Approbation at the

The Commons in a Flame.

A.D. 1679. Bottom of the last Letter. They immediately resolved to impeach the Treasurer of High Treason, and other high Crimes, and appointed Mr. Montague and Mr. Harbord to draw up Articles against him. The Articles were six, but the Strefs of them lay upon that which contained the Negotiations in these Letters; the rest, which related to Misdemeanors in his Office of Lord Treasurer, serving only to make up a Number.

They resolve to impeach the Lord Treasurer.

The Treasurer in great Perplexity.

The Earl was under a great Perplexity. He could not deny the Letters, or the Consequences drawn from them. He thought at first by Way of Revenge, to have exposed all Mr. Montague's Letters, by which that Gentleman would have appeared more obnoxious than himself. But here the King interposed, knowing that the farther this Matter was searched into, the more Odium was like to fall upon himself, from the great Part he would appear to have in it. So he told the Earl of Danby, that he would give him his Pardon to plead against the Impeachment; and farther said, that he owed him more Duty than to expose the private Negotiations between him and the King of France; and that he was sure he could not be guilty of such perfidious Baseness to him, as Montague had been. However, whether by Permission or otherwise, the Treasurer sent two of Mr. Montague's Letters to the House of Commons, the first tending to make appear the Correspondence which the Court of France held with the discontented Party in the House of Commons in Opposition to the Treasurer; and the second, to shew that he was extremely hated and suspected in France, as one who was an Enemy to their Interest. But these Letters were not suffered to be read; and the House pursued the Treasurer with greater Eagerness than those Lords who were accused for the Popish Plot.

He was soon impeached in Form at the House of Peers. Upon reading the Articles of Impeachment, he stood up, and made a Speech, in which he endeavoured to clear himself from all the Articles, except what related to the two Letters. Concerning them he said, that he had done nothing without the express Order of the King; and in the Conclusion, spoke a great deal to shew that he always was an Enemy to France, and was known and believed by that Court to be such.

There arose in the House of Lords a great Debate concerning this Impeachment. The Question was, whether they should receive it as an Impeachment of High Treason, because the Word High Treason was added to it. It was said, the utmost that could be made of this Charge, was to suppose it true; but that if it were, they must needs say plainly, that it was not within the Statute. To this it was replied, that the House of Commons, who brought in this Charge, were to be heard to two Things; first, the Proof of the Crime; secondly, the Nature of it. It was therefore proposed that the House should receive the Charge, and proceed according to the Rules of Parliament, which were to commit the Person impeached, and appoint a short Day for his Trial. But after a long and warm Debate, the Majority were against the Commitment.

The King was obliged to defend the Lord Treasurer, and this Resolution of the House of Lords encouraged him. So on the 30th of December he came and prorogued the Parliament to the 4th of February following.

The Parliament prorogued.

The Conduct of the several Persons concerned in this important Affair was much descanted upon. Some blamed Mr. Montague for revealing the King's Secrets; and the more, because it was plainly done out of private Spite to the Lord Treasurer, and not with the least Intention of serving the Publick, which was the only Motive that could possibly excuse the betraying such a Trust. As Mr. Montague was blamed by some for revealing these Negotiations, the Earl of Danby was no less blamed by others for concurring in them. They said, no Commands of a Prince were a sufficient Excuse for doing an ill Thing. That if what he said in his Speech was true, of his Opposition to the French Interests, he ought not to have had the least Hand in promoting them in this Manner. Nor were any Favours received from the King an Excuse for this Concurrence, since the best Return a Minister can make his Prince for great Obligations, is to keep him from pursuing dishonourable Measures; which always bring Shame to his Master, and often Danger. Men of severer Tempers added, that they saw no Reason the King had to complain of Mr. Montague's Part in this Affair, it being only the natural Consequence of Things. They said, that when Princes employ their Servants to betray their Countrey, they teach them to be insensible to the Motives of Honour and Conscience; and when Men have been taught to break through those Obligations once to gratifie their Prince, he has no Reason to wonder if they break through them a second Time to gratifie themselves. That it would therefore be happy, if Princes, by this and many like Examples, would be dissuaded from entering into unlawful Counsels; since those who are the fittest Instruments for executing them are, and always will be, for that very Reason, the most likely to betray them.

While this Affair was depending, there appeared a new Discoverer of the Murther of Sir Edmond Godfrey. This was one Miles Edmond Prance, a Goldsmith, who worked for the Queen's Chapel at Somerset-House. This Person had in his House a Lodger, whose Name was John Wren, with whom he had had some Difference about his Rent which was in Arrear. It seems Prance had lain out of his House two or three Nights the Week before the Murther. Wren calling to Mind this Absence, but forgetting the Difference of a Week's Time, either really suspected he was then employed in the Murther, or used it as a Ground of Accusation; so that he went and informed against him. There were some Prance's Discovery of Sir Edmond Godfrey's Murther.

Circum-

The Impeachment occasions a Difference between the two Houses.

A.D. 1679. Circumstances that, had the Time of Prance's Absence agreed, gave some little Colour to this Suspicion; for he was a Papist, and personally acquainted with Grove, Pickering, and Ireland, who were lately condemned, and often worked in his Trade at Somerset-House, where Bedloe deposed he had seen the Body; so that had he been really absent at the Time that was sworn, the other Circumstances agreed well enough. Prance was taken up by a Warrant of Council, and Bedloe, who was the first Discoverer, was called upon to give an Account of him. Bedloe foreseeing this, had found Means to get a Sight of him privately before; so that when he was planted in the Room where Prance was brought, he started up, and with a cursed Oath cried out, This is one of the Rogues I saw with a dark Lanthorn about Sir Edmondbury Godfrey's Body, but he was then in a Periwig.

Prance was brought before the Committee of Council, where Bedloe charged him directly with the Murther, and Wren with being out of his House those Nights that Godfrey was missing. He denied the least Knowledge of the Murther, or the Plot, but confessed he had wrought in his Trade for the Persons above named. He was sent to Newgate, where he at first denied every Thing; but at last, (whether compelled by barbarous Usage, as he afterwards swore, is uncertain) he made a Confession. But afterwards again he retracted it before the King in Council. And thus he went on for some Time, denying one Day, and confessing another, till at last he settled upon a Confession.

His Account of it.

The Account he gave was this. Girald and Kelly, two Priests, engaged him and three others in the Murther. The three others were one Green, that belonged to the Queen's Chapel; Hill, a Servant to one Doctor Godden; and Berry, the Porter of Somerset-House. After this was resolved on, they followed Godfrey for several Days. The Morning before they killed him, Hill went to his House to see if he were yet gone out, and spoke to his Maid; and finding he was yet at home, they waited for his coming out. They then dogged him to a Place near St. Clement's, where he stayed till Night. When he was come from thence, as he passed by the Water-Gate at Somerset-House, two of them pretended to be in a Quarrel; and a third came to Godfrey to desire him, who was a Magistrate, to come in and part them. As soon as he was come in, Green got behind him, and pulled him down by his Cravat, and strangled him. Afterwards they carried the Body into Doctor Godden's Room, of which Hill, who was his Servant, had the Key, Godden being in France. Two Days after they removed it into another Room, but that being found inconvenient, they brought it back. At last it was resolved to carry it out in the Night in a Sedan, which was accordingly provided, and the Body was carried out in it. When they were got clear of the Town, it was laid upon a Horse which Green had provided, who, as Prance suppofed, carried it to the Place where it was afterwards found.

The Priests accused were not to be met with, but Green, Hill and Berry were apprehended and brought to Trial. Bedloe and Prance swore against them as is above related. They on the other hand brought Witnesses to prove, that they came home in a good Hour on those Nights, in which the Fact was said to be done. Those who lived in Godden's Lodgings deposed, that no dead Body could be brought thither, for they were every Day in the Room that Prance had named. And the Centinels of the Night he was carried out said, they saw no Sedan brought out. This Defence was very strong, but it was forced to give Way to the Fury of the Times; for they were found guilty, condemned and executed. But they denied to the last Moment all that was sworn against them.

Green, Hill, and Berry tried for the Murther.

Executed.

Soon after the Prorogation of the Parliament, it was debated at Court whether it should not be dissolved by Proclamation before the Time of the Prorogation was expired, and it was agreed to do so. For the Earl of Danby found a Majority there engaged against him; and the Duke of York saw such a Fire kindled among them by the Plot, that there was no Hopes of laying it; and he hoped another Parliament would be cooler in that Affair. The Earl of Danby spoke with some of the leading Members about the Dissolution, who consented to it, and undertook that he should be brought off upon that Condition. The Thing being agreed on, a Proclamation was published Jan. 25. to dissolve the Parliament, and call another to sit on the 6th of March. But the Duke, the Earl, and the Members were all disappointed; for the next Parliament proved warmer both against the Earl, and against Popery, than the other had been. This Parliament had continued above seventeen Years and eight Months, which has given it the Name of the Long Parliament in this Reign. It had passed through great Variety of Tempers and Dispositions; being at first loyal and complying to Extremity; and at last refractory and jealous to as great a Degree. It is represented by some, and called by others, by the Name of the Pensionary-Parliament, but I think unjustly. For their Behaviour was, at the Time they are most charged with Bribery, so opposite and contradictory to the Measures at Court, and gave the Ministers so much Trouble, as plainly demonstrates the Unreasonableness of such an Imputation.

The Parliament dissolved.

The King prepared the Way for the next Parliament, by desiring his Brother the Duke of York to retire beyond Sea for some Time. He went first to Holland, where he was received with great Respect by the Prince of Orange his Son-in-Law. After a short Stay there he went to Brussels, where he spent most of the Summer. The Duke began about this Time to be jealous of the Duke of Monmouth, whom the King entirely loved, and who was growing very popular. Some unwary Persons

The Duke of
York retires beyond Sea.

He grows jealous of the Duke of Monmouth.

Persons

A.D. 1679. Persons had carried their Partiality to him so far, as to raise a Report that the King had been privately married to his Mother before she suffered him to lie with her; which made the Duke of Montmouth his lawful Son. And this Story was countenanced, by the usual Indiscretion of Love at that Age, the King not being nineteen when he got that Son, as well as by the Lady's Character, which was untainted, except by that single Blot. This Rumour made the Duke of York so uneasy, knowing how easily such a Story might gain Ground, when his Nephew was so popular, and himself so suspected, that he got the King, before he went, to declare upon Oath, and sign the Declaration, that he was never either married or contracted to her, or any other Woman, except Queen Catherine.

The Parliament meets.

A Dispute between the King and Commons about their Speaker.

Compromised.

The Impeachment of the Lord Treasurer renewed.

The Parliament met upon the Day appointed, when the King and Lord Chancellor having spoken as usual, the House of Commons retired to chuse a Speaker; the Choice falling upon Edward Seymour Esq; who was Speaker in the last Parliament. This Choice was very disagreeable at Court, and produced a Contest between Privilege and Prerogative. For when the House of Commons appeared before the King the next Day to present their Speaker, the King refused to confirm the Election, and the Lord Chancellor desired them to return to their House and chuse another; his Majesty having Occasion for Mr. Seymour in other Employments. The House returned, and fell into warm Debates; and Sir Thomas Meres being proposed by some of the Court Side, was rejected with great Heat. It was generally agreed among them that the House alone had the Choice of a Speaker, and that the presenting him to the King, was a Matter of Form only. So they resolved to stand firm; and on Tuesday after waited upon the King with a Representation to that Purpose, but conceived in the usual Expressions of Duty and Loyalty. But the King stood as firm as they, and desired them to return, and do as he directed them. The Commons were still unmoved; and the next Day attended the King again with another Address to the same Purpose as the former. The King said, he would give them an Answer next Day; at which Time he came and prorogued them for two Days longer. During that Time the Difference was compromised, so that Mr. Seymour was to be set aside for the present; but the Right of the House was confirmed for the future. And when the House met again, they chose Serjeant Gregory, whom the King immediately approved.

This Dispute is said to have drawn the ill Humours of this new House upon the Earl of Danby. For they said it was he that had caused this Attack upon the Rights of the Commons, on Account of some private Resentments between Mr. Seymour and himself; so that he was fallen upon with the same Violence as before. The Commons sent a Message to the Lords, to put them in Mind of the Impeachment against the Earl, and to desire he might be committed to Custody. The Earl finding the Storm rising again, and that the King would not suffer him to produce some Papers that were necessary for his Defence, resolved to adhere to the King's Pardon; and to assuage the Fury raised against him, withdrew for some Time.

He withdraws.

When the House of Commons heard of the passing of the Earl of Danby's Pardon under the Great Seal, they were all on Fire, and sent for the Lord Chancellor to know how it was done. The Lord Chancellor told them, that himself declined the Office of putting the Great Seal to it, but that upon his Refusal, the King ordered the Seal to be taken out of the Bag, and put to it by another Person. This irritated the Commons more than before; and after a fierce Debate, they resolved to send an Address to the House of Lords to demand Justice against the Earl, and to have him sequestered from Parliament, and committed to Custody. The Lords sent the Black Rod to his House to secure him, but he was withdrawn; with which they having acquainted the Commons, that House ordered a Bill to be brought in to attain him, if he did not render himself to Justice by a certain Day.

The Commons in a Fury.

This Bill after passing the Commons being sent to the Lords, that House altered it from a Bill of Attainder to a Bill of Banishment, which produced three Conferences between the Houses. But the Lords at last yielded, and a Bill passed through both Houses to attain the Earl, if he did not appear on or before April 21. next following. This obliged the Earl to leave his Retreat, and April 15. he surrendered himself to the Black Rod; and being brought before the House of Lords, he was committed by them to the Tower.

The Earl surrenders himself.

The Earl of Danby being thus removed, the King found himself on a sudden in the most frightful of all Solitudes, the Want of a Person with whom he could speak in Confidence:

The King enters into new and wholesome Counsels.

A State to which Kings are often obnoxious, and which makes the Throne, encircled with bowing Crowds, more lonely than a Desert. He was sensible of the wrong Measures he had taken, and resolved to give himself Ease by redressing them, and directing his Counsels to salutary and popular Ends. But he was long in settling upon the Person with whom he should concert these Measures. At last he fixed upon Sir William Temple, just returned from the Congress at Nimeguen, where he had been Plenipotentiary; and the King was not deceived in his Choice, for he was a true Patriot, and faithful to his Prince and Country. With this Gentleman the King consulted the proper Methods to compass his Intentions; and they agreed in the first Place to dissolve the Privy-Council then in being, and call a new one. This new Council was to consist of thirty Persons, of whom fifteen were to be the chief Officers of the Crown and Household for the Time being; the other half being composed of Lords and Commoners who appeared to have the greatest Sway and Credit in both Houses, joined Being assisted by Sir William Temple.

A new Privy-Council called.

A.D. 1679. joined with some few others, whom the King out of any particular Inclination, might think fit to honour with a Place at that Board. The Ends proposed by this Constitution of Council were, first to unite the King with his Parliament, by taking the Leaders there into all Consultations of State; so that by making them Parties to the King's Counsels and Measures, all Complaints of the same in Parliament might be cut off. Or, secondly, if the ill Humours there should unexpectedly grow so outrageous, as to make a Dissolution necessary, it would be much more safely done by the King at the Head of such a popular Council, than any other Way.

While this was privately concerted between the King and Sir William Temple, the sudden Removal of the Prime Minister had produced at Court the Cabals and Intrigues usual upon such Revolutions. The Duke of Monmouth was become very considerable there by the King's extreme Fondness for him, and grown yet greater by the Absence of the Duke of York. He was then in the Height of Confidence with the Earl of Essex, Son of the brave and virtuous Lord Capel, who was beheaded for his Loyalty to King Charles the First, soon after his Master suffered. That Earl had been sent Ambassador to Denmark, was afterwards Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and was now in the Treasury. These two Lords joined with the Dukes of Portsmouth and Earl of Sunderland to bring the Lord Shaftsbury in Partnership with themselves into Affairs again. So strange Fortune or Dexterity had that Earl, that notwithstanding his notorious Double-dealing and Breaches of Faith, so conspicuous in the many Changes of Parties he had gone through, he had ever the Luck to find Persons who would not only favour, but believe and trust him even to their own Ruin; as afterwards proved the Case of these two Lords, and many others with them. But these Measures were disappointed by those the King took in the mean Time.

When this new Council was declared, it was received by the Court, the City, the Countrey, and in foreign Parts with universal Applause. But in the House of Commons, where the Contrary was most expected, it was received with the greatest Coldness. Those who had kindled the Flames in that House under Pretence of publick Ends, had too many private ones to serve by them to suffer their Extinction. And these were joined by many of the same Temper, who seeing themselves left out of this new Constitution, and thinking they were as deserving as those who were put in, resolved to shew their own Importance by the Mischief they could do. And these two Parties laboured hard, and the more fiercely because unjustly, to infuse a Mistrust of all that had been done. They pretended that all this was a Court Juggle to get Money; that they had been so often deceived from that Quarter, that it was best to have Patience, and see where Things would end, before they trusted to a fair Appearance.

However, the Council went on to deliberate on Expedients for the publick Quiet and Security. Three Things principally demanded their Cares. The first was to lay the Foundation of a good Agreement between the King and the Parliament. And this was to be done by finding some Security against the Dangers of Popery, apprehended upon the Succession of the Duke of York to the Crown; the Plot having heightened those Fears to that Degree, that the two Houses could bear no other Deliberation, till that great Point was settled. The second was to take Measures for the Security of Flanders and Holland, which were left in a very exposed Condition by the Peace of Nimeguen; as we above took Notice. The third was to give some Ease to Scotland, which was heavily pressed under the Government of the Duke of Lauderdale. The last of these could not be obtained of the King; his Answer to those who urged it to him admitting no Reply, namely, that none of them knew Scotland so well as himself. As to the second, it was easily settled to Satisfaction.

But the first proved a very intricate and perplexed Business; not by the Nature of the Thing, but because some found it their Interest to make it so. For the Earl of Shaftsbury made the Duke of Monmouth believe, that if Opportunity were taken by the present Heats to exclude the Duke of York from the Crown, he must of Course come to lie in the Duke's Place by the Affection the King bore him, and the Favour of the People. The Duke of Monmouth, who wanted a solid Judgment of his own, was apt to be guided by others; which made him fall too easily into those remote and chimerical Hopes, which proved his Ruin at last. So that these two Lords engaged their Party in an obstinate Resolution to admit of no other Security against the Dangers of Popery, than the entire Exclusion of the Duke of York from the Crown. The King on the other Hand was as obstinately resolved against it; but willing to agree to any Limitations whatsoever. And thus both Sides continuing inflexible, the Nation was left to be torn to Pieces between these opposite Powers.

About this Time Nathanael Reading, a Reading's Lawyer, was accused and found guilty of Trial. tampering with Bedloe to soften his Evidence against the Popish Lords in the Tower. He was sentenced to pay a thousand Pounds, and to stand in the Pillory. This strengthened the Belief of the Plot, as it seemed to be an Acknowledgment of the Truth of what Bedloe was to swear, since that Method of Defence was taken.

The Privy-Council agreed to draw up Limitations of the Crown upon the Succession of the Duke of York, which the King should propose to the Parliament, as a Security against the Dangers of Popery, if that Duke should ascend the Throne. Those Limitations were to be as follows: 1. All spiritual Promotions were to be put out of his Power.

A.D. 1679. The laudable Consultations of the Privy-Council.

The Duke of Monmouth entertains ambitious Thoughts.

Limitations of the Crown drawn up.

The King's Measures every where approved. Except in the House of Commons.

A.D. 1679. 2. In case of the King's Death, the Parliament then in being was to continue indissoluble for a competent Time; or if no Parliament should be then in being, the Members of the last before, without waiting for any Summons, were immediately to assemble. 3. Privy Counsellors, Judges, Lord Lieutenants, Deputy Lieutenants, and Officers of the Navy, were not to be removed without Authority of Parliament.

Proposed to the Parliament.

These Limitations the King agreed to, and proposed them to the Parliament, adding, that if any farther Security could be found by them that should not prejudice the Right of Succession, he would willingly consent to it.

But without Success.

But this Condescension was very ill received, and little Notice was taken of it; the Commons being warm upon another Scent.

The Earl of Danby pleads the King's Pardon; at which the Commons are enraged.

For the Earl of Danby had at last pleaded the King's Pardon at the Bar of the House of Lords, which the Commons were much incensed at. They were resolved to push him to the utmost, and voted that the Pardon was illegal and void; and the Speaker with the whole House went up to demand Judgment against him. But the House of Lords were not so clear in their Opinions about the Pardon, which was a Point that had never yet been determined against the Crown. So that the Earl insisting upon his Pardon, and desiring to be heard by his Council, the Lords appointed a Day to hear that Matter debated; and sent a Message to the Commons to acquaint them with it. But it set the House in a Flame immediately; and they resolved, that if any Commoner should presume to maintain the Validity of that Pardon without Consent of the House, he should be deemed a Betrayer of the Liberties of England.

A Bill to exclude the Duke of York brought in by the Commons.

While this Affair was depending, the Duke of Monmouth's and Lord Shaftsbury's Party were grown so prevalent in that House, that a Bill was ordered to be brought in for excluding the Duke of York from the Crown. But before it could go through the House, the Parliament was prorogued upon the following Occasion. Several Conferences had passed between the two Houses, about the Manner of trying the Earl of Danby and the Popish Lords; and at last a Committee was appointed of both Houses to consider of the Method of Proceeding. In this Committee the Commons insisted, that the Bishops should withdraw during the whole Trial. This Demand was grounded on a Custom introduced in the Times of Popery, in which the Clergy had entertained a Notion that it was inconsistent with the Purity of their Function, to be any ways concerned in taking away a Life, though it were by the Methods of Justice. This made them always withdraw from Judgments in capital Cases, which was a Rule constantly observed. The Reason of the Demand was, that the Validity of the Pardon would in the first Place come to be debated, when the Earl of Danby's Tryal should come on. Now as the Spiritual Lords did not use to retire from Trials in capital Cases till Judgment was just going to be pass'd, they would have by Consequence an Opportunity of voting in this Debate, which though it was only a Preliminary to the Trial, was in the present Case the Hinge upon which the Affair turned. And it was well known by the Commons, that the whole Weight of the Bench of Bishops would fall into the Scale opposite to theirs. This made them adhere firmly to this Demand. But the House of Lords suspicious of the least Alteration in the Forms of their Judicature, finding it was the constant Custom for the Bishops to continue upon the Trial till Guilty or not Guilty came to be pronounced, refused to consent. This produced insuperable Difficulties; both Houses being inflexible. And this Breach gave a Pretence for proroguing the Parliament, though the Bill of Exclusion was the true Reason.

The Parliament prorogued.

Soon after the Prorogation of the Parliament, News came of a Rebellion in Scotland, raised by the Field-Conventiclers; which Name took its rise from the following Cause. After Episcopacy was restored in Scotland, the Government there laboured to suppress Presbytery, which was still the Idol of very great Numbers. The Churches were restored to the Episcopal Clergy; and all preaching in any other Place was forbidden. Had the Clergy been careful to enforce these Changes by the Piety of their Lives, and the Care of their Function, this might have had a good Effect. But on the contrary, when they saw the People still apt to wander after their old Ministers, instead of reclaiming the straying Sheep by exemplary and attractive Behaviour, and learned and eloquent Preaching of their own, they called upon the temporal Power to drive them into their Folds by Force. This was executed with many Circumstances of arbitrary and tyrannical Violence. The People who were indeed in their own Natures perverse and untractable to a very high Degree, became ten Times more so by this Usage. At length when they found themselves shut out, not only from the Churches, but often from the Houses, they began to hold their Meetings in the Fields; where they often came armed to prevent their being disturbed by the legal Officers. This had been the State of Ecclesiastical Matters in Scotland, for a long Time; during which the Stubbornness on one Side, and the Oppressions on the contrary Side, kept up and heightened one another. The Fire had broke out once before in the Insurrection of Pentland-Hills, and now it flamed out a second Time.

The Rebellion was ushered in with a barbarous Murder of the Archbishop of St. Andrews. That Prelate had formerly been a Presbyterian and Covenanter; but had turned about upon the Restoration, and procured himself that See by doing so. He had been since a great Promoter of the violent Prosecutions against the Conventiclers, so that he was very much hated by them; and they laid a Design to take away his Life.

The Murder of the Archbishop of St. Andrews.

A.D. 1679. Life, and affected it in a most inhuman Manner. It happened that the Archbishop was going to his Episcopal See at St. Andrews, and some of these Men had Notice of it. Seven of them waited for him on that Road, well armed with Swords and Pistols. They came in Sight of his Coach within two Miles of St. Andrews, and galloped hard after it. He saw himself pursued, and his Coachman drove as hard as he could: But they soon overtook him, and having killed one of the Horses, and hamstringed the other, stopped the Coach. His Daughter who was with him came out, seeing her Father in Danger, and upon her Knees begged of them to spare his Life, but they threw her down, trampled upon her, and wounded her. At this sad Sight her Father came out to them, and told them he did not know he had injured any of them; but if he had, he was ready to make Reparation; desiring them to spare his Life, and promising that he would give them no Trouble for what they had done. Some of them were moved with Compassion, and one cried, Spare his grey Hairs; but the rest cried out, He must die, and the traitorous Villain, Judas, Enemy to God's People, must receive the Reward of his Apostacy. He then desired Time to pray, and told them, he would pray for them; but they replied, they cared not for his Prayers, for they were sure God would not bear so base a Dog as he was. When he heard this, he looked on one of them whom he thought he knew, and kneeled to him, and said, Sir, you are a Gentleman, I beg one last Favour of you, that since you are resolved I must die, you will spare the Life of my poor Child here; and for this Sir, give me your Hand. But as he reached out his own Hand to him, the barbarous Wretch cut it almost off with a broad Sword; and redoubling his Stroke, gave him another deep Wound over the Eye, with which he fell to the Ground. But raising himself upon his Knees again, he said, Gentlemen, it is enough, you have done your Work; and afterwards holding up his Hands as well as he could, cried out, Lord Jesus have Mercy upon my Soul, and receive my Spirit. While he was saying this, they all fell upon him, wounding him with their Swords in every Part of his Body. The last Words he was heard to say were, God forgive you, and I forgive you all; and soon after he expired. When these Wretches found he was dead, they turned to go away; but one of them saying he heard him groan, they came back, and to make sure Work, stirred about his Brains in the Skull with the Points of their Swords. Then they left him, and galloped off, leaving behind them a most shocking Instance of enthusiastick Rage and Cruelty.

The Field-
Conventiclers take up Arms.

Soon after this was done, the Field-Conventiclers assembled together; and making up a Body, proclaimed the Covenant, and burnt several Acts of Parliament made since the Restoration. They soon after grew to a Body of fifteen hundred Men, with which they possessed themselves of Glasgow. An Express of this was sent to London; and the King assembled a Council, in which it was A.D. 1679. agreed to send the Duke of Monmouth to suppress it. The Duke lost no Time, but went down to Scotland immediately, and joining some Troops he found in the North of England, with those that were already in Scotland, he quickly came up with the Rebels. They were increased in Number to above four Thousand, but were little better than a disorderly undisciplined Rabble; so that their enthusiastick Heat having had Time to cool, they became heartless and dispirited at the Sight of the King's Troops. There was a Bridge over the River Clide, which they might have defended, but they took no Care of it, but sent some to treat with the Duke of Monmouth. He told them if they would lay down their Arms and submit, he would interpose with the King for their Pardon; but that he would not treat with them as long as they continued in Arms. When they received this Answer, some were for yielding, and others against it; so that they were all in such Confusion, that the King's Forces came over the Bridge, and fell upon them, without the least Attempt on their Side to prevent it. And they did not stand the first Charge, but as soon as they were attacked, threw down their Arms, and ran away. Two or three Hundred of them were killed, and twelve Hundred taken Prisoners. And this short Skirmish put an End to this Rebellion, which is commonly known by the Name of Bothwell-Bridge, the Place where the Fight was. The Duke of Monmouth returned in Triumph, and was received by the King and Court with great Affection and Applause.

The Duke of Monmouth
goes against them.

And routs
them.

In the mean time came on the Trial of five Jesuits for the Plot; namely, Thomas Jesuits. Whitebread, John Fenwick, William Harcourt, John Gavan, and Anthony Turner. At this Trial appeared a new Evidence, Stephen Dugdale, who had been Bailiff to Lord Aston, a Popish Lord in Staffordshire. His Carriage and Behaviour gave more Credit to the Plot, than that of Oates and Bedloe; for he appeared like a Man of Sense and Sobriety; whereas Oates made himself odious by an unsufferable Licence in speaking of all Persons; and Bedloe was a scandalous Libertine. But in some time this new Witness proved as bad as the rest. Oates and Bedloe repeated the Evidence they had given before; excepting that Bedloe charged them upon his own Knowledge with what he had before only spoken of by Hearsay. And the Reason he gave was that the Practices of Reading, mentioned above, had engaged him to soften his Evidence; he being told that the Popish Lords would take as well any Kindness done to the Jesuits, as to themselves. This was an open Confession of Perjury, which ought to have set him aside for a Witness ever after. And Judge Wylde, a worthy and ancient Judge, told him when he said this, that he was a perjured Man, and ought to come no more into Courts, but go home and repent. But People were not yet cool enough for Reflexion; so that not only

A.D. 1679. only this passed over, but the Judge was turned out for his Freedom. Dugdale confirmed Oates and Bedloe's Evidence, by Accounts of the Consultations of the Jesuits in Staffordshire about the same Time. Brance too added his Part towards the Charge against Harcourt, and said, moreover, that he told him of 50000 Men that were to be in Readiness to establish Popery.

The Prisoners in their Defence brought a great many Witnesses from St. Omers; who all said, that Oates was at that Place at the Time he said he was in London; and mentioned very particular Circumstances which confirmed their Testimony. Oates in Answer brought six or seven Persons who swore they saw him in London at that Time. But one of these afterwards confessed himself perjured. Upon the whole the Jury brought them in Guilty; the Testimony of the St. Omers Scholars being got over by a Notion that prevailed in that credulous Time, that Papists have Liberty to commit any Crime that will serve their Religion. It is indeed certain from undoubted Facts, that some of the Romish Church have upon those Occasions made very free both with their Words and Oaths; but it was carrying the Consequence too far, to lay it down as a Rule that Papists are therefore never to be believed. The five Jesuits continued to the very last, denying in the most solemn Manner all that was sworn against them.

They are executed.

Langhorn's Trial.

Their Trial was succeeded by that of Mr. Richard Langhorn; Oates swore, that he was acquainted with the Consultations for killing the King, and consenting to them; and that he had in his Custody the Patents for the Lords in the Tower; and one to himself to be Advocate of the Army. Bedloe swore, he had seen him register treasonable Letters relating to the Plot. In answer to this Evidence, he called the same Witnesses that had been brought the Day before to prove Oates perjured. And whereas Oates had named Mrs. Grove's House, at which he said he lay during the Time of the Consult; he produced Mrs. Grove to testify that he never was there about that Time, which was confirmed by her Maid. He argued also many Things relating to the Improbability of the Evidence; but the Times were not yet cool enough to bear Reason: So that he was brought in guilty and condemned with the five Jesuits, who were tried the Day before him. He was reprieved for some Time in hopes that he would make Discoveries; but he persisted to the last in affirming, that he could make none, and that all that was sworn against him was false. He spent the Time allowed him in writing some devout and well composed Meditations.

The Parliament was prorogued in form to the 14th of August; but when the Time drew near of their assembling again, the King was unwilling to meet them. He found the Current ran so strong in the House of Commons for the Bill of Exclusion, which he was resolved not to consent to; that he despaired of coming to any Agreement with them. So A.D. 1679. he determined at last to dissolve the Parliament by Proclamation; which was accordingly done, and another summoned to meet October following.

The Parliament dissolved.

In about a Week after this, came on the Trial of Sir George Wakeman, with William Marshall, and James Corker, two Benedictine Monks, and William Rumley, a Lay Brother of that Order. Against Wakeman, Oates swore, that a Letter was sent by him to one Ashby, a Jesuit then at the Bath, containing Directions for the Management of his Health; but that in the same Letter, Sir George took Occasion to mention his Design to kill the King. Oates related also his Story about the Queen's consenting to the King's Death; though this was no Evidence against Wakeman; but it served to make it thought that he, being the Queen's Physician, was likely to engage in the same Design. Bedloe swore he had received from Harcourt, who was executed, a Bill of 2000 Pounds, in Part of a greater Sum, which was given him to poison the King, as Sir George and Harcourt both told Bedloe. Against Marshall and Corker, Oates and Bedloe both swore that they were privy to the Design of killing the King, and that they were consenting to a Consult of their Order, for raising 6000 Pounds to carry on that Design. Oates swore the same against Rumley, but Bedloe had nothing to say against him. So that he was acquitted of course.

The Trial of Sir George Wakeman, and others.

But by this Time Men were a little more calmed than they used to be. The Executions that had been made of so many Persons, began to raise Pity in the compassionate Tempers of Englishmen; and the obstinate Denials of those who suffered increased the Concern, and People came to call in question the Truth of many Things they believed at first, when they found them supported only by the Testimony of three or four infamous Wretches, and denied by the most solemn Protestations of dying Men. So that their Minds were prepared to receive the evident Proofs of the Perjury of the Witnesses which appeared at this Trial.

Sir George Wakeman said in his Defence, that it was true he sent a Letter of Directions to Ashby at the Bath; but he proved by his own Servant, and the Apothecary at the Bath, that it was not written by himself, but dictated by him to his Servant, and that there was no mention in it of the King or Queen; and besides, produced the very Letter. Upon this, Oates was forced to say, That was not the Letter he saw; but he was easily answered by the Improbability that a Man should write two Letters upon the same Account. He observed also a great Blunder Oates had made; by saying that in the Letter he saw Sir George ordered Ashby to use a Milk Diet with the Bath, which were two Things entirely inconsistent. He observed farther, that Oates at first charged him upon Hearsay, and being asked whether he knew any Thing more against Sir George Wakeman, he solemnly protested he did not; whereas

A.D. 1679. whereas he now swore against him on his own Knowledge. Oates in Answer to this pretended he was then so weak and weary, he did not know what he said; which Evasion had passed at Coleman's Trial, but Men were now grown cooler. Another gross Falshood happened to be found in his Evidence against Corker, who he swore was the Superior of his Order; whereas it was proved that another Person was Superior, and had been so for some Years. Upon the Whole, the Jury acquitted the Prisoners; only Corker and Marshall being Priests, and as such obnoxious to other Laws, were remanded to Prison.

The Prisoners acquitted.

The King falls sick.

Which occasions a great Alteration at Court.

The King soon after fell sick at Windsor with a Fever, in which, though he soon recovered, the Fits were so violent at first, as made Men apprehensive of Danger; which caused an universal Terror and Concern in the Nation while the Sickness lasted, and introduced a great Revolution at Court afterwards from the following Causes. Upon the late Alteration made there by the Imprisonment of the Earl of Danby, the Authority and Confidence of prime Minister came to be parted among four; the Lord Sunderland, Lord Effex, Lord Halifax, and Sir William Temple. The last of these was fonder of his Ease than of Honours; so that in no long Time after he had brought about the new Constitution abovementioned, he began to withdraw from Court to his Retirement in the Countrey, leaving the Cares of Business to the other three Lords, and touching them himself but by the Bye. So that at the Time of the King's Illness, the Earl of Effex and Lord Halifax were about him, in the Height of Confidence with him. The Duke of Monmouth was at the same Time too in his Height of Favour with the King, as well as of Popularity, though he had no Influence on the Steps of the Court, being unable to hinder the Prorogation of the Parliament, which was done entirely against the Will of all his Party. While the King was ill, the Lord Shaftsbury had threatened to revenge this Prorogation upon the Advisers, meaning the Lords Sunderland, Effex and Halifax. The two last seeing the Duke of Monmouth so great, who was led at Pleasure by Lord Shaftsbury, began to fear he might have Power to put his Threats in Execution, if the King should die. So they cast about to save themselves, thinking the Lord Sunderland secure by his Relation to Lord Shaftsbury. To this End they opposed to the Duke of Monmouth, his powerful Rival, the Duke of York; whom they persuaded the King to send for with all Hastie and Secrecy, at the Time his Sickness was so violent. The Duke came Post from Flanders to the King at Windsor; but upon finding him well recovered, it was agreed that the Journey should be received by the King and three Lords as coming from himself, and with great Signs of Surprise. But there is scarce any Dissimulation so exquisite that a jealous Enemy will not see through. The Earl of Shaftsbury doubted the Truth, and enflamed the Duke of Monmouth so much more against those Lords upon that Account, A.D. 1679. that they found no Way to secure themselves, but by the Ruin of those two. And they succeeded so well in their Endeavours, that the Duke of Monmouth was disgraced and sent over into Holland; and Lord Shaftsbury turned out of the Council where he was President. But the Duke of York, after he had gained this Victory, found himself by the Necessity of Affairs, obliged to retire again; which he did, first to Brussels, and then with the King's Leave into Scotland.

The Duke of York returns.

The Duke of Monmouth and Lord Shaftsbury disgraced.

By this Time all Hopes of any Good from the new Measures the King had entered into, were entirely dissipated; and a melancholy Scene succeeded to the End of this Reign. The Blame of this seems to lie entirely at the Earl of Shaftsbury's Door, who, though brought into Affairs at that Time, found himself without that Height of Credit and Authority he desired; and therefore in Revenge, kept up all the former Heats in the House of Commons, by the Interest he had with the Duke of Monmouth, and his Party. It was indeed an amazing Thing, that so many Men of Integrity and Understanding as were in that House, would deliver up themselves to one who had been so little before a Counsellor, and Instrument of arbitrary Power; and can only be accounted for by a Spirit of Infatuation and Madness, with which the wisest are at some Times possessed; since there cannot be a more evident or certain Maxim of State than this, That such an one may easily turn a mischievous Incendiary, but never become an honest Patriot.

The Practices the Earl of Shaftsbury had entered into with the late House of Commons, he continued in the new one; and they had that Effect, that the King seeing what Temper the Parliament was like to meet in, resolved to prorogue it for three Months longer. He had once determined to prorogue it for a Twelve-month, and declared that to be his Mind in Council with so much Stiffness, that he would not suffer any Thing to be spoke there to the contrary. But he afterwards changed the twelve Months to three, and a Proclamation was issued accordingly. Who advised the King to this Prorogation is not very clear; for the Earls of Effex and Halifax, who appeared the highest in Confidence, were so more in Shew than in Reality. It seems to be the first Step the King made towards that resolute Conduct he fell into afterwards; which in a little Time turned the Scale on his Side, and brought in a perfectly new Scene of Affairs.

The Parliament prorogued.

Soon after this Prorogation, a new Discovery broke out, which in those Times were very much in Fashion. One Dangerfield, a very great Rogue, and a very bold and dexterous one, was the Informer. This Fellow had found Means to hide in the Lodgings of one Colonel Roderick Mansel, a Bundle of seditious and dangerous Letters; and when this was done, gave Information to the Custom-House Officers of some prohibited Goods there; and came with them upon the Search,

The Meal-Tub Plot.

A.D. 1679. his Intention being, that those Letters might be discovered there, as it were, by Accident. What his real Design was in this, is hard to guess; for he was so impudent a Liar, that no Credit can be given to what he said of it afterwards himself. But it happened that the Officers missed the Place where he had put the Letters, so that he was forced to find them himself; and as soon as he saw them, before he had Time to look upon them, he cried out, Here is Treason! The Officers carried the Papers to Court, but the Forgery appeared so evident, that they were ordered to be returned, and nothing was done upon them. But Colonel Mansel, who knew Dangerfield and his Character, and heard he had been concerned in the finding the Letters, took Pains to seek him out, and discover the Roguery. At last he found him at the House of one Mrs. Cellier, a Popish Midwife, a Woman of a good Share of Wit, but a bold lewd Creature, whom Dangerfield had been long, and, no doubt, very well acquainted with. The Colonel caused him to be brought before the Council, where after a full Hearing, the Imposture was detected, and Dangerfield sent to Newgate. Two Days after, in searching Cellier's House, a Paper Book was found hid in a Meal-Tub, which contained the Scheme of a Plot, which was to be sworn against several eminent Persons among the Protestants; as Lord Shaftsbury, Effex, Hallifax, and many others. This raised new Alarms and Conjectures; and Dangerfield, upon hearing this, pretended to make a Discovery of the whole Design. He swore that the Project was contrived between Mrs. Cellier and the Countess of Powis, to take off the Odium of the Popish Plot from their Religion, by inventing another among the Protestants. But Dangerfield hoped to become now an Evidence as great as Oates; so that he not only produced this Relation, but added many Things about his being tempted to kill the King, and the Earl of Shaftsbury; and this he swore against the Earl of Castlemaine, Husband to the famous Duchess of Cleveland, the King's former Mistress, the Lady Powis, and Mrs. Cellier. This last Charge was very unkind to his old Acquaintance; but the Friendships of such loose Creatures do not use to be very constant, and perhaps too there had been some Quarrels between them, which frequently attend such lewd Intercourses. But when the Matter came to be tried in Court, Dangerfield was proved so infamous a Wretch, that no Credit could be given to what he swore; so that all whom he accused were acquitted, and he was thrown aside for a profligate Impostor. What was the real Truth of this Affair, is very hard, and not material to know; but it served at first to keep up the Alarms and Fears Mens Minds were filled with; and afterwards to weaken the Credit of the Popish Plot, when it was found how easily Impostures might be invented of the same Kind.

During the Interval of Parliament, the Lord Shaftsbury employed all his Arts to keep alive till the next Sessions, the Flames A.D. 1679. that had been kindled without Doors. In the City, Occasion was taken from the Custom of burning the Pope in Effigie, which the Zeal of our Ancestors introduced upon Queen Elizabeth's Accession-Day, to celebrate the same in such a Manner, as might draw great Crowds of Spectators, and raise and inflame the Passions of the Weak, who are sure to make a very great Majority in all numerous Assemblies. So on the 17th of Nov. The Pope burnt on the 17th of November. a long Procession went through the City from Bishopsgate to Temple-Bar; in which the Pope, attended by his constant Companion the Devil, was carried with great Solemnity, and accompanied with Cardinals, Priests and Monks of several Orders. But the most moving Part of the Procession, was a Figure representing Sir Edmondbury Godfrey carried on Horseback, which to make the greater Impression, was attended by a Bellman; with a doleful Sound, putting the People in Mind of his barbarous Murther. This idle Shew was attended with great Multitudes, and made a strong Impression upon silly People, who are always found at such Sightings in great Abundance.

All other Methods were taken to raise Other Arts used to inflame the People. Fears among the People, and give Uneasiness to the King, that could be thought of. And because the Dangers of Popery were a standing Topick, Pamphlets were written and dispersed, in which the Cruelties of that Religion were represented in such frightful Colours as might terrifie and distract Mens Minds, upon the View of a Popish Successor. And because it was apprehended that the King would not suffer the Parliament to sit upon that Day to which they were prorogued, tumultuary Petitions were set on Foot in most Places to be presented to the King for the sitting of the Parliament at that Time; and he was pestered with several to that Purpose, attended by great Numbers. The Duke of Monmouth was sent for, and came over again to England; and instead of waiting on the King, made Progresses through several Counties; many Thousands coming to see him, whom he studied to oblige by all the Arts of Popularity. And this was the Course held on by that Party till the Parliament actually sat, which was not till the next October.

But all these Machinations ended in the Ruin of that restless Head that directed them. By straining so hard, he only came to find that the Weight was above his Strength; and when he had raised the Stone as high as he could, it rolled back upon him with such a Violence, that he narrowly escaped being crushed to Pieces by it. The King was roused from his natural Indolence by the continued Provocations he had met with; and the Steps taken by the seditious Party, were so like those by which his Father was ruined, as alarmed him with very just Apprehensions. But by his Father's Fate he was directed to use contrary Measures to his; and he took the Warning, and by a steady and resolute Conduct, kept the Crown upon

A.D. 1679. upon his Head, and procured himself at last Victory and Quiet. He rejected the Petitions for the sitting of a Parliament with all the Marks of Displeasure to those that brought them. And to shew his Resentment and Firmness, soon after he had received the first Intelligence of the Practices on foot to procure those Petitions, he issued out a Proclamation to prorogue the Parliament ten Months longer than he at first proposed. He was encouraged in this by a Party that was daily increasing; which took its rise from a Suspicion that sober and dispassionate Men began to entertain of the Scope and Tendency of these tumultuous Proceedings, which appeared too riotous and seditious to be directed to any good End. The Heats which the Popish Plot had raised, began to cool with many Persons, and the wicked Designs carried on under that Cover grew more and more apparent to Men of Penetration. These Notions and Suspicions gaining Ground every Day, the Nation which was before unanimous in the Belief and Prosecution of the Plot, became divided into two Parties. The first of these continued in the same Heats as before, and were blind to every Thing but the Dangers of Popery; while the other began to call the Truth of the whole Plot in question, and to apprehend a second Time the Troubles of 1641. These differing Sentiments were soon improved into furious Animosities; Mens Passions being, as is natural, worked up and heightened by Contradiction. The Diffension growing more and more violent, the two Parties began to invent opprobrious Names for each other. Those who believed the Plot looked on their Opposites as Papists in disguise, and called them by the Name of Tories, a common Name for the wild Irish Robbers, who are all Papists. Those on the contrary Side looked on their Adversaries as Rebels and Enemies of the Church; and in return bestowed upon them the Title of Whigs, which was the Name given the Scotch Conventiclers, who were sworn Enemies to Episcopacy, and frequently in Rebellion. But in some Time it came to pass, that these Names which were at first given and taken as Terms of Reproach, came to be looked on and assumed as Titles of Honour by the Zealots on both Sides. And this was the Rise of those two famous Words, which have kept the English Nation in a Fit of Madness for above forty Years together.

The Rise of the Names of Whig and Tory.

The King gets the Ascendant over the seditious Party.

But this Difference of Parties, as it was a great Encouragement to the King, so it proved a great Shock to the Leaders of the discontented; it being a Blow they did not look for. They had now fair Warning of their Danger if they went on, and were offered the Choice of Submission with Security, or Obstinacy with Peril. But that Party being led by a Head of deep and dark Designs, were persuaded to go on with their Intrigues, in prospect of gaining their Point at last; and many were thus drawn in to their Ruin. For the loyal Party, as they called themselves, daily increased, and with the King at their Head grew so powerful, that they prevailed over the other, some of whom afterwards lost their Lives, which others avoided only by Banishment.

Jan. 26. The Parliament met according to the Prorogation; but it was only to be prorogued a second Time to April 15. the King telling them he found a longer Interval necessary for quieting Men's Minds. And two Days after this, he sent for the Duke of York from Scotland. The Resentment of these Proceedings wrought so upon the Lord Ruffel, Lord Cavendish, Sir Henry Capel, and Mr. Powle, four leading Members in the House of Commons, who had been upon that Account taken into the new Privy-Council, that they desired Leave to withdraw from thence, under Pretence of being unable to serve the King any longer while the present Counsels were followed, which he readily granted. This Step of theirs seems to have been owing to the Persuasions of Lord Shaftsbury, who desiring to strengthen his Party by the Countenance it would receive from Gentlemen of their Figure and Worth, found it necessary to make such a Breach between them and the King, as this Retreat must in course produce. But it seems to have been a great Error in those Patriots to do this, even upon their own Principles; the Presence of a faithful Counsellor being certainly never more necessary, than when Princes are inclining to unsafe or dangerous Measures. Their Example was followed by several others, who desired to be dismissed from their Posts; all which only served to offend the King, and give him Reason to suspect turbulent and dangerous Combinations.

A.D. 1680. The Parliament prorogued.

Upon which many Members of the Privy-Council withdrew.

About this Time some Prosecutions were on foot arising from the Plot. One Sir Thomas Gascoigne, a Yorkshire Gentleman of eighty five Years of Age, was tried at Westminster for High-Treason, upon the Accusation of two who had been in his Family, named Bolton and Mowbray. But the Jury acquitted him. The same happened not long after to Richard Tasborough, Esq; indicted upon the same Account; as also to Mrs. Cellier abovementioned. The Earl of Castlemaine was indicted upon Dangerfield's Evidence; but acquitted also.

Sir Thomas Gascoigne's Tryal.

He is acquitted.

As also the Earl of Castlemaine.

Mean Time the King's Party gained Ground; and in Answer to the Petitions for the sitting of the Parliament, Addresses came up from many Counties, in which they expressed their Abhorrence of the seditious Manner in which those Petitions were promoted. And thus the Names of Petitioners and Abhorers came to be thrown at each other, by the contending Parties. The Report mentioned above of the King's Marriage with the Mother of the Duke of Monmouth, being now again set about, the King repeated once more his Declaration to the contrary in the most solemn Manner; which was also registered in the Court of Chancery.

Petitioners and Abhorers.

A.D. 1680. Bedloe died this Summer at Bristol. As he was on his Death-bed, the Lord Chief Justice North went to him, being then on the Western Circuit, and examined him in those tremendous Circumstances, about the Truth of what he had deposed. He denied that the Duke or the Queen ever had any Intention to kill the King; but said, that all that he had deposed besides was true, which he attested on the Word of a dying Man. And constantly affirming this, he passed into another World. All this appears very amazing and very startling; since it is certain his Evidence was full of the greatest Improbabilities; that he sometimes changed it, and sometimes contradicted himself. And as to his Life and Character, they were as wicked and infamous as could be. These Considerations seem at least to balance his dying Attestations; and how far so bad a Man, after such a Life, might be given up to a feared and hardened Conscience at last, I leave to others to judge.

Bedloe's Death.

Confirms the Truth of what he swore with his dying Words.

A Poll for Sheriffs at Guild-hall.

This Year there was a tumultuous Election of Sheriffs at Guild-hall; which was the first of its kind, though not the last. The Method used before in the chusing of Sheriffs was this. A Person being pitched on that was of Figure in the City to serve that Office, the Lord Mayor used to nominate him Sheriff by drinking to him with a particular Ceremony. This Person was then put up at the Common Hall, and used constantly to be elected Sheriff of London, together with some other, who was made Sheriff of Middlesex. This Method had been continued for many Years; the Place of Sheriff being of that Nature, both as to Trouble and Expence, that no Man used to take it that could avoid it; and many had paid the Fine, though it was a considerable Sum, to be freed from the Fatigue of it. But now when the Nation was divided between two furious Parties, the Place of Sheriff began to appear of Importance, on Account of the Power they have of impannelling, and therefore of chusing, the Jury-men in all Tryals. So that when the Person drank to by the Lord Mayor was put up, the Common-Hall, in which the Whigs had a Majority, rejected him, and caused two other Persons to be put up, which were Mr. Slingsby Bethel, and Mr. Henry Cornish; who were afterwards elected, though not without a Poll; which was used for the first Time upon this Occasion.

A Change in the Ministry.

During the Summer a Revolution happened at Court. The Lord Effex and Lord Hallifax decayed in their Credit with the King, who was entering into Measures not agreeable to their Sentiments. These Lords were not long in finding this out; and soon after the same appeared more openly. For though they were mentioned in the Meal-Tub Plot, as Persons to be sworn against, which made them particularly concerned to know the Truth of that Affair, they were left out of the secret Examinations about it. This they resented so much, that Lord Effex left the Treasury, and Lord Hallifax went down to his Countrey-Seat. This voluntary Removal made room for Mr. Hyde, afterwards Earl of Rochester, and Mr. Godolphin, afterwards Earl of Godolphin, to fill their Places in the Council, and in the King's Confidence. And these two, together with the Lord Sunderland, who kept his Post, composed the Ministry, in whose Hands the Secret and Management of Affairs lay. These Ministers did their utmost to give Content and Quiet to the People's Minds; and because the Power of France was a Subject of popular Fears, they concluded a defensive Alliance with Spain against that Crown; and proposed to do the same with other Courts and States of Europe.

But these Steps gave Apprehensions to the Earl of Shaftsbury. He found himself baffled in his Measures without Doors by the King's steady Resolution, and the Change daily growing in Men's Minds; and he began to fear that his Party in the two Houses might be induced to desert him. There were among these many Persons of great Influence upon the Score of their Worth and Probity, who took that Side out of a sincere Concern for the Protestant Religion, which they thought could be secured no other Way but by the Exclusion of the Duke of York. The general Reputation of these Men for Honesty and Disinterestedness was that which supported the Party; the Lord Shaftsbury's own Character upon those Accounts being very unequal to such a Weight. So he found himself in Danger of being abandoned, if any popular Counsels at Court should, by giving Satisfaction to those real Patriots, assuage those Jealousies which were his only Security. Therefore he found himself obliged to cut off all Possibility of future Confidence or Reconciliation, by engaging them, while their Fears were yet warm, in some desperate Step that might cause an irreparable Breach. And he effected this, by persuading several Lords and Commoners of Rank to go with him, and present the Duke of York as a Recusant in Westminster-hall. This was a notable Strain of Policy in Lord Shaftsbury for his own Security; because it united so many considerable Persons in the carrying on his Designs to exclude the Duke from the Crown, which they were now engaged to in their own Defence, after such a Provocation given. But it was a mighty Error in those amongst them who were true Lovers of their Countrey, to enter so desperately into Measures which appeared every Day less and less practicable, and could therefore end in nothing but their own Ruin, or that of their Countrey by a Civil War.

The Duke of York presented as a Recusant.

But the Boldness of this Attempt startled some of the Ministers to that Degree, that they gave their Advice in Council that the Duke should be sent away again before the Parliament met; and though the rest of the Council were of another Mind, they prevailed upon the King to agree to it. So the Duke went away to Scotland the Day before

A.D. 1680. the Parliament met; but not without Affairances of his Brother's Steadiness in the Affair of the Exclusion.

The Parliament meets.

Their intemperate Heat.

Oct. 21. the Parliament met. The King told them in his Speech of the Alliances he had made with Spain to restrain the Power of France, and of his Readiness to do any Thing for the Security of the Protestant Religion, that might leave the Crown in its legal Course of Descent. The Commons returned to their House, and chose William Williams, Esq; their Speaker. But the Flames that had raged in the former House, were raised in this again by the same Breath that had kindled them before. They fell upon several of their Members who had been Abhorrrers of the late Petitions, and presented an Address against Sir George Jefferies, desiring that he might be removed from publick Offices. They also sent their Serjeant at Arms into several Parts of England, to bring up Abhorrrers as Delinquents. This was very arbitrary, and a Mark of extravagant Heat, unbecoming the Dignity of such an Assembly. But as this Proceeding was notoriously unjust, it gave Occasion for an Enquiry to be made into their Right of imprisoning any but their own Members. And many to whom the Serjeant was sent refused to come up. One Person who was committed by them, moved for his Habeas Corpus, and one of the Judges had the Courage to grant it. So that they rather lost than gained Ground by these furious Proceedings; not to mention the Scandal and Indecency of them.

The Exclusion-Bill brought in by the Commons.

But they were not long before they took up the Exclusion-Bill again. By the late Attack upon the Duke of York, those concerned in it were so rivetted to one Interest, that they could propose no Safety to themselves till the Exclusion was compassed. So in five Days after the Lord Russel moved, that the House would consider of Measures for securing the Protestant Religion. This was seconded by many of the Members; and after many Debates upon that Subject, a Motion was made, that a Committee might be appointed to bring in a Bill to disable the Duke of York from inheriting the Crown of these Realms. This was opposed by some, who moved that some Expedients might be rather thought of that might secure Religion, without breaking into the lineal Descent. But these were overpowered by so great a Majority, that their Opposition only served, as is usual in such Cases, to make the Stream run the more fiercely the other Way. So a Committee was appointed, and a Bill brought in accordingly; which, though vigorously opposed by some few Members, passed the House by a great Majority, and was carried up to the Lords for their Concurrence, by almost the whole Body of the Commons. But it met with a very different Reception in that House. The Dignity and Splendor of the Peerage being derived from the Prince, produces in Return among that Body, a profound and peculiar Veneration for the Crown and its Prerogatives; the Glory and Majesty of which reflects a Lustre on A.D. 1680. their own Privileges and Honours. So that factious or popular Notions make their Way with great Difficulty and Resistance in that House; the Members of which have been always accustomed to look upon the Distinctions of Birth and Rank with a kind of superstitious Reverence. Hence it is that the Body of the Peers have always been a Guard and Defence to the Rights of the Crown; and jealous of the least Invasions upon them; as it proved in the Affair of this Bill. For notwithstanding the strenuous Endeavours of the Lords Shaftsbury, Effex, Sunderland, and some others, it was thrown out by the House of Lords by a great Majority; the No's being sixty three, and the Yea's only thirty.

Rejected by the Lords.

The rejecting the Bill in this manner, set the House of Commons in a Fury; and because the Lord Hallifax, who by some secret Causes was carried about to the Court again, appeared at the Head of the Debates against the Exclusion-Bill, and by his Reasonings influenced the House, with great Diminution to Lord Shaftsbury, over whom he visibly triumphed, they presented an Address to the King to remove him from his Presence and Councils for ever. This was a very ill-judged Proceeding, and brought great Scandal upon them; it being such a notorious Infraction of all Freedom in Debates, as was most apparent and inexcusable.

Which puts the Commons in a Flame.

But their Resentments fell most heavily on the Lord Stafford, who had been impeached by them of High-Treason, and was soon after brought to Trial in Westminster-hall, with the Ceremonies usual upon those Impeachments, the Lord Chancellor being made Lord High Steward for that Time. The Evidence against him were Dugdale, Oates, and one Turberville, a new Evidence lately come in. The Sum of what they swore was, that the Lord Stafford was engaged in a Design to take away the King's Life, and to introduce the Popish Religion; and Dugdale swore, that the Lord Stafford had offered him 500*l.* to kill the King. Turberville also swore the Lord Stafford had proposed to him at Paris to kill the King. The Lord Stafford in his Defence proved, that he was near the Bath at the Time when Dugdale swore he was in Staffordshire; and denied solemnly that he had ever seen Turberville at Paris. He then made Remarks upon the vicious Lives and Poverty of the Witnesses, which might naturally lead them into Perjury, when so much was to be got by it.

This was the Sum of his Defence. But He is found when Judgment was given upon him, he guilty. was found guilty by fifty five Lords, and acquitted only by thirty one; so that Sentence was passed upon him by the Lord High Steward. His Behaviour throughout was very composed and affecting; denying in the most solemn Manner, and with all the Marks of Sincerity, every Thing that had been sworn against him.

A.D. 1680.

Makes some Discoveries, but denies the Plot he was charged with.

The Barbarity of Bethel and Cornish to him.

He is beheaded.

Warm Resolves of the Commons.

Addresses the King to consent to the Exclusion.

The Council divided upon it.

During the Interval between Sentence and Execution, he was much urged to make Discoveries, as the only Means to save his Life. He promised to discover all he knew, and was brought to the Bar of the House of Lords. He gave there an Account of some Measures that had been taken at the beginning of the King's Reign to gain some Ease to the Roman Catholics; but that these Measures had been quashed by Chancellor Hyde, and were in themselves perfectly legal, and to be carried on by Parliamentary Methods. As to the Plot for which he was accused, he continued to deny the least Knowledge of any such Design.

Bethel and Cornish, the Sheriffs, did a very shocking Thing with respect to this unfortunate Nobleman. For when they understood that the King had changed the Execution of the Sentence to beheading, as is always done to Persons of Quality, they presented a Petition to the Commons, in which they set forth their Doubts whether the King had it in his Power to alter the Sentence. This was very foolish, as well as cruel, it being the only Way to save his Life, by alarming the King in defence of his Prerogative. But the Leaders in the House were wiser; and to prevent all Delays they got a Resolution passed, that the House is content with the Execution of the Sentence by way of beheading. And soon after (Dec. 29.) it was executed accordingly, under which the Lord Stafford behaved himself in a Manner becoming a good Man and a good Christian, denying constantly all that had been sworn against him. His Blood was the last that was shed upon Account of this Plot.

Notwithstanding the Bill of Exclusion was thrown out by the Lords, the Commons were still busy and restless to bring about that Point some Way or other. The King had made another Speech to them, in which he repeated his Offers of concurring in any Security for the Protestant Religion, that might not interrupt the lineal Descent. The Commons upon this resolved themselves into a Grand Committee, where they passed many warm Resolutions; that a Bill be brought in for banishing all considerable Papists; that Religion and Liberties are in danger so long as there is a Prospect that the Duke of York will succeed to the Crown; that Bills be brought in for an Association of the King's Protestant Subjects; for frequent Parliaments; for continuing the Judges quam diu se bene gesserint; and against illegal Exactions of Money. Then in Answer to the King's Speech they drew up an Address, in which they requested him, in Consideration of the Dangers that would arise from the Succession of the Duke of York to the Crown, he would please to depart from the Reservation in his Speech.

This Address was of too much Importance to receive an immediate Answer; and when it came before the Council there was a Division about it. Sir William Temple proposed, that the King should avoid a positive Answer, and excuse it to the Commons, by representing to them the Importance of this Affair, and the Necessity of knowing the Sense of both Houses before he declared himself; and that if they would concur in any Bill or Address to that Purpose, he would let them know his Mind. By this he might avoid a direct Breach with the Commons, and yet secure himself from any future Troubles of the same kind; there being no Danger that the two Houses should concur in any Application of that Nature. But others of a less mild Disposition, or who wanted to bring the King to a Disuse of Parliaments, having the other Measures in view which afterwards were put in Practice, advised a positive Denial of their Request, let them take it how they pleased, and this last Advice prevailed; and Sir William Temple carried the King's Answer to the House.

While this was in Agitation at the Council Board, the Zeal of the Commons against Popery, made them think of a Bill for the strengthening of the Protestants, by some Indulgence of Dissenters, which was brought in and passed both Houses. Some Part of their Time was spent in drawing up Articles of Impeachment against the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, for stifling the Plot, and unjustly prosecuting some Writers and Sellers of Pamphlets. But at last on the 5th of January they read the King's Message to them, which they had suffered to lie three Days without taking any publick Notice of it. The Purport of it was to let them know, that he was sorry to find them so set upon the Bill of Exclusion, that they would think of no other Remedies, but that he was confirmed in his Opinion against that Bill by the Judgment of the House of Lords, who rejected it. So that the only Answer he could send to that Address, was to recommend to them the Consideration of some other Means for the securing of the Protestant Religion, in which he promised his Concurrence.

But this was so far from giving Satisfaction to the Commons, that they flew into the most violent Heats; and that very Day resolved, that there could be no Security or Safety for the Protestant Religion, the King's Life or Government of this Nation, without passing a Bill to exclude the Duke of York; and that all other Means without it, would be not only insufficient, but dangerous. And to carry the Difference to the utmost Height, to this Resolution they added another, that till a Bill be passed for excluding the Duke of York, the House could not give any Supply to his Majesty. They voted farther, that those who advised the King to adhere to that Opinion against the Exclusion-Bill, were Promoters of Popery, and Enemies to the King and Kingdom. And the Storm gathering Strength by Continuance, they fell upon several of the King's Counsellors whom they suspected, as Lord Hallifax, Mr. Hyde, the Earls of Worcester, Clarendon, and Feverham; and voted an Address that they might be removed from all Places

A.D. 1680.

A.D. 1681.

The King refuses his Consent.

The Commons in violent Heats.

A.D. 1681. Places of Honour and Profit, and from the King's Presence and Councils for ever. And because they had no Evidence of any Misdemeanor whereon to ground such an Address against them, they voted that common Fame was a sufficient Ground; though it seemed very hard to bring so much Disgrace and Prejudice to any Man upon the Testimony of so noted a Liar. And to carry Matters to the utmost Extremity, because they apprehended the King might raise present Money by the Anticipation of that Revenue which was already settled upon him, they voted that whosoever should have any Part in supplying the King by such Anticipations, should be deem'd a Hinderer of the fitting of Parliaments, and should be responsible for it in Parliament.

This was extravagant to the last Degree, and tending to dissolve the Constitution, by breaking off all Hopes of Agreement and Confidence between the King and his Parliament. So that this ungoverned Fury was very much blamed. It provoked the King, as may be well imagined, so that he determined to put an End to their Sitting, finding no Hopes of their coming into any Temper. On the 10th of January he had resolved to come and prorogue them. But the Commons had private Notice of this, and assembled early in the Morning, and before the King sent for them, came to the following warm Resolutions. First, that whoever advised the King to prorogue the Parliament, unless in order to pass a Bill for excluding the Duke of York, is a Betrayer of the King, of the Protestant Religion, and of the Kingdom of England; a Promoter of the French Interest, and a Pensioner of France. Secondly, that the Laws against Recusants ought not to be extended to any but those of the Church of Rome. Thirdly, that the Laws against Protestant Dissenters ought not to be executed. These Votes were much censured, it being thought a great Invasion of the Legislature, when one House pretended to suspend the Execution of Laws. But when they had done this, they were sent for up, and prorogued for ten Days. The Bill for Ease of Protestant Dissenters was to have been then presented to the King for his Assent. But the King, who was turning to arbitrary Counsels, was desirous to keep that Party in Subjection, by the Dread of the Laws hanging over them, though unwilling to enflame the Heats by refusing it. So that an Expedient was found (but a very unjustifiable one) to save the King the passing his Negative, by the Clerk of the Crown's withdrawing it, at the Time it was to be presented.

On the Day of the Prorogation the Commons had sent their kind Commendations and Thanks to the City of London; and this produced a Petition to the King from the Common-Council, testifying their Surprise at the Prorogation, and desiring the Parliament might sit at the Time appointed. But the King was only provoked by this unreasonable Interposition to dissolve it the sooner, being resolved to shew himself inflexible to all such irregular Applications. So two Days before the appointed Meeting, he issued out his Proclamation to dissolve the Parliament, declaring his Intentions to call another on the 21st of March, which was to meet at Oxford. And dissolved.

An Alteration was made in the Ministry soon after, by the Removal of the Earl of Sunderland, whose Place was filled by the Lord Hallifax. That Earl, though in the Height of Confidence with the King, had thought fit to become a zealous Promoter of the Exclusion-Bill, not only against the King's Mind, but his express Commands. This was certainly a very unaccountable Step, as those of refined Statesmen sometimes are, and highly provoked the King, who believed his Appearance on that Side made the Commons think the King was inclined to yield to them, and engaged them to drive that Point with the greater Violence. On the other Hand, the Lord Hallifax had made his Way into the King's Favour again, by the Figure he made in Opposition to the Exclusion-Bill; so that he became one of the Ministry, with great Credit and Confidence.

The Elections for Members of Parliament were carried on throughout the Nation with great Zeal; and they fell upon the same Persons with those of the last, with very little Alteration. But the discontented Party finding themselves strengthened during the sitting of Parliament by the Neighbourhood of the City of London, where their Side had a Majority; and having, or pretending to have, Apprehensions of some Force to be put upon the Parliament, when separated from their fast Friends, a Petition was presented to the King by several Lords, representing the Danger the Parliament would be exposed to at Oxford, from the Papists and their Adherents, of whom too many had crept into his Majesty's Guards, that Liberty of speaking according to their Consciences would be thereby destroyed, and the Validity of their Acts and Proceedings be left disputable; that the Straitness of the Place no Ways admitted such a Concourse of People as follow the Parliament, and that the Witnesses the Commons wanted to make good their Impeachments, were unable to bear the Charges of such a Journey; and therefore they prayed the Parliament might, as usual, sit at Westminster, where they might consult and act with Safety and Freedom. The King very well understood the Drift of this Petition, and was confirmed by it in his former Resolution. He remembered what Trouble had been given to his Father, when the seditious Party of the two Houses were supported by the Tumults of the neighbouring City, and feared the same again when Circumstances were so much alike. So that instead of returning any Answer to this Petition, he only frowned upon those who presented it, without taking any other Notice of it. A Petition offered the King against calling the Parliament at Oxford.

At this Time a strange kind of Alarm was given by one Fitz-Harris, an Irish Papist. Plot. Which he rejects.

This

The Parliament prorogued.

A.D. 1681. This Man, with what Intent is not very clear, had laid a Scheme to write a treasonable Libel against the King, under the Disguise of a zealous Enemy to Popery. This Scheme he communicated to one Everard, who fearing he designed to trepan him, got Witnesses to hear what passed between them. This Matter was so carried on, that Evidence being had against Fitz-Harris, he was apprehended.

The King goes to Oxford.

Tumultuous Bodies of Men attend the Members.

The Parliament meets.

Their Proceedings.

The Commons impeach Fitz-Harris.

The Time of the Parliament's Meeting drew near, and the King went down to Oxford to attend them. It was a great Disappointment to the Leaders of the disaffected Party, that they were carried so far from their Friends in London; but the Zeal of a great many there remedied, in some sort, that Inconvenience. For under a Notion of guarding the Parliament against the Papists, there came down with the City Members, a numerous Body of Horsemen well armed, wearing Ribbons in their Hats, with these Words, No Popery, no Slavery! Many other of the Members came with the like Retinues, who attended them upon the same Pretence. And thus the Meeting of the Legislature of England became like a Rendezvous of Soldiers; while cool and sober Men, if any such were left while the Nation was kindling into such fierce Animosities, looked with Terror on this mustering of Forces, as a Prelude to a civil War.

The Parliament met on the Day appointed; the Gallery of the publick Schools being prepared for the Lords, and the Convocation House for the Commons. The King in his Speech complained of the ill Usage he had met with from the late House of Commons, desired them to proceed in the Prosecution of the Plot, and in finding Means to secure themselves against Popery. But he at the same Time requested them not to be so fond of one particular Expedient, as to reject all others. Then mentioning the Exclusion, he told them he would never be brought to consent to it; but if they could find Means, in Case of a Popish Successor, to put the Government into Protestant Hands, he would readily assent to it.

The Commons returned to their House, and having chosen the same Speaker as before, they first fell upon the Enquiry, how it came to pass that the Bill for easing Protestant Dissenters was not presented to the King. But a farther Examination of this was put off till a Conference was had with the Lords upon it. A Report was spread, whether true or not is uncertain, that Fitz-Harris was employed by the King or Ministers to draw up the Libel he was charged with, and that the Design was to send it to all the Heads of the Protestant Party, as they called themselves, and then by a sudden Search of all their Houses to find, and charge it upon them. This Rumour was easily believed by a House of Commons so disposed as this was, and gave the Leaders Hopes to raise new Fires out of his Examinations. So they determined to impeach him in Parliament, and by that Means to deter all inferior Courts from meddling with him. A.D. 1681.

But all Heads in the House of Commons were so full of the Danger of a Popish Successor, that other Matters soon gave Way to it. And five Days after their Meeting, they turned their Thoughts that Way. A Paper of Expedients was first read, by which it was proposed to banish the Duke of York five hundred Miles from any of the Dominions of our Crown. That the Administration should be put in the Hands of a Regent, which should be the Princess of Orange; or in Case of her Decease, the Lady Anne; but that the Regent should govern in the Name and Style of James the Second. The rest of the Paper consisted only of Articles for securing this Establishment. But the Majority was so fixed upon the Exclusion, that this Scheme, which was not without its Difficulties, was set aside, and a Bill for the Exclusion was ordered to be brought in again.

And bring in the Bill of Exclusion.

But before the Bill came to its first Reading, an Incident happened that afterwards gave a Pretence to the King to dissolve the Parliament, which he was heartily tired of, seeing them again running into the Heats of the Exclusion, and having resolved to try new Measures for the Establishment of his Power and Authority. The Incident was this. Upon the bringing in the Impeachment against Fitz-Harris, the Lords, who had a great Majority on the King's Side, were determined to reject it, seeing what was intended by it. And a Precedent was found in the Time of Edward III. in which an Order was made, that the Lords should not judge and condemn Commoners. This Order, in Truth, only related to Proceedings against Commoners at the King's Suit; but it was now applied to all Proceedings whatever, as a weak Pretence will serve, when Men are resolved before-hand. When the Commons were informed of this Refusal, they fell into high Votes; and resolved, 1. That it is the undoubted Right of the Commons to impeach any Person, whether Peer or Commoner; and that the rejecting of the Impeachment by the Lords is a Denial of Justice, and a Violation of the Constitution of Parliaments. 2. That in the Case of Fitz-Harris, where the Commons had impeached him, and declared that in convenient Time they would bring their Articles against him, for the Lords to refer his Trial to the Common Law, is a Denial of Justice, and a Violation of the Constitution, an Obstruction to the Discovery of the Popish Plot, and dangerous to the King's Person, and the Protestant Religion. 3. That for any inferior Court to try Fitz-Harris, should be looked on as a high Breach of the Privilege of Parliament.

The Lords reject the Impeachment of Fitz-Harris.

Which occasions great Heats among the Commons.

This Fury the King took as a Handle for dissolving them; and on the Day when the Exclusion-Bill was read first, and ordered a second Reading, the Commons, who proceeded next to Fitz-Harris's Affair, were interrupted on a sudden by the Usher of the Black-

Upon which the Parliament is dissolved.

A.D.1681. Black-Rod, who commanded their Attendance on the King in the House of Peers. He then in few Words told them, there had been great Heats between the Lords and Commons; and that their Beginnings were such, that he could expect no good from them, and therefore he was come to dissolve them. And immediately the Lord Chancellor declared the Parliament dissolved, after it had sat but seven Days. This unexpected Dissolution struck both Houses like a Clap of Thunder; and while all Men were in Amaze and Consternation, as the News was carried from one to another, the King took Coach, and left Oxford, making all possible Haste to Windsor, from whence the next Day he came to Whitehall.

A new Face of Affairs.

This Dissolution introduced a new State of Things. The King receiving so much Uneasiness from his Parliaments, resolved to continue (for some Time at least) without them, finding the ill Humours that had been kindled by the Plot, to be collected and break out with the most Fury and Strength in the House of Commons. The great Incendiary being deprived of that Engine, fell to cultivate the more industriously the Seeds of Faction and Disturbance he had already sown in the City of London, which was of a more permanent Constitution, and now became his chief Instrument. But the King beat him out at last from thence too, as will be hereafter related; which completed his Triumph over all that Party that had troubled him so long, and made him Master again.

Reflections
upon it.

Had the Methods he took to this End been strictly right and justifiable, we must have praised his Wisdom, and admired his Felicity, who could so soon and so entirely recover that Regal Dignity and Authority that had been so dangerously incroached on during the Heats raised by the Popish Plot. But there were many dark Practices carried on in order to this, and the Consequence of the Victory was such, as made the very Foundations of English Liberty to tremble. And this alarmed in some Time wise and moderate Men, and begat a third Party, called by the Name of Trimmers; but stronger in Weight, than in Number; the far greater Part of the Nation, and even those of Understanding and Integrity, running with Violence into one or other of the mad Extremes. The chief Thing that can be alledged to excuse the King's Proceedings is, that the Dissolution of the Parliament was necessary; in which, though many wise and virtuous Men were found, there were many others of different Characters, who either pursued Designs of their own, or were animated by those who did; and that the violent Measures he fell into afterwards, were the Effect of Necessity, as much as Choice, it being necessary to pursue resolute Counsels when once entered into. But it made all honest Men lament the Unhappiness of their Countrey, which was brought to such a Condition, that no Measures could be taken to preserve its Peace, but such as must endanger its Liberty. And they detested and execrated those Men, whose ungoverned Passions did then, or should in after-times, by stirring up, or unseasonably provoking the People, bring it to that perillous State. The Truth is, the Temper of the Nation was such, by its Division into two furious Parties; one directed by a dark and unfathomable Head, whose Designs, though never well understood, could be no other than bad ones; the other growing as madly fond of a Prince, professing a Religion destructive of our own; that it seems to have required a Wisdom more than human, to bring our Constitution through all these Dangers into a safe Port. And therefore, when we look back upon those Times, we ought to admire and bless the Divine Providence, which so mercifully watched over our Safety, that through all these Storms, and others more dangerous that afterwards arose, our happy Form of Government was not only conducted safely, but strengthened and perfected by the fierce Conflicts it met with.

Not long after, the King published a Declaration, in which he set forth the ill Usage he had received from his Parliaments, and his own Intentions for the publick Good; promising his best Endeavours for the suppressing of Popery, and declaring that it was yet his Intention to hold frequent Parliaments, and hinting that a Meeting of that Kind might not be far off. When this Declaration was read in Council, the Archbishop of Canterbury proposed, that it should be read by the Clergy in all Churches and Chapels, which was easily agreed to. This was an indiscreet Step, though well meant; and the Precedent now set, drew a fearful and dangerous Storm upon the Clergy in the next Reign. But as that excellent Man did himself encounter and overcome it so nobly, we ought to pass a mild Censure upon a Failing, whose Consequences were so hard to be foreseen. This Declaration could not be supposed to want Answers, and there came out two very well written. But the Dissolution of the Parliament was such a Blow to that Side, that they declined daily. So that the King's Declaration met with as great Success as could be desired; and Addresses came up from all Parts of the Kingdom, condemning the Bill of Exclusion, and the Proceedings of the late Parliament. All the Publick Papers written against the Court Side were suppressed, while Mr. L'Estrange in the Observer, some unknown but excellent Writers in a Paper called Heraclitus Rident, and Mr. Dryden in some of his Poetical Works, employed all their Parts in defending the King, and exposing the Proceedings of opposite Party.

Soon after this Fitz-Harris's Trial came on. The Lord Chief Justice Scroggs was intimidated by the Votes of the House of Commons, and declined trying him. But Sir Francis Pemberton, one of the greatest Lawyers of his Time, undertook it, and was put in the other's Place. When Fitz-Harris was arraigned, he put in a Plea against the

The King's Declaration.

Two Answers to it published.

Fitz-Harris
arraigned.

A.D.1681. Jurisdiction of the Court; alledging, that having been impeached by the House of Commons, he could not be tried there. But this Plea, after long Debates, was over-ruled. So he pleaded Not Guilty to his Indictment; but alledging, that a material Witness for his Defence was in Holland, his Tryal was put off for a Month.

Plunket's Trial.

In the mean Time came on the Trial of Doctor Oliver Plunket, a Popish Titular Archbishop of Armagh, who called himself Primate of all Ireland. He was a worthy and good Man, who notwithstanding the high Title given him, was in a very mean State of Life, as having nothing to subsist on, but the Contributions of a few poor Clergy of his own Religion in the Province of Ulster, who having but little themselves, could not spare much to him. In these low Circumstances he lived, though meanly, quietly and contentedly; meddling with nothing but the Concerns of his Function, and dissuading all about him from entering into any turbulent or factious Intrigues. But while the Popish Plot was warm, some lewd Irish Priests, and others of that Nation, hearing that England was disposed to hearken to good Swearers, thought themselves qualified for the Employment. So they came over with an Account of a Plot in Ireland, and were well received by Lord Shaftsbury. They were also examined by the Parliament, and what they said was believed. They were very profligate Wretches, and some of the Priests among them had been censured by Plunket for their Lewdness. So partly out of Revenge, and partly to keep themselves in Business, they charged a Plot upon that innocent quiet Man; so that he was sent for over, and brought to Trial. The Evidences swore, that upon his being made Primate of Ireland, he engaged to raise sixty or seventy Thousand Irish, to be ready to join with the French to destroy the Protestant Religion, and to get Dublin, Londonderry, and all the Sea-Ports into their Hands; and that besides the French Army, there was a Spanish Army to join with them, and that the Irish Clergy were to contribute to this Design. Plunket in his Defence alledged the Improbability of all that was sworn against him, which was apparent enough. He alledged, that the Irish Clergy were so poor, that he himself, who was the Head of a whole Province, lived in a little thatched House with only one Servant; having never above sixty Pounds a Year Income, so that neither he nor they could be thought very likely to carry on a Design of this Nature. But the Fact being positively sworn against him, and the Jury unacquainted with the Witnesses Characters, and the Scene of Action, he Found Guilty.

'Tis said that the Earl of Essex was so sensible of the Injustice done him, that he applied to the King for a Pardon; and told him, that the Matters sworn against Plunket were so absurd in themselves, that it was impossible for them to be true. But the King answered him in a Passion, Why did you not declare this then at the Trial? It would have done him A.D.1681. some good then; but I dare pardon no body; and concluded with saying, His Blood be upon your Head, and not upon mine!

The next Day came on Fitz-Harris's Trial. The Fact was too plainly proved against him, to admit of much Dispute; but the Impeachment of him by the House of Commons so intimidated the Jury, that he had been acquitted, had not one of them by threatening to fast with the rest, brought them over to his Side. So that he was found guilty, and condemned. In the Interval between Sentence and Execution, many dark Practices with him were charged by both Parties upon each other; of the Truth of which it is hard, and not necessary, to determine.

The Storm which had been raised first against the Papists in general, and then against the Duke of York, not without Danger to the King himself, now shifted to the opposite Point, and began to blow against that very Party that had fomented its Rage before. Dugdale and Turberville, two of the Witnesses in the Popish Plot, were now employed against their former Friends and Supporters. The Earl of Shaftsbury, and others of his Party, were taken up and committed to the Tower, upon a Charge of high Treason. Among these were one Stephen Colledge, a Joyner by Trade, who by his Fury and Extravagance on that Side, had got the Name of the Protestant Joyner, being no otherwise remarkable. This Man was one of those that attended the City-Members, when they went to Oxford to sit in the Parliament there. So he was charged with an Information of High-Treason. But when the Bill against him was brought before the Grand-Jury in London, they returned it Ignoramus; which was a great Strain of their Oaths, a kind of Ties that were but little regarded in these Times. Thus Colledge was saved in London; but the Treasons alledged against him, being designed to be executed at Oxford, he was triable there. And a Grand-Jury of that County found the Bill. So he was sent down to Oxford for his Trial. He had a Counsellor and Solicitor allowed him for his Defence; but as he went to his Trial with some Papers of Instructions they had given him, he was on a sudden hurried into an House, and his Instructions were violently taken from him; so that he was sent to be tried in a very fit Posture to make his Defence. When he was brought to the Bar, he complained of this to the Court; who made themselves so far accessary to it, that it was with much ado that he got Part of his Papers restored. Two of them, which were not of his own Hand-Writing, were absolutely refused him, under Pretence that they were Libels. They contained indeed some warm Expressions, which had in Prudence been better let alone; but the Proceedings at his Tryal gave but too much Ground for them. When he had at last recovered so many of his Papers as the Court thought fit to let him have, his Trial began. Dugdale, Turberville,

His Trial.

A.D. 1681. Turberville and others, swore many dangerous and treasonable Words against him, which such an indiscreet hot Man was likely enough to speak, though without any Thought of putting them in Practice. Colledge was upon a Negative; so that he could only defend himself by invalidating the Credit of the Witnesses. The famous Titus Oates engaged now openly with his Brethren, Dugdale and Turberville; and the positive Contradictions upon Oath that passed between these Men at this Tryal, lessened very much the Credit of the Plot they had before sworn to. Oates attested solemnly, that Dugdale and Turberville, had both denied to him that they knew any Thing against Colledge, with some other Things to weaken their Testimony; while the others in return protested upon their Oaths, that every Thing he testified so confidently was utterly false; so that they fell out in the open Court in a very indecent Manner. This made good Diversion for those who disbelieved the Plot; but it was very shocking to considerate Persons to see what Wretches these were whose Testimony had taken away so many Lives, and thrown the Nation into such a dangerous Combustion. In Conclusion the Jury brought in Colledge guilty of High-Treason; and fourteen Days after, he was executed. On the same Day Oates, whose Pension had been some Time abridged, was turned out of his Lodgings at White-hall, and stripped entirely of his Salary.

He is found guilty, and executed.

Oates discarded.

The French Refugees relieved.

This Summer the French Protestants being driven from their native Countrey by the Persecution now raging throughout France, came over to England in great Numbers, and were received by the King with all the Marks of Royal Favour, and relieved by the People with a truly Christian Tenderness and Charity.

A Bill of High-Treason exhibited against the Lord Shaftsbury.

The Court having gained a Victory, though a very barbarous one, over poor Colledge, were encouraged to strike at the great Leader himself. And as it was no difficult Matter in those Days to find or to make Witnesses, a Practice that can never be mentioned without Horror, a Bill of High-Treason was exhibited against the Earl of Shaftsbury at the Old-Baily. Eight Witnesses were examined against him, who swore to many treasonable and extravagant Speeches, which were like enough to escape a Man of his Temper, though it might be doubtful too whether the Witnesses had such Things said to them. For they were Men of no Character, or else of a very bad one. But besides this, a Paper was found in his Study of an Association, upon which great Strefs was laid, though it was neither written, nor any where marked, with his own Hand; nor so much as laid in the Indictment. It is said, that after the Danger over he always protested he knew nothing of it, or how it came there; which shews how little Strefs ought to be laid on such remote Proofs. 'Tis probable it was given to him, but carelessly laid aside and forgot, as a Thing of no Importance. This Association was to unite all those who signed it in an indissoluble Bond, to withstand the Duke of York's Succession to the Crown, and to oppose to the utmost Extremity all who should adhere to him. This last Circumstance was construed to extend to the King, who adhered very stedfastly to his Brother in the Affair of the Exclusion. But the Grand Jury being impannelled by Pilkington and Shute, the two Sheriffs, who were of the Earl's Party, they returned the Bill Ignoramus, which was received with great Shouts by the People who were there; his Party still continuing the strongest in the City, where great Rejoicings were made upon his Deliverance. And four Days after he was bailed at the King's-Bench.

In Opposition to the Endeavours of the disaffected Party in England, the Duke of York, who was sent into Scotland, found means to get the Parliament of that Kingdom, to settle the Succession of that Crown upon him by a solemn Act. Soon after the Earl of Argyle was tried there for High-Treason, and condemned, but found means to make his Escape.

The Escape of the Earl of Shaftsbury was a great Mortification to the Court; and as it exasperated the one Party, and encouraged the other, the National Feuds flamed out this Year to a portentous Height. The Court to keep their own Side firm to them, set them upon the Dissenters; the Malignity of humane Nature being such, that Men seldom stick closer to one another, than when they have a third Person to do Mischief to. So the Laws which till now had lain asleep, were roused and let loose upon the Dissenters, and Men were made to believe, that they were all Rebels and Republicans in their Hearts. And the Execution of those severe Laws coming into the Hands of Knaves and Fools, who are sure to be busiest upon such Occasions, many Acts of unchristian Barbarity were of course committed. While this was doing, occasion was taken from the Association found at the Earl of Shaftsbury's, to procure a new Set of Addresses from every County and Town, abhorring that Association, and filled with all the Strains of Loyalty the Penmen could invent. And because in divided Nations each Party always thinks it self so much nearer the right Way, by how much it goes farther from the other; therefore the Court Party, to make amends for the Disloyalty and Sedition they charged their Antagonists with, ran as madly into the other Extreme. The Doctrines of Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance were revived, and inculcated and pressed both by Lawyers and Divines with such Warmth and Contention, as though Servitude and Chains were Blessings mightily to be wished for, and the Depth of Slavery were the Perfection of National Happiness.

On the 12th of February a Murther was committed upon one Mr. Thynne, a Gentleman of a great Fortune, after a very strange and unusual Manner. As he was riding in his Coach in Pall-Mall, three Men on Horseback came up, and one of them discharged a Musketoon into the Coach with two Returned Ignoramus.

The Succession of the Crown of Scotland settled on the Duke of York.

The Dissenters persecuted.

Passive Obedience revived.

A.D. 1682. The Murther of Mr. Thynne

A.D. 1682. two Brace of Bullets, which gave Mr. Thynne several mortal Wounds; after which they rode off and made their Escape. They were soon after seized, and found to be Foreigners. The one whose Name was Vratz, was a German, born in Pomerania, and a Captain of Foot; the other was a Swede, and a Lieutenant, whose Name was Stern; the third, whose Name was Borofki, being a Polander. Vratz at his Examination confessed the Fact with Unconcern, and said that he came to attend Count Coningmark, a German Lord, in his Travels; that some Affronts had been offered to the Count by Mr. Thynne, which the Count intended to resent by fighting him: That himself with the other two attended him on that Design; but that instead of stopping the Coach, as their Purpose was, in order to make Mr. Thynne come out to fight, the Polander mistaking the Sign, discharged his Musketoon at him and killed him. A few Days after Count Coningmark was also seized at Gravesend, and was brought to Tryal with the other three. But the Count, who was a Favourite of the King's, was with great Difficulty, as well as Partiality, helped off by the Bench; so that he was acquitted; the other three being condemned. The Swede and Polander suffered with Signs of Repentance; but Vratz, who was filled with empty Notions of Honour, more prevalent in other Countries than in our own, continued to the last to justify what he had done. It was found at last, that Mr. Thynne and the Count were Rivals in their Addresses to the Lady Ogle, sole Heiress of the noble Family of the Piercies, and a vast Fortune; and that the Count had taken this Method to rid himself of his Competitor. The Action was certainly both base and barbarous; but it is said, that it gave Occasion to some to remember another Lady, whom Mr. Thynne was reported to have used very unworthily. It seems she had long and unmoveably withstood the unlawful Solicitations of the Duke of Monmouth, though armed with all those Advantages of Person and Fortune that strike the Eyes and Hearts of Women. And the Duke, like a true Libertine, enraged with the Disappointment, persuaded Mr. Thynne who was his intimate Friend, to delude and betray her in Revenge. Mr. Thynne consented to this wicked Proposal, and by pretending honourable Love, got into the Lady's Affections; and taking one of those Opportunities that may sometimes be found, if Men are so wicked as to seek them, ruined her Honour, and then abandoned her to Tears and Shame. It would be well if the Example of this signal Retribution would deter Men from the like Crimes; which, how common soever, or little regarded, scarce ever escape a Punishment, either publick or private.

The Duke of York gains Ground.

The Duke of York soon after this returned from Scotland to Newmarket, where he met the King; from whence they went together to Cambridge, where they were received with great Pomp and Ceremony, with many Complements to the Duke on his prudent Conduct in Scotland. And soon after he returned with the King to London. His A.D. 1682. Power increased now every Day. The Lord Mayor and Aldermen came to congratulate his Return; and a solemn Invitation was made him by the Artillery Company, of which he was Captain-General, to dine with them at Merchant-Taylor's Hall, where he was received with an affected Profusion of Shew and Respect. A Letter was sent after him from Scotland, written by the Bishops there; containing their Thanks to him for his wise Government of that Kingdom; and Care was taken to make it publick. Shortly after he set out again for Scotland, to bring back his Family which he had left there behind. His Stay was short, but his Return became remarkable by a great Danger he escaped. For though the Ship was piloted by one of the best Coasters in England, she chanced to strike upon a Sand over against the Mouth of the Humber, and the Duke, with some Persons of Quality, were obliged to save themselves in the Long-boat and go aboard another Ship. The Love of the Sailors to their Master was very much to be admired; it being reported, that when they perceived that the Duke was safe, they set up an universal Shout for Joy of his Escape, though they saw themselves ready to be swallowed up every Moment. From thence he returned to London, where his Friends were grown so numerous, that the whole City was filled next Night with Bonfires for Joy of his Arrival. He continued there to the End of this Reign, in full Authority and Power.

The discontented Party received a great Blow this Year in their last Fortrefs, the City of London; two Sheriffs, Mr. North and Mr. Rich, and Sir William Pritchard the Lord Mayor being elected out of the opposite Side; so that the Government of the City being taken from them, they were reduced to a very low Ebb. Many unfair Practices were however said to be used in bringing this about; and it was likely enough those Reports might be true. For a Court never wants Instruments for such Practices, in a Nation divided into two furious Parties; the Spirit of Party Rage being such, that honest Men, if Knaves by a strange Chance are wanting, will do those Things to maintain and raise their own Side, which they would not do to increase their private Fortunes.

Be the Cause what it will, the Effect was, that the Earl of Shaftsbury finding his last Battery taken from him, and ready to be turned against him, was afraid to tarry any longer in the Nation he had so fatally disturbed. He was now reduced to the utmost Extremity of Madness and Despair; being enraged to find himself baffled in all his Undertakings, and to increase his Mortification, by the King too, of whom he had so mean an Opinion, that he once bragged that he would walk him leisurely out of his Dominions. Vexation and Anger for his many Disappointments tormented him so, that it even turned his Head; and took from him the Use of his truly admirable and profound Capacity; and he fell into Notions and Counsels

He escapes a great Danger by Sea.

The City of London in the King's Power.

The Earl of Shaftsbury goes over to Holland.

Sir John Moore

A.D. 1682. fells so wild, impracticable and precipitate, that his own Party began to fear and shun him. So that declining in his Credit with one Side, and dreading the Revenge of the other, he at first absconded; till not able to bear the Mortification of being forced to hide himself from those he had so much despised before, he at last went over into Holland; not only to the great Triumph of his adverse Party, but to the great Satisfaction of his own; among whom many worthy and true Patriots began to find their Error in trusting themselves to him too far. He went over to Holland, but lived a very little while after.

Had the Court been contented with their Success hitherto, little had been done that was not either justified, or excused at least by the Law of Self-Defence; and perhaps that was not necessary to give Peace to the Nation at such a turbulent Time. But Mankind is so framed as never to know how to stop, when their Enemies are once reduced; and nothing less will serve than an entire Suppression and Destruction. The King had followed his Blow as far at least as was consistent with the Liberties of a free Nation, and had procured himself Peace and Victory on all Sides, but he could not be satisfied with this. He now wanted to secure himself against any Disquiets of the same kind; which Security was not to be had without too great an Incroachment on the legal Rights and Privileges of his People. And now the Ballance of Power began to preponderate as much on the King's Side, as it had done before in the popular Scale. Not content with seeing the Government of the City in the Hands of Persons well affected to him, he resolved to bring it entirely under his own Direction. To this End a Writ called Quo Warranto, was brought into Westminster-hall by the Attorney-General in Hilary Term, against the City of London, to make them shew by what Warrant they pretended to be a Corporation, and to have the Privileges mentioned in that Writ. The City answered to this at the King's-Bench Bar, setting forth their Rights, and the Manner and Times in which they were granted; to which the Attorney-General reply'd, setting forth some Things done by them contrary to the Duty of a Corporation, by which their Charter was said to be forfeited. The first was, that they had exacted some Tolls in their Markets illegally; and the second, that the Common-Council there had framed and presented a scandalous Petition, in relation to the proroguing of the Westminster Parliament.

It was a strange Thing to make the Privileges of a great and famous City to hang upon such Cobwebs as these; for the Tolls exacted in their Markets were deemed so reasonable by those who paid them, that the Thing had never been contested in any Court of Law. And to make the City accountable for an Act of the Common-Council, was not only unequitable in it self, but contrary to an express Law, that the City should not be punished for the Misdemeanors of those who bore Office in it. But the Bench was prepared beforehand to do as they were bid. So that the Arguments on both Sides being heard for Form's Sake, the Court declared, that the Liberties and Franchises of the City were forfeited into the King's Hands. After this the Attorney-General moved, that Judgment might not be entered, till the King's Pleasure were farther known; the Intention of which was, to give Opportunity for Practices with the Citizens, to induce them to resign their Liberties of themselves, to avoid the Odium of taking them by Violence. And the Fears of some, the secret Hopes and Designs of others, and the wild and inconsiderate Loyalty of a third Part concurring, the Common-Council was wrought on to carry a most submissive and abject Petition to the King; confessing the late Misbehaviour of the City, which had drawn upon them his Majesty's Displeasure, imploring his accustomed Clemency, and begging his Commands and Directions. They were received superciliously enough; and the Conditions upon which they were to be made capable of the Royal Grace were told them; which were, 1. That no Lord-Mayor, Sheriff, Recorder, Common-Serjeant, Town-Clerk, Coroner of London, or Steward of Southwark, were to exercise their Offices till they were approved by the King under his Sign-Manual. 2. That if the King should disapprove a Lord-Mayor, upon Signification thereof the Citizens should chuse another in a Week's Time; and if the second Choice were also disliked, the King should then nominate the Person. 3. The Condition of the Sheriffs was to be upon the same Foot. 4. The Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen, might with the King's Leave, displace any Alderman, Recorder, &c. 5. Upon the Election of any new Alderman, if the Court of Aldermen should disapprove him, the Ward should proceed to a new Choice; and if that Choice was disliked also, the Court might appoint another in his Room. 6. The Justices of the Peace should act by the King's Commission; and that the settling these Matters be left to the King's Counsel at Law. These imperious Regulations being debated on at the Common-Council, there was not found a Majority who had the Courage to reject them; so that it was agreed by the odds of eighteen Voices to submit to them. And the two Sheriffs waited on the King the next Day to acquaint him with it.

The King was now absolute Master of the City, and Practices were set on foot, which were in most Places successful, to induce the other Corporations to surrender their Charters, and submit to new ones to be framed by the Court. So that being also enabled by a frugal Management of his standing Revenue, to live without Parliamentary Supplies, his Power became formidable not only to his Enemies, but even to the true Lovers of our Constitution. And to increase his Power, there was at this Time a Discovery of a very

The Liberties of the City declared forfeited.

The City submits.

Hard Conditions imposed on them,

Other Corporations surrendered their Charters.

The Rye-House Plot breaks out.

A.D. 1682. very made of a Plot among some of the disaffected Party, to kill the King and subvert the Government, which, whether true or false, served, as such Discoveries always do, to strengthen both the more.

An Account of the Grounds thereof.

From the Time of the Earl of Shaftsbury's going away, there used to be Meetings of a Set of Men of that Party at the Chambers of one Mr. West in the Temple; at which Place various Discourses were held by them concerning the State of their Affairs. In these Conferences many Things had been talked of in a loose and extravagant Manner, relating to the Means and Facility of killing the King and his Brother, and making an Insurrection, with other Matters tending to the same Purpose; which was a Discourse well enough suited to violent Party-Men of bold Tempers and desperate Fortunes. In these Conversations they used a kind of Cant for fear of being overheard and understood; calling the Assassination the Lopping-Point, the King and Duke of York by the Names of Captain and Lieutenant; and using some other Terms of the like Nature. The Persons chiefly concerned in these Meetings were one Colonel John Rumsey, who had been an Officer in Cromwell's Army, and had since served in Portugal with Reputation; Robert Ferguson, a Scotchman by Birth, and an Independent by Profession, a Man of Intrigue, and of a bold and dangerous Spirit, capable of any Enterprizes, good or bad; Richard Goodenough, who had formerly been Under-Sheriff, and wickedly industrious in packing Juries; to whom were sometimes added others of the same Side, who delighted in such Discourse, and whom the Cabal could trust with it. There was one Richard Rumbold, who was a Maltster, and had served in Cromwell's Army, who was sometimes with them also; together with the Lord Howard of Esrick, a Man of an ill Character, and notwithstanding his Title, in very mean and necessitous Circumstances. To such a Knot of Men, bigotted to Party, of Spirits naturally turbulent and unquiet, pinched by Want and uneasy Circumstances, and despairing of seeing better Times, it is easy to conceive that dangerous Discourses, and seditious and treasonable Projects must be very agreeable Entertainment. It happened that Rumbold had a Farm near Hoddefdon, in the Way to Newmarket; near which the Road was so narrow that there was just Room for a Coach to go near it. He being at one of their Meetings, when they were discoursing of the Lopping-Point, as they called it, told them he had seen the King go by there in his Journeys to Newmarket, so ill attended, that if he could but have stopped the Coach a Minute or two, by overturning a Cart or some such Obstacle, he could easily have shot the two Brothers, and made his Escape over Grounds, where he could not have been followed. Another Time as they were upon the same Subject, when Lord Howard was present, he said he thought it best to have the King and Duke shot at the Play-House; because as he added, they would then die in their Calling. A.D. 1682. There was one Captain Walcot, an Irish Gentleman, who sometimes was at their Meetings; who declared himself against an Assassination, but offered to concur in a Rising. These and the like wicked Discourses they used, it seems, to entertain themselves with.

But a great Question here arises, whether these Schemes and Projects had not some deeper Roots than the Cabals of a few inconsiderable Men, there being soon after an Account published by Authority, in which all the chief Men of the discontented Party were said to be engaged, and assisting in the same Measures. To this one may briefly answer, that in such mysterious Questions, the only sure Way not to be mistaken, is to suspend one's Assent to either Side; but as every one desires to have something of Probability to rest on, where Certainty is not to be had, I must give it as my private Opinion, still submitted to better Judgments, that there was no more in it than is above related. That there were some dangerous Consultations among that Side, appears plainly from the dying Confessions of some Persons executed for the same; but that any of the eminent Persons who were accused by the Witnesses in this Plot, were really guilty of what was laid to their Charge, seems exceedingly improbable and incredible for these Reasons. First, because the Witnesses against them were Men of very infamous Characters; secondly, because the Law was vehemently stretched to take away their Lives; and lastly, because they denied with their dying Words what the Witnesses had sworn against them. But to return to the Narration.

It happened that Goodenough had acquainted one Josiah Keeling, an Anabaptist in the City, with the Discourse usual with the Company at the Temple; and had employed him to try their Strength in the City, to know whom they might depend upon in case of a sudden Rising. But Keeling, fearing the Danger of such like Undertakings, grew very uneasy, and at last resolved to discover what he knew. So he went to the Secretary of State, Sir Lionel Jenkins, to acquaint him with what he had heard. The Secretary took his Depositions, but let him know at the same Time, he could make no Use of them, unless they were confirmed by another Evidence. Upon this Keeling introduced a Brother of his into Goodenough's Company; and Goodenough trusting him, spoke to him with all possible Freedom about their Designs, mentioning the killing of the King and Duke. This being drawn from Goodenough, Keeling carried his Brother to the Secretary's Office, where the former Depositions were confirmed by this new Testimony. The Secretary let them both go; but the other Keeling, who was trepanned by his Brother into an Evidence against his Will, is reported to have sent Word to the Persons in Danger to keep out of the Way.

A.D. 1682. Three Days after the Plot broke out, and filled the Town with strange and various Stories as usual. Several Persons were taken up, and a Proclamation was issued for apprehending such as could not be found. In a Day or two after the Proclamation was issued, first West, and then Rumsey came in; having perhaps concerted their Measures before. They both joined in a Discovery of what they had really heard in their Clubs, and pieced out, by Help of Invention, what their Memory did not furnish them with. They deposed, that their Party had intended a Rising on November 17. being Queen Elizabeth's Accession-Day, when the burning of the Pope used to be performed with Solemnity; but that afterwards it was resolved to defer it till the Sunday after, when every Body was at Church. That a Plot was laid to kill the King at Rumbold's House; which being known by the Name of Rye, or Rye-House, gave this Plot the Name of the Rye-House Plot. That Walcot made a Scruple of killing the King, but engaged to attack the Guards; so that Rumsey himself undertook that Service. This was to be done by the Assistance of forty Men who were to be there in Readiness; with twenty of which Walcot was to fall upon the Guards, while Rumsey with the other twenty was to stop the Coach, and kill the King and his Brother in it. Of these forty they could name but eight. They said that they were divided in their Opinions how they should do after the King was killed, some being for riding off immediately over the Grounds, while others were for defending themselves against the Guards till Night, by Help of a Mud-Wall and a Moat, with which the House was inclosed; and not for making off till then. That West had bought Arms for this Use as upon a Commission for a Plantation; and that Walcot, Rumbold, and Goodenough had undertaken to find the rest of the Men, besides the eight abovementioned, and the Horses necessary for them. That this was to be done when the King was at New-Market in March last; but that a Fire which happened in that Town, and burnt down the greatest Part of it, obliged the King to return to London a Week sooner than he intended; by which all their Measures were broken, there being then neither Horses, Men nor Arms provided. There had really been a Correspondence between the discontented in Scotland, and those here; of which these Witnesses had chanced to hear something, but could say nothing on their own Knowledge.

Remarks
thereon.

This Story was liable to several Exceptions. No Person of Figure was named who was to head the Rising. What was sworn about the Rye-House Attempt, seemed very improbable on several Accounts. It was not easie to conceive how forty Horsemen could be brought without Suspicion into a little Farm House, or could be well lodged there; or how forty Men could think to defend themselves against the King's Guards after such an Attempt, only by a Mud-Wall and a Moat, so as to get off afterwards. Nor did it appear where these Men and Horses were to be had; it being only said, that three of their Cabal had undertaken to provide them, which seemed a very slight Account of so important a Matter; a Provision of that Nature not being so easily made. And it appeared very unlikely, that any in their Wits should put off the doing this till a Week before the Time of Execution: As if the procuring so many Men and Horses fit for such a desperate Service, were a Thing to be done in half an Hour.

It had happened also, that one Day the Lord Russel, one of the Heads of the disaffected Party, and who had been a great Promoter of the Bill of Exclusion in the House of Commons, was invited by the Duke of Monmouth, to meet him and some of his Friends at one Mr. Shepherd's, a famous Wine-Merchant of that Party. The Lord Russel consented to this, as having a Mind to taste some of that Merchant's Wines. So he went with the Duke, the Lord Grey, and Sir Thomas Armstrong. When they came, they found Rumsey and Ferguson there, whom they knew to be two of Lord Shaftsbury's Instruments. The Lords did not like their Company, and resolved to go back; but Lord Russel having designed to taste Shepherd's Wines, got them to stay till he had done that. In the mean Time, Rumsey fell into Discourse with Armstrong, and talked to him, which he knew he might safely do, about a Project of surprizing the King's Guards. Armstrong, who had formerly commanded in them, disagreed with him, and shewed him his Mistakes. This Conference lasted while Lord Russel was tasting the Wines, after which he went away with the Duke, and the other two; not having spoke a Word in the whole Discourse between Rumsey and Armstrong. This real but accidental Fact, Rumsey improved into a deliberate Consultation about surprizing the King's Guards, at which he swore that Lord Russel was present, and consenting. That Lord was very obnoxious to the present ruling Powers, on Account of the Share he had in the Exclusion-Bill, so that he was soon apprehended and committed to the Tower. He was eldest Son to the Earl of Bedford, and Heir to the vast Estate of that Family; a truly religious and virtuous Gentleman, actuated in all his publick Proceedings by a tender Concern for his Countrey's Welfare; being placed above all self-interested Pursuits, both by his Fortune and his Virtues. But the Warmth of his Imagination was an Overmatch for the Solidity of his Judgment; which made him sometimes pursue his truly honourable Designs, though with an upright Heart, yet with an unskilful Zeal. This laid him open to the Arts of ill-designing Men, and drew him in to countenance by his Concurrence, those violent Measures which were set on Foot during the two last Parliaments; which as they were both unreasonable and dangerous, could not have been carried to those Heights, if the universal Reputation the Lord Russel had justly acquired for Probity and Virtue, and the

The Lord
Russel apprehended.
His Character.

A.D. 1682. the great Zeal with which he was seen to promote them, had not given them Countenance.

Others apprehended.

Lord Howard becomes an Evidence.

The Duke of Monmouth, the Earl of Effex, the Lord Grey of Werk, Colonel Sidney, with Mr. Trenchard, and Mr. Hamden, who had stickled for the Exclusion in the House of Commons, and some Scotch Gentlemen, were also sent for. The Duke of Monmouth, by the King's Permission, as 'tis said, found Means to escape; but the others were apprehended; only Lord Grey found Means to get away from the Messenger by making him drunk. The Lord Howard was also apprehended, who soon after made himself an Evidence. He attested that the Duke of Monmouth had told him, that Mr. Trenchard had undertaken to bring a Body of Men from Taunton. He confirmed the Story of the Rising intended in November, but he knew of no body that was to be at the Head of it. He added, that a Council of six was instituted, of which himself, the Duke of Monmouth, Colonel Sidney, Lord Russel, the Earl of Effex, and Mr. Hamden, were Members; and that they had had several Debates about an Insurrection; but that they resolved before they entered on it, to know what Condition Scotland was in; and that Colonel Sidney had sent one Aaron Smith to Scotland, to bring him a sure Information from thence, and that he gave him sixty Guineas for his Journey. On this Testimony, the material Part of the Plot depended; for as to what was sworn by the other Witnesses, it was of so little Importance, on Account of the Meanness of those who were accused, that a dangerous Conspiracy could not easily be framed out of a Combination of such insignificant Persons. Besides the Lord Howard, there were apprehended Lieutenant Colonel Walcot, William Hone a Joyner, John Rouse, and William Blague.

Walcot's Trial.

The first of these was soon brought to Trial at the Old-Baily. Rumsey swore, that the Prisoner was at West's Chamber, and there agreed to command a Party that was to charge the Guards; and was present at other Consultations, which was confirmed by Keeling, Bourne and West. Besides this, a Letter of his was produced, that was written by him to the Secretary of State, in which he acknowledged that he knew of dangerous Designs, and offered his Service to discover them. The Prisoner said in his Defence, that he came accidentally to the Meetings, and only to hear News; and that while the King was at Newmarket, he was ill of the Gout, and could not therefore undertake any such Enterprize as attacking the Guards. Upon the Whole, he was brought in Guilty of High-Treason.

Hone's Trial.

After him, William Hone was brought upon his Trial. Upon his Arraignment, he had offered to plead Guilty to part of the Indictment, but refusing to do so to the Whole, he was put upon a Jury. Keeling swore that he had been present at traitorous Consultations, and was to have been one of the Assassins at the Rye-House; and that he had talked of taking off the Blackbird, and Goldfinch, by which were meant the King and the Duke. Hone confessed that he had said something about the Blackbird, but not about the Goldfinch. But this was only Talk. West swore he had spoke to him about making a bold Push at the two Brothers, the Captain and Lieutenant; by which he meant the King and the Duke. Besides this, Sir Nicholas Butler deposed, that the Prisoner used to be full of Plots and Contrivances of this Nature; and particularly, that he had once framed a Design for killing the King and Duke with Cross-Bows from Bow-Steeple. Upon the Whole, he appeared to be a very hot prating Fellow, but scarcely in his Senses, as may be imagined from his Project of Bow-Steeple, and therefore not likely to be trusted with a Conspiracy. But his dangerous Expressions were so evidently proved, that the Jury soon brought him in Guilty.

On the same Day, the Lord Russel was brought to his Trial. Rumsey and Lord Howard swore against him as was above related; and Shepherd, the Wine-Merchant, confirmed the Lord Russel's being at his House. Lord Russel positively denied what Lord Howard had sworn, but as to Rumsey's Evidence, he was much perplexed to make his Defence. He could not deny his being at the Place, though he knew he had not consented to the Matter proposed by Rumsey to Armstrong; and he was advised by his Counsel not to confess any Thing about it, as he once intended to do, and to relate the whole Thing as it was. So that all his Defence consisted in debating some Points of Law; as whether a Design to surprize the King's Guards were Treason, and whether not only to levy War against the King were Treason, but the bare imagining to do so, which was all that was laid to his Charge. But both these Questions were determined against him; so that he was brought in Guilty, and condemned.

He is found Guilty.

On the same Day that he was tried, the Earl of Effex cut his own Throat in the Tower. The King and Duke of York being there by Chance at that very Time to see some Invention about the Ordnance, a Report was raised, as if it had been done by some other Persons, and afterwards laid upon himself. But the Truth was, he was subject to very black Fits of the Spleen; and was remarkable for praising and justifying Self-Murder upon several Occasions, in common Discourse. Besides, the Manner in which his Throat was cut, was such as made it plain it could be done by no Hand but his own. These Circumstances were, it seems, so well known to the Family, that they never gave themselves the Trouble of a farther Enquiry; though a warm and indiscreet Man, got himself afterwards a great deal of Trouble, by a Notion he had of his being murdered by others.

The Earl of Effex kills himself.

After the Lord Russel had received Sentence, his Friends were busied in contriving all possible Methods to save his Life. Money was offered without Measure or Counting

A.D. 1682. ing to all that had Credit. He offered from himself, but with great Indifference, to live beyond Sea in any Place the King should name, and never to meddle with English Affairs; which was all his Friends could bring him to. But either the King, or the Duke, or both, were so set against him, that all these Efforts were in vain. So he set himself to prepare for Death with the Quiet and Repose of a pious Christian; who having had always in his View that inevitable Change, had wisely provided long before to make it happy when it should come. For in the midst of all the Temptations that Youth and Affluence could lay in his Way, his Life had been remarkably strict and unblemished; and though at his first setting out into the World, he had fallen into some Excesses through the Fire of Youth, and the Force of ill Example, he soon recovered himself, and had lived for many Years a Pattern of Temperance and Piety. His whole Behaviour was a Triumph over Death; and was attended with such uncommon and exemplary Circumstances of Christian Fortitude, that it will not be amiss to enlarge a little upon them. During the last Week of his Life, he spent the Mornings alone; and at Noon he was attended by Doctor Tillotson and Doctor Burnet, to assist him in preparing for his approaching Change, which he saw coming towards him, with Tranquillity and Unconcern, like one who knew he should be no loser by it. He told the Divines that were with him, that he felt none of those Transports that other pious Persons felt; but said, that he had a full Calm in his Mind, no Palpitations of Heart, nor Trembling at the Thoughts of Death. He even shewed a Cheerfulness and good Humour at those Times when he was obliged to suspend for a while Employments of a serious Nature. When the Sheriff brought him the Warrant for his Execution, he took it and read it without any Concern; and after the Sheriff was gone, said to a Friend, it was not decent to be merry with such a Matter, else he was going to tell him, that they two should never sit together again in the House of Commons to vote for the Bill of Exclusion. For Rich, who was the Sheriff, though now on the other Side, had formerly voted for the Exclusion in that House. The Day before his Death he fell a-bleeding at the Nose; upon which he said, I need not let Blood now to divert this, that will be done to Morrow. For in Respect to his Quality, his Sentence had been changed to Beheading. The Night before his Execution it rained hard: If such a Rain, said he, comes to Morrow, it will spoil a great Shew, which is but a dull Thing upon a rainy Day. The Day on which he was beheaded, he refused to lose any Time in being shaved; and gave it as a Reason, that he was not concerned in his good Looks that Day. He asked what he should give the Executioner, and being answered ten Guineas; he said with a Smile, it was a pretty Thing to give a Fee to have one's Head cut off. Thus the Remembrance

The Lord
Russel's Behaviour under Sentence.

of a religious and virtuous Life, enabled a Man to look Death in the Face with so little Trouble, that it furnished him with Matter to be pleasant upon.

The Morning he was executed, he went into his Chamber six or seven Times, and prayed by himself. He drank some Tea, and a little Sherry. He wound up his Watch, and said, he had now done with Time, and was going to Eternity. About ten o' Clock the Sheriffs called him. He met the Lord Cavendish at the Bottom of the Stairs, and they embraced very tenderly; for they had been intimate Friends. After Lord Russel had left the other, upon a sudden Thought he came back to him, and pressed him earnestly to apply himself more to Religion, telling him what great Comfort and Support he had felt from it in his Extremity. Lord Cavendish had before offered to change Cloaths with Lord Russel, and stay in Prison for him while he made his Escape; but his Friend would not consent to it. Doctor Tillotson and Doctor Burnet went in the Coach with him to the Place of Execution, which was Lincoln's-Inn Fields. He was singing Psalms a great Part of the Way, and said, he hoped to sing better very soon. When he came upon the Scaffold, he walked about it four or five Times; and then delivered a Paper containing his Speech to the Sheriffs. He spoke a few Words; protesting he had always been far from any Designs against the King's Life or Government; that he prayed God to preserve both, and the Protestant Religion; that he wished all Protestants might love one another, and not make Way for Popery by their Animosities. After this he kneeled down and prayed by himself. Then Doctor Tillotson prayed with him. He afterwards prayed again by himself; and then undressed himself, and laid his Head upon the Block, without any Change of Countenance, and his Head was cut off at two Strokes.

This was the End of one of the firmest and truest Patriots our Countrey was ever blessed with; I mean for the Integrity and Uprightness of his Intentions; for his Conduct was not without Errors, as has been already observed. But his Virtues were so eminent and so rare, that they cast a Veil at once over all his humane Mistakes.

In the Speech he left with the Sheriff, he owned that there was some Discourse at Shepard's about seizing the Guards, and that he had heard such Talk in other Places, but denied that he ever gave his Consent to it at any Place; but on the contrary, had upon one Occasion declared passionately against it. This Speech was animadverted upon by several, with the usual Severity of Party-Zealots, who can believe nothing but what makes for their own Side. But the Seriousness and Sincerity so remarkable in this Gentleman, is a sufficient Answer to all the Reflections cast on him by those whom Prejudice had made insensible of his Worth.

The Doctrine of Non-Resistance, which was so naturally introduced and nourished

A.D. 1682. by the Remembrance of the late Rebellion, had been inculcated with so much Zeal, and imbibed with such an Eagerness and Thirst by most of the Church of England, that even wise and moderate Men could not help sucking in a Prejudice so diligently infused. This produced a Difference of Opinion between the Lord Ruffel, and the two Divines that attended him; which latter pressed this Doctrine with so much Strictness, that Doctor Tillotson wrote him a Letter, in which he told him he thought he could not leave the World with a well-grounded Peace of Mind, unless he acknowledged his Error in maintaining the contrary, and particularly and deeply repented of it. But it does not appear that his Admonition produced any Effect; which is not to be wondered at, since the Transactions that happened in the next Reign convinced the pious and worthy Author himself of his Mistake in pushing that Doctrine so far.

The Marriage of the Lady Anne with Prince George of Denmark.

About this Time Prince George, second Son to the King of Denmark, married the Lady Anne, second Daughter to the Duke of York; which Marriage to a Protestant Prince, completed the publick Satisfaction that had been carried so high by the Match of her elder Sister to the Prince of Orange. The Prince of Hanover, since King George I. of England, had been here two Years before to make his Addresses to her; but he was scarce arrived, before his Father sent for him back for a Match with the Duke of Zell's Daughter, which did then more accommodate the Family. Prince George and Lady Anne, by a Felicity that seldom reposes on Princely Beds, lived many Years together in all the Pleasures of the most perfect Conjugal Love; in this Respect only unhappy, that of the numerous Children with which their Marriage-Bed was blessed, not one lived to Ripeness of Years.

The City and other Corporations new modelled.

Soon after the Charter of the City of London was taken away, and a Lord Mayor and two Sheriffs were sworn before the Privy-Council into those Offices, and received Commissions under the Great Seal, by which they were empowered to act; but this was only to be done during the King's Pleasure. What was done in London, was done also in most other Corporations, who had either by Force or Persuasion, been wrought on to surrender their Charters. To all these new Charters were given, in which Care was taken to leave the King power enough over them.

A.D. 1683.

There were now almost three Years elapsed since the last Parliament at Oxford was dissolved; and according to the Act for Triennial Parliaments, a new one was to be thought of by this Time. But the Court either not thinking the Elections well enough secured yet, many of the Charters not being yet come in, or for some more secret Reasons, resolved after some Debates among the Ministry, not to call any.

Colonel Sidney's Trial.

The next remarkable Occurrence we meet with about this Time, is the Trial of Colonel Algernon Sidney. He was of a noble De-scient, being of the Family of the Earl of A.D. 1683. Leicester; a noted Republican, and who had been so eminent on that Side during the Rebellion against King Charles I. that he was appointed one of the High Court of Justice for the Trial of the Royal Martyr; though he never sat there, which procured him his Pardon after the Restoration. He had all the Fire and Spirit of a Republican, mixed with a good Degree of Extravagance. Lord Howard was the only Evidence against him; so that for want of another he must have been acquitted in course, had not the fruitful Invention of Lawyers found out something to supply that Want. It happened that when Sidney was apprehended, and his Papers as usual, seized on, a Treatise of Government of his Writing was found amongst them. It was composed in Answer to a Book written by Sir Robert Filmer, in which he asserted the Divine Right of Monarchy upon the eldest Son's succeeding to the Authority of the Father. This Work of Sidney's has been since published, and is penned with an uncommon Life and Force. In this Treatise some Passages were found, which though little more than declarative of the Rights of a free People, were in those Times, when unlimited Power in the Prince and unlimited Obedience in the Subject were all the Mode, construed into Treason. So the writing this Book was joined with the Plot; and the Court having now more than one Witness against him, that is, one to the Plot, and those who found the Book in his Custody, he was brought to Trial. He was indicted for conspiring to levy War, &c. and to promote those his wicked Designs, for writing a treasonable Libel, in which he advanced many traiterous Positions quoted at large in the Indictment. Lord Howard was the Evidence against him as to the Plot. He charged Sidney with being one of a Council of Six, who were to direct the other Conspirators. He had been very much obliged to Sidney for many kind Offices done him, which made his appearing against him in this Manner monstrously ungrateful. Whether it were Resentment for this Ingratitude, or whether Sidney thought his Defence lay another Way, is uncertain; but when he was asked, as usual, after Lord Howard had done his Evidence, if he would put any Questions to him, he only answered in a sullen Manner, he had nothing to say to him. But he called several Persons, some of which were of Quality, who deposed that Lord Howard had solemnly protested to them all, that he knew nothing of any Plot. He also observed how improbable it was that Howard, who could not raise five Men, and had not five Shillings to pay them, should be taken into such Consultations. The Libel came next to be considered. It was urged by the King's Council, that here was another Overt-act of Treason, which could not be denied, it being found in his Custody. To this Sidney answered, that it was not proved the Book was written by him; that Similitude of Hands was not a Proof in Criminal Causes;

A.D. 1683. Causes; that what was there written, were his own private Thoughts and Speculations, not communicated to any; that the Book was not finished, and none could tell how it was to have ended; a Man writing against Atheism, sets out the Arguments for it in his full Strength; but he was not therefore to be concluded an Atheist, because such a Chapter is found in an unfinished Book. It was also plain that this Treatise and the Plot, were Things entirely independent and unconnected; so that the Witnesses to the one, did not in the least strengthen the Testimony of the other, and therefore could not amount to two Witnesses in the Sense of the Law. But to this it was answered, that if there were two Witnesses, one to the Treason, and another to a Circumstance tending to Treason, these were the two Witnesses the Statute required. In Conclusion Sidney was cast, and condemned; and in three Weeks after, in Regard to his Quality, beheaded on Tower-Hill. His Behaviour before and at his Death, though firm and undaunted, was nothing so amiable as that of the Lord Russel; being mixed with a disagreeable Heat and Extravagance, that favoured too much of Enthusiasm.

He is found guilty, and condemned.

The Duke of Monmouth appears at Court.

About this Time an Accident happened, which surprized the City and Court. The Duke of Monmouth had lain hid in England all the Summer; but was now designing to go beyond Sea, and to engage in the Spanish Service. The Lord Hallifax, who was in great Confidence with the King, and out of Enmity to the Lord Shaftsbury with whom he had an irreconcilable Quarrel, had assisted the King in the resolute Counsels he fell into which gave so wonderful a Turn to the State of Affairs, began to find Matters pushed to much greater Extremities than he intended or approved. He thought the only Way to stem the Torrent which ran on with such a dangerous Rapidity, would be to oppose the Duke of Monmouth's Interest to the Power of the Duke of York. He not only found Means to correspond with the Duke of Monmouth, but gave him the Draughts of Letters which he should send to the King. These submissive Letters were of that Efficacy, that the King, who loved him passionately, was easily wrought upon, and resolved to restore him to his Favour. The Difficulty was, that the King absolutely insisted on his making a general Confession of the Plot, with which the Duke was loth to comply; but at last he was persuaded to satisfy the King by the Interposition of the Lord Hallifax; who advised the Duke to be silent for some Time, and patiently to bear the Censures that would of course pass upon him but being neglected, would quickly vanish and die of themselves. But this Advice was more prudently given than followed. The Duke was introduced to the King, and with all Humility fell at his Feet; confessing in general Terms his Offences against the King, and begging his Forgiveness. He then applied himself to the Duke with Expressions of great Deference and Respect. The King was delighted at his Heart to have him near him again; and this Incident might probably have given a great Turn to Affairs, had it been rightly made Use of. But the very next Day the Duke indiscreetly suffered himself to be again surrounded with Men of the same Stamp he used to converse with before; which gave Uneasiness to his Friends, and Hopes to his Enemies. However this was not so much minded, but that in the next Gazette an Account was published, that the King had pardoned him upon his confessing the whole Plot; and the King had also said in Discourse, that the Duke had confirmed all that Lord Howard had testified. This was made Use of by the Duke of Monmouth's false Friends to make him uneasy; and as soon as his Pardon was passed, they persuaded him to publish openly that he had confessed nothing at all: which, though partly true, was not to be said at that Time, and in that Manner, when the King had asserted the contrary. This Indiscretion laid him open to still greater Inconveniences. For it being soon carried to the King by some of the Duke's Creatures, the King was so unsatisfied, that he now ordered him to write a Confession under his own Hand. This Order perplexed him very much; he was afraid to refuse, and unwilling to obey. At last, the Lord Hallifax got over his Difficulties, by representing to him that he might safely confess he knew of a Plot; that Word being of an ambiguous Signification, and implying not only a Conspiracy against the King's Life, but dangerous Consultations of any Kind, which he could not deny his being privy to. He also laid before him the Service he might do his Friends by such a general Letter, which by gaining the King's Heart, would enable him quickly to recompense to them the seeming Prejudice such a general Acknowledgment could bring them under; and that this Confession could do them no real Hurt, because the King had promised it should never be given in Evidence. Thus he was induced to write a Letter to that Purpose, which Lord Hallifax carried to the King, who remained fully satisfied with it. But the next Day the Duke came again to the King in a great Disturbance, desiring earnestly that his Letter might be returned him. The King endeavoured to make him change his Mind, and spoke to him a good while with great Calmness. But finding him at last not to be persuaded, he returned him his Letter, but ordered him to leave his Presence and the Court immediately. This threw him again upon his own Party, who received him with a Joy and Welcome, that proved in the End a fatal and a killing Kindness to him. After some Days he went beyond Sea, and after a short Concealment appeared publicly in Holland, when he was received by the Prince of Orange, with a very particular Respect; which was not displeasing to the King, who loved him with such a Fondness, that no Misbehaviour could take it away. The Banished again.

A.D. 1683. The Port of Tangier on the Barbary Coast, at the Entrance of the Streights of Gibraltar, had been in our Hands ever since the King's Marriage; and many expensive Attempts had been made to cast up a Mole to make a secure Harbour there. But these Endeavours proving unsuccessful, and the Place lying exposed to the Moors its Neighbours, who had made many furious Attacks upon it, it was thought that the Expence of keeping it would not answer the Convenience. Therefore the Lord Dartmouth was sent thither, with Orders to evacuate the Place, and blow up all the Works, that they might be of no Use to the Moors or Spaniards if they should hereafter come to possess it; which was accordingly done.

The Earl of Danby, and the Popish Lords committed to the Tower for the Plot, had often moved to be bailed, but could not obtain it till now. But by this Time the Dread of Parliaments was over, and the whole Bench of Judges agreed to bail them; and accordingly they were discharged from their Confinement. The Lord Petre died about a Month before, protesting to the last that he was innocent of every thing sworn against him.

A.D. 1684. From this Time to the End of the King's Reign was a State of general Tranquillity; the discontented Party having been so long crushed, that their Spirits were quite broke; like a Spring which, if too long and violently restrained, loses at last the Power to restore it self. So that to the King's Death little happened remarkable; the Prosecutions of some of that Side making up the whole History of the Time.

Mr. Hambden above-mentioned came to be tried the first. But there was no Evidence against him but Lord Howard, without any Circumstance to support his Testimony. So to the end he might not escape, he was ordered to be tried for a Misdemeanor, for proving which one Witness is sufficient. The Jury brought him in Guilty, and a Fine of 40000*l.* was set upon him; which amounted to an Imprisonment for Life.

Two Days after, there came on the Trial of Laurence Braddon and Hugh Speke, for defaming the Government, by spreading a Report that the Earl of Essex had been murdered in the Tower. They were found guilty; and the former fined 2000*l.* and the other 1000*l.* Shortly after Mr. Samuel Johnson, a Clergyman, was tried for writing a Book, entitled, Julian the Apostate, and was fined five hundred Marks for the same. And after him Sir Samuel Barnardiston, for scandalizing the Evidence of the late Plot, was fined 10000*l.* Soon after Titus Oates was arrested at the Suit of the Duke of York in an Action of Scandalum Magnatum, for calling him Traytor, and other opprobrious and insolent Language, which naturally flowed from his Mouth. He let Judgment go by Default, upon which he was sentenced in 100000*l.* Damages, which laid him in Prison to the End of this Reign.

Among those who fled at the first breaking out of the Plot, was one Holloway, who used to make one sometimes at the Meetings at West's Chambers, spoken of before. He not appearing nor being found, a Writ of Outlawry was issued against him, and he happened afterwards to be found and apprehended in the West-Indies, where he fled for Refuge. He was brought over from thence in the Beginning of the Spring this Year; and April 21. he was brought to the King's-Bench Bar, and was offered a Trial notwithstanding his Outlawry. But he, having probably some Hopes of a Pardon if he saved the Court that Trouble, declined it, and promised to tell all he knew. He confessed he had been drawn into some Meetings with Rumsey and the rest, where it had been consulted how to raise an Insurrection, and that himself with two more had undertaken to manage a Design to seize Bristol, but that no Progress had been made in these Enterprizes. This Confession not satisfying the Court, he was ordered to be executed.

In June Sir Thomas Armstrong, who was also in the Proclamation and had fled, was taken at Leyden in Holland, and brought over here. He was brought to the King's-Bench Bar upon a Writ of Outlawry. He pleaded for himself that he ought to be tried though he was in an Outlawry, there being an express Statute, that if an outlawed Person came in at any Time within a Year, he was to have the Benefit of a Trial notwithstanding his Outlawry. Now there were several Months of the Year to come since his Outlawry; so that his Time for deliberating being not expired, he ought to have the Benefit of the Law, though he was brought by Force; since it was uncertain whether he did not intend to surrender himself before the Year was out. But this Plea was over-ruled, and he received Sentence; and in six Days after was executed.

The remaining Part of the Summer was chiefly employed in the surrendring the old Charters, and receiving new ones, which thro' the Fears of some, and the mad Loyalty of others, was grown into a Fashion among the Corporations in England.

In the Middle of November there was a remarkable Trial of one Mr. Rosewell, a dissenting Teacher. Three Women of very infamous Characters deposed against him treasonable Words spoken by him at a Conventicle. They swore to two or three Periods, in which they agreed so exactly, that there was not the least Variation in their Depositions. Rosewell made a strong Defence. He proved that the Witnesses were lewd and infamous Persons: That he had always been a loyal Man, even in Cromwell's Days, and constantly prayed for the King in his Family, and in his Sermons often insisted on the Obligations to Loyalty. As to the Sermon in which the Witnesses swore he delivered those Words, he shewed what his Text was, which the Witnesses could not remember, nor any Thing else in his Sermon but the Words sworn to. His Text and his Sermon had no relation to those Words.

Several

A.D. 1684. Several Witnesses who had heard the Sermon, and some who had taken it in Short Hand, declared he said no such Words; which were in themselves so wild, that no Man in his Wits could be supposed to say them in a publick Place. It was highly improbable that three Women should remember so long a Period upon one single Hearing, and all remember it so as to agree with that Exactness they did. Rosewell offered to put the whole upon this short Issue; he would pronounce a Period as long as that to which the Women had sworn, and in the Tone of Voice with which he used to preach, and then leave it to them to repeat it if they could. Jefferies, who was Lord Chief Justice, behaved himself very rudely; and gave the Charge with great Severity against the Prisoner. So that in spite of this powerful Defence, the Jury brought him in Guilty. But when the Words sworn against him were examined by Men learned in the Law, they were found not to be Treason by any Statute. So Rosewell moved for an Arrest of Judgment, till Counsel should be heard on his Side on that Question. And the King had heard so many Stories of the Infamy of the Witnesses, that he ordered the Court and Council to yield to the Arrest.

He is brought off.

While the King was in this Height of Power and Authority to which all submitted, he was still unsatisfied. He saw that his present Greatness was upheld, not as at his first Coming by the united and ardent Love of the whole Nation, but by the Fears of one Part, and the Madness of another; and he had too much Discernment, not to know that his Throne could not long rest with Safety upon such unstable Supports. He resolved therefore to set it once more on its true and steady Foundation; and to that End to give Satisfaction to his People by calling a Parliament, sending away the Duke of York, and recalling the Duke of Monmouth. But this hopeful Project proved abortive by the King's sudden Death.

Works of Piety in this King's Reign.

AS we have thought fit (and as we hope with good Reason) to deviate so far from Sir Richard Baker's Method, as to give a regular History of Parliamentary Proceedings, which that Author has not done, we have been obliged to give in course an Account of the Taxes and new Laws that occurred in this Reign, which we think it needless therefore to repeat here. And the Affairs of the Church having so near a Connexion with those of the State, we have chosen to put them together. Of Works of Piety, the first in Order is the rebuilding the Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London, and the other Churches, after their Destruction by Fire in 1666, which was ordered by Act of Parliament to be done at the Publick Expence, by a Tax on Coals. In 1669. the Theatre at Oxford was erected by Dr. Gilbert Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1673. a Mathematical School was founded in Christ's Hospital in London; and in 1681. the Writing School there was built. Also that noble Structure of Chelsea-College was begun in this Reign. We may under this Head not improperly mention the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, founded by the King for making Observations on the Heavenly Bodies.

Casualties in this Reign.

BESIDES the Plague and the Fire of London, of which we have given an Account above; there happened in the Town of Northampton a terrible Fire on the third of September 1675. just nine Years after that of London, by which that whole Town was almost destroyed. And in the Year 1676. a Fire happened in the Borough of Southwark, which consumed no fewer than six hundred Houses. Several Comets appeared during this Reign; among which one in 1680. was the most remarkable, which appeared first before Sun-rise, and then again after Sun-set, sending out at its second Appearance a prodigious fiery Tail, of so great a Length that it reached over a fourth Part of the Heavens. In the Year 1683. there happened a most violent Frost, which began about the Middle of December, and continued till February 5, without any considerable Intermission. During this Time the Thames was frozen over with a solid and contiguous Ice, in all Places above the Bridge; Booths being built thereon, and thousands of People continually upon it, some passing and repassing about their Affairs, and some diverting themselves. On the 9th of January Coaches drove over at Somerset-House, and at the Temple. On the 23<sup>d</sup> of January, being the first Day of Hillary Term, Lawyers and others, who had Affairs at Westminster, went over the Ice from the Temple to Westminster-Hall, and back again, as if it had been on Land; some on Foot, and some in Coaches, which carried People between the Temple-Stairs and Westminster for the same Fare as by Land, and plyed there for Customers as the Watermen used to do. Below Bridge many Booths were also built, and People crossed the River upon the Ice; and the Sea was so frozen round the Shores of England, France and Holland, that for a Fortnight no Packet-Boat could go out, or come in.

Of his Marriage and Issue.

HE had but one Wife, Catharine, Infanta of Portugal, who survived him, but he had no Issue by her. But his Natural Children were numerous. By Mrs. Lucy Walters he had James Scot, whom he created Duke of Monmouth. By the Lady Boyle, Viscountess Shannon, he had Charlotte, who by Marriage became Countess of Yarmouth. By Mrs. Catharine Pegge, Charles Fitz-Charles created Earl of Plymouth. By Barbara Duchess of Cleveland, Charles Fitz-Roy, created Duke of Southampton; Henry Fitz-Roy, created Duke of Grafton; George Fitz-Roy, created Duke of Northumberland; and Charlotte, married

A.D. 1684. married to the Earl of Litchfield. By Mrs. Eleanor Gwin, a Player, he had Charles Beauclerc, created Duke of St. Albans; and another Son, named James, who died young. By Louise de Querouaille, Duchess of Portsmouth, Charles Lenox, created Duke of Richmond. By Mrs. Mary Davis, Mary Tudor, married to the Son of the Earl of Derwentwater.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HIS Person was tall and well made; and his Constitution vigorous. His Complexion was black, and his Features strong and harsh; but dignified and heightened with a certain Majesty that shewed the King, even when he condescended to lay his Character aside, which he often did. He had a very lively and sprightly Turn of Wit, as many of his Sayings testify, which have been carried down by Tradition to our Times; and it had something in it so peculiarly his own, that no Man of any Taste can be easily deceived in any Saying related for his. He had an excellent Understanding, a ready Apprehension, and a sound Judgment; little or no Literature, but a great Compass of Knowledge in the Arts and Sciences. In particular, he was a perfect Master of every Thing that belongs to Sea-Affairs; and understood the Architecture of Ships so well, that he might have been said to be more exact therein than became a Prince; if it were not a Part of Knowledge so peculiarly becoming an English King. He was the best bred Man of his Age; and had a most captivating Easiness and Affability of Behaviour, which he knew how to temper so, that he could make himself familiar without losing his Dignity; and it was to his surprizing Mastery in this Art, that he owed the universal Affection his Subjects had for him; who loved their Prince as an agreeable and well-natured Companion, whom they had not so much Cause to admire as a faithful and provident Ruler. He was full of Diffimulation, and very expert at it, yet mostly without any ill Intention, or any other than just to make himself easy for that Moment with those he had to do with; to compass which trifling End, he used as much Art as Men use to employ upon much deeper Designs. With all his Remissness, he would sometimes be so industrious and indefatigable, that no Man would either toil longer, or be able to manage it better. He had such an utter Aversion to any Constraint, that he could not bear the short Formalities his Kingly Office obliged him to pass through; so that with as much Wit as most Men ever had, and as Majestick a Mien, he could not on Premeditation, whether at Parliament or at Council, act the Part of a King for a Moment, either in Words or Gesture, as great a Command as he had of both. This Temper, too much indulged, seems to have produced the many Errors of his Life; for he could not persuade himself to undergo that Restraint which is necessary at the Entrance into a steady Course of Wisdom and A.D. 1684. Virtue; so that having formed no Scheme of Life but that of pleasing himself, he was tossed to and fro, like a Vessel a-drift, as the various Accidents of his Life, and the different Turns of his Inclinations and Appetites, uncertain and unregulated as the Winds at Sea, chanced to drive him.

Of his Death and Burial.

ON the first of February the King eat little all Day; and came to Lady Portsmouth at Night, and called for a Porringer of Spoon-meat. He did not like it, so he eat but little. After he was a-bed he was heard to groan most of the Night. Next Morning there appeared a Paleness and Ghastliness in his Looks; he complained of a heavy Oppression at his Stomach, and about his Heart. He sat down to be shaved, but did not sit straight as he used to do, but continued in a stooping Posture with his Hand upon his Stomach. After this Dr. King, a Physician, and a Chymist, came to wait on the King; who being then amusing himself with a Chymical Process for the fixing of Mercury, had sent for him. All the King's Discourse to him was so broken, that he could not tell what he meant. The Doctor amazed at this went out, and meeting the Earl of Peterborough, told him the King was in a strange Humour, for he did not speak one Word of Sense. The Earl desired him to go in again to the Bed-Chamber, which he did. And he was scarce entered, when the King, who seemed all the while to be in great Confusion, fell down all on a sudden into a Fit like an Apoplexy; he looked black, and his Eyes turned in his Head. The Physician, who had formerly been an eminent Surgeon, said it was impossible to save the King's Life without letting him Blood immediately, which he accordingly did. The King came out of that Fit, and the Physicians approved of what Dr. King had done. But still the Effects of the Fit hung upon him, and he complained very much of a sharp Pain about his Stomach. The Physicians very much apprehended the Return of another Fit, and that it would carry him off; so that he was looked upon as a dead Man. The Bishops came to assist him with those religious Helps that are necessary to a Man in such a dangerous Condition. Dr. Sancroft Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Compton Bishop of London, and Dr. Ken Bishop of Bath and Wells, spoke to him one after another, on the Subjects proper for such a serious Occasion; but he gave them no Answer. Three Days after another Fit returned; and then the Physicians told the Duke of York he was not like to live a Day to an End.

The Duke immediately sent for Huddleston, a Romish Priest, who had a great Hand in saving the King after the Fight at Worcester, and ordered him to be carried to the Lodgings under the Bed-chamber. He was then told, that he was to administer the Sacraments

The King falls down in a Fit.

A.D. 1684. craments to the King according to the Usage of the Church of Rome. As soon as he had prepared every Thing necessary, it was made known to the King; who ordered every Body to leave him, except the Earls of Bath and Feversham, and the Door was double locked. Then Huddleston administered to the King the Sacraments used in the Romish Church in such Extremities. This was done in about half an Hour; after which the rest of the Company was called in. Bishop Ken, deeply affected at the Sight of one who had been both a mighty Monarch and a grievous Sinner lying before him in the Agonies of Death, was kindled into a pious Flame, and spoke to him with such an Elevation of Thought and Expression that he was like a Man inspired, but the King took little Notice of what he said. The Bishop pressed him several Times to receive the Sacrament; a Table with the Elements upon it ready to be consecrated being brought into the Room; but the King always declined it, saying, he was very weak. The Bishop then pressed him to declare that he desired it, and that he died in the Communion of the Church of England. But he made no Answer to this, but consented that the Bishop should give him Absolution; which, if he thought at all, he thought could do him no hurt. So the Bishop read over him the Absolution; which seems to have been a charitable Error in that Saint-like Man, seeing the King expressed no Sense of Sorrow for his past Life, or any Purpose of Amendment. The King suffered much inwardly, and often complained he was burnt up within. He bore his Pains, and the Approach of Death with a Calm and Constancy that amazed all who saw him, and knew how he had lived; and once said, he hoped he should climb up to Heaven's Gates.

He gathered all his Strength to speak his last Words to the Duke; to which every one listened with great Attention. He expressed his Kindness to him, and said that he now delivered all over to him with great Joy. He then recommended to him the Duchess of Portsmouth, Mrs. Gwyn, and his Natural Children; but said nothing about Religion, his Queen, his People, or his Servants. The next Day he died, in the fifty fourth Year of his Age; having reigned, if we reckon from his Father's Death, thirty six Years, and eight Days; or, if we reckon from the Restoration, twenty four Years, eight Months, and nine Days.

The King dies on the fourth Day.

Suspensions of his being poisoned.

The critical Time at which the King died, made it suspected that he was poisoned; and many Circumstances were observed that gave Suspicion: But as this is a Matter not positively determined, we shall refer the more curious of our Readers to Dr. Wood's Memoirs; where the Arguments pro and con are set forth with a Prolixity not proper for this Place.

His Funeral.

His Funeral was solemnized on the 14th of February in Westminster-Abbey, whither his Body was brought from the Painted-Chamber, Prince George of Denmark being chief Mourner, supported by the Dukes of Somerset and Beaufort. The Procession was met by the Dean and Prebendaries at the Entrance into the Church; who having performed the sacred Rites usual on those solemn Occasions, the Body was deposited in a Vault at the East End of the South Isle in King Henry the Seventh's Chappel.

Men of Note in his Time.

THE Return of the King and Constitution was accompanied by that of Learning, Knowledge, and Politeness. The Number of famous Men who appeared and flourished in this Reign is too great to be set down without Danger of omitting many eminent Names; but in conformity to our Author's Method, we shall mention such as at present occur. Among Statesmen we find the Earls of Clarendon and Southampton, two wise and excellent Ministers; whose Prudence and Integrity will make their Memories honoured, while British Liberty is valued. To these we may add Sir William Temple, who obtained so much Honour by his successful Negotiation of the Triple Alliance: As we might also the Lord Halifax, if he did not as much belong to the two following Reigns: And the Earl of Shaftsbury, if the ill Use he made of his great Capacity did not shut him out from that Fame which ought to be the Reward of Virtue only. Many eminent Divines also rose up to withstand the Torrent of Vice and Impiety, which began to overflow at this Time: As More, Wilkins, Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Cudworth, Patrick, Lloyd, Sprat, and many others; who have introduced a Way of Writing on Religious Subjects, that has a Solidity and Beauty in it little known or understood before. In Philosophy and Mathematics some towering and gigantick Genius's sprung up: As Mr. Boyle, Dr. Wallis, Sir Christopher Wren, Mr. Newton, (afterwards Sir Isaac) Dr. Halley, the living Glory of our Countrey, with others, of great though inferior Fame, who sprung from that Seminary of useful Philosophers, the Royal Society. In Poetry, the great Author of Paradise Lost, a Work which raises the Renown of the English Muse as high as that of the Greek or Roman; Dryden, who completed what Waller had begun, in refining the Numbers of the English Versification; with Otway and Lee, famous for Tragedy. In this Reign also was written, though not published, the Earl of Clarendon's noble History of the Rebellion, in which the Excellencies of the two great Roman Historians, Tacitus and Livy, are united; the profound Politicks of the one being joined to the flowing Eloquence of the other. Another admirable Performance of the same kind, the History of the Reformation by Dr. Burnet, since Bishop of Salisbury, appeared in this Reign. The Art of War was so little exercised after the Restoration, that the Military Genius had no Occasion to shine out on Land; and the Names of those who signa-

A.D.1684. lized themselves at Sea, have already been mentioned in the Course of the History.

MAYORS and SHERIFFS of LONDON in this King's Reign.

In 1660.

SIR Thomas Alleyne, Mayor.
William Bolton, William Peake, Sheriffs.

In 1661.

Sir Richard Brown, Mayor.
Francis Menbil, Samuel Starling, Sheriffs.

In 1662.

Sir John Frederick, Mayor.
Sir Thomas Bludworth, Sir William Turner, Sheriffs.

In 1663.

Sir John Robinson, Mayor.
Sir Richard Ford, Sir Richard Rives, Sheriffs.

In 1664.

Sir Anthony Bateman, Mayor.
George Waterman, Charles Doe, Sheriffs.

In 1665.

Sir John Lawrence, Mayor.
Robert Hanson, William Hooker, Sheriffs.

In 1666.

Sir Thomas Bludworth, Mayor.
Sir Robert Viner, Sir Joseph Sheldon, Sheriffs.

In 1667.

Sir William Bolton, Mayor.
Sir Dennis Gawden, Sir Thomas Davies, Sheriffs.

In 1668.

Sir William Peake, Mayor.
John Forth, Francis Chaplin, Sheriffs.

In 1669.

Sir William Turner, Mayor.
John Smith, James Edwards, Sheriffs.

In 1670.

Sir Samuel Starling, Mayor.
Dannet Forth, William Gomelden, Patience Ward, Sheriffs.

In 1671.

Sir Richard Ford, Mayor.
Jonathan Dawes, Robert Clayton, John Moor, Sheriffs.

In 1672.

Sir George Waterman, Mayor.
Sir William Pritchard, Sir James Smith, Sheriffs.

In 1673.

Sir Robert Hanson, Mayor.
Henry Tulse, Robert Geffery, Sheriffs.

In 1674.

Sir William Hooker, Mayor.
Sir Nathanael Herne, John Letbieulier, Sheriffs.

In 1675.

Sir Robert Vyner, Mayor.
Thomas Gold, John Shorter, Sheriffs.

In 1676.

Sir Joseph Sheldon, Mayor.
John Peake, Thomas Stampe, Sheriffs.

In 1677.

Sir Thomas Davies, Mayor.
William Rawstone, Thomas Beckford, Sheriffs.

In 1678.

Sir Francis Chaplin, Mayor.
Richard How, John Chapman, Sheriffs.

In 1679.

Sir James Edwards, Mayor.
Jonathan Raymond, Simon Lewis, Sheriffs.

In 1680.

Sir Robert Clayton, Mayor.
Slingsby Bethell, Henry Cornish, Sheriffs.

In 1681.

Sir Patience Ward, Mayor.
Thomas Pilkington, Samuel Skute, Sheriffs.

In 1682.

Sir John Moore, Mayor.
Dudley North, Peter Rich, Sheriffs.

In 1683.

Sir William Pritchard, Mayor.
Peter Daniel, Samuel Dashwood, Sheriffs.

In 1684.

Sir Henry Tulse, Mayor.
William Goslin, Peter Vandeput, Sheriffs.

A.D.1684.

THE REIGN

OF

King JAMES II.

A.D. 1685.

The Duke of York made King.

His excellent Declaration.

AS soon as King Charles was dead, the Crown devolved upon James the Duke of York, his Brother. On the same Day he came to the Privy-Council, and made a Declaration as is usual at the Entrance into Government. He declared that he would endeavour to follow the Example of his Brother, more especially in his great Clemency and Tendernefs to his People: That he had been reported to be a Man for Arbitrary Power, but that was not the only Story that was made of him; and that on the contrary, he should make it his Endeavour to preserve the Government, both in Church and State, as by Law established. That he knew the Principles of the Church of England were for Monarchy; and that the Members of it had shewed themselves good and loyal Subjects; therefore he would always take Care of it, defend and support it: That he knew the Laws of England were sufficient to make the King as great a Monarch as he could wish: And that as he would never depart from the just Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown, so he would never invade any Man's Property; Concluding, that as he had often ventured his Life in Defence of this Nation, so he would go as far as any Man in preserving it in all its just Rights and Liberties.

The King's Friends were marvellously delighted with this truly Royal Declaration, and his Enemies were satisfied, or at least silenced by it. So that this Declaration was magnified by all as a Security for our Religion, Laws and Liberties, of the strongest Nature that could be given; and the more, because it was the King's voluntary Act, which his Honour would not suffer him to break. The common Phrase was, We have now the Word of a King, and a Word never yet broken. And a Set of Addresses came from all the Parts of England, conceived in such Terms as shewed that no Fears or Jealousies were left.

In this universal Satisfaction two Things done by him, were passed over with less Animadversion than they deserved. The first was, that on the Sunday immediately following he went openly to Mass; which expressed an ill-boding Zeal, that could not contain itself within the Limits of a decent and prudent Moderation. The second was his issuing out a Proclamation to cause the Customs and Excise to be levied as before his Brother's Death. Now as these Revenues had been settled on the late King only for Life, the Power of collecting the same had determined at his Death, and could not legally be renewed without Consent of Parliament. It is true, that no Doubt could be made that the Parliament (which was expected to sit very soon) would grant those Duties; but still as none was yet in being, the Thing was both illegal, and of dangerous Example. But though it caused some Whispers among watchful and discerning Men, the Generality were little affected by it.

To remove the Prejudices entertained in relation to a Popish King, two Papers were published which were attested by the King to have been found in his late Brother's strong Box. The Scope of these two Papers was to shew the Necessity of a constantly visible Church, and of a Guide in Matters of Faith; which could only mean the Church of Rome. The Publication of them tended to procure favourable Sentiments of the Church of Rome, from the Approbation of so popular a Prince as King Charles II. and to shew by his Example, that the Church of England might be safe under a Monarch of that Religion.

The hasty Advances made by the King in favour of his Religion, were taken more Notice of by Foreigners than by our own Nation. Don Pedro de Ronquillo, the Spanish Ambassador, a wise and diligent Minister, and well acquainted with the Temper and Affairs of England, took the Liberty in a private Audience he had soon after of the King, to tell him, that he saw several Priests about him, who would importune him to alter the established Religion in England, but that he in-treated

8 Y

A.D. 1685.

Published two Papers of the late King's.

The King warned of his hasty Proceedings.

A.D. 1685. treated his Majesty not to give Ear to them; for that if he did, he would repent of it too late. It is said, the King took this Freedom ill; and asked the Ambassador in a Passion, whether in Spain they did not advise with their Confessors; to which Ronquillo answered briskly, Yes, Sir, we do, and that's the Reason our Affairs go so ill. It is said also that Pope Innocent XI. writing to the King on his Accession to the Throne, told him that he was highly pleased with his Majesty's Zeal for the Catholick Religion; but that he feared it might push him too far, and that he might bring upon it a great Prejudice, and upon himself with it, by attempting that, which his Holiness was well assured by long Experience, could not succeed. Such early Warnings arrived to this unfortunate Prince!

His Conduct in other Matters agreeable and popular.

In other Matters he behaved himself in a very popular Manner. There was a Lady near the Court, one Mrs. Sidley, by whom he had had several Children. But now he gave a solemn Promise to his Queen and his Priests, that he would see her no more. But he forgot this Promise in some Time. He spake openly against Lewdness, and declared a Detestation of Drunkenness. He sat many Hours in a Day at the Council, the Treasury, and the Admiralty; for he understood Sea-Affairs extremely well, and being naturally frugal, would look into his Revenue himself. These Beginnings were very promising, and Men said, there would now be a Reign of Action, and not of Sloth and Luxury as the last. He affected to stand upon high Terms with France, and to treat its haughty Monarch upon the Foot of Equality. And when he sent the Lord Churchill over with the Compliments upon his Brother's Death, he ordered him to observe nicely the Ceremonies and Respects used to him. And when the Mareschal de Lorge came over with an Answer to the same, Care was taken at the Court of England to observe those Forms to a Tittle. He also gave out that he would live in a particular Confidence with the Prince of Orange, and the States of Holland. And because Cbudleigh, his Envoy, had been wanting in his Respect and Observance to the Prince, he recalled him. All which Things were very acceptable, and well taken.

Oates's Trial.

The first remarkable Occurrence was the Trial of Doctor Titus Oates for Perjury, upon two Indictments. He had been arrested at the End of the late Reign in an Action of Scandalum Magnatum, at the Suit of the present King, when Duke of York, whom he had very insolently abused in Words. The Jury gave one hundred Thousand Pounds Damages, which laid him in Prison. He was afterwards indicted for Perjury, and had pleaded Not Guilty to two Indictments for that Offence; but the Trial being put off, the late King's Death intervened. The Indictments alledged against him were, first that he had sworn that a treasonable Consult was held by the Jesuits, in the Strand in London, April 24, 1678. where he was present; whereas he was at no Consult at all, nor in England at that Time. A.D. 1685. The second was for swearing, that Ireland, one of the Persons executed for the Popish Plot, was in London on the twelfth of August, and first and second of September of the same Year; whereas Ireland was at those Times in Staffordshire. The Witnesses examined were the same as had given Evidence at the Trials; namely, the St. Omer's Scholars, one of which had since taken Orders in the Church of England, who swore to the first Indictment; and the Relations and Acquaintance of Ireland, who swore to the second. The Trials held two Days, and the Jury found Oates Guilty of both Indictments. The Sentence against him was, that he should be deprived of his Canonical Habit, that he should stand three Times in the Pillory, and afterwards be whipped, first from Aldgate to Newgate, and two Days after from Newgate to Tyburn; besides which, he was to remain a Prisoner during Life, and to stand five Times in the Pillory, every Year. This Sentence was censured as too severe for the Mildness of the English Laws, more especially after the Whipping had been executed; which being at once a dismal and publick Spectacle, wrought upon the compassionate Tempers of Englishmen, to consider him with more Pity than perhaps he deserved.

Found Guilty, and receives a severe Sentence.

Not long after Thomas Dangerfield was also convicted for writing and publishing his Narrative about the Meal-Tub Plot, and sentenced to be whipped, one Day from Aldgate to Newgate, and the next Day from Newgate to Tyburn. It happened, as he returned the first Day in a Coach from that dreadful Execution, one Mr. Robert Frances, a Barrister of Grey's-Inn, came to the Coach Door, where it chanced to stop, and used indiscreetly some taunting Words to him, upon which Dangerfield spit in his Face. The other upon this thrust a little Cane he had at him, and struck him under, or as some say, in the Eye; with the Pain of which, joined with that of his Whipping, he died in a few Hours. Frances upon this was apprehended, condemned and executed; the Act having so ill an Appearance that his Life could not be saved, though he professed to the last Moment, that it was a Thing purely accidental, and without any premeditated Malice.

Dangerfield's Trial and Sentence.

The King and Queen being crowned with great Solemnity, Writs were issued out to call a Parliament, to assemble on the nineteenth of May. In the mean Time while all Things were in this apparent Tranquillity, a Design was formed by some Malecontents in Holland, to raise a Rebellion both in England and Scotland. The Earl of Argyle had been condemned in Scotland about three Years before, for a Fact which could not easily be construed to a Fault, much less to High-Treason. But he made a Shift to escape from that unjust Sentence, and to get over into Holland. He there met and conversed with many other disaffected Persons of both Nations; with whom he formed a Project to fail

The Earl of Argyle projects a Rebellion.

A.D. 1685. fail to Scotland; where his Estate and Interest were great, and the Discontented numerous. His declared Intentions were to redress the Grievances the Kingdom of Scotland suffered under the Government of the Duke of York; but the secret Scheme laid among his Party was, as 'tis said, to reduce the Monarchy there to a Commonwealth. The Duke of Monmouth, who was obliged to take Shelter in Holland after his Difference with King Charles, mentioned above, used to converse sometimes with these People, who persuaded him to make an Attempt upon England, at the same Time they began the Enterprize in Scotland. The English Malecontents agreed to this, and pressed it also upon him. They urged to him that he was so popular, especially in the West of England, that as soon as he should shew himself, he would have Multitudes at his Command. That the City of London was so disaffected to the King, that when he should have sent away some Part of his Troops to meet the Danger in Scotland, he would be obliged to keep the rest about him for the Safety of his Person. So that the Duke would have full Time to assemble an Army, and go and meet him upon equal Terms.

The Duke of Monmouth persuaded to make an Attempt on England.

The Duke of Monmouth had by this Time tasted so much of the Changes of Life, as had disposed him to Seriousness and Retirement and Repose, more than to any such laborious and turbulent Undertakings. Besides this, he was in absolute Want of all Necessaries for such an Enterprize; for he had neither Money to pay his Soldiers, if he should be able to raise any, nor Officers to conduct them. So that he refused to hearken to this disagreeable and hazardous Proposal, and took a Resolution to go and spend the Summer in Sweden; being obliged to leave Holland at the Instance of King James, with whom the States and the Prince of Orange were forced to comply.

He refuses it at first.

The Duke of Monmouth's little Council consisted chiefly of Lord Grey of Werk, Mr. Wade, and Colonel Matthews, Englishmen; and Mr. Fletcher, and Robert Ferguson, Scots. The two first of these were violently set upon the Attempt; and their Importunity, joined with that of the Earl of Argyle, at length over-ruled the Duke's own Inclination and Judgment, and the Advice of the others.

But is at last prevailed on.

Argyle fails to Scotland.

The Earl of Argyle, who was first ready, set Sail with three small Vessels for Scotland, and had a very prosperous Voyage. He came first to the Isles of Orkney, where he sent his Boat ashore to get Intelligence: but the Boat was stopped; and the Men secured; and the Wind chopping about, he was obliged to sail away, and leave them. The Winds were afterwards very favourable, and turned as his Occasions required; so that in a very few Days he arrived in Argyleshire, his own Country. But the Notice that had been sent from Orkney of his coming, enabled the Government to prevent him, and to seize on most of the Gentlemen of his Country, which saved them, though it helped on his Ruin. Yet he got between A.D. 1685. three and four Thousand of his Highlanders about him. He issued out two Declarations, the one in the Name of the whole Party, the other in the Name of the Earl alone; summoning all Scotchmen in general, and the Earl's Relations and Vassals in particular, to join with them.

In the mean Time the Parliament of England met. The King's Speech was to the same Effect as his Declaration; to which he added, that in giving those Assurances, he used the same Words as at his coming to the Crown, to shew that he then spoke them not by Chance, and consequently, that they might firmly rely upon a Promise so solemnly made. He then desired to have his Brother's Revenue settled upon him; and lastly acquainted them with the Earl of Argyle's Invasion of Scotland, the Account of which was just arrived.

The Parliament meets.

The Houses immediately joined in an Address of Thanks for the King's gracious Declaration confirmed by his Speech; to which the King answered, They should always find him as good as his Word. The Commons voted the King the same Revenue for Life, as had been settled on his Brother. And a joint Resolution passed both Houses, that they would stand by and assist the King with their Lives and Fortunes against the Earl of Argyle; and all Rebels and Traitors whatever.

But the Earl's Attempt gave the King no great Trouble. Few Persons came in to him, and the other Noblemen and Gentlemen raised their Vassals, and pressed him so close, in Conjunction with the regular Troops, that he was obliged to cross over, by the Help of his Ships, into an Island called Bute. He stayed in that Island, till he had eat it up, and then came over again into Argyleshire; where he fortified a Castle called Ellengreg, and lodged there the Arms and Ammunition he had brought with him; ordering his Ships to anchor near it, to secure the same from any Attempts by Sea. But a Squadron of the King's Ships, which was pursuing him, having Intelligence of this, soon mastered the Earl's Vessels, and then the Castle itself, with the Magazine laid up there. This Loss struck Terror into all of his Party, who began to desert; those who remained with him, retreating before the King's Troops, and covering themselves behind Rivers and Marshes. But at last they found themselves so closely followed, that they separated by Night into small Parties, taking different Ways. The Earl of Argyle, with that Body which accompanied him, marched towards Galloway. But the Guides, through Malice or Mistake, led his Company into a Bog, where their Horses stuck fast, and most of the Riders were obliged to leave them, and shift for themselves on Foot. The Earl got out his own Horse, and rode on alone, through unknown and private Ways, till he came to the Banks of the River Clyde. Here he was met by two sturdy Fellows, who guessing he might be one Argyle miscarries in his Attempt.

A.D. 1685. one of the Party, though they knew not who he was, bid him stand and surrender; but he answered them with a Pistol Shot, which missed them. They were armed as well as he, and fired at him again, and one of their Bullets wounded him. He would then have rode away, but his Horse was utterly spent, and could scarce move; upon which he dismounted, and taking his Pistols with him, endeavoured to escape on Foot; and made to the River, designing to wade or swim across it. He was got into the Water, almost up to the Neck, when a Countreyman, who saw him fighting with the other two, ran in after him, with a Pistol in his Hand. The Earl would have made a Shot at him, but his Pistol missed Fire; and the other gave him a Wound in the Head, upon which he fell, crying out, Oh! unfortunate Argyle! He was then seized, and carried to Edinburgh, where he was very barbarously used; being brought into the Town bareheaded, his Hands bound behind him, and the Hangman walking before him with his Ax. In a few Days after he was beheaded, and suffered with a Calmness and Serenity that was very extraordinary after such a long Train of Misfortunes.

He is taken and beheaded.

Rumbold taken and hanged.

And Aileffe.

The Duke of Monmouth sets Sail.

Richard Rumbold the Maltster, mentioned above, as Master of the Rye-House, at which it was said that Conspiracy was to be perpetrated, was taken after a stout Resistance, and hanged. He denied at his Death the Truth of that Plot. He confessed, that at West's Chambers many Propositions were made for killing the King and Duke, upon which he said, it might have been executed near his House, and some Discourse followed about the Manner of doing this; but that it was all but Talk, and nothing was laid, or so much as resolved on. One Aileffe, concerned in the same Conspiracy was also taken; who, with Rumbold, chose rather to run Fortunes with Argyle, than with the Duke of Monmouth, though they were Englishmen. This Man soon after he was taken, gave himself several Stabs with a Penknife; and thinking he had killed himself, cried out, That now he defied his Enemies. But his Wounds proved not mortal, so that he was brought up to London, it being believed he could make Discoveries. But he shewed a fullen obdurate Temper; and when he was brought before the King, treated him in an unbecoming Manner. So that he suffered also with the rest.

This Scotch Alarm was not fully quieted, before another and more dangerous one was heard from the West. The Duke of Monmouth having been induced to promise Argyle his Concurrence, set Sail from Holland three Weeks after the Earl, but in such an Equipage, and with such Preparations, as scarce ever any Invader set out with before. He had nothing to raise Money by, but the pawning his own Jewels, and those of the Lady Wentworth, who being desperately in Love with him, followed him beyond Sea. With this Money he purchased Arms for five Thousand Men, and hired a Man of War of thirty Guns, and three small Vessels, which was all his Fleet; on Board of which he went with about eighty two Persons, which composed his Army. And so wonderful and unaccountable are human Events, that with this slender Attendance and Provision, he was enabled in six Weeks, to bid so fair for one of the brightest Crowns in Europe, that nothing but a Sett of Misfortunes, as unaccountable as his Success, frustrated his Hopes and Attempt.

King James's Minister in Holland had some Notice of his Designs, and procured the Seizure of one of the Duke of Monmouth's Ships; but the rest got away, and sailed out of the Texel. They met such bad Weather, and other cross Accidents, that they were nineteen Days at Sea; so that it was the greatest Wonder imaginable they did not fall in with some of the King's Fleet, who lay to intercept them. But they escaped that Danger, and landed safely at Lyme, a Port in Dorsetshire, and went ashore that Afternoon. As soon as all were landed, the Duke commanded Silence, and falling on his Knees, implored the Protection of Heaven in a short Prayer. Then he drew his Sword, and marched at the Head of his Men into the Market Place, where he set up his Standard, and mustered his little Troop. Their Appearance was not at all encouraging, their Number being so small; but the Errand they came on, and their Leader, were so acceptable, that several immediately joined them. Then a Declaration was read, rehearsing and aggravating all the Blemishes and ill Conduct of the late Reign, and laying the same to the Charge of the Duke of York. Besides this, he was accused of the burning of London, the Popish Plot, the Murther of Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, the Death of the Earl of Essex, and even the poisoning of his own Brother. Notice was also taken of the levying the Customs and Excise without Consent of Parliament. But the Whole was ill written, and many Things insisted on that were neither just nor reasonable.

He lands in Dorsetshire.

He publishes a Declaration.

The Countrey People came in to join him in such Numbers, that he soon wanted both Arms and Officers for them. He had the whole Countrey open to him for some Time, which he spent in visiting the neighbouring Places, and in training and animating his Men. His own Behaviour was so gentle and obliging, that he was Master of their Hearts as much as possible. But he met with two very ominous Misadventures. The Lord Grey, for whom he designed the Command of the Horse, was sent out with a Party; but in his Way meeting with some of the Militia, he fled immediately, and abandoned his Men. But the Soldiers, either not knowing, or not minding the Absence of their Commander, stood their Ground; and the Militia ran from them. This very much perplexed the Duke of Monmouth, not knowing what to do when the Person whom he intended to place next himself in the Command, had made himself so infamous by his Cowardise. He had intended to have joined Mr.

He draws together a considerable Force.

Meets with two Misfortunes.

A.D.1685. Mr. Fletcher with him in the Command of the Horse, who was a Man of many Virtues, and wanted neither Courage nor Fidelity. But another Mischance had made it necessary to part with him before. It seems he was sent out upon another Party, and wanting an Horse, took that of a Person who was absent, thinking all Things were in common that would advance the Cause. The Owner of the Horse at Fletcher's Return, reproached him in very injurious Terms, for taking his Horse without his Leave. Fletcher bore this longer than could have been expected from one of his Temper; for with his good Qualities, he had one ill One, of being extravagantly passionate. But the other persisting in his foul Language, and offering a Switch or a Cane, he drew out a Pistol and shot him dead upon the Place. This inflamed the Countrey People, who came in a Body to demand Justice; so that the Duke was obliged and glad to save him by sending him away.

The Loyalty of the Parliament to the King upon this Occasion.

When the Report of the Duke of Monmouth's Landing came to London, it was received by both Houses with all the Resentment of the most Loyal Subjects. An Address of Lives and Fortunes was immediately presented, and a Bill of Attainder of the Duke and all his Accomplices passed with as much Celerity as might be; and the King was prayed to issue out his Proclamation, offering five Thousand Pounds Reward to any that should take the Duke of Monmouth alive or dead. This Bill of Attainder, with others of less Importance, receiving the Royal Assent soon after, the Parliament broke up.

The Parliament breaks up.
The Duke of Monmouth's Actions.

The Duke of Monmouth in about nine Days had got an Army of near five Thousand Men, and might have had as many more, could he have furnished them with Arms, so entirely were the People devoted to him. But these were of the common Sort chiefly; very few were of the better Rank. He spent nine Days after his Arrival in training his Men, and in slow Marches round the Countrey, where there were none to oppose him but the Militia, who fled before him; as some say, by Order from above, to furnish a Pretence, which was afterwards laid hold on, for keeping a Standing-Army. On the tenth Day he took a very extraordinary and unexpected Step; and proclaimed himself King of England, Scotland, &c. What the Reasons were of this Proceeding, which was directly contrary to his Declaration, is not very well known. There were some for it, as well as against it; and the Thing had no remarkable Consequences, good or bad. He then marched his Army towards Bristol, through Bridgewater and Glastenbury, and came within three Miles of it. Here a Party of his Horse was met by some of the King's, and a Skirmish rose between them; which for want of good Officers and Horses, ended to the Disadvantage of the Duke of Monmouth's Men.

His Army discouraged.

This Misfortune stopped the Duke's Progress to Bristol, and cast a Damp over all his Army. Nevertheless some of the Townsmen of Bristol came out to him, and offered to conduct his Army thither by private Ways, and assured him, that upon his Entrance, he would find no Resistance. But he was dejected, and refused to run the Hazard; and so went away to Bath, which he summoned to surrender. But the Place being well provided, rejected his Summons; and he not caring to spend Time in Sieges, went on to Philips-Norton, where he cut off part of a Troop of Horse of the King's. From thence he came to Frome, where he was received with great Joy, and might have increased his Numbers in some good Proportion, but that the Inhabitants had been all disarmed a few Days before. But at this Place he received the dismal News of the utter Defeat of the Earl of Argyle in Scotland; and what was yet worse, that a Body of Regular Forces was advancing towards him, together with a Train of Artillery. This struck his Party with such a Consternation, that it was once resolved, that all who came over with the Duke, should take Horse that Night, and make the best of their Way to the nearest Harbour; and seizing a Ship, set Sail for Holland. But this cowardly Motion was laid aside afterwards, and they agreed to stand the Fortune of one decisive Field.

Their Army which lay at Bridgewater, was encompassed on all Sides, except towards the Sea, by the Militia of Devonshire, Gloucestershire, Somersetshire, and Wiltshire, who were posted all round them. The King's Regular Forces were incamped at Sedgmore, not very far from Bridgewater; the Horse and Dragoons lying every Night in the neighbouring Town, and the Foot under their Tents. The Earl of Feverham their General, is said to have neglected the sending out for Intelligence; while the Duke of Monmouth was well furnished with it, by the good Affections of the Countrey to him. This gave the Duke an Opportunity of making one bold Effort for his Safety and Glory, which without great Misfortune or Treachery, would probably have succeeded.

He is surrounded, but resolves on a bold Attempt.

The Countrey People gave him Notice, that at the Earl of Feverham's Camp, the Orders and Discipline of War were very remissly observed; the Horsemen being either sleeping or drinking every Night in the Town where they were quartered, and the Foot revelling in the Camp, with as much Security as if no Enemy were near. Upon this Advice he formed a Design to fall upon them in this Disorder. About eleven o'Clock at Night he set out with all imaginable Silence, with a Guide who knew the Countrey, and was to lead them about the safest and most private Way. He marched on as to a certain Victory; for there was no Apprehension of his coming among the King's Forces, and the Duke himself said, they should have nothing to do, but to lock up the Stable Doors, and take the Troopers in their Beds. But this hopeful Scheme was disappointed by a Train of unaccountable Misfortunes.

He attacks the King's Forces in the Night.

A.D. 1685. The Guide lost his Way, which retarded their Arrival near an Hour; and it happened besides, that he brought them to the only Place in the Camp, where any Care or Thought was used to prevent a Surprise. The first Body of the King's Troops they fell in with, was a Scotch Regiment, under the Earl of Dumbarton, who were all old Soldiers, accustomed to Vigilance and Caution. These Men remembered that an Enemy was near, and kept a good Watch, and slept under their Arms. To complete the Mischance, while the Duke was yet at a great Distance from these attentive Veterans, a Pistol was fired among his Forces. Those experienced Troops immediately took the Alarm, and put themselves in Order; and from them the Call to Arms flew in a Moment throughout the King's Camp. The Scotch Battallion being first ready, kept the Duke of Monmouth's Forces employed, while the others put themselves in Order. Then the Fight began. Monmouth's Foot disputed the Field with incredible Vigour and Vivacity, and galled the King's Forces with their Shot so terribly, that those old Soldiers could hardly abide their Fury. The Battle had certainly been lost on the King's Side, had the Horse behaved themselves suitably. But they were ill mounted, and ill commanded; the Lord Grey, who had behaved himself so basely before, being by an unaccountable Weakness of the Duke of Monmouth, continued in his Post. So that though there were near a Thousand of them, they fled before a Quarter of the Number of the King's Horse; who having driven them out of the Field, came back, and fell upon the Rear of those brave Foot. It was then no longer a Fight but a Slaughter; the Cavalry breaking in upon the Battallions behind, and trampling them down; so that being attacked on all Sides, and their Ranks broke into, that excellent Body of Infantry was disordered and dispersed; and all were driven to shift for themselves. More of them were killed in the Pursuit, than in the Fight; for having lost that Order which was their Security, they became an easie Prey to the Horsemen that followed them.

The Fight at Sedgmore.

The Duke of Monmouth's
Forces routed.

Three hundred of them were slain in the Fight, a Thousand in the Pursuit, and as many taken. The Duke of Monmouth behaved himself well during the Fight; but seeing the Battle lost, he left the Field, with about fifty Horse. But these being soon dispersed, he rode on, accompanied with only a German Count, who came over with him. He took his Way towards Dorsetshire, and went on till his Horse could carry him no farther; upon which he quitted him, and trusted to his Feet. In this Manner they two wandered about for two Days, when they separated, and about four Hours after the German Count was taken. The whole Countrey was up in Quest of the Duke for the Sake of the Reward, and by the Count's Information they were encouraged to look for him thereabouts; and he was found not long after in a Ditch covered with Fern, with some green Pease in his Pocket; his Spirits being quite spent with the Fatigue he had undergone. A.D. 1685.

He is taken.

He wrote a Letter to the Earl of Feverham, He begs his Life meanly. the Queen, and the Queen Dowager, to intercede with the King for him; and another to the King himself, in which he begged his Life too meanly. He was brought up to London, and carried to the King at Whitehall. He here begged his Life again, with the same Submission as before, and with many Tears, but in vain. The Queen is said to have treated him with an Arrogance and Insolence, that was very unbecoming. This Interview was on a Monday, and he was ordered for Execution the Wednesday following. But is ordered for Execution.

Doctor Turner, Bishop of Ely, and Doctor Ken, Bishop of Bath and Wells, with Doctor Tenison, and Doctor Hooper, were appointed to attend him, to prepare him for the last Hour. They laid before him the Sin of his Rebellion, to as little Purpose as is usually done to Persons under those Circumstances. He desired them not to make him uneasy with that Discourse, but to turn to other Matters. His Duchess, whom he had long forsaken, came to him; but he treated her with an unbecoming Coldness and Neglect. During his Acquaintance with the Lady Wentworth, she had filled him with such Enthusiastical Notions, that he verily believed that what they did was approved of God. And when the Bishops pressed that Sin upon him, he told them he had prayed, that if his Affection to that Lady were unlawful, it might cease; but his Affection continuing, he concluded it was not sinful. And all the Pains they took to convince him of the Unlawfulness of that Course of Life was in vain. His Behaviour.

When he went to the Scaffold, he was attended by a strong Guard, who are reported to have had Orders to shoot him, if any should endeavour his Rescue; an Attempt of that kind being talked of and apprehended; for which Reason all the Avenues to Tower-Hill were secured by Soldiers. He behaved himself at the Place of Execution with a Cheerfulness and Magnanimity that would have been very becoming, had he not continued to persist in justifying his open Adultery with the Lady Wentworth. He said but little, except that he was sorry for the Blood shed in his Attempt; but that he had ever meant well to the Nation. He prayed there with the Divines that attended him. When he rose from his Knees, he spoke to the Headsmen to do his Business well; saying, that if he gave him two or three Strokes, he should not be able to lie without turning. He then gave him six Guineas, and four more to a Stander-by, which he ordered him to give the Executioner, if he did his Business well, otherwise not. The Executioner was in great Disorder, trembling all over; and gave him first a light Stroke, at which he turned and looked at him. Then the Duke laid him down again, and the Headsmen gave him two Strokes more, but then threw down the Axe, and cried out, that he could not go on. He is executed.

A.D. 1685. on. But the Sheriff with Threats obliged him to take it up again; and so at two Strokes more he cut off his Head.

His Character.

Thus died this unfortunate young Nobleman, having had his full Share of the Vicissitudes of Life. No Man was ever a greater Proof of the Treachery that lies hid under the Smiles of Fortune; for the Adversities of his latter Years could not have been brought upon him, without that overflowing Prosperity that went before. But the Favour of the King and People undid him, and drew him, as it were by Force, out of that safe Obscurity which guarded and sheltered the rest of his Father's Natural Children. By those fair and promising Winds he was invited to trust himself to the dangerous and tempestuous Ocean of ambitious Desires and Attempts; where wanting Judgment to be his own Pilot, he committed himself to the Skill of others; by whose Errors or ill Intentions he was tossed about among Rocks, and Shoals, and Sands, till he struck against that by which he suffered a total Shipwreck. He was brave in his Person, and understood Military Affairs well. The rest of his Character may be summed up in one Word, Softness and Gentleness of Temper; from which Source all the Accidents of his Life seemed to flow. By that he was drawn in to the Vices and Debauchery of a corrupted Court; by that he became popular; by that he was brought to entertain the Suggestions of ill-designing Men, who represented to him that his Countrey's Safety demanded his Interposition; and lastly, by that he was engaged against his own Inclination and Judgment, in this last Attempt, which ended in his Overthrow and Ruin.

The Lord Grey taken, but pardoned.

The Lord Grey, who was taken just before the Duke of Monmouth, was expected to go next. But the publick Expectations were here disappointed, which raised Speculations as if he had been employed to betray the Duke. But others say that he bought off his Life with a great Sum of Money, and making Discoveries.

A severe Execution of the Duke's Party.

Every Prison in the West was full of the Duke of Monmouth's Followers, taken in or after the Fight at Sedgmore. To try these Persons, a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer was sent down with the Lord Chief Justice Jefferies, who was also attended by a Body of Troops under Colonel Kirk. These Men went through the Countrey like a Pestilence. At Winchester, Dorchester, Exeter, Taunton and Wells, above five hundred Persons were condemned, of whom two hundred and thirty were executed, and their Quarters set up in the principal Places and Roads. Nor would the Number of the Executed have been so small, had not the Cruelty of the Judge often yielded to his Avarice; but none were saved, who did not purchase their Lives, except some few, who in Mercy were sold for Slaves to America. The barbarous Manner in which this was done, was equal to the Thing it self. Some of the Prisoners were hanged by Kirk without Form of Law, himself and his Company looking on with Unconcern from an Entertainment they were at. At every new Health a Prisoner was hanged. And they were so brutish, that observing the shaking of the Legs of the poor Wretches, they cried out, that they were dancing; and ordered Musick to be brought to them.

These and the like Barbarities, too many to be particularly related, one would chuse to impute to the cruel Temper of those who committed them, rather than to the King's Direction or Approbation. But it was at best a great Error in the King to treat Jefferies with those Marks of Favour he shewed him at this Time. He made him Lord Chancellor during his Absence; and when he came to pay his Duty at his Return, the King drew a Diamond Ring from his Finger, and presented it to him, as a Token of his Satisfaction in his Conduct. These Things made an Impression upon the Minds of the People to the King's Disadvantage, of which he will hereafter find the ill Effects.

The Severity of the Government was also felt in the City. Alderman Cornish, who had been a violent Prosecutor of the Popish Plot, was taken up on a Charge of High-Treason. He was a Man of no Depth, and by Consequence violent in his Way. He had pursued the Lord Stafford with great Indecency; and had been too busy in packing those Ignoramus Juries, which were a few Years ago the Scandal of the Nation and Times. But in all this Conduct, though exceptionable enough, he was rather weak than wicked; so that he could not be said to have merited the Hardships he now underwent. He was clapped up in Newgate close Prisoner, without the Use of Pen, Ink or Paper, for five Days; and on the fifth Day, which was Saturday, he had Notice that he was to take his Trial on the Monday following, on an Indictment of High-Treason. His Children petitioned for a longer Time for Preparation, alledging not only the Reasonableness of the Thing, but that a material Witness was an hundred and forty Miles off. But it was answered by the Attorney-General, that he had not deserved so well of the Government to have his Trial delayed; as if what he requested was a Favour, and could be denied without Injustice. So he was compelled to plead on the Day appointed. The Indictment was for conspiring against King Charles the Second in 1682. and that though he knew the Duke of Monmouth, the Lord Russell, and Sir Thomas Armstrong to be Traitors, he had promised to be assisting in their Treasons. The Evidence against him was Rumsey, who had sworn against the Lord Russell. He deposed that a treasonable Declaration was read in the Presence of Mr. Cornish, at the House of Sheppard, a Wine Merchant, where the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Russell, and others, were assembled, of which Mr. Cornish expressed his Approbation, and promised to join in it. Being asked, why he had never declared this before, he answered it was out of Kindness

A.D.1685. nefs to Mr. Cornish. He said farther, that though he had known Mr. Cornish for fourteen Years, he never heard him say one Word of those Matters before or after that single Time. To keep up the Form of two Witnesses, one Goodenough was called. He swore to some general Expressions of Mr. Cornish at another Place and Time; which had they been true, were too loose to lay any Strefs on. The Prisoner in his Defence, urged the Improbability that he should be with Rumsey once at a traiterous Consult, and never say one Word to him on such a Subject before or since. He brought Witnesses to prove that Goodenough was at Enmity with him. He insisted also, that he had never been at any Consult or Meeting at Sheppard's House; but his laying so much Strefs on this Affirmation brought him into a Snare. For after the Evidence was summ'd up, and the Jury ready to depart, who 'tis thought would have brought in a favourable Verdict, he desired that Sheppard might give Evidence to what he knew. The Attorney-General had subpoena'd Sheppard as well as the Prisoner, so that his Request was easily granted, though not without great Observation made to him of this seeming Indulgence in so unusual a Demand. Sheppard contradicted all that Rumsey had sworn relating to Mr. Cornish; but said, that once when the Duke of Monmouth was at a Meeting at his House, Mr. Cornish came to speak a few Words either to him or some other in the Company. This turned the Matter against the Prisoner; who affirmed he had never been at any Meetings there. But whether Sheppard's Evidence was true, or whether such a Thing had really happened by Chance, which the Prisoner had forgot, is uncertain. He was brought in guilty, condemned, and executed at the End of Queen-street, Cheapside, in Sight of Guild-hall. His Case was thought so hard, that after the Revolution his Attainder was reversed.

He is convicted and executed.

Other Persons executed.

With him were tried William King, John Fernly and Elizabeth Gaunt, Persons of ordinary Condition, for harbouring some of Monmouth's Party, who escaped to London from the West. What was monstrous in these Trials was, that the Evidences who took away the Prisoners Lives, were the very Persons whom they had thus charitably succoured and relieved. They were found guilty and executed, the Woman being burnt, as the Law directs in Cases of High-Treason. After these the Lord Brandon and Mr. Hambden were indicted in Westminster-hall for High-Treason; of which the latter pleaded Guilty, and the other was convicted. But they both received the King's Pardon. One Mr. Bateman, a Surgeon, was also convicted at the Old-Bailey of the same Crime. He had lost his Senses so entirely, that his Son was allowed to make his Defence. Yet though a Man in his Condition seemed very little dangerous to a Government, he was not only condemned but executed.

The King's Greatness,

The King was now raised to an height, from which nothing but himself could throw him down. He had a Revenue of two Millions a Year settled on him by a Parliament, which was in being, and as obsequious as he could reasonably desire. France on one side, and the Emperor, Spain and Holland on the other, paid him all the Court that could be. His Crown, which was shaken by Monmouth's Invasion, was fixed more firmly than ever by its Suppression. So that he wanted nothing but Moderation to secure all this Prosperity. But he was undone by his excessive good Fortune, which lifted him up so, that his Eyes were dazzled with his own Splendor; he became blind to his true Interest, and being misled into dangerous and ruinous Projects, overturned with his own Hands the Pillars that supported his Throne.

Which proves his Ruin.

The Parliament met on the ninth of November, within less than a Year after the beginning of the King's Reign. The King made a Speech to them, in which having congratulated them upon the Tranquillity that had succeeded the Rebellion, he observed to them "how weak and insignificant the Militia had proved upon that Occasion, which he said, made it necessary to keep a Body of Regular Troops in constant Pay, to be in Readiness against any future Exigency. For the maintaining of these Forces he desired a suitable Supply. He then went on, "Let no Man take Exception that there are some Officers in the Army not qualified according to the Tests; the Gentlemen, I must tell you, are all known to me; and I will deal plainly with you, that I will not expose them to Disgrace, nor myself to the Want of them"; and concluded with his Desire that there might be no Coldness between himself and his Parliament upon that Account.

The Parliament meets.

The King dispenses with the Tests.

A Standing Army, commanded by Popish Officers, avowed and maintained so openly and in such lordly Terms, filled the Mind of every true Englishman present with strange Fears and Apprehensions. The Commons going down to their House, and the Speech being read there again, according to Custom, the Members sat for some Time looking at each other, silent and amazed. After a little Space, the Earl of Middleton, a Courtier, stood up, and moved that "the Thanks of the House might be given to the King for his most gracious Speech; and that the Ends there proposed might be taken into Consideration." But the Astonishment and Perplexity the true Patriots were in, did not yet suffer them to break Silence. At last the Lord Castleton spoke, and declared his Dislike; upon which the Debate was adjourned, and the Speech was appointed to be considered in a Committee of the whole House three Days after.

The Parliament alarm-ed.

The Proceedings of the Commons.

The King's Speech appointed to be considered.

In the House of Lords a warm Debate arose, whether they should give the King Thanks for his Speech. It was opposed as vigorously by some, as it was contended for by others. The Marquis of Hallifax in the Debate happened to say by Way of Irony, "that

Of the Lords.

A.D.1685. "that the House had now more Reason than ever to give Thanks to his Majesty, because he had dealt so plainly with them, and had let them know what he would be at". What he meant for a Jest was laid hold on by the Courtiers for Earnest; and the Address of Thanks was carried, and presented. The King's Answer was artful. He said "he was very well pleased that the House was satisfied with what he had delivered; and that he would never offer them any Thing that was not for the Good of the Kingdom." Nevertheless the Bishop of London had the Courage to move, in the Name of himself and his Brethren, that the King's Speech might be fully debated; and the twenty third was appointed for that Purpose.

Who also appoint a Day for considering the same. The Commons consider the King's Speech.

When the House of Commons came to consider the King's Speech, the Debate was long, and ended not agreeably to the Court. A Standing Army in general was very much cried out against, and the obvious Inconveniences arising from thence were largely insisted on, and Proposals were offered for making the Militia useful. To all this the Courtiers had nothing to answer, but that ridiculous and stale Pretence of a Spirit of Disaffection among the People, which made them not to be trusted. Nevertheless the House was so respectful to the King, that they voted him a Supply of seven hundred thousand Pounds, which was understood to maintain the Army for two Years, till such Time as the Militia could be made useful.

But that which gave a far greater and a more reasonable Alarm, the dispensing with the Tests, admitted of little or no Dispute. This Infraction of the Laws was so plain and so flagrant, that nothing could be said in Justification of it; so that the House came almost unanimously into an Address against it. The Purport of it was "with all Humility and Duty to represent to the King, that those Officers were by Law utterly disabled from exercising those Employments; and that their Incapacities could be no way taken off but by Act of Parliament". They told him "that out of Respect to his Majesty, they had brought in a Bill for indemnifying those Persons from the Penalties they had incurred; but since the continuing them in their Employments was a dispensing with Law, a Matter of the utmost Consequence to the Religious and Civil Concerns of the Nation, they begged his Majesty would give such Directions therein, as should remove all Apprehensions from the Minds of his Subjects". The King who did not expect so vigorous a Remonstrance, and thought of carrying all Things with an high Hand, answered them sullenly, "That he did not look for such an Address from them, after he had warned them of Fears and Jealousies; but that he would yet continue true to his Word, and the Promises that he had made them".

This Answer was read with all due Reverence, and was succeeded by a profound Silence. At last a Member moved, that a Time might be appointed for considering it. This was seconded by Mr. Coke, who added, that he hoped they were so good Englishmen as not to be frightened out of their Duty by a few high Words. Notwithstanding the Disatisfaction the House was in on Account of the King's Speech, and Answer to their Address, such was the Respect they had for him, that Mr. Coke was sent to the Tower for his Freedom. And as a farther Proof of their Readiness to oblige the King, they entered upon Ways and Means for raising the seven hundred thousand Pounds abovementioned. Besides this, they offered to bring in a Bill for capacitating such a Number of Roman Catholick Officers as the King should give a List of. But many of them still insisting to have the King's Answer considered, he grew uneasy with them; and because the 23<sup>d</sup> was set apart in the House of Lords for considering his Speech, he came on the 20th, and prorogued the Parliament, which was never suffered to sit again.

A.D.1685. The Firmness and Moderation of the Commons.

The Parliament prorogued.

The Lord Delamere was tried soon after by a select Number of thirty Lords for High-Treason, in corresponding with the Duke of Monmouth. But the main Witness against him, one Saxon, was caught in such manifest Perjury, that his Lordship was unanimously acquitted.

A.D.1686.

Lord Delamere's Trial.

He is acquitted.

The King, who had now made so bold a Push in England, was not idle in his other two Kingdoms. The Parliament of Scotland had shewed it self very obsequious before; which gave him Encouragement to proceed. He declared himself here more openly than he had done in England; and wrote the Parliament an earnest Letter recommending to their Care his innocent Roman Catholick Subjects, who lay under such Discouragements as were hardly to be named, notwithstanding their constant Loyalty in the worst of Times, &c. This was enforced by a Speech from the Earl of Murray, the Lord Commissioner, to the same Purpose. But the Parliament was not so obsequious as was expected. All that they could be brought to was, to bring in an Act for allowing Papists the Exercise of their Religion in private Houses. But even this met with so much Opposition, that the King found they were not to be trusted; so that they were soon prorogued first, and then dissolved.

The King's Conduct in Scotland.

But in Ireland, where the Roman Catholicks were numerous, no Measures were kept. Two Months after the King's Accession to the Throne, the Duke of Ormond was removed, under Pretence of his great Age; but in Truth, because that noble Patriot would have proved an immoveable Obstacle to the Designs on foot. The Lord Primate and the Earl of Granard, were appointed Lords-Justices, who were Protestants; but to controul them it was not long before the Privy-Council was dissolved, and a new one constituted; into which Papists were brought so fast, that the few Protestants became Cyphers. After this the King wrote to the Lords Justices, to let them know that there was Reason to fear that

And in Ireland.

Monmouth's

Address the King against dispensing with the Tests.

The King is offended with them.

A.D.1686. Monmouth's Rebellion had infected Ireland; and therefore that it was thought proper to have the Arms of the Militia deposited in the Stores of the Countrey; and under this Pretence the Protestants in Ireland were all disarmed at once.

But there was another Obstacle to be removed; which was the Army there; which consisted of about 7000 Men, all zealous Protestants. This Army was to be cashiered, and the Person chosen for this Work was Colonel Richard Talbot; who was made Earl of Tyrconnel, and sent over Lieutenant-General; the Earl of Clarendon being made Lord-Lieutenant. As soon as Tyrconnel was there, he betook himself to the Design he was appointed to with so much Heat and Zeal, that in a very short Time he had quite changed the Army, having cashiered and disbanded all the Protestant Officers and Soldiers, to the Number of five or six thousand Men, and supplied their Places with Irish Papists. This being done, he came over into England; from whence he was sent back, as it was before agreed, with the Commission of Lord Lieutenant; the News of which was so terrible to the Protestants in Ireland, that many Merchants called in their Effects, and left the Kingdom. And it appeared soon after that they had but too much Reason to be alarmed. But to return now to the Affairs of England.

The King closets the Members of Parliament, but in vain.

The King's Power of dispensing with Laws set on foot.

The King had fair Warning given him by the Parliament of the Opposition he would meet with in the Projects he was meditating; but he would not take it. He sent for several of the Members who had eminently appeared for the Test, and spoke to them earnestly in his Closet to bring them to Compliance; which begat the Term of Closeting, much used afterwards. But they proved steddly to their Countrey's Interests, and many of them gave him flat and hardy Denials. At last these Endeavours proving ineffectual, a new Expedient was thought of for compassing the same Thing. A Notion was set on foot, or rather revived, that the King had a Right of dispensing with the Penalties of Laws, by Virtue of the Power entrusted with him for the Execution of them. This Pretence had been opposed and disannulled by the Parliament in the late Reign in the Years 1662. and 1673. as has been above related; and though the present King claimed such a Power virtually in his late Speech to his Parliament, yet it was done in a covert Manner, as a Demand he would be glad to have confirmed by their Connivance or Concurrence, rather than claimed as his undoubted Right. But now this Dispensing Power which overturned and frustrated all Law, was to be made a Part, nay, the very Foundation of it; and to support this, the Courts in Westminster-hall were to be prepared.

The Judges closeted.

The Judges were closeted one after another. Sir Thomas Jones, Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, who had been more than enough obsequious at Mr. Cornish's Trial, was first attacked. He defended himself with great Bravery and Steddings; and at last told the King downright, he could not do it. The King told him, that he should find twelve Judges of his Opinion. The other briskly replied, if he should find twelve Judges of that Mind, he would hardly find twelve Lawyers. But his faithful Counsel procured him his Quietus; as the same Firmness did to the Lord Chief Justice Montague, Mr. Justice Charlton, and the Lord Chief Baron Newill; whose Places were supplied by more flexible Tempers.

This being done, a Case was soon brought before them. Sir Edward Hales, a Roman Catholick Gentleman of a good Family in Kent, took an Employment; and his Coachman was set to inform against him, and to demand the 500*l.* given by the Act to such Informer. The King's Dispensation was pleaded by the Defendant; which brought the King's Authority of dispensing to be argued and debated; but in a cold and indecent Manner, very unsuitable to the Importance of the Question. The Coachman's Cause was given up; and thus the Dispensing Power was confirmed, as far as a Sentence in Westminster-hall could do it.

This Point being gained, the King was not wanting to use the Power these Judges gave him. All those who had a Mind to recommend themselves, though Protestants, took Employments, and accepted of the King's Dispensation. And Papists were put into Offices in great Abundance. The Popish Worship was openly exercised; and Jesuits Schools and Seminaries were erected in London, and the considerable Towns, for the Propagation of it. Four Roman Bishops were publicly consecrated in the King's Chapel, and sent out under the Title of Vicars Apostolical, to exercise their Episcopal Functions in their respective Dioceses; and their Pastoral Letters, directed to the Lay-Catholicks of England, were printed by the King's Allowance. Their Regular Clergy appeared in their Habits at White-hall and St. James's, and made no Scruple to tell the Protestants, "they hoped in a little Time to walk in Procession through Cheapside". Thus the Laws were openly broke through and undermined, by the servile Compliance of an infamous Bench.

The Doctrines of Passive-Obedience and Non-Resistance maintained by the Church of England at this Time, and the remarkably good Correspondence it has always preserved with the Throne, gave the King hopes of finding its Members more obsequious than they proved. Many of them were examined, to know how far they might be depended on to assist the King in his preparatory Step of the Repeal of the Penal Laws and Test; and no Promises or Threats were wanting to gain their Compliance. But the Court-Sollicitations and Menaces proved vain, and produced nothing but firm and resolute Answers. So these Applications failing, the Churchmen on a sudden were disgraced; and the Dissenters were taken into high Favour. All was Kindness and Condescension to them; and great Compassion was expressed for their past Sufferings.

Upon which he courts the Dissenters.

The King tries the Members of the Church of England in vain.

The King's Dispensing Power confirmed in Westminster-hall.

Upon which Papists are put into Offices; and all the Laws against Popery broke through.

A.D. 1686. ings. Their Teachers were encouraged to set up Conventicles, and Intimations were every where given, that the King would not have them, or their Meetings, disturbed. The wiser sort did not know what to make of all this, and suspected that something lay at the Bottom of these sudden Endearments. But as such Men seldom make a Majority in a great and numerous Body, the Generality were infatuated by them; and some began to grow insolent, and publish virulent Libels against the Church of England. Many of these were supposed to be employed, in order to engage the Church and the Dissenters in a furious Contention, while the Papists played them against each other. The Artifice was dangerous, and might have taken at another Time. But the Clergy with admirable Prudence and Moderation frustrated this Device, by a general Agreement amongst them not to take any Notice of Pamphlets, or Papers of that kind. So that the hot Men, finding themselves laughed at by their Adversaries, and reprov'd by their wiser Friends, grew tired of spending their Time and Pains to so little Purpose.

The excellent Conduct of the Clergy.

The imminent Peril of the Church of England.

The primitive Zeal and Courage of the Clergy.

Their glorious Conflict with the Errors of Popery.

The Church of England was now assaulted by a Storm that threatened its utter Ruine. Books and Discourses were published by Authority, and dispersed among the People, to mislead unwary Persons to embrace the Corruptions of the Romish Church. And that these might have their full Effect, an Order was directed by Way of Letter to the Protestant Bishops, to prohibit the inferior Clergy from preaching upon controverted Points in Divinity; and withal, they were threatened with exacting the full Value of their First-Fruits and Tithes, besides other Mischiefs and Inconveniences which the Royal Power might bring upon them, in Case of Disobedience. But now the Clergy shewed a Zeal worthy of the Apostolical Times. They refused to obey these unjust Commands, though with the Hazard of all they possessed; and committing themselves to God, defied what Man could do to them. They declared open War against the Errors of Popery, and set themselves to expose and confute them, both in Writing and Preaching, with that Ardor and Constancy, as gained them the Applause and Admiration of their Contemporaries, and will be a lasting Glory to them in all future Ages. Scarce a Week passed over, wherein some new Treatise or Sermon did not come out, to the great Strengthening and Edification of those who read them. And all the Corruptions of Popery were examined and confuted with a Solidity of Judgment, a Clearness of Argument, a Depth of Learning, and a Vivacity of Style, at least equal to that of the best Performances in any Time or Countrey since the Reformation. On the other Hand, the Popish Performances were very mean Things; being generally composed by Missionaries brought over from beyond Sea, who having spent their Time in Countries, where all they said was swallowed without Contradiction or Controul, it was a quite new Thing to them to find their Doctrines brought to the Test of Reason and Scripture, and made to pass through that fiery Trial, which they could so ill bear.

The Romish Priests were enraged to find their Religion so much exposed, and growing every Day more and more into Contempt. They said it was ill Manners to treat the King's Religion with so much Disrespect. But these Complaints being little heeded, it was resolved to proceed against some of the Preachers, in Hopes to intimidate the rest. Doctor Sharp was Rector of St. Giles's, a very pious Man, and one of the most popular Preachers of the Age, who had a peculiar Talent of reading his Sermons with much Life and Zeal. He received one Day, as he was coming out of the Pulpit, a Paper sent him, as he believed, by a Priest, containing a Sort of Challenge upon some Points of Controversie touched by him in some of his Sermons. Upon this, not knowing to whom he was to send an Answer, he preached a Sermon in Answer to it; and having confuted it, he concluded with shewing how unreasonable it was for Protestants to change their Religion on such Grounds. This was carried to Court, and represented as a Reflection on the King for changing on those Grounds.

Doctor Sharp attacked by the Papists.

This Opportunity was laid hold on to mortify the Clergy. The Earl of Sunderland, Secretary of State, sent an Order to Doctor Compton, Bishop of London, requiring him to suspend Doctor Sharp immediately, till he had given the King Satisfaction, and till his Majesty's farther Pleasure should be known. The Bishop was startled at this Letter, which if complied with, would effectually put an End to that noble Stand the Clergy were making in Defence of their Religion. He found himself intangled in a cruel Snare; his Refusal would bring Danger to himself, his Compliance to the Church. But that courageous Prelate did not long deliberate on the Choice he was to make. He wrote back to the Earl of Sunderland, that he was desirous to obey any Commands from the King which he could perform with a safe Conscience, but in this Case he could not proceed as was required of him. But he added, that what was in his Power he had done, having requested Doctor Sharp to abstain from officiating, till he had given the King Satisfaction; which he found him so ready to do, that he had made him the Bearer of that Letter. Doctor Sharp carried his Notes with him, which he was ready to swear were the same from which he had preached; where the Words charged against him were not to be found; together with a dutiful Petition, praying the King to lay aside his Displeasure against him. But Admittance was denied him, and this Accident was made a Handle for shewing the Clergy the Danger they might incur by Disobedience. But Doctor Sharp was not thought considerable enough; the Bishop of London himself was to be the Example, whose

The Bishop of London ordered to suspend him.

Who refused to do it.

A.D. 1686. whose Birth, Station and Credit would make the Sacrifice the more illustrious and exemplary.

The Ecclesiastical Commission.

When the King first entered on these Incroachments upon our Constitution, a Commission had been sealed, instituting a Court for taking Cognizance of Ecclesiastical Affairs. This was directly contrary to the Statute passed in the Reign of King Charles the First, which took away the High Commission-Court, and ordained that no Court should be set up for those Matters, but the ordinary Ecclesiastical Courts. But one arbitrary Act always draws on another. By this Commission the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Durham and Rochester, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, and Lord Chief Justice, were made the King's Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Affairs, and impowered to punish by Ecclesiastical Censures. This was now made publick on Account of this pretended Contempt shewn by the Bishop of London, who was doomed to feel the Weight of it.

The Bishop of London summoned before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners being late, the Bishop was summoned to appear before them. He came there, attended by many Persons of eminent Quality and Rank, who out of Respect to his Person and Virtues, as well as his Cause, honoured him with their Presence and Countenance. Jefferies, the Lord Chancellor, treated him very roughly, and asked him why he did not obey the King's Commands in suspending Doctor Sharp? The Bishop answered in respectful Terms, but with undaunted Firmness, that the Reason was, that he could not lawfully do it; adding, that he was unprepared to answer, as not knowing what he was cited for; and desired a Copy of their Commission, and of the Accusation against him. The Chancellor told him he must explain the Reason of his making these Demands, that if his Intention was to dispute the Legality of their Commission, a Copy should not be granted him. The Bishop replied, he did not intend to do so, but that he thought he might find something there that might be of Service to him. For though the Commission was in it self utterly illegal, it was not thought proper to dispute that Point at this Time; and the rather, because it would certainly have been to no Purpose, since the illegal Court would be sure to maintain its own Authority. The Bishop then desired a Copy of the Information, which was also denied, Jefferies telling him that their Court proceeded briefly, and viva voce. He then asked the Bishop again, why he did not obey the King? The Bishop replied, the Question was short indeed, but required many Words to answer it; that he was a Peer and a Bishop, and ought to be cautious to do nothing contrary to Law; that he wanted Time to make his Defence, and moved for a Delay till the October following. This was refused, and only four Days allowed him; at the End of which he came before them again, telling them he was not yet so well prepared as he ought to be; that he could procure a Copy of the Commission no sooner than the Night before, and desired more Time; which after a short Consultation was allowed him. The Bishop's Firmness and prudent Behaviour on this Occasion, got him universal Praise and Admiration; as the Justice of his Cause gained him the Concern and good Wishes of all who were present. When he moved for a Delay, Sir Thomas Clarges, who stood by, said aloud: Well put, the Bishop asks nothing but what is reasonable. And Sir J. Lowther, a Gentleman of Lancashire, coming away in the Crowd said; Some Persons have reported me to be a Papist, but the contrary shall appear; I will not be ashamed or afraid to vindicate my Lord Bishop's Cause against the Commissioners themselves.

He appears a second Time.

During these Delays, the Bishop endeavoured to mollifie the Displeasure conceived at Court, by secret Applications; hoping that they might be wrought on to accept of some general and insignificant Submission, and let the Matter fall. But they did not understand their own Interest well enough. So he appeared again before the Commissioners on the Day appointed. He then told them after a proper Apology, that he was informed by his Council, that their Proceedings were contrary to Law, and that they were ready to make it out. But because this was not permitted, he gave in his Answer, with a Protestation in Behalf of his own Right, as a Subject, and as a Bishop. His Answer contained a Relation of his Conduct in the Affair to the same Effect as is above recited; upon which he observed that he had acted by the Advice of Council, and according to the Maxims of Law. His Council, who were four Civilians, Doctor Oldish, Doctor Hedges, Doctor Brice, and Doctor Newton, endeavoured to shew, that the Suspension of Doctor Sharp in the Manner required, was contrary to all Laws, and a Thing unknown and unheard of in the Christian World. No Answer was given to this by the King's Advocate, though present; and the Bishop making an Apology for any Thing himself or his Council might have mistaken, the Court broke up. The Bishop was voted to be suspended during the King's Pleasure; and Sentence was passed on him accordingly at his next Appearance. And at the same Time a Sentence of Suspension passed on Doctor Sharp.

He comes before the Commissioners a third Time.

He is suspended.

But this violent Step brought incomparably more Prejudice to the King than to the Bishop. These arbitrary Proceedings withdrew the Affections of his People from him, who began to fear, and by Consequence to hate him; while the Bishop sat crowned with that Esteem and Applause that attends undaunted Virtue. The Princess of Orange, whose Childhood had been spent under the Care of this worthy Prelate, and who had also been confirmed and married by him, wrote to him while his Cause was in Agitation, expressing the great Share she took in the Trouble he was fallen into. She also wrote to the King in his Behalf, in which the Prince

of

A.D. 1686. of Orange joined with her, but in vain. His Clergy, notwithstanding his Suspension, were more governed by the secret Intimations of his Pleasure, than they had ever been by his Authority before. So that the small Inconvenience the Bishop underwent, was more than compensated to him by the Respect and Honours it procured him, while the King, having alienated the Hearts of his People from him, suffered a Loss never to be repaired.

The King makes an Encampment on Hounslow-Heath.

But he had gone too far already to hope to reign by Love, nor was he solicitous about doing so. The Designs he had in View obliged him to take another Course of Fear and Terror; in order to which he assembled all his Forces, dispersed in several Parts, into one Camp upon Hounslow-Heath, to the Number of about fifteen Thousand Men. This Encampment in Time of Peace gave great Jealousie; and it was taken, as well as meant, for an Ostentation of the King's Ability to overcome all Opposition by open Force. For though the Army consisted almost entirely of Protestants, it was feared and hoped, that the unlimited Obedience of Military Discipline, joined with the too common Licence of Soldiers, might easily engage them to advance the Designs of their Superiors without Examination. But to the immortal Honour of those brave Men, it afterwards appeared that they had Hearts as truly English as any of their Fellow Subjects.

Johnson writes an Address to the Army.

This Encampment gave Occasion to Mr. Samuel Johnson, a Clergyman, who had been fined in the late Reign for writing a Book entitled, Julian the Apostate, designed to reflect on the then Duke of York, to write an Address to the Soldiers in that Army. The Purport of it was to warn them not to join with the Popish Officers and Soldiers there. This was thought so dangerous, that the Author was tried for an High Misdemeanor; and being found Guilty, was sentenced to be degraded from his Ministerial Office, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn.

The King attempts to make Converts.

The Earl of Sunderland complies.

A new Scene now began at Court. The King set himself to make Converts among his Courtiers and Ministers. He first undertook the Earl of Sunderland, who being a Man of very loose Principles, was found obsequious enough. Nevertheless, he did not now think proper to profess himself openly; but, as 'tis said, promised to do it when the Queen should have a Son, as he accordingly did when that happened, or was said to happen.

The Earl of Rochester attacked.

The Earl of Rochester was soon after attacked. He defended himself for some Time from the King's Importunity, but being weary with being pressed, he at last told the King, that to let him see that his Perseverance did not arise from Obstinacy or Prejudice, he consented to hear some Protestant Divines dispute with his Popish Priests, and promised to side with the Conquerors. The King agreed to this, but excepted against Doctor Tillotson, and Doctor Stillingfleet.

The Earl said he would take those of his A.D. 1686. Chaplains who should happen to be in waiting, (for the Forms of the Chapel were kept up) which proved to be Doctor Patrick, and Doctor Jane. The Papists were one Gifford, a Doctor of the Sorbonne, and Tilden, who went by the Name of Doctor Godden, an eminent Writer among them. The Popish Priests began the Attack. But when they had done, the Earl himself stood up, and said, if they had nothing farther to offer, he would not trouble the learned Gentlemen of the Clergy to say any Thing, for he was sure he could answer all that he had heard. Then he went through what they had said, and answered it with much Heat and Spirit; saying from Time to Time, Were those Grounds to persuade Men to change their Religion? The King was so ill satisfied with his Proselyte, that he ordered the Conference to be broken up. But the Earl's Behaviour cost him his Staff of Lord Treasurer, which was soon after taken from him.

Who confutes the Popish Priests.

The King thought the Conversion of his Kingdoms so near and certain, that he now thought fit to make a Tender of them to the Holy See. To this End, the Earl of Castlemain was sent upon a formal and pompous Embassy to Rome, where Innocent XI. was Pope. This Step of his was contrary to Law, which forbids all Communication with the Court of Rome; but the King's Zeal urged him to give part to that Court of the Success he promised himself. But this Embassy was not received as he expected. The Pope was neither so bigotted nor so sanguine as the King; and had more Thoughts of depressing the Power of France, which he mortally hated, than of converting England, which he accounted a chimerical Project. He was vexed at his Heart to see the King spend his Thoughts and Labour on an Undertaking that appeared impracticable, while he neglected another which he might easily accomplish, and his Holiness was extremely set on. So that as soon as the Ambassador in his Audiences entered upon the Occasion of his coming, the Pope, to whom that kind of Talk was all Impertinence, was sure to be taken with a Fit of Coughing, so bad that it was impossible for him to enter upon Business at that Time. These Audiences and Fits of Coughing accompanied each other so periodically, that it was soon taken notice of at Rome, and grew to be the publick Diversion. Besides this, the Ambassador was so ill instructed, as to shew himself a zealous Favourer of France, which Nation was as odious at that Time at Rome, as could possibly be; so that he became as disagreeable at the Court there, as a Minister could well be imagined. At last being wearied with his cold and slighting Reception, he sent Word to the Pope that he would be gone; who was so little concerned at it, that he only said to the Messenger, "Well then, if he must needs go, tell him I advise him to rise early in the Morning, and to rest a little at Noon, for it is bad Travelling in these Countries in the Heat of the Day".

The King sends an Ambassador to Rome.

Who is ill received there.

A.D.1686. So that after a great Expence, to no Purpose, he left Rome; having received very little Encouragement there, unless from the Jesuits, who indeed shewed him a Profusion of costly and magnificent Respects. But that Order being altogether out of Favour with the Pope, their Example was not imitated.

A.D.1687. The next Step was to set on Foot a general Toleration. This had been long discoursed of at Court, as a Thing entirely reasonable and just; and great Reflections were cast on the Church of England for the Severities used to Dissenters. It was first attempted in Scotland, where a Proclamation was issued out for granting a Royal Toleration to Presbyterians and Papists, suspending all Penal and Disabling Laws, and annulling and discharging all Oaths by Way of Test, or Distinction between Subject and Subject. This Invasion being quietly received there, another Proclamation of the same kind was published in England, beginning for Form's Sake with a Promise of Protection to the Church of England; and then proceeding to the same Effect with the other just mentioned. All which was said to be done by Virtue of the King's Royal Prerogative of Dispensing Power. Besides the obvious Design of bringing in the Papists under Cover of this universal Indulgence, it was hoped that the Dissenters would be drawn in by it to defend the King's Dispensing Power, in return for the Ease it gave them; and grow so insolent upon the sudden Change, as to fall into Quarrels and Feuds with the Church of England.

The Behaviour of the Dissenters.

When this Proclamation was published, the greatest Part of the Dissenters became for some Time, not so much joyful, as quite mad. They caught greedily at the Bait, though the Hook lay so bare, that they must shut their Eyes to keep from seeing it. Addresses came from all Sects and Persuasions of them, and from every Part of England, full of such Raptures of extravagant Loyalty, that the King himself was more than satiated with them. But this Madness was too violent to last. The sober Men of the Church, and among themselves, gave them Warning of the Danger that lay hid under these Caresses; and when the first Transports were a little cooled, those Admonitions began to take Effect. And the Prospect of the common Danger united the Church of England and the Dissenters by Degrees, in a Band of mutual Forbearance and Charity; though to say the Truth, the Behaviour of the latter throughout this Reign was very little to their Credit.

The Romaniſts begin to attack the Universities.

The Church of England was already attacked with Violence enough; but another Attempt was made to corrupt it at its Source, the two Universities. This was not only a dangerous but an imprudent Step of the Court; the Privileges of Colleges and Universities being in all Nations regarded with a particular Veneration; and an Attack upon them, engaging not only the present Body in their Defence, but all those who have formerly had their Education there. So A.D.1687. that considering the Opposition they were like to meet with, they might be said to begin just where they should have ended. But the Jesuits fancied that if they could get Footing in the Universities, they should get such Reputation by their Methods of teaching Youth, that they should carry them away from the University Tutors; some of whom are to be found that are remiss enough. It had been proposed by some of the more moderate among them, to endow a new College in each University, and plant them there. This had certainly been the right Method; but whether it were to save Charge, or because it was thought that the King's Dignity was concerned to bring about his Ends in the most authoritative Manner, it was resolved to take more violent Courses to introduce them.

They began with Cambridge upon a softer Point, but which would have made Way for all the rest. The King sent his Mandamus to Doctor Peachel, the Vice-Chancellor, to admit Alban Francis, a Benedictine Monk, to the Degree of Master of Arts, without offering him the accustomed Oaths; which was intended to introduce the Popish Regulars into the Degrees of the University. When this Letter was read in the Senate, the whole Body were unanimous not to admit him. The King's Letters indeed were scarce ever before refused in conferring Degrees; and when Ambassadors or Foreign Princes came to visit the Universities, they usually gave such Degrees as were desired to those who belonged to them; and even the Morocco Ambassador's Secretary, who was a Mahometan, had been made a Master of Arts. But there was a Distinction made between honorary Degrees given to Strangers, and the Degrees given to such as might settle there. And the Vice-Chancellor and Senate were obliged by their Statutes to administer the Oath of Allegiance to all such; which Francis had refused. They sent up a submissive Letter to the Earl of Sunderland, desiring him to mediate with the King, and obtain Leave for their petitioning him, in order to represent the Hardship of their Case. But this Letter only produced a second to the University, commanding the same Thing, with this additional imperious Clause, to do it at their Peril. This being read in the Senate, they dispatched two of their Body to Town, with other Representations. But the Answer made them was, that the King was offended with their Proceedings, and they should hear more from him.

The Vice-Chancellor was soon after summoned to appear before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the Senate by their Deputies, among whom were Doctor Echard, Master of Katharine-Hall; Mr. Newton, (since the great Sir Isaac) Fellow of Trinity; and Mr. Stanhope, of King's, late Dean of Canterbury. Jefferies treated them with his accustomed Rudeness. The Vice-Chancellor was a Man of more Honesty than Acuteness,

A.D. 1687. nels; and made but an indifferent Defence. In the End he was deprived of his Office of Vice-Chancellor, and suspended from his Headship of Magdalen College.

The Vice-Chancellor suspended.
The Affair of Magdalen College in Oxford.
The Court commands the Fellows to make one Farmer their President.

But the Royal Severity was yet more sensibly felt at Oxford. The President of Magdalen College died about this Time. The Popish Priests immediately fixed their Eyes and Hearts upon that noble Foundation; and a Mandamus was sent to the Fellows, whose Right it always had been to elect their own President, directing them to chuse one Anthony Farmer, who had given his Promise to turn Papist. The Fellows received this Mandamus with great Concern and Surprise. They could not be unacquainted with the loose Principles of the Person recommended, to which his Life and Character were suitable; and the setting such a Man at their Head was like to prove not only a private, but a publick Mischief. At last they resolved to incur the King's Anger rather than comply with so pernicious a Command. They sent a Petition to Court, representing that Farmer was a Person in many Respects incapable of being made their President; and humbly requesting the King either to leave them to the Discharge of their own Consciences, or to recommend some fitter Person. But the Answer sent them was brief, that the King must be obeyed. This Answer came to them on the last Day that was allowed them by their Statutes to defer the Election; so that it was only left to their Choice, whether they would chuse Farmer, or a more statutable Man, no Time being left them for any farther Representations. Hereupon they chose Dr. Hough, a worthy Man, and a resolute, not apt to be terrified out of his Right; and he was next Day confirmed by the Visitor, the Bishop of Winchester.

The News of this came to Court, and was very ill received there. A sharp Letter was sent them by the Earl of Sunderland; and the Vice-President and Fellows were cited to appear before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Accordingly, the Vice-President and five of the Fellows came before them. It was demanded of them why they did not obey the King's Mandate? After some Time allowed them for deliberating, they made answer, that they were bound by their Oaths to elect none but such as were, or had been Fellows either of Magdalen or New College; but that Mr. Farmer had never been Fellow of either; so that they could not have chosen him without Breach of their Oaths. That they had represented this to the King; and deferred their Election till the last Day limited by their Statutes; when they made Choice of a statutable Person. And at their second Appearance they represented also, that Mr. Farmer was a Person of an ill Life and Character, and produced many Testimonies of the same, which were too plain to be denied. Nevertheless, the Commissioners deprived Dr. Hough of his Presidentship, and suspended two of the Fellows, ordering the rest to cause their Sentence to be executed, and affixed to the Gates of the College; A.D. 1687<sup>4</sup> which they neglecting to do, were cited to appear again for Contempt. But the Court soon found the Person recommended from thence to be of so scandalous a Life, that they began to be ashamed of him, and desisted from all farther Prosecution of that Affair; and sent a new Mandate in behalf of Dr. Parker, Bishop of Oxford, a servile Courtier, and no less incapacitated by the Statutes. So that the Fellows, having besides a legal President already, did not think fit to comply with the King's Commands.

In the mean Time, the King who was vehemently set upon abolishing the Test and Penal Laws against the Papists, had tried all the Court Arts with the Members of Parliament, to bring them to promise their Consent to it: and to this End had put off their Sitting, by Prorogations from Time to Time. But he found so universal a Firmness amongst them, that he now dissolved them, in hopes of modelling a new Parliament more to his Mind. To this Purpose he set himself to court the Dissenters, putting them into such Offices in the several Counties and Corporations, as should enable them the better to concur and assist in the Choice of Members. He reviewed the Lists of the Lord Lieutenants and Deputy Lieutenants, and gave Orders to the former to summon the Gentry, and engage them to promise to chuse Members according to the King's Desire. But this Experiment gave the King a fair Warning, if he would have taken it, not to drive any farther an impracticable Design; the Inclinations of the People appearing very averse to such Elections. Nevertheless he went on, and resolved to make the Essay what Force his own Interposition would have. He made a Progress this Summer round a great Part of England; and was received in every Place with the utmost Respect due to his Royal Dignity.

In his Progress he came to Oxford; where either by his own Eagerness, or ill Advice, he was persuaded to try what his Presence would do with the Fellows at Magdalen College; forgetting that the Influence of Regal Majesty is always greatest at a Distance. They were sent for to the King at his Lodgings at Christ Church; where when they presented themselves before him, he asked them haughtily, Whether they did not receive his Letter? Dr. Pudsey, the Senior Fellow, confessed to him that they had: to which the King in an angry Tone replied, Then you have not dealt with me like Gentlemen; you have done very uncivilly and undutifully by me. They all fell presently upon their Knees before him, and Dr. Pudsey, the Senior Fellow, offered a Petition, in which they humbly expressed their Grief, that they could not obey his Commands without breaking their Oaths, and their Founders Statutes. But the King refused their Petition roughly, and spoke to them in these Words: Ye have been a stubborn turbulent College; I have known you these six and twenty Years,

The Court recommend the Bishop of Oxford; but the Fellows remain firm.

The Parliament dissolved.

The King endeavours to model the Elections of a new Parliament.

His Treatment of the Fellows of Magdalen College.

But they chuse Dr. Hough.

The Fellows summoned before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

A.D. 1687. Years, and you have affronted me in this. Is this your Church of England Loyalty? One would wonder to find so many Church of England Men in such a Business. Go home, and shew your selves true Members of the Church of England. Get you gone! — Know I am your King! — I will be obeyed, and I command you to be gone! — Go, and admit the Bishop of Oxford Head, Principal, what d'ye call it (one that stood by said, President) I mean President of the College. Let them that refuse know they shall feel the Weight of their Sovereign's Displeasure. Hereupon they were going out of the King's Presence, but were called back and asked, whether they had not admitted Mr. Holben Fellow since they received his Inhibition? They answered, that there was no new Election or Admission, but only the Consummation of a former Election. The Consummation of a former Election, said the King, is downright Disobedience, and a fresh Aggravation. — Get you home, I say, again, and elect the Bishop of Oxford, or expect to feel the Weight of my Hand. Upon this they fell upon their Knees a second Time, and offered their Petition; but the King said, Get you gone! I'll receive none from you till you have obeyed me, and admitted the Bishop of Oxford. But these undaunted Men were not to be wrought on by Frowns or Threats to act against their Conscience. They repaired to the Chapel as they were ordered; but the Question being proposed, whether they should obey the King, they answered, that they were as ready to shew their Duty to him as any of his Subjects; but this Election being contrary to their Oaths and Statutes, it was not in their Power to obey him now.

But the Fellows continue undaunted.

Ecclesiastical Commissioners sent down to them.

They drew up an Address to this purpose, but in the most submissive Terms, and presented it to the Earl of Sunderland; but to no other Purpose than to engage the Court to make use of secret Artifices and Sollicitations for some Time instead of open Violence. But these proving ineffectual, a new Set of Ecclesiastical Commissioners were made; Dr. Cartwright Bishop of Chester, Sir Robert Wright Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and Sir Thomas Jenner one of the Barons of the Exchequer. These were sent down to Oxford, to visit Magdalen-College in particular. The President and Fellows were cited to appear before them; and the Bishop of Chester began with a Speech, in which he enlarged upon their undutiful Behaviour, his Majesty's gracious Temper, and his Care for the Church of England; their Dependence upon the Crown, and the Dangers they had brought upon themselves, the Universities, and the Church, by giving occasion to this Visitation; and hypocritically exhorted them by the Bowels of Christ to think upon those Things. After this Scene was over, they called the Fellows a second Time, and the Bishop of Chester asked Dr. Hough whether he submitted to their Visitation? To which he answered in his own Name, and that of almost all the Fellows, that he submitted to it as far as was consistent with the Laws of the Land, and the Statutes of the College, and no farther. A.D. 1687. The Bishop then demanded their Registers; an Account of their Revenues, and Copies of the last two Years Leases. The next Morning Dr. Hough being called before them, they required him to deliver up the Keys, and Possession of the Lodgings to the Person whom the King had made President; but the Doctor resolutely denied both. After they had demanded this several Times, and been as often refused, the King's Proctor stood up, and accused him of Contumacy. The Bishop of Chester then admonished him three Times to depart peaceably out of the Lodgings, and act no longer as President, to as little Purpose. He was then dismissed; and the Commissioners applied themselves to the Fellows, and asked them whether they would admit the Bishop of Oxon President, since Dr. Hough's Election was declared void? They made Answer, that they could not do it without premeditated Perjury, and therefore would not do it. During this Examination Dr. Hough came again into Court; alone, and without any Attendance. He stood by silent till the Commissioners were at a Pause, and then desired Leave to speak a few Words. This was granted to him with great Civility; for it was expected he would have offered some Compromise. He then said to them, Since you have been pleased to deprive me of my Place of President of the College, I do protest against all your Proceedings, in Prejudice of me and my Right, as illegal, unjust and null; and therefore I appeal to my Sovereign Lord the King in his Courts of Justice. Upon this resolute Protestation the Scholars and Standers by gave a triumphant Humm; which so incensed the Lord Chief Justice, that in a very arbitrary Manner he obliged Dr. Hough to sign a Bond of 1000*l.* to make his Appearance at the King's Bench-Bar the following Term; though both himself and the Fellows offered to purge themselves by Oath that they were in no wise accessory to that Acclamation. The Commissioners were in a great Rage to see the publick Favour run so much on the Side of the excluded President; and told the Fellows, that if the Civil Power could not keep their College in Order, the Military should. Three Days after the Bishop of Oxford was installed President in the Chapel, by Proxy. The Proxy was then conducted to take Possession of the President's Lodgings; but as Dr. Hough had refused them the Keys, they ordered them to be broke open. The Fellows were then asked, whether they would obey the Bishop of Oxford as their President? Dr. Fairfax answered, he neither could nor would obey him, having already a lawful and statutable President. Dr. Smith, and Mr. Charnock complied; but the others desired Time to deliberate, and at last gave in their Answer, that they submitted so far as was consistent with their Statutes; which was in effect not submitting at all. This was at first accepted by the Commissioners; who finding they could obtain no more, were content

The Resolution of Dr. Hough, and the Fellows.

The Commissioners exclude Dr. Hough by Force.

A.D. 1687. tent with this Appearance. But afterwards they required a more ample and full Submission, that they should acknowledge their Contempt, own the Legality of the Court, implore the King's Pardon and promise their entire Submission to the Bishop of Oxford as President. But this the Fellows absolutely refused, one or two Compliersexcepted.

The Commissioners being called to London, while this Matter was contesting, it lay still a little. But they were soon sent back with positive Orders to exclude and deprive all those who refused the entire Submission required of them. The Fellows were cited again before the Commissioners, and the Bishop of Chester did his best by Threats and Cajollings to bring them to comply. But they continued firm; so that the Commissioners obeyed their illegal Orders, and deprived and excluded twenty five of them; against which they all protested, declaring they would use all just and legal Ways of being relieved. This was so open an Invasion of Right and Property, that a greater could scarce be in France, or Turkey; a Fellowship being the same Thing as a Freehold, and secured by the very same Laws. The whole Nation was alarmed at this; no Man having a stronger Security for his Estate or Possessions, than those which were here openly and violently broken through. Yet though it lay burning in every Man's Breast, no visible Effects yet appeared from thence, nor were any publick Complaints made of it.

The Pope's Nuncio makes his publick Appearance.

While this Affair was depending, the King shewed by another Example, how little Regard he had to the Laws. The Pope, who could not agree with him in essential Matters, would not be behind-hand in Point of Ceremony, and sent over Signor Ferdinando d'Adda as his Nuncio. He came over at first in a private Manner, but in about a Year's Time took the Character publicly; though it was absolutely forbid by Laws then in Force. But the King's Dispensation got over that Difficulty, and he made his publick Entry into Windſor with the utmost Pomp and Ceremony; being dressed in his Pontificalibus, preceded by a Cross-bearer, and a Train of Monks and Friars, in the Habits of their several Orders. But the

The Duke of Somerset refuses to introduce him.

King met here with a little Mortification. For the Duke of Somerset, who was Lord of the Bed-Chamber then in waiting, being commanded by the King to introduce the Nuncio, made him Answer, that he could not do it, being informed that it was contrary to Law. The King asked him if he did not know that he was above the Law? But the Duke replied briskly, If your Majesty is, I am not. The King told him in a Passion, he would trouble him with no more Commands, and dismissed him from his Employments. But the Duke of Grafton was more complaisant, and introduced the Nuncio without any Difficulty. But the real Matters transacted by the Nuncio were of no Importance, for he came from a Court that knew better than that he was sent to.

And he was so ill satisfied with the Steps the King took, that he desired often to be recalled, lest he should be thought to have a Hand in such imprudent and precipitate Measures.

About this Time the French Protestants came in great Numbers into England, to shelter themselves from the Persecution that raged in their own Countrey. They were received with a great Tenderness by the People, and with great Kindness by the King, who granted them Briefs for their Relief, and gave them considerable Sums out of his Privy-Purse; which was looked upon as an Artifice by some, but highly commended by more impartial Persons.

The French Protestants relieved.

The King had made so many and so dangerous Encroachments upon the settled Constitution, that it was easie to see that nothing would serve him, but the introducing Popery upon the Ruins of our Religion, Laws and Liberties. Nor did Power seem wanting to him to compass this. He had a brave and a numerous Army on Foot, a formidable Fleet; he was a careful Manager of his ample Revenue, so that he was in no Want of Treasure; and the greatest Prince in Europe, his next Neighbour, was his powerful Friend. A Parliament, which alone could apply Remedies to these deadly Symptoms that appeared in the State, was not to be expected; unless so bought and corrupted, as only to temper and administer the last poisonous Draught, which could be so mortal and killing in no other Hand. One faint Hope appeared from the King's Age; who being advanced in Years, some were willing to persuade themselves might in no long time be taken away by Death; when, by the usual Fate of Princes, his Thoughts would perish with him; and a Protestant Successor might make them forget, or remember with Pleasure, the Dangers and Fears they passed through before.

The dangerous State of Affairs.

But this Hope, which seemed the last, was turned into Terror and Consternation, when News began to be whispered about that the Queen was with Child. This was afterwards confirmed by a Proclamation for a publick Thanksgiving on the fifteenth of January for the Queen's Pregnancy; and a solemn Prayer for her safe Delivery.

The Queen said to be with Child.

The Protestants were terribly alarmed at this; and yet not so much from their Apprehensions of the Consequences, as from an universal Rumour and Suspicion that immediately ran about, that the Thing it self was not true; and that the Romish Party had prevailed upon the King's Bigottry to join with them in imposing a supposititious Heir upon the Nation, in order to establish and perpetuate the Designs he had entered into for introducing his own Religion. This Report and Jealousy gained Ground with an inconceivable and unaccountable Progress; and a Thousand odd Conceits sprung up in People's Minds. All the Accounts of former Cheats and Impostures were now remembered, and some of them reprinted; as that of Queen Mary's pretended Conception, in order

Which is not believed.

A.D. 1688. der, as 'tis said, to defeat Queen Elizabeth's Succession. So that in a short Time this Story of the Pregnancy of the present Queen came to be treated and regarded by all Protestants as an undoubted Fraud and Contrivance. It was very surprizing that a Thing so unlikely as that a Parent and a great King would knowingly embrace a fictitious Child for his own, should meet with so easie a Belief. But there were some Causes of Suspicion that appeared now, and there were many more afterwards. The Queen had left off bearing for six or seven Years, and it looked odd that she should begin again at so critical a Time. The King's Zeal had already engaged him to break the most solemn Promises, and enter upon such desperate Attempts as must end either in the Nation's Ruine, or his own; so that Men were easily brought to believe he might be persuaded to go farther. And the Reason assigned by the Papists for the Queen's unexpected Fertility, namely that it was the Effect of a Vow and Present made to the Image at Loretto, was worse than none to Protestants, who looked before with so evil an Eye on the pretended Miracles of the Romish Church.

The glorious Stand made by the Clergy.

Nevertheless, some Addressees came up upon this Occasion; which to make themselves the more welcome, not only brought their Congratulations, but Assurances of sending such Members to Parliament, as would be for repealing the Penal Laws and Test; the Court being now employed in modelling such a Parliament as might be brought to carry that Point. The Jesuits and Priests gathered new Vigour, and were more busie than ever in making Converts, and publishing Books of Controversie. But they were afresh encountered by the Clergy, with unwearied Labour, and intrepid Resolution; though the Storm that threatened them, grew every Day blacker and blacker. But the Dangers that surrounded them only served to animate their Courage, and make their Constancy the more illustrious. Their unshaken Resolution infused new Life into their Flocks; who would probably have yielded to the imminent Peril, had not their Spiritual Leaders thus nobly placed themselves in the Front of Danger; and by their own Example, encouraged the Laity to stand the Shock. This Primitive Zeal drew upon that reverend Order the Love, Applause, and Veneration of all good Persons of every Condition and Degree; who comforted themselves with Hopes, that the same Divine Goodness which had kindled these shining Lights in his Church at this needful Time, would not suffer them to be at last overwhelmed and extinguished by cruel and tyrannical Violence.

The King endeavours to engage the Prince and Princess of Orange to concur in repealing the Penal Laws and Test,
but in vain.

An Incident happened at this Time which helped to support the Spirits of the People. The King, who neglected no Expedients for compassing his great Design, was advised to sound the Inclinations of the Prince and Princess of Orange, with Relation to the Penal Laws and Test; not doubting, if he could engage them, but that their Opinion A.D. 1688. would draw in great Numbers of Followers. Applications were made to the Prince from the King, in which it was observed how great Severities had been brought upon the Dissenters by the Penal Laws, and how fitting it was therefore to repeal them; since the Papists being an inconsiderable Body, could do no hurt by what they would gain by it. But that since the King was resolved not to consent to the repealing them without the Test, it was fit to consider whether it were not better to accept the King's Offers as he made them, rather than by rejecting them, to expose the Dissenters to the Danger of a new Persecution, which might otherwise come upon them some Time or other. Thus an extraordinary Tenderness for Dissenters, was to be the Means of introducing Papists into Offices and Power.

The Prince caused an Answer to be sent, importing, that himself and the Princess were much against Persecution on Account of Religion; and were willing that the Papists should be relieved from the Penal Laws, as well as the Dissenters have a full Toleration; but that they could not consent to the taking away the Test, it being now become necessary to secure the established Religion. This Answer was so unacceptable to the King, that the Letter was concealed for some Time; and it was given out with great Art and Industry, that the Prince and Princess had consented to the Repeal of the Test, as well as of the Penal Laws. But this Report being brought into Holland, it was thought necessary to put an effectual Stop to it by publishing the Letter; and vast Numbers of Copies were sent over into England, and carefully dispersed, which very much encouraged all Protestants. The Church Party were confirmed by it in their Zeal for standing by and maintaining the Test; and the Dissenters were delighted to find the favourable Intentions of their Highnesses towards them. Even the Papists of moderate Dispositions were so well satisfied with it, that they complained of those ambitious Priests and Courtiers, who rather than leave their aspiring Projects, would expose the Roman Catholics to the former Severities, when an Exemption was now offer'd them.

The Court finding this Repeal of the Penal Laws and Tests so powerfully opposed, set on foot a general Proposal that an Equivalent should be given for them, which should be as great a Security, or even a greater than those Statutes. This Word filled the Mouths of the Court-Advocates for some Time; till the Marquis of Hallifax, in a short Treatise entitled, The Anatomy of an Equivalent, shewed so clearly the Danger and Folly of expecting any such Security, that the People grew weary of being amused with an idle Sound, and the Proposers ashamed of it.

The King repented heavily the Firmness of The King re-
the Prince and Princess of Orange, the Con- sents it.
sequences of which had vastly increased his Trouble in pursuing the Measures he had entered

A.D. 1688. entered into. He sent over on the sudden to the States, to require of them the Return of six English and Scotch Regiments that were in their Service. But the States excused themselves in a civil Manner, alledging that those Troops were in a great Measure composed of their own natural Subjects; and that by the Treaty they were not obliged to send them back, unless England were engaged in a War. However they said they would allow Passes to all the Officers who were willing to return home; which about forty of them accepted. These were Men who had behaved themselves very ill, and given much Trouble to the Prince and the States; so that their Absence was very acceptable.

A second Declaration for Liberty of Conscience.

The dangerous Design of it.

This mistaken Prince had been hitherto with great Labour and Earnestness, weakening the Foundations on which his own Safety rested; but now he gave Fire to a Mine, which shook his Throne so fiercely, and left it so tottering, that in a short Time after it fell, and brought him down from it with so precipitate and violent a Ruin, as dashed his Crown and Scepter to pieces. He published at this Time a second Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, in which the former was repeated and confirmed. This was partly intended to shew the King's Resolution to go on with his Designs; and partly to extend some farther Grace to the Papists than the former allowed. But the principal Design of it lay much deeper. The Clergy of the Church of England had given so much Trouble to the Papists by the glorious Stand they made in defence of their Religion, that it was necessary to find an Expedient to restrain these dangerous Men. And by this Declaration it was proposed to catch them in such a Trap, as should effectually revenge upon them their past Offences, and silence them for the future.

In company of this Declaration was published an Order of Council, by which the Bishops were commanded to distribute Copies of the Declaration to the Clergy, and to direct them to read the same after Divine Service on two successive Sundays. The Effect of this it was expected would be as follows. It was known that the Clergy in general were fully persuaded, not only that the Declaration was illegal, but that the sole Aim and Tendency of it was to ruin them. So that it was supposed, that a considerable Number, those especially of the most Learning and Credit, would refuse to read it; but that a great Majority, some to make their Court, and some out of Fear, would comply. That these Parties would soon grow very odious to one another, by the ill Correspondence that will naturally be kept between generous Virtue and servile Baseness. That when the Feuds were risen very high, the Court might interpose, and crush the Non-compliers with the utmost Severity and Rigour; in which it was reckoned that the opposite Party would chearfully concur; who in return for their friendly Assistance, should have the kind Acknowledgment made them of being devoured the last.

But this Engine of Mischief was so contrived, that whatever other Course the Clergy might take, the Blow it threatened them with appeared still as certain and as fatal. For if the Clergy should have the Firmness universally to refuse Compliance with this Order, there was a Pretence for proceeding against that whole Body for Disobedience; which would put all the Preferments and Livings of the Church at the King's Mercy by an Ecclesiastical Commission; the Consequence of which would have been, that her glorious Champions and stedfast Friends had been every where turned out into Distress and Poverty, while her Revenues had been made the Hire of those who were to assist in her Destruction. If they should prove so base and cowardly as universally to comply with a Command evidently calculated to make them ridiculous and accessary to their own Undoing, it would be easy to load them with more of the same Nature; till their present Glory would be changed to the lowest Infamy, they would become contemptible to all Mankind, and their Ruin would be neither pitied nor withstood by any. And so certain were the Romanists of compassing their Ends by this Artifice; that Father Petre, the King's great Counsellor and Director, broke out into a most insolent Expression upon it, and said in Triumph, he would now make the Clergy eat their own Dung.

Providence seemed now to have abandoned the Church of England to her Enemies; those who had been her Guardians and Defenders being intangled in such a cruel Snare, that which Way soever they turned themselves, they seemed inevitably undone. Many Meetings were held by the Clergy to deliberate on their Proceedings in these perplexing Circumstances. Some proposed complying, but with a Declaration that they did it in mere Obedience, but did not assent to or approve the Thing. But to this it was objected, that if they once yielded the Point, that they were bound to read what they did not approve, the King might in Time send them Declarations to read in favour of Popery; and if they did not stop now, they might never be able hereafter. That it was plain their Ruin was resolved on; and nothing but sacrificing their Religion to their Safety could prevent it. That in a Word, the Time was come that called them out to sufferings for Conscience-sake; to which they must now begin to inure themselves. These Reasons soon prevail'd, and they agreed with a wonderful Unanimity, and yet with great Secrecy, to expose themselves to all the Dangers of a Refusal, rather than obey so unjust and unlawful a Command.

The perillous Condition of the Clergy.

Their noble Resolution.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. San-croft, acted on this Occasion as became the supreme Pastor of the Church of England. (The See of York was at this Time vacant; being kept so in order, as is supposed, to be filled with Father Petre, as soon as the Romish Projects were come to sufficient Ripeness.) He wrote round his Province, requesting such of the Bishops as were able, to

The Archbishop of Canterbury consults his Province.

A.D. 1688. to come up and confer with him; and desiring the Opinion of those whom Age or Infirmities disabled from taking such a Journey. He found that eighteen Bishops, and the main Body of the Clergy, concurred against reading the Declaration. Upon this he held an extraordinary Assembly at his Palace at Lambeth, of Bishops and other eminent Divines, to consider of some Expedient to divert this Storm. And having first implored the Divine Assistance in solemn Prayer, they proceeded to Deliberation. They all agreed, that the Matter of the Declaration was utterly illegal; and therefore, that the Clergy by publishing it would do an illegal Act; that the ill Consequences of reading it must upon that Account be great and many; by making the Clergy appear as Time-servers or Cowards; and by influencing the Electors of Members of Parliament, to chuse such as were for the Dispensing Power, on a Supposition that the Clergy favoured it. That the Thing intended was plainly not to make the Declaration known, but to make the Clergy Parties to it; who would have other Things imposed on them for the same Reason, till they should be at last driven to the same Difficulty as now; but disabled to make a Stand, by having lost their Reputation. Some objected that their Refusal might be interpreted as a Failure of Loyalty by the Papists, or resented by the Dissenters, as Want of Tenderness towards them; or lastly, that the Church might be left destitute of her Pastors, by the Suspension or Deprivation of the Refusers. But to these Things it was answered, that Loyalty being Obedience according to Law, those were the loyal Men that did nothing contrary thereto; and that the best Friends to the Crown, are those who support the Law. That the Dissenters could not but see, that it was the Dispensing Power, and not their Indulgence, that was opposed. That the Church would suffer less by the Deprivation of her Ministers, than by this illegal Compliance; but that at all Events, it was necessary to do their Duty, and leave the Issue to God.

A Meeting of the Bishops and Clergy at Lambeth.

The Bishops resolve to take the Danger of Refusal to themselves.

The Result of this memorable Conference was, that the Bishops considering how fatal the Consequences might be, if the whole Body of the Clergy should be suspended for not reading the Declaration, and what Influence Fears or Hopes might have over some of the weaker Sort, resolved not to send it to them, but stand the Danger of the Refusal themselves. An Act worthy of those Times, when the Church of Christ subdued the World by Martyrdom and Sufferings. Dr. Sancroft Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Lloyd Bishop of St. Asaph, Dr. Ken Bishop of Bath and Wells, Dr. Turner Bishop of Ely, Dr. Lake Bishop of Chichester, Dr. White Bishop of Peterborough, and Sir Jonathan Trelawny Bishop of Bristol, who were the only Prelates there, drew up a Petition to the King in Behalf of themselves and their absent Brethren, and in the Name of the Clergy of their respective Dioceses.

They draw up a Petition to the King.

It set forth, that the great Averseness they found in themselves to distribute and publish the Declaration, did not arise from Want of Respect to the King, or of Tenderness to the Dissenters; but that the Declaration being founded on such a Claim of Dispensing Power, as had been often declared illegal in Parliament, they could not in Prudence, Honour, or Conscience, make themselves so far Parties to it, as the Publication of the same once and again in God's House, and in the Time of Divine Service, would in reasonable Construction amount to.

The Archbishop was then in an ill State of Health. So the six other Bishops went over to the King with the Petition, signed by all the seven. They had proceeded in this Matter with that Secrecy and Caution, that none but themselves knew what was contained in their Petition. The King was deceived by his Spies; and was made to believe, that the Bishops intended to get their own selves clear of the Difficulty, and to throw it upon the Clergy, by representing to him that Orders of that Nature use to be addressed to the Chancellors; and that the Occasion of their coming was to pray him to continue that Method. This was what the Romanists wanted: who thought the Disunion they hoped to make in the Church was now begun. So that the Bishops had an easy and quick Admittance into the King's Presence. The King, who expected quite another Thing, was startled and confounded when he heard their Petition read. He told them in a rough manner, he did not expect this from the Church of England, especially from some of them. He was their King, and would be obeyed; and they should be made to feel what it was to disobey him. The Bishops just said, The Will of God be done; and making their Reverences, immediately retired.

They present it to him.

Who is vehemently offended.

This Disappointment was so unforeseen and unprovided for, as obliged the King's Popish and Arbitrary Counsellors to suspend their Resentments for some Time, while they should consult what to do in so nice and unexpected an Emergency. Some of the Popish Nobility, who had more Wisdom and less Zeal than their Ecclesiasticks, advised the King to let the Matter fall, and not to drive his Point so much against the Grain of his People. But their wholesome Counsels were overpowered by those of a blind and violent Majority, whose Advices falling in but too much with the King's own Temper, it was resolved to proceed against the Bishops with all Severity.

The Romish Cabal at a Stand.

In the mean time the Days appointed for reading the Declaration came on; but to the immortal Honour of the Clergy, not above two hundred out of that numerous Body throughout England could be prevailed on by Fears or Hopes, to concur in the mean Condescension demanded of them. Those who did obey were inconsiderable Persons; and some of these read it only the

The Clergy in general refuse to read the Declaration.

A.D. 1688. the first Sunday, but changed their Minds before the second. Others declared in their Sermons, that though they obeyed the Order, they did not approve the Declaration. And one more pleasantly than gravely, told his People, that though he was obliged to read it, they were not obliged to hear it; and so stayed till they were all gone out of the Church, and then read it to the Walls. In other Places, as soon as the Minister began to read, all the People rose and went out. So that it appeared, that if the King proceeded in this Affair, he had not only the seven petitioning Bishops to deal with, but the whole Body of the Nation both Clergy and Laity.

The Bishops brought before the Council.

Three Weeks passed over before any Thing was done at Court; during which Time the paternal Tenderness of the Bishops to their Clergy, was the Subject of every Man's Discourse and Admiration; and every Mind was filled with Solicitude, for the final Issue this heroick Act would meet with. At last, the Bishops were summoned before the Privy Council; where it was demanded of them, whether they owned the Petition? Which after some Pause they did; adding, that they had done nothing which they were not ready to justify. They were then required to enter into Bonds to appear in the Court of King's Bench, to answer to an Information of Misdemeanour. But they all refused this, alledging their Privilege of Peers, which they were resolved to maintain, they said, as well as the Prerogatives of the Church, being bound by their Callings to oppose all Innovations in Government as well as Religion. Jefferies, who had hitherto spoken to them, was all in a Fury at this bold Answer, and threatened to send them to the Tower, and prosecute them with the utmost Rigour of the Law, unless they would immediately recant, and withdraw their Petition. But they unanimously answered, that they were ready to go wherever his Majesty would please to send them; that they hoped the King of Kings would be their Protector and their Judge; that they feared nothing from Men; and that having acted according to Law, and their own Consciences, no Fear of Punishment should ever daunt them.

They are ordered to be committed to the Tower.

Which puts the City in a Flame.

The universal Respect shewn to the Bishops.

Upon this a Warrant was drawn up and signed by the Privy-Counsellors present, to commit them to the Tower; which was immediately put in Execution. But the News of this flew in a Moment through the City of London, and put it in the highest Fermentation that was ever known. The Court expected some Disturbance beforehand, and had ordered that the Bishops should be carried to the Tower by Water. But the People ran in Crowds to the River-side to wait their coming, and filled the Banks of the Thames by which they were to pass. All the Emotions and Transports that Love, Respect, Compassion, Fear, Grief, and Rage could beget, were expressed by the innumerable Spectators that beheld these venerable Prisoners from either Shore; who passed on in a sedate Tranquillity, reposing themselves on their own Virtue and Innocence, and the Favour and Protection of the Almighty. Nor was this Affection shewn to these worthy Prelates by the Populace or the City only. When they were landed at the Tower, and received by the Guard there, the Officers and Soldiers met them with the utmost Respect, and fell before them on their Knees to beg their Blessings; and did not stick to say, that their Duty to the King was not sufficient to stifle their just Concern for those Reverend Divines, who were so unworthily used, only because they would not betray their Consciences, and the Trust reposed in them. It being about the Time of Evening Prayer, when the Bishops were brought thither, they went immediately to the Chapel, where a Passage in the second Lesson chanced to be well adapted to their Condition; Giving no Offence in any Thing that the Ministry be not blamed; but in all things approving our selves as the Ministers of God; in much Patience, in Afflictions, in Necessities, in Distresses, in Stripes, in Imprisonments, &c. The Court was alarmed, but not sufficiently warned, by these Instances of Respect shewn to the Bishops, and ordered the Guards of the Tower to be doubled.

The Apprehensions all Protestants, especially of the Church of England, were under upon this Commitment, were mightily increased when they heard two Days after that the Queen was brought to Bed of a Son. The former Suspicions concerning the Queen's Pregnancy, were not at all lessened by the Circumstances attending her Delivery. It happened at a Time when the Protestant Ladies attending the Court, were generally at Church; and neither the Princess Anne of Denmark, the Dutch Ambassador for the Princess of Orange, nor the Archbishop of Canterbury, according to ancient Custom, were present. Many other Things increased these Jealousies, which we shall hereafter take Notice of. Next Day was issued out a Proclamation for a general Thanksgiving for the same, but it was observed very coldly. The Imprisonment of the Bishops hung heavy upon the Minds of all of the Church of England; and this new Heir seemed to preface that the like Violences would be entailed on distant Times. The King was moved to take the Opportunity of the general Joy to discharge the Bishops with Honour to himself, as well as Satisfaction to the People. But he was not to be persuaded, and said, he should make his Authority contemptible if he suffered such an Affront to go unpunished. It is said he laid it down as a Maxim, (which proved a very mischievous one) that a King having made a Step must never go back, or encourage Disobedience by yielding to it.

The Queen brought to Bed of a Son.

Suspicious Circumstances.

A Week after their Commitment the Bishops were brought by Writ of Habeas Cor. to the Court of King's-Bench, to move for their being set free on Bail. The Council for the Bishops, who were some of the great-

A.D. 1688. greatest Men of the Law, endeavoured to prove that their Commitment was illegal; but that was over-ruled by the Court. In the End the Bishops were obliged to plead to an Information given in against them, and to give Bail for their Appearance on that Day Fortnight to answer thereto. The publick Joy upon their Enlargement was answerable to the deep Concern that appeared at their Confinement. Persons of Quality and Rank were continually visiting them, one Company going out, as another came in. And when they came from Westminster-Hall, the Crowd that pressed to see them was so great, that they were forced to get to their Barge by private Stairs. But this would not free them from the Congratulations of the People, who saluted them from the Shore with loud Acclamations; some even running into the Water to beg their Benedictions. Publick Rejoycings were begun in the Evening, and continued all Night; which was spent in making Bonfires, drinking to the Healths of the seven heroic Prelates, and the like Demonstrations of popular Joy.

The Trial of the Seven Bishops.

On the Day appointed for the Trial, the Bishops appeared at the Court of King's-Bench. No fewer than thirty Noblemen, and those of the greatest Figure, attended this important Trial; besides an innumerable Concourse of other Persons, which filled Westminster-Hall, and all the adjacent Parts. As the Danger of these worthy Men approached, the publick Concern for them increased; nor did it appear any where more than in the King's Army, where the Soldiers were in such a Temper as was next to a Mutiny. The Council for the King were Sir Thomas Powis, Attorney-General; Sir William Williams, Solicitor-General; Sir Bartholomew Shower, Recorder of London, and some others of less Note; but the chief Management lay on the two first, but more especially the latter. He had been Speaker of the two last unquiet Parliaments in the late Reign; but was now, by a common Transition, come about from one extreme to the other. The Council for the Bishops were Sir Robert Sawyer, Mr. Finch, Serjeant Pemberton, Serjeant Levinz, Mr. Pollexfen, Sir George Treby, and Mr. Sommers, who generously exerted themselves upon this Occasion without Fee or Reward.

The Information laid against the Bishops was for a Misdemeanor in writing, framing, and publishing a seditious Libel against the King, under the Name of a Petition, tending to alienate the Affections of the Subject, &c. After a long Time had been spent in proving the Hand-writing of the several Bishops by Witnesses, the Publication was in the next Place to be made out; nothing of which did appear by any Evidence. It was indeed proved that they had at the Council Board owned the Petition, but the Court would not allow that to be a Publication; so that the King's Council were forced to send for the Earl of Sunderland, who introduced the Bishops to the King, by whose Evidence the Publication was proved, A.D. 1688. as far as delivering the Petition into the King's Hands would amount to one. This being construed as a Publication, the Council for the Bishops proceeded to the material Part of their Defence. They insisted upon these two Heads; first, that a Subject receiving a Command from the Prince which he conceives illegal, may petition to be relieved from that Command: Secondly, that the Dispensing Power, on which the Declaration was founded, was actually illegal. The King's Council had very little to answer to so clear Arguments, and were driven to Absurdities in attempting it.

The Trial lasted for ten Hours. At the End, two of the Judges, Holloway and Powell, were of Opinion that the Petition was not a Libel, and the Lord Chief Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Allybone, that it was. The Jury, who were Persons of Figure and Character, went out and sat up all Night without Fire or Candle, though they soon agreed upon their Verdict; but this was done for the greater Solemnity. Next Morning the Courts being sat, and the Bishops brought before them, through numberless Crowds of People which had filled the Hall and all the neighbouring Places, the Jury came out, and brought in quitted their Verdict, Not Guilty. They are ac-

The Words were caught immediately from the Foreman, and carried from Mouth to Mouth throughout the Hall; which rung in a Moment with such loud and repeated Acclamations, as no Fear or Reverence of the sitting Courts could restrain. Thence they flew round the Cities of London and Westminster; all that heard the News joining in them, and carrying them on to more distant Parts. The Acquittal of the Bishops soon reached the Camp at Hounslow-Heath, at which the Soldiers set up such a joyful and universal Shout, as if a Victory had been obtained. The King had entertained Hopes that the Bishops would be found Guilty, as he was apt to believe what he desired; so that he went to the Camp that Morning early, to appease any Disorder that might arise upon that Account, but came there only to receive this Mortification, which much discomposed him. All the ensuing Day was spent in Rejoycings, which spread themselves with the joyful Tidings through every Part of England, notwithstanding the severe Prohibitions that were issued from Court. The general Joy thereupon.

But so fatally was the King pushed on to his Ruine, that he would not yet take Warning. It was talked at Court that the Bishops should still be brought before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. But this was dropped, because it was expected they would plead to their Jurisdiction. So because the inferior Clergy were supposed to want the Courage and Power necessary to withstand such an arbitrary Tribunal, it was resolved to bring them under its Censure. Accordingly the Ecclesiastical Commissioners directed an Order to the Chancellors and Archdeacons to send in Lists of all the Clergy, The Romanists will not yet desert from pursuing the Clergy.

A.D. 1688. Clergy, both of such as had, and had not obeyed the Order of Council. But the Resentment the Nation had shewn at the Bishops Imprisonment and Trial animated them so, that they generally refused Obedience.

The Bishop of Rochester refuses to act in the Ecclesiastical Commission.

When the Day came to which they were cited, the Bishop of Rochester, though he had himself obeyed the Order, and had hitherto sat with the other Commissioners, but always voted on the milder Side, resolved to leave them, seeing Matters run on so fast to the Ruine of the Church. He wrote them a Letter, in which having excused himself for obeying the Order of Council, which he protested he did, because he thought himself in Conscience obliged to do it, he told them that he did not doubt but those who had not obeyed it, had gone upon the same Principle, with whom he would much rather chuse to suffer, than concur in bringing Sufferings upon them. This Letter stopped their Proceedings for that Day, and put them to a Stand. So they adjourned themselves to December; but never sat more. Thus ended all the Transactions produced by this famous Declaration, by which it pleased the Divine Providence to frustrate the Devices which powerful and crafty Wickedness had framed against the Innocent; and to catch those Politicians in the Snares they had laid for Men much better than themselves.

Which puts the others to a Stand.

But the Romish Cabal was so blinded and infatuated, that ill Success only served to make them more violent, not more cautious, or more moderate. They resolved now to declare open War against the Laws of England, and finding so little Hope to attain their Ends by Subtilty and Stratagem, to compass the same by downright Force. To this Purpose it was necessary to gain the Army; and this also was to be done by Violence, for they were strangely set on carrying all Things with a high Hand. A Writing was prepared, by which the Officers and Soldiers were to engage themselves to promote, as far as in them lay, the Repeal of the Penal Laws and Tests. To bring this to bear, it was to be proposed to all the Regiments, one by one; it not being doubted that if two or three could be brought to it, the rest would follow their Example. The Regiment it was thought fit to begin with, was drawn up in the King's Presence as for a Review; and when they were under their Arms, the Major was commanded to signify to them that the King required them to sign that Writing instantly, or to lay down their Arms upon the Place. But those brave Men loved their Countrey too well to assist in its Ruine; so that when they heard the Command, except a very few who were Papists, the whole Regiment disarmed themselves immediately.

The King tries to engage the Army to concur in repealing the Penal Laws and Tests.

But they nobly refuse it.

The King was Thunder-struck with the Sight, and for a few Minutes stood speechless; but having at last recollected himself, he commanded them to take up their Arms again, adding with a fullen discontented Look, that for the future he would not do them the Honour to ask their Advice. A nobler Instance of publick Virtue is not to be found than that of these generous Soldiers; who could so unanimously, and upon so short a Warning, chuse to expose themselves and their Families to Want and Poverty, rather than consent to their Countrey's Undoing. It will be easily supposed, that the Resolution of those worthy Men discouraged the King from making any farther Attempts of the same Kind.

In the mean Time, though it pleased the Divine Providence thus to defeat the Attempts that had been made upon the Constitution, the Nation continued under severe and cruel Apprehensions. The King had so entirely forgot his Promises, as to give himself up to a bigotted Cabal, of whom it was hard to say, whether their present Madnes, or any future Moderation, were the more dangerous. The one made them capable of dreadful Extremities, the other might lead to Counsels more quiet, and therefore more surely pernicious. It is true the Army had in the late Instance forsaken him; but Ireland was a Seminary of Popish Soldiers, who were transplanted every Day into the English Regiments; and none could say what Alterations might come to be made there in Time. The Birth of the new Prince gave the Romanists Courage and Helps to enter upon Measures that could not otherwise be ventured on. And the intolerable Violence and Injustice with which the Protestants were treated in Ireland, shewed what the Consequence would be, if Popery should prevail as much here. So that the Face of Things was very dismal and gloomy, and the Clouds that hung over all the Land seemed ready to break in an impetuous Storm.

The dreadful Prospect at this Time.

In this sad State of Things, one Refuge only appeared, to which the distressed Religion and Liberties of England could run for Shelter, a Parliament freely chosen; but it was plain that the summoning and meeting of such an Assembly must be extorted from the King by open Force, if it was to be obtained at all. There was no Power in England able to make the least Head, nor could any Insurrection be reasonably agreed or ventured on. It was absolutely necessary that such an Attempt should have some stronger and more regular Support, than the uncertain Measures that could be concerted here for the compassing such an Enterprize. So that our Countrey had been utterly undone, had not the Divine Goodness, as it were in Foresight of this great Event, provided this Support in Foreign Parts.

The Prince of Orange had the nearest Relation to England of any Person abroad, and could not be supposed negligent of what passed there. Applications had been made to him upon the first Infringements of the settled Laws, and the Correspondence between him and the true Patriots among the Men of Quality and Rank, became more and more close and frequent, as those Incroachments multiplied and grew. The Lord Mordaunt had gone over to the Prince Applications made to the Prince of Orange.

fourty A.D. 1688. two Years ago; who about a Twelve-month after was succeeded by the Earl of Shrewsbury, a Convert from the Romish Religion; who mortgaging his Estate for four thousand Pounds, came over to offer his Sword and Purse to the Prince, when his Country's Service should demand them. But the Prince regarded these Solicitations no farther, than to have a distant Eye to the Affairs of England, and to keep all Things in Readiness for a sudden Exigency, as far as was consistent with Secrecy.

But in May this Summer there went over Admiral Ruffel, who having a Sister in Holland, had a Pretence to cover his Journey, which was necessary to avoid Suspicion. He was intrusted by several great Men in England to represent to the Prince the Danger they were in, and to desire to know what Hopes they might have of his Assistance. The Prince made him Answer, that he must first be satisfied both in Honour and Conscience as to any such Attempt, which if it failed, would bring Ruine both on England and Holland. He told him that no private Ambition or Passions of his own, should engage him in so important a Design; but said, that if he were invited by some of the best Interest, and most valued in the Nation, in their own Name, and in the Name of others who should trust them, to come to rescue their Religion and Liberties, he would engage in the Enterprize; and that if there were Occasion, he believed he could be over by the End of September. With this Answer, Admiral Ruffel went back to England, and was followed by Mr. Sidney, and the Earl of Shrewsbury. These applied themselves to several noble Persons, of whom the Earl of Danby, the Earl of Devonshire, the Lord Lumley, the Bishop of London, the Lord Churchill, and others of eminent Rank, heartily concurred in the Invitation. These Advices determined the Prince to enter on this great Undertaking; in which Resolution the Relations that soon after came of the Ferment raised by the Bishops Imprisonment and Trial, and the suspected Birth of the new Prince, much confirmed him. The Army had declared openly against Popery, and treated the few Papists among them with Scorn and Aversion. The Seamen were in the same Dispositions; and it happening about this Time, that one of the Sea-Officers, who was a Papist, had caused Mals to be said aboard one of the King's Ships, the Fleet was in such a Mutiny upon the News, that it was with much ado that the Officers saved the Priests from being thrown over-board. So that the Temper of the whole Nation seemed exactly fitted to graft such an Enterprize upon.

The States-General also engaged.

But besides the Prince, it was necessary to engage the States-General to concur in this Undertaking. To this End those who negotiated this Affair, waited on the leading Members of that Assembly; and represented to them, how nearly Holland was concerned in the Preservation of England, whose Ruine must soon be followed by their own.

A.D. 1688. They remembered them how much their Republick in its Infancy had been obliged to the Assistance of our Countrey, to enable them to shake off the grievous Yoke of Spain; and how glorious it would be to them to be the Deliverers of so mighty a Nation, and the Sanctuary of the oppressed. So that all the Motives of Gratitude, Safety, and Religion, concurred to persuade them to join their Assistance in this necessary Undertaking. Thus, to humble the Pride of Man, our once independent and lordly Nation became a Suppliant for Help to that State, which but an Age before had neither Being, nor vital Support, which it did not draw from England.

The States-General had Reason enough to hearken to these Suggestions. Among the other wrong Steps taken by the King's Ambassador at Rome, he had, it seems, pressed it upon the Pope to make up the Differences between the two Courts of France and Rome, which were at that Time very high; and gave it as his Reason, that after that Accommodation, if the Pope would join with them, the two Kings would fall upon Holland without any Declaration of War. This Proposal was so little welcome to the Pope, who was at irreconcilable Enmity with France, that Cardinal Cibo, who was Cardinal Padrone, gave Notice of it, by the Pope's Order, to the Imperial Cardinals at Rome, who wrote the same to the Emperor; from whom it came round to the Prince of Orange. This was remembered by the States, and being compared with other Things, engaged them, though not without strong Opposition by some of great Figure among them, to lend their best Troops to the Prince of Orange, and heartily to concur with him.

The Prince favoured by this Concurrence, and tempted with the fair Prospect of Success, carried on his Design with great Diligence, and with equal Secrecy. He proposed to carry over to England a Force of about thirteen thousand Men; picked Soldiers, and the Choice of the Dutch Army. And because the States would be left exposed upon any Emergency, by the drawing off so many of their Troops, he secretly communicated his Design to the Elector of Brandenburgh, the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and the Duke of Lunenburg and Zell; who out of their Regard to the Protestant Interest, readily assisted the States with an equal Number of their own Forces.

The Secret of this Design, though it came of Course to be diffused every Day among more and more Persons, was yet inviolably kept. An Accident happened a little before, which gave a Colour for some extraordinary Preparations; but which, at the same Time that it covered the Enterprize, made the Progress and Issue of it very doubtful and lubricous. It will not be amiss to insist upon this somewhat largely, that the nice Composition of this great Machine, which now began to be put in Motion, may the more clearly appear.

It is in great Danger of failing.

In

A.D. 1688. In the preceding June, the Elector of Cologne died; who was not only Bishop of that See, but of Munster, Hildesheim, and Liege; so that his Dominions lay quite round the Netherlands. He had taken one of the Princes of Furstemberg into his Confidence, and was entirely governed by him. This Prince of Furstemberg, though a German by Birth, was absolutely French by Inclination; and it was by his Influence that the Elector was brought in 1672. to admit French Garrisons into all his Towns, by which the Republick of Holland had well nigh felt its Bane. The Treaty at Cologne was broke up upon his being seized there by the Emperor, who kept him Prisoner for a long Time. After his being set at Liberty, he was made a Cardinal by the Recommendation of France. This Cardinal had engaged the Emperor to consent to the Election of a Coadjutor at Cologne, under Pretence of carrying the Electoral Dignity into the Family of the Elector Palatine; it being always the Custom for the Coadjutor to succeed the Bishop to whom he is joined, without any new Election. But when the Cardinal had obtained this Consent, without which, by the Laws of the Empire, the Election could not be made, he managed his Interest in the Chapter so well, that he procured himself to be elected by a great Majority.

Cardinal Furstemberg like to be made Elector.

This was done the last Winter, and had not this Election wanted one Circumstance to confirm it, the Cardinal had succeeded as Bishop and Elector, without any Difficulty; by which Means the French Power, to which he was slavishly devoted, would have become so near and dangerous a Neighbour to Holland, as would scarce have given them Leisure to look abroad to help their distant Friends. But it happened that by the Canon Law, it was necessary to have this Coadjutorship confirmed by the Pope. A Message was sent to Rome for this Confirmation, which did not use to be denied; but there being at this Time a violent Breach between the Courts of France and Rome, the Pope kept off every Thing in which the former was any Ways concerned. So that the Elector died before this Confirmation arrived, by which Means a new Election became necessary.

Nevertheless the Cardinal was so sure of a considerable Majority in the Chapter, that this new Election would have brought him no Manner of Prejudice, had it not been for another Accident. The French, upon engaging the Cardinal in their Interests, had obliged him to accept of the Bishoprick of Strasburg, to lessen the Pension they were to pay him. And by the Laws of the Empire, no Man, who is already a Bishop, can be chosen into another See, unless by a Postulation, to which it is necessary to have the Concurrence of two Thirds of the Chapter. But the Cardinal's Party wanted one or two Votes of that Number. So that to make his Majority of Service to him, he was obliged to resign his Bishoprick of Strasburg. But it was necessary that this Resignation should be made to the Pope, A.D. 1688. who knowing that his Denial would mortifie France, absolutely refused to accept it. The King of France sent a Gentleman with a Letter to the Pope, all in his own Hand, desiring him to accept the Resignation, and promising him thereupon all reasonable Satisfaction. But the Pope would neither admit the Bearer, nor receive the Letter.

Mean while, the Intrigues at Cologne went on in the Behalf of Prince Clement of Bavaria, the Elector's Brother; and ten Voices were made sure to him out of six and twenty. But he being but seventeen Years of Age, and besides not of the Chapter, it was necessary to get a Bull from Rome to dispense with those Things. The Pope was as easie towards the House of Austria, who stood for Prince Clement, as he was inflexible towards France; so that he granted the Bull without any Difficulty. And the Election coming on, the Cardinal, who had but sixteen Voices, against ten, was thrown out; his Postulation being defective. And Prince Clement's Election was adjudged good by the Emperor, and was afterwards confirmed at Rome. And thus the great Engine of the Revolution was enabled to move on safely, which had fallen to Pieces, had not the Pope, by assisting in this Election, driven in the very Nail that kept the Frame of it together; which no Hand but his could have done. For no Means are too unlikely for the Divine Providence to make Use of, to compass its sacred Ends.

But is unexpectedly thrown out.

Another Danger appeared from another Quarter, which was almost as wonderfully diverted. The French King had concluded the Peace of Nimeguen, with the usual Intention of ambitious Princes, to observe the same no longer than he thought convenient. He had now formed a Design upon Germany; but as this was just going to break out, a Whisper of the intended Invasion of England got Air; and the French Ambassador Monsieur d'Avaux, sent Word from the Hague to the Court of France, that some such Enterprize was going forward. There was a very close and strict Correspondence subsisting between the Courts of England and France, if not an Alliance. So that the King of France sent over to King James the Intelligence he had received, warning him to be upon his Guard, and offering him as great a Force as he should call for to assist him. It was proposed by France, that these Auxiliaries should be landed at Portsmouth, which Place should be put into their Hands. The Popish Lords and the Priests were for accepting this; but the Earl of Sunderland opposed it furiously. He said, that an Army of forty Thousand Men would be a real Strength; but that this Army would depend upon the Orders they received from France: They might master England indeed, but they would master the King at the same Time, who would be no better than a Viceroy to the French King. But as to any lesser Force, he urged that it would only serve Lord Sunderland persuades the King not to accept it.

Another Danger diverted.

The King of France sends Word to King James of the Prince's Design, and offers Assistance.

A.D. 1688. to make the King lose the Affections of the People, and drive his own Army to Desertion, if not to Mutiny. Upon these Advices, King James sent his Thanks for the French King's Kindness, but excused himself from accepting it.

This Refusal was a great Surprise to the French Court, who did not understand so well as the King, the Alarms and Jealousies his accepting the Offer would have created. Sir Bevil Skelton, the King's Minister, was tired out there with Questions about the Reason of this Conduct, which appeared to them so unaccountable. He was earnestly pressed to find some Expedient by which their Court might serve his Master in Spite of him. Skelton overcome by Importunity, at last told them, that if the most Christian King would order his Minister to present a Memorial to the States, declaring he would attack them if they attempted any Thing against King James, it might break the Measures entered upon. This was done, and put the States to a great deal of Perplexity. But it furnished them with an Answer to a Memorial presented to them by the English Minister at the same Time, demanding the Reason of their great Preparations at the Beginning of Winter. They answered him, that they armed in Imitation of his Britannick Majesty, being convinced of the Alliance he had entered into with France, as had lately been owned to them. And besides this, they gave Orders to their Minister at London to complain of the same at the Court of England. And, by the Persuasion of the Earl of Sunderland, the King was brought to disown these Steps taken by the French Court; and a Memorial was presented to the States, signifying the same. And because Skelton was supposed to have been concerned in this, he was sent for over, and committed to the Tower.

The French make another fruitless Application.

Upon which they engage their Forces upon an Invasion of Germany.

The French Court made one more Effort before they went upon the Enterprize of Germany; and offered the King to abandon that Design, and carry the War into Holland. But this was in like Manner rejected; and the French Ambassador, Monsieur Barrillon, wrote over to his Master, that if the Matter should come to a Push, it would certainly produce a long Civil War, which would oblige King James to seek to France for Aid upon their own Terms. He therefore advised his Court to go on that Winter with the Design upon Germany; assuring them it would be Time enough to think the next Year of making their Profit of the Affairs of England. The King of France took this Advice, and sent the Dauphin with the Strength of his Troops to make a furious Inroad into Germany; in which, though the French were successful, their Forces were so engaged, that before they could draw them off, the Revolution in England was completed. Nothing could be more critically happy than this Diversion of the French Forces, who might have given so much Hindrance to the intended Design on England, and have made some dangerous Advantage of the Disorders of our Country. Now A.D. 1688. they were as seasonably put out of the Way, as the Prince of Orange himself could have ordered them.

The Preparations for this Expedition were so far advanced, and every Thing was so well secured behind, that it was thought unnecessary to suffer any longer the Constraint and Inconvenience that attends a strict Secrecy. Accordingly in the Middle of September, the Pensionary Fagel acquainted Albyville with the Prince of Orange's Design; adding, that if the Dutch Ambassador at London had said any Thing to the contrary, he had done it without Orders from the States. The News of this coming to Court, struck the deluded King like a Thunderbolt. At the reading the Letter that Albyville sent him, he turned pale, and for a while stood Speechless. The golden Phantom of unbounded Rule and Sovereignty, that had so long danced before him, and glittered in his Eyes, disappeared in a Moment; and he found himself standing on a frightful Precipice, while the Support that bore him was going to break to Pieces under his Feet. After some Time had diminished the Consternation of the first Surprise, a great Man endeavoured to support his Spirits, by representing to him that the Danger was less than he imagined; and that the Prince of Orange might be diverted from his Design, or defeated in the Attempt. But he made Answer, I know my Son-in-Law's Character so well, that if he undertakes any Design, he will go through with it; he will never be diverted, and very hardly be defeated.

He would now have recalled the fugitive Affections of his People, just when it was too late. He began to feel what Princes should for ever reflect on, that no Counsellors are so faithful, or Friends so affectionate and true, as those who with most Zeal oppose their Sovereign's Will, when it becomes illegal and exorbitant. These salutary Monitors King James now found his Want of; and growing clear-sighted by Danger, summoned the Bishops, whose Ruin he was contriving just before, to desire their Advice in the Difficulties that surrounded him. It was some Concern to those good Men to meet with nothing but Disgrace from the King, while he was in the Sun-shine of his Prosperity; and to receive the Marks of his Favour and Confidence, only at a Time when he could do them but very little good. But they remembered that their Case was the same with what is generally the Lot of truly loyal Subjects in such Reigns; and forgetting what was past, they came to him furnished with such wholesome Counsels as the State of Things demanded. The Bishops that appeared before the King, were Winchester, Peterborough, Chichester, Rochester, Ely, and Bath and Wells; the Bishops of London and Bristol being out of Town, and the Archbishop of Canterbury indisposed. The King treated them with great Respect and Condescension; and told them, that he desired the Assistance of their Counsels in this

The Prince's Design made publick.

The King startled at the News.

He asks the Advice of the Bishops.

A.D. 1688. this present Exigency; assuring them, that he was ready to do whatever they should think necessary for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and of the Rights of the People, without derogating from his own Prerogative. The Bishops answered this Kindness with all the Expressions of Duty and Loyalty on their Parts; and were going on, when the King told them, that he was not then at Leisure, and therefore desired them to go to consult together upon this weighty Matter: Upon which they took their Leaves, and entered into Deliberation at Lambeth on the Advice they should offer to the King.

The King makes several Concessions.

In the mean Time the King issued out a Proclamation, in which to prejudice Mens Minds against the Prince of Orange, he signified that his Design was to make an absolute Conquest of the three Kingdoms, and subject the same to a Foreign Power; nevertheless that as to himself, he declined all Foreign Succours, and relied wholly on his own Subjects, for whom he had often ventured his Life. In Conclusion, he informed them, that he intended to have met his Parliament in November; but upon this strange Attempt, designed to divert his gracious Purposes, he found it necessary to recall the Writs that had been issued out. He also took off the Suspension of the Bishop of London; and removed an Anabaptist who was Lord Mayor of London, and placed a Churchman in his Room. And farther to ingratiate himself, he sent back by Jefferies the Charter of the City of London, which was taken from them in the late Reign, as was mentioned above. He also published a general Pardon for all Criminals. But these Concessions came too late, every one being ready to attribute them to Necessity more than Kindness; for which some Proceedings afterwards gave but too much Reason. So that the stormy and contrary Winds which blew about this Time, and kept the Dutch in their Harbours, caused many a heavy Heart. All past Injuries and Contentions between these two Nations were forgot; and the English Nation thought with so much Pleasure and Welcome of an Army of Foreigners upon their Coasts, that the Lord Dorset said, If the Dutch came at this Season, it might be called the Merry Invasion.

The Bishops attend him with their Advice.

The Bishops waited on the King about eight or nine Days after their first Attendance; the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Bishop of London being added to those who came at first. The Archbishop was the Speaker to that Reverend Council; the Substance of whose Advice was, That the King should dissolve the Ecclesiastical Commission, reverse the Proceedings against Magdalen-College, restore the Law to its ancient Course, call a free Parliament, and be pleased to converse with his Bishops to hear their Arguments in behalf of the Religion which he had once professed. This Counsel was more wholesome than pleasing, and required no ordinary Courage to deliver it with that Christian Fortitude and Primitive Temper to a Prince, who had lived so long without hearing a truly English Advice. But the State of Affairs was such, that the King went about soon after to redress these Grievances. The Ecclesiastical Commission was in two Days after dissolved. The Bishop of Winchester, Visitor of Magdalen-College, was ordered to settle that Society according to Statute. A Proclamation was issued for restoring Corporations to their ancient Rights, Charters and Franchises. Popish Magistrates were displaced, and Protestants put into their Rooms. And thus the Fabrick which the Romish Cabal had been building near four Years, was thrown down and destroyed in twelve Days.

With which the King complies.

But the King fell in with his former evil Counsellors so quickly, that upon a Report that the Dutch Fleet was blown back by a Storm, and could not come out till the next Spring, Things began to return to their former State. The Bishop of Winchester who had cited the deprived Fellows of Magdalen-College to return, was recalled to London, upon a frivolous Pretence, and the Restoration of them was deferred. But again, when News was brought that the Dutch were in a failing Posture, he was sent back, and the Settlement of the College was completed. These Proceedings lost the King many Friends, who found him guided by Counsels equally foolish and pernicious.

But with Reluctance and Double-dealing.

The Court did what they could in Provisions of other Kinds against the intended Invasion. It was proposed to secure all suspected Persons, and send them to Portsmouth; but this was vehemently opposed by the Earl of Sunderland, who said, that only a few could be taken, which would alarm the rest, drive them in to the Prince, and give them a Pretence for it. And by his Influence the Motion fell. The Lord Dartmouth put to Sea with a strong Fleet, and Forces were drawn out of Scotland and Ireland, so that the King's Army was near thirty Thousand strong. Some of the Nobility waited on the King to offer their Service to him, to whom he gave Commissions for raising new Forces. A Proclamation was issued for guarding the Coasts, and removing all Conveniences from the Places where the Enemy should attempt to land. Extraordinary Prayers also were offered in the King's Chapel, where the Hoste was exposed. But the Mob growing insolent, the other Popish Chapels were shut up; and the Priests and Jesuits finding a Storm gathering in the Air, began to retire, and fly for Shelter into Foreign Parts.

He makes Preparations against the Prince's coming.

At this Time the King ordered the Baptism of the Prince of Wales, who was named James-Francis-Edward, the Pope being his Godfather. The Report of his being supposititious, which was little regarded while the King was in his Glory, was now thought worthy of Notice. The Lords Spiritual and Temporal, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, the Judges, and other eminent Persons were sent for to the King. He told them that the Reason of his calling them together

The Prince of Wales baptized.

A.D. 1688. together was to give publick Satisfaction to them concerning the Birth of his Son, whom some were persuaded to believe was a supposed Child; that he had desired the Queen-Dowager to come, and ordered others to attend, to the Number of forty Persons, who were ready to depose what they knew relating to the Birth, which he hoped would satisfy them. The Queen-Dowager only said, she was in the Room at the Time of the Birth. The other Depositions were designed to prove, first, the Queen's being with Child; secondly, her being truly delivered of the same at the Time that was supposed. To prove the former, several of the Women that attended her swore, that they had known the Milk run out of the Queen's Breasts, in the Time of her Pregnancy; as is usual to Women in that Condition. One or two of the Ladies also deposed, that they had seen the Bigness of the Queen's Belly, which could not be counterfeit. To prove the second, the Midwife deposed, that she delivered the Queen of that Child who was now Prince of Wales. The Physicians deposed, that they saw and considered the After-birth warm and entire, immediately upon the Queen's Delivery. And the Lords who were in the Room attested, that they heard the Queen's Groans and Shrieks, like those of a Woman in Labour. The Queen's Laundress also deposed, that for a Month after she knew by the washing of the Queen's Linnen, that she was in the same Condition with other Women upon those Occasions. Some other collateral Things were sworn to, which tended to confirm the rest.

Depositions relating to his Birth.

Nevertheless these Depositions when made publick, did not answer the End designed by them. The Thing was not made so clear by them as to take away all doubt; and it was said, that the Suspicion that so universally prevailed was of that Importance as to demand some more convincing Proof. There was only one positive Evidence to the Birth and Identity of the Child, which was the Midwife; who being a Papist, was the less regarded. The Presence of so many Persons made an Imposture indeed difficult, but not impossible, considering the Distance at which most of them stood. And it was A.D. 1688. urged, that their Attendance did not make amends for the Absence of the three Persons principally concerned; namely, the Princess Anne, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Dutch Ambassador. Several Stories have since been published, which have given Occasion to imagine that a Change was made of the Child after the real or pretended Birth thereof; the first dying*. So that upon the whole it must be allowed, that very odd and unusual Incidents have concurred to raise Jealousies and Doubts about this Person. But as Matters of Fact and Report are easily mistaken or misrepresented, unless where several competent Witnesses agree to the same Circumstances; it seems the surest Method to lay the Stress upon this general Argument (though the other Testimonies ought to have their due Weight) that since the Court knew very well how universally the Truth of the Queen's Pregnancy was questioned, and of how fatal Consequence that doubt might prove to the Child she bore, she ought to have put the Matter out of dispute; which was to be done whenever she pleased. And since that Suspicion was not removed by those who were most concerned to do so, the British Nation is reasonably excused for retaining it still; even though it should be in itself ever so false at Bottom.

Soon after this, the Earl of Sunderland, who had been looked on as the Prime Minister throughout this Reign, or at least as in the very first Rank of the King's Counsellors, was on a sudden removed from all his Places, with the utmost Marks of Disgrace and Displeasure. This Incident caused a great deal of Speculation at that Time and since. Some said that the King had discovered him to be in a Correspondence with the Prince of Orange; which others have carried so far as to alledge that he pushed on his Master to all the violent Counsels that were followed throughout this Reign, in hopes to ruin him. But that Notion seems too refined and chimerical to lay any Stress on. He says of himself in a printed Apology published not long after, that he opposed all those dedisgraced.

The Earl of Sunderland

His Apology for himself.

* To this purpose it may not be amiss to insert the following Relation, communicated to the Writer of these Pages, by a Friend, who received it immediately from the Person concerned.

"Colonel Sands, who was in the Service of his present Majesty King George II. and died in the Summer of the Year 1728. was at that Time Gentleman-Waiter to the Princess of Denmark. Her Royal Highness being at Tunbridge some Time after this Birth, sent this Gentleman from thence to enquire after her Brother's Health. He came to Court, and according to the Custom in such Cases, of going up without Ceremony or Interruption immediately to the King, he came into the Chamber where the Prince lay. He saw there a pale long visaged Child with red Spots in his Face, and other Marks of Weakness. This struck him so, that he took very particular Notice of it; but in a very short Time the Ladies in the Room came about him, and told him the Prince was asleep, and must not be disturbed; and made him leave the Room. At his going out he met the King; who asked him with a disturbed Countenance, whether he had seen the Prince? The Gentleman, who feared he had done something amiss, denied it, and said he had not Time to see him; upon which the King's Countenance cleared up, and he told him in a gracious Manner, that if he would go down he should see him. While he was waiting below, the Servants came about him, and detained him about an Hour, being very urgent with him to drink Wine, under Pretence of Refreshment after his Journey. But he excused himself industriously, and drank but one Glass. He was afterwards called to look at the Prince; but saw a Child of very different Looks and Complexion from that which he found before. He took so much Notice of this, that when he came away, he sat down with the first Opportunity, to commit to Writing what he had observed. This Paper he carried to the Princess, who upon the reading it, lift up her Hands and Eyes, saying, My God, what are they doing! After the Queen's Accession to the Crown, she recommended this Information to a Bishop who was inquisitive into this Affair. Thus far this Relation. The Bishop he was recommended to, was very probably Dr. Lloyd, Bishop of Worcester, who made a great Collection of Facts relating to this Birth; but which has not yet seen the Light.

fructive

A.D. 1688. fructive Measures with great Vehemence which he was thought to promote; as the Dispensing Power, the Ecclesiastical Commission, the Proceedings against Magdalen College, and the imposing the Declaration upon the Clergy. As to his declaring himself a Papist, he alledges that he did it to secure himself from the Attacks of the Romish Cabal, who endeavoured to ruin him for the Opposition he made to the Violences they were putting the King upon. That it was by his Instigation, and against the Will of the Popish Faction, that the King lately rectified the false Steps he had taken before; and that he always advised him to salutary and popular Courses. That for the same Reason he opposed vehemently all Succours from France, as that which would prove dangerous both to the King and Nation; and not, as it was suggested, in order to betray him to the Prince. He owns himself to have been too deeply enamoured with the State and Splendor that attend on publick Employments; and would have it believed, that an Over-fondness of the vain Pomp of the World was the real Cause of his continuing so long at Court; while he disliked and condemned the Projects in which he still had a Part. Upon the whole, he appears by his own Confession to have been a Man void of any Sense of Religion or Conscience; and how far he may be credited in his own Vindication, the Reader will judge more from the probability of the Things alledged by him, than from the Credit of the Relater. We are told that the Prince of Orange absolutely denied the having any Communication with him; though it is certain he had with the Countess his Lady. He was a Man of great Parts, and had a superior Genius in Business to most Men, with an amazing Power of Insinuation. For though, as was said above, he was a warm Promoter of the Bill of Exclusion, he found means before King Charles the Second's Death, to enter into such Confidence with the Duke of York, that upon his coming to the Crown, this Earl was taken into the very uppermost Rank of those who were in Favour. And though he was so universally odious at this Time to all Protestants, that he was excepted out of King William's Declaration of Pardon as well as King James's, yet he found means at last to get such a high Degree of Confidence with him, as has given room for many odd Conjectures, though probably not true ones.

While these Things passed in England, the Preparations in Holland went on more vigorously than ever. And in the Beginning of October the Dutch Land Forces began to move from Nimeguen, where they were encamped, to be put on board five hundred Transports that waited for them in the Zuyder-zee. But the Wind continued Westerly till the 16th, when it came about to the East. The Prince of Orange then went to the Assembly of the States to take his Leave. He thanked them for the Kindness they had shewed him upon many Occasions. He took God to witness, that in all his Actions he had ever pursued his Countrey's Good, since he was intrusted with the Government; and A.D. 1688. that he had no other Design in this Expedition than his Declaration testified. He commended to them the Care of their Countrey, if any Misadventure should befall himself; and in a particular Manner of the Princess, his Spouse. The Assembly was melted into Tears; some offered to speak, but Passion stopt their Words; so that what was said was very short and broken, but extremely tender. Only the Prince retained his usual Phlegm and Steadiness. Three Days were spent at Helvoet-Sluis before the Fleet could get out; at last on the nineteenth of October at Night they set sail. But the next Day the Wind came about to the North, and settled in the North-West, and at Night blew a Storm. The Seamen struggled with it all that Night, and all the next Day; though with great Hazard to so vast a Fleet; who were obliged to keep together, yet not to come too near each other. On the 21st in the Afternoon, the Signal was given to return into Port, which was done by the end of the 22<sup>d</sup> Day by the greater Part. Some stayed out longer, which were thought to be lost; but they all came in, in a few Days. Some of them were so shattered, that as soon as what they had on board was taken out, they sunk down. The Men of War continued riding at Sea, though the Wind was stormy. But on the 27th, the Storm grew so furious, that all who were ashore thought the greatest Part of them must be cast away; but the next Day they every one came in safe, except that one Ship had broke her Rudder, which was all the Damage.

The States and the Prince were no Ways discouraged, but repaired every Thing that was amiss with all possible Expedition. The Princess of Orange continued all this Time at the Hague. She ordered Prayers four Times a Day, and joined in them with great Devotion. She spoke little of publick Affairs, but was reserved and silent. The States sent some of their Body to inform her of their Proceedings from Time to Time. Her Answers were short; but such as made them often admire her Judgment.

The News of this Disaster flew immediately into England, and gave the Popish Party a short Triumph. They boasted that now the Disappointment of the Spanish Armada was recompensed to them, and that the Winds and Seas fought against the Hereticks. The Loss was vastly aggravated on both Sides; by the English Court, to discourage the Prince of Orange's Friends; and by the Dutch, to make King James secure. And it had a very fatal Effect upon him, who began upon this to recal some of his late Acts of Favour, which ruined his Credit.

But all Things were so well and so soon refitted in Holland, that on the first of November the Fleet put out again to Sea, with a fair East Wind filling their Sails. It was proposed at first to land in Yorkshire, where the Earl of Danby had formed a very strong Party, who were ready to rise in Arms, and join with the Prince. And because the Seamen had objected that it would be dangerous

The Fleet sets sail; but is driven back by a Storm.

The Triumph of the Papists in England.

The Fleet is refitted and puts out to Sea again.

His Character.

The Prince of Orange takes Leave of the States.

A.D. 1688. rous for the Fleet to ride out at Sea near that Coast, where a strong Easterly Wind would drive them towards the Shore, it was intended to send them away into the Channel, where they might lie in greater Safety, and prevent besides any Succours arriving from France. This Northern Course they endeavoured to hold, for a good Part of the first Day. But the Wind being not only full in the East, but very strong, the Seamen found it impracticable for the Fleet to keep that Course. So that at last the Signal was given for steering Westwards. The Wind which so favourably assisted the Prince, was so directly cross to the English Fleet which lay near the Gun-Fleet, that they could not possibly stir after them. Next Day the whole Dutch Fleet passed between Dover and Calais; so numerous, that they made a Line seven Leagues in Length, and were six Hours in passing by the Harbour. Before Night they came in Sight of the Isle of Wight. The next Day, being the Day of the Prince's Birth and Marriage, he was desirous to land his Army, in Hopes that the setting Foot on English Ground that Day would look auspicious, and animate the Soldiers. But Torbay being the designed Landing-place, they could not get so far Westward that Day. The Pilot, who was in the Ship that led the Van of the Fleet, was ordered to sail so, as to be short of Dartmouth by that Time the next Day appeared; it being designed to send in some of the Ships there, and go with the rest into Torbay. But by the Pilot's Mistake, they found themselves in the Morning past both Torbay and Dartmouth. The Wind was full in the East, though not so strong as before, so that there was no Prospect of recovering those Ports; which made it necessary to sail on to Plymouth, where it was doubtful whether they should be received; or if they were, they must have been engaged in a tedious Campaign in Winter, in an ill Country. This Mistake occasioned a great Consternation; and Admiral Ruffel, who was aboard the Ship, where the Pilot was, who had committed this Error, ordered his Men to clear the Boat to go aboard the Prince to consult with him upon this unlooked-for Misfortune. But while this was doing, on a sudden the Wind fell in the East; and after a short Calm, rose again in the South; which was the very Wind they needed to carry them happily to their intended Landing-place. And setting up their Sails before it, they were brought by a soft and pleasant Gale in four Hours Time into Torbay.

The Prince
lands at Torbay.

Immediately the Prince and Marechal Schomberg went ashore, and as many of the Land-Forces as conveniently could, at a small Village called Broxbolme. The Night coming on soon after, the Soldiers were forced to spend it in the Fields, for want of better Accommodations; but the Weather proved so warm, notwithstanding the Season of the Year, that they got no Harm by it. Next Day they found a Place within a Quarter of a Mile's Distance, so convenient for landing the Horse, that though they came to it by meer Accident, a better could not have been found round the Island of Great Britain. So that this Business was done in three Hours, which it was expected would take up as many Days; and by Noon that Day the Army was in full March towards Exeter, twenty Miles off. They soon after heard of a more extraordinary Token of the Providence of God assisting this Enterprize. For the Lord Dartmouth's Fleet, which was with incredible Labour got out to Sea, in Quest of the Dutch Fleet, and was up with the Isle of Wight, was met by a terrible Storm from the West, which stopped their Progress, and shattered them so, that they were obliged to put into Portsmouth, and were unfit for Service the rest of the Year. 'Tis said indeed, that the Fleet was so well affected in general to the Prince of Orange, and such Measures were concerted between the Flag-Officers and Commanders, that little would have been done against the Dutch Fleet. But the Hazard of meeting them was so great, that it was reasonably accounted a signal Mercy that it was hindered. The Prince made haste to Exeter, where he stayed ten Days, expecting the Country to come in to him.

The King's Fleet beat back by a Storm.

The Prince comes to Exeter.

The Prince's Declaration.

He there caused his Declaration to be published, in which the several illegal Acts committed since the Beginning of this Reign were enumerated; the King's assuming the Dispensing Power, and in Consequence of the same, advancing Papists into Offices of Trust and Power; his setting up an Ecclesiastical Commission, by which the Bishop of London was suspended, and the President and Fellows of Magdalen-College were arbitrarily ejected from their Freeholds; his allowing Popish Monasteries and Colleges of Jesuits to be erected; his turning out of publick Employments all such as would not concur with him in repealing the Test and Penal Laws; his seizing the Charters of the Corporations; his putting the Government of Ireland into the Hands of Papists; and assuming an absolute and arbitrary Power in Scotland, by which it was easie to judge what he designed in England. It was then said, that the Subjects having endeavoured, by humble Petitions and Representations, to persuade the King to rectify these Disorders, their Instances were not only in vain, but prosecuted as Criminal; as in the Case of the seven Bishops. That the great Remedy for these Evils, a lawful Parliament, could not be procured, by Reason of the Methods that had been taken in Corporations to model them, contrary to Law. That there were besides great Presumptions and Suspicions, that the Child called the Prince of Wales, was not born of the Queen. That the Princess of Orange being so much concerned in this last Article; and the Prince and the Dutch Nation so much obliged to the English for interposing in their Behalf in the great Danger of 1672. they had heartily espoused the Nation's Interest, which was now

A.D. 1688. now in such manifest Peril; to which the Prince was earnestly solicited by many of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Persons of all Ranks. He therefore for these Ends was come over, and had brought with him a considerable Force to defend him from the Violence of those evil Counsellors the King was beset with. That his Expedition had no other Design but to cause free and lawful Parliaments to be assembled both in England and Scotland, and to procure a lasting and happy Establishment of the three Kingdoms. This was the Substance of the Declaration, as it was framed in Holland. But the King, having upon the Prince's coming, reversed many of those illegal Acts that were done by him before, an Addition was made to it, in which it was observed, that though an imperfect Redress had been offered for the past Violences, yet that it was plain that nothing but a Declaration of the Rights of the Subject in a free Parliament could be a lasting Security against the like Exorbitances; and not transient Acts of Grace, extorted by Necessity, and to be resumed at Pleasure.

Few come in to him at first.

This Declaration was read publickly in the Cathedral at Exeter, where though the Prince stayed a Week, yet none of the Gentlemen of the Country came in to him. The People, though they treated him with all Respect, and his Soldiers with great Kindness, were at first backward to join with him. It is said that in a Council of War held there, he suffered it to be proposed to reembark for Holland, though he did not agree to it. But it was not long before he found an Alteration.

The King's ill Conduct.

Mean while the King's Conduct was not at all amended by the Danger he was in. His Army was considerably superior to that of the Prince; and had he used that Celerity so critical an Occasion required, and marched directly towards his Enemies, before his own Soldiers had Time to cabal among each other, or the newly-landed Troops to refresh themselves, or increase their Numbers, he would, in all Likelihood, have defeated the Prince's Design. Instead of this, he took the contrary Course to what he should have done. He talked high, and did little. He issued out a Declaration against the Prince, in which he charged him with having a Design to usurp the Crown; to which End, he said, he endeavoured to ingratiate himself with the People, by demanding a free Parliament; whereas he knew a Parliament could not be free, when an Army of Foreigners was in the Heart of the Kingdom. He then promised to call such an one, when his Kingdom should be freed from this Invasion; and in the mean Time hoped his faithful Subjects would concur in suppressing his Enemies, and the Rebels that joined them. And when he was informed that the City of London, and the Counties of York and Kent, designed to address him to come to an Accommodation with the Prince of Orange, he declared in Council, that he should look upon those as his Enemies, who should pretend to advise him to treat with the Invader of his Kingdoms. He relied much on his Army; and seems to have laid a great Stress on a Notion, that the Doctrines of Passive-Obedience and Non-Resistance, which had been carried by too many of the Church of England to an extravagant Height, would have bound the Hands of the Members of her Communion; and that his Declaration of Indulgence had engaged the Dissenters to him. His Army was ordered to rendezvous on Salisbury-Plain, where he reckoned to have a Body of thirty Thousand Men, which he designed to command in Person. And the Duke of Berwick was ordered to Portsmouth, to secure that important Fortrefs.

In a very short Time, the Falling-in to the Prince of Orange, and the Defection from King James, began. On the eighth Day of the Prince's Stay at Exeter, the Gentlemen of the first Rank in the neighbouring Country, came to attend upon him, to offer him their Service and Credit; as Sir Edward Seymour, Sir William Portman, Sir Francis Ware, Colonel Palmer, and others.

The Gentlemen of the West join the Prince.

Upon the Arrival of these Gentlemen, an Association was drawn up, by the Proposal of Sir Edward Seymour, which was signed by all the English Lords and Gentlemen there. The Design of it was, to bind themselves to stick to each other till the Religion, Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom were so secured in a free Parliament, that the Nation should be no more in Danger of falling under Popery and Slavery. And in Case any Attempt were made upon the Life of the Prince of Orange, they engaged to prosecute it with all the Severity of a just Revenge, upon the Perpetrators and their Adherents. This Association was carried to other Places, where Multitudes of Hands signed it; especially at the University of Oxford, whither the Prince was earnestly invited, with an Assurance that their Plate should be at his Service if he wanted it.

After this, the Nobility and Gentry were coming in every Day to him; the Lord Colchester, Son to the Earl Rivers, accompanied by the Honourable Mr. Wharton, Colonel Godfrey, John Howe Esquire, and about threescore Gentlemen on Horseback, came in first. They were followed by the Earl of Abington, Captain Clarges, Mr. Ruffel, and others. But what was yet more, the Lord Cornbury, who commanded a Regiment in the King's Army, not only came in, but brought his whole Regiment, besides part of two others. The Lord Lovelace was on his Way towards the Prince, but had the Misfortune to be stopped at Girencester by the Country Militia; where after a short but sharp Skirmish, he was taken Prisoner.

Others come in.

The King, who should have gone immediately to have met the Prince upon his Landing, made it twelve Days before he set out, for his Army. He had just Courage enough to embark in a dangerous Enterprize, but

The King in Perplexities.

A.D. 1688. but not enough to enable him to look the Difficulties of it stedfastly in the Face, now they came upon him. Those Counsellors, whose Folly and Bigottry had brought their Royal Master into this Danger, wanted Understanding and Abilities to help him out of the perplexed and perillous State he was in. Yet he remained so strangely infatuated, that he would still listen to those bewitching Sirens, though they were drawing him upon his Ruine; while he continued inflexible and deaf to the wholesome Advice and earnest Warnings of his truly faithful and loving Subjects. While he was in the Distraction that must attend such a State of Affairs as his were in, the two Archbishops, five Bishops, two Dukes, Grafton, and Ormond, with ten other Lords, which were much the greater Part of the Peers who were then in Town, thought themselves obliged to interpose for the Safety of their King and Countrey. Accordingly they drew up a wholesome Petition, which was presented to the King by the Archbishops, and two of the Bishops; in which they with all Respect laid before him, that in Duty to God, his Majesty, and their Countrey, they could not but offer it to him, as their Opinion, that the only visible Way to save his Majesty, and his Kingdom, would be the calling of a Parliament, regular and free in all its Circumstances. And they farther besought him to enter upon such a Treaty, as might save the Effusion of Christian Blood. The King did not answer this salutary Representation in some Time; and it having been variously discoursed on, the Lords thought fit to publish it. But the Jesuites Cabal, who knew that a Free Parliament would end in their Ruine, were so enraged at this, that they printed severe Reflections upon it. But it was not long before the King gave it the following Answer; My Lords, what you ask of me I most passionately desire; and I promise upon the Faith of a King, that I will have a Parliament, and such an one as you ask for, as soon as ever the Prince of Orange has quitted this Realm. But how is it possible a Parliament should be free in all its Circumstances, as you petition for, while an Enemy is in the Kingdom, and can make a Return of near one hundred Voices? This Answer lost the King many Friends, who found him so reluctant in giving his Consent to the Meeting of a Parliament. They allowed, that the Objection he made was plausible, but said it was by no Means sufficient; and added with Concern, that his solemn Promise might perhaps have been taken as a Security, had not he himself shewn before, by so many Examples, how little it could be depended on.

The King sets out for his Army.

But at last the King set out from London to Salisbury, where his Army lay. Before he went out of Town, he summoned all the Officers of his Army that were there, and told them, he had promised to call a Free Parliament, as soon as the Prince of Orange had quitted the Kingdom; and to do all in his Power to quiet the Minds of his People, by securing their Religion, Laws and Liberties. But added he, if after all this, any of A.D. 1688. you are not satisfied, let him declare himself; I am willing to grant Passes to all that desire to go over to the Prince of Orange, and spare them the Shame of deserting their lawful Sovereign. Upon this some of them promised to spend their Blood in his Defence. The Duke of Grafton, who was one of them, was suspected by the King; who spoke to him in private, and told him, that he was sure he could not pretend to act upon Principles of Conscience, for as he knew little of Religion, he regarded it less. The Duke could not much contradict this, but told the King in Answer, That though he had but little Conscience himself, he was of a Party that had a Conscience.

The King arrived at Salisbury the nine-<sup>He arrives at Salisbury.</sup>teenth, much disordered and fatigued with a bleeding at the Nose. The next Morning, as he went to view a Part of his Army posted at some Distance, he was seized afresh with the same Accident; which continued so violently, that nothing could stop it, but the breathing of a Vein, which prevented his going farther. This Illness was counted ominous; for from that Day forward, Disappointments and Misfortunes poured in upon him like a Torrent. On the same unlucky Day, most of the chief Officers came to the Earl of Feverham the General, desiring him to assure the King, that they would upon Occasion spend the last Drop of Blood in his Service; but that they could not in Conscience fight against the Prince, who was come with no other Design, than the calling of a Free Parliament, and securing their Religion and Liberties. And from this Time he was entertained with continual News of Desertions and Defections of his Servants and Friends, and Insurrections in almost every Part of his Kingdom.

The next Day after this Declaration the Lord Churchill, who commanded a Brigade of five Thousand Men in the King's Army, and was highly in the King's Favour, left him, and went over to the Prince of Orange. He was accompanied by the Duke of Grafton, Colonel Berkley, and four or five Captains. This Desertion, and the Representation of the Officers, so confounded the King, that upon a false Rumour that Mareschal Schomberg was marching to fight him, he left Salisbury with great Precipitation, and hastened to London. In his Way thither he was forsaken by Prince George of Denmark, the Duke of Ormond, Sir John Herwet, and others, who left him at Andover. The Kingdom in the mean Time was filled with Attempts and Insurrections in Favour of the Prince of Orange's Declaration. The Earl of Bath secured Plymouth for the Prince, and received the Dutch Fleet there. The Lord Lovelace was rescued by the Earl of Shrewsbury, and others, who got Possession of Bristol. The Earl of Devonshire, with several Lords and Gentlemen assembled at Darby, and declared for the Prince of Orange, and a Free Parliament. Soon after, a Bo-

Yet unwilling to give his People Satisfaction.

Several Lords address the King to call a Free Parliament.

But the King evades their Request.

The whole Kingdom deserts him at once.

A.D. 1688. a Body of Nobility and Gentry appeared at Nottingham, who published a Declaration of their joining in the same Cause. The Earl of Danby, with his Son the Lord Dumblaine, the Lord Fairfax, the Lord Willoughby, and other Persons of Quality, surprized and possessed the City of York; disarmed and put out all the Papists, and declared for a Free Parliament. At the same Time Hull was surprized by Colonel Copley, its Deputy-Governor, who made the Lord Langdale, its Popish Governor, the Lord Montgomery, and several other Papists, Prisoners; while the Townsmen and Seamen joining with him, secured the Fort and Citadel. The great Town of Newcastle received the Lord Lumley, and declared also for a Free Parliament. The Town of Berwick followed the Example of York and Newcastle, and declared for the Prince. The Duke of Ormond went to Oxford with a Body of the Prince's Troops, and caused his Declaration to be read there. And shortly after the City of Norwich was secured by the Duke of Norfolk. The Duke of Somerset also, with the Earl of Oxford, and other Persons of Note, went over to the Prince; and the Earl of Stamford and Lord Delamere joined the Earl of Shrewsbury at Bristol. And five Commissioners set out from Scotland to demand a Free Parliament in that Kingdom. And not long after, the Lord Dartmouth and the Officers in the Fleet, sent a mortifying Address to the King to beg of him that he would call a free Parliament, as the only Means left to quiet the Minds of his People.

The Princess
Anne retires.

Besides this, when the King arrived in Town, the first News that met him, at the Entrance of his Palace, was that the Princess Anne of Denmark was retired the Night before. The unfortunate Prince was struck to the Heart when he heard this, and bursting into Tears, cried out, God help me! my own Children have forsaken me! It seems upon the Recess of her Husband Prince George, the Princess was so afraid of the King's Anger upon that Account, that she told the Lady Churchill her Confident, that she could not bear the Thoughts of it, and would leap out of the Window rather than meet him. Upon this the Lady Churchill consulted with the Bishop of London on the proper Means of providing for the safe Retirement of the Princess. All Things being disposed, her Royal Highness, having first gone to Bed to avoid Suspicion, stole out of her Closet at Midnight by private Stairs, accompanied only with the Lady Churchill, in such haste, that they carried nothing with them; and went to the Earl of Dorset's, whose Lady furnished them with those Things that were necessary. From thence they went to the Bishop of London's House in Aldersgate-street, with so much Privacy, that they entered at the Back-door. Here they took Coach, attended by the Bishop, till they came to Northampton, where the Earl of Dorset met the Princess with a Guard, which accompanied her to Nottingham. And in some Time a little Army was formed about her there, who put themselves under the Command of A.D. 1688. the Bishop of London. From thence she was conducted to Oxford, where the Prince, her Husband, met her.

But the Cause of her Recess not being known, or the Place she was gone to, it had like to have produced very terrible Consequences. A Report had gone abroad, that the Queen had treated her with great Indignity, and, as some said, had given her a Box on the Ear; which being succeeded by the News that she was missed from White-hall, threw the People into such a Rage, that they threatned to tear all the Romish Party to Pieces; being possessed with a Notion that she was either murdered, or put secretly in Prison. The universal Concern for that illustrious Lady, ever the Darling of the English Nation, was such, that the King's Guards, instead of repelling the popular Fury, were ready to join in it. But a Letter from her to the Queen being produced, giving an Account of the Reasons of her Retiring, which shewed that she was safe, it quieted the Tumult and Ferment the City was in.

Which
throws the People into a Rage.

The Prince of Orange, upon the News of King James's Arrival at Salisbury, came out to meet him. A small Skirmish happened between two Parties, of which that of the Prince of Orange was much the less numerous. Nevertheless by a Stratagem of a Miller, who when the Prince's Men were overpowered, came and told the King's Forces, that a strong Detachment of the Prince's Troops was coming towards them, the superior Party retired in great Confusion. This small Action was much to the Advantage of the Prince, by the Reputation it gave his Troops. But the King's main Army coming back to Reading, the Prince made haste to possess himself of Salisbury, into which he made a splendid publick Entry.

A Skirmish
between the Forces of the King and Prince.

At this Time an unknown Person ventured to publish a Paper in London, and other Places, called, The Third Declaration of the Prince of Orange, &c. It was penned with great Spirit and Boldness, requiring all Magistrates to disarm and secure all Papists; and threatening to deliver them up to the Discretion of his Soldiers, in case any of that Religion should be found with Arms in their Houses. It was a very bold Attempt for a private Person to venture on; but it had a wonderful Effect, being punctually obeyed in every Place, no Man doubting that it was the Prince's own. It caused some Disorders in the City, the Apprentices getting together, and committing many Irregularities. But this outrageous Fury was still under such a Governance and Order, that no Blood was shed.

A third Declaration in the Name of the Prince.

The King surrounded with those Perplexities, Fears and Distractions that accompany a ruined Authority, sent for such of the Protestant Privy-Counsellors and Peers, as were in Town, to ask their Advice and Opinion. They agreed that he should send Commissioners to the Prince of Orange to

The King at last takes Advice of his Protestant Counsellors.

A.D. 1688. know what he demanded, call a Free Parliament, grant a general Pardon to all those who had joined the Prince, and turn all Papists out of their Employments. This Advice, though so wholesome and necessary, was so little agreeable, that he took the Night to consider of it. But the next Day he declared his Consent to it, and proceeded accordingly; only the last Article stuck by him so closely, that he said he would leave that Matter to be debated in Parliament.

He sends Commissioners to the Prince.

The Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Nottingham, and the Earl of Godolphin were appointed Commissioners to go to the Prince of Orange. These Lords sent to the Prince to know where they should wait on him; who first appointed Amesbury, but afterwards Hungerford. He also desired them to send their Proposals in Writing, which they did, to this Effect; That since the Causes of Complaint were by Consent to be referred to a Free Parliament, the King had declared his Resolution to call one; in order to which he had issued out his Proclamation and Writs; and to prevent any Interruption therein, he consented to every Thing that could be reasonably desired for the Security of those who should come to it. He had therefore sent them to him for the adjusting of all Matters relating thereto, and to enter into a Treaty about the same.

He offers them seven Proposals.

The Prince took a Day to deliberate hereon with those great Men who were with him, and ordered the Earls of Oxford, Sbrensbury, and Clarendon to treat with the Kings' Commissioners; and they delivered the seven following Proposals in Answer. 1. "That all Persons, unqualified by Law, be turned out of Offices and Employments. 2. That all Proclamations and Acts against the Prince and his Party be recalled. 3. That the Custody of the Tower of London be immediately put into the Hands of the City. 4. If the King should think fit to be at London, during the sitting of the Parliament, that the Prince might also be there, with an equal Number of his Guards; or if the King chose to retire from London, the Prince might be at a Place at the same Distance; and that the respective Armies be thirty Miles from London; and that no more Forces be brought into England. 5. That for the Security of the City of London, Tilbury-Fort be put into the Hands of the said City. 6. That a sufficient Part of the Revenue should be assigned the Prince for the Maintenance of his Troops, during the sitting of Parliament. 7. That to prevent the landing of Foreign Troops, Portsmouth should be put into such Hands as should be agreed between the King and Prince.

The King's Commissioners were well pleased with these Proposals, which tended so naturally to procure that happy and Parliamentary Settlement, which alone could reduce the Members of the State, now all disjointed and dispersed, into their proper Order and Places. The King himself upon A.D. 1688. reading them seemed satisfied with them, and said, That they were fairer than either he did or could expect.

He was now to consider whether he would preserve his Crown by abandoning the Designs he had so long pursued. His Person and Regal Dignity were safe, but his Cause undone for ever. He might have been still a King, still great, and still happy too, if he could think himself so when bounded by Law; but was to be for ever disabled from making a second Invasion on the Religion and Liberties of his People. But this he could not be content with; and his Reluctance to submit to those equitable Conditions of Reigning, crowned the rest of his ill Conduct, and completed his Ruine. He received the Proposals of the Prince in the Evening of the tenth of December, after which he presently called an extraordinary Council; and besides the Lords who were in Town, sent for the Lord Mayor of London, and the Sheriffs. He acquainted them that the Queen and the Prince were gone to France the Night before, but promised that himself would stay here. They all appeared unanimous for his accepting the Prince's Proposals; and he also seemed to design the same. So that at parting, the King having ordered the Council to attend him the next Morning to give their farther Advice, the Assembly broke up with great Satisfaction, and Hopes of seeing a joyful Alteration of Things; the Storms that at first threatened the Land, and afterwards turned with such Fury on the King, seeming now past and overblown, and ready to change to a bright and smiling Day.

The King's Affairs at a Crisis, which takes a fatal Turn.

He calls a Council under Colour of asking Advice.

But other Counsels and Intentions were in the King's Breast. There can be no Doubt that he had some Time before concerted his Retreat out of the Kingdom, and that the Queen's Departure was to be the Fore-runner of his own. But since the Terms sent him were by his own Confession better than he expected, it seemed reasonable that they should have produced some new and more mature Deliberation, before he fixed on that Resolution, which was never to be recalled. But the same malignant Star still influenced his Counsels. He took a Night to consider of the wholesome Advice his Peers gave him, but not an Hour to think on that by which he was undone. As soon as the Council had left him, he prepared for his Escape to France; if it be proper to use that Word, when no real Danger was near. He wrote first a Letter to the Earl of Ferversham, to order him to disband the Army. In the next Place he ordered all the Writs to be burnt, by which the Parliament was to be called; and because some were sent out, he entered a Caveat against them. He then disguised himself, and between two and three in the Morning left his Palace in Company of Sir Edward Hales, Mr. Sheldon, and Mr. Delabadie, and took a Boat at the Privy-Stairs in Whitehall, carrying the Broad Seal with him; which when he

But leaves his Palace on the same Night.

A.D. 1688. he was upon the Thames, he threw into the Water. He then crossed the River, and went by Land to Feverſham, where the Veſſel lay that was prepared to carry him over.

With this Step his Reign ended, and it was the laſt of the many Breaches of Faith in it. What his Reason was is impoſſible to know certainly; it is certain he gave none, and very near as certain there was no good one to be given. Thoſe who cenſured it moſt moderately, ſaid that it ſhewed his Priests had more Regard to themſelves than to him, and that he conſidered their Intereſt more than his own; ſince he choſe to wander abroad with them, and try what he could do by a French Force to ſubdue his People, rather than ſtay at home under thoſe Reſtraints, which his own ill Conduct had made ſo equitable and ſo neceſſary. It was alſo wondered at, why he did not go away in one of his own Yachts or Frigates, rather than expoſe himſelf in ſo dangerous and ignominious a Manner. In a Word, it was impoſſible to put a good Conſtruction on any Part of the Scene he now acted.

The Nation left without any Form of Government.

The next Day in the Morning, the great Council met at White-hall; but were all confounded and amazed when they heard that the King was gone. It was ſoon known in the City; and for a ſhort Time filled all Men with Doubts and Perplexities as to what would happen next in this unheard-of State of Affairs. There appeared now in the Nation neither King nor Parliament; ſo that the whole ſupreme and ruling Power of the three Kingdoms was as it were diſſolved and vaniſhed. But the publick Thoughts which are peculiar to free Nations, and had at this Time more than ordinarily exerciſed Men's Minds, being directed by the Divine Mercy, guided them to an eaſy and natural Method to bring the diſmembered State into Order and Place again. The King's Forces declared for the Prince, and turned out the Papiſts from among them; and the principal Officers met at Whitehall, and ſent to the Prince to acquaint him that the King was gone, but that they would aſſiſt the Lord-Mayor to keep the City quiet till his Highneſs ſhould arrive there.

Some Appearance of Order.

The Lords come to the City.

But what was of moſt Importance was, that the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, who were the only Part of the Legiſlature ſubſiſting, joined their Care and Conſultations with the Influence and Power of the City of London, to preſerve the publick Quiet. The Peers went immediately to Guild-hall; and ſending for the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen, they declared to them, that the King having withdrawn himſelf, they reſolved to apply themſelves to the Prince of Orange, and uſe their Endeavours with him to obtain ſuch a Parliament, as might ſecure the Religion, Laws and Liberties of our Country. This Declaration was written out, and then ſubſcribed by all that noble Aſſembly; which conſiſted of the two Archbiſhops, five Biſhops, and two and twenty temporal Lords. They deputed four of their Body to wait upon the Prince with it. And becauſe Colonel A.D. 1688. Skelton, who was Lieutenant of the Tower, was a Perſon obnoxious, they removed him by their Authority, and put the Lord Lucas in his room. They alſo ſent an Order to the Lord Dartmouth, requiring him to avoid all Acts of Hoſtility with the Dutch Fleet; and to remove all Popiſh Officers. The Lord-Mayor, Aldermen and Common-Council ſent an Addreſs to the Prince at the ſame Time with the Lords Declaration; deſiring his Protection, and his ſpeedy Repair to the City. This was followed by an Addreſs from the Lieutenantcy to the ſame purpoſe; promiſing their Care for the Peace and Safety of the City. And the Militia of London and Weſtmiſter were preſently in Arms.

They apply themſelves to the Prince.

Nevertheless, this did not reſtrain the Rab-

Tumults in the City.

ble, a ſort of People not eaſily ſtirred, but violent when once in Motion, from committing ſeveral great Diſorders. They fell upon the Maſs-Houſes with great Fury; which were utterly demolished; and the Materials burnt with the uſual riotous Ceremonies and Acclamations. There was no Miſchief done to Mens Perſons, but ſeveral Houſes were plundered; nor could their licentious Rage be withheld from invading the ſacred Privileges of Publick Miniſters; the Houſes of the Spaniſh and Florentine Ambaſſadors being broke into, and much Damage done. But the Parliament that ſate afterwards endeavoured to recover the Nation's Honour, by making them ample amends for the Loſſes they had ſuſtained. In the miſt of this popular Fury, they accidentally lighted upon the Lord Chancellor Jeffreys, who had diſguiſed himſelf in a Seaman's Habit, and retired to Wapping, in order to eſcape to Hamburg. He had the good Fortune to fall into the Hands of ſome Perſons who had Authority, and ſaved him from the Populace, or he would have been pulled to pieces. Their Rage againſt him was ſuch, that they followed him to the Lord-Mayor's Houſe where he was carried, crying out, that he might be delivered to them, and threatening to whip him to Death; and it was with much ado they were kept off him. And no doubt, in the inexpressible Agony he muſt then feel (juſtly due to all ſuch Inſtruments of Tyranny) he underwent a ſevere Penance for the barbarous and illegal Acts he had committed before. When he was brought before the Lord-Mayor, he was in ſuch a Terror and Conſternation that he earneſtly begged to be committed to the Tower, that he might be in Safety from the outrageous Rabble. His Requeſt was eaſily complied with; and a Body of the Trained-Bands appointed to ſecure him. He never came out thence again; dying there, as ſome have ſaid, of drinking ſtrong Liquors; but according to better Informations, of the Stone.

Jeffreys found.

And committed to the Tower.

The Earl of Feverſham upon the Receipt of the King's Letter above-mentioned, diſmiſſed immediately four thouſand Men who were with him. But he was very much blamed for doing a Thing of this Conſequence, without adviſing with either the Prince

Part of the King's Army diſbanded.

A.D. 1688. Prince of Orange, or the Peers at London; since the letting loose into a Countrey so many armed Men, under no Restraint of Military, and much less of Civil, Coercion, might have caused great Disturbances in a Time of such Confusion. But Care was taken by the Lords to rectify this wrong Step.

A panick Fear throughout England.

This Accident gave rise to an unaccountable panick Fear that spread through the City and Countrey the following Day. About Midnight some Countrey Fellows came into Westminster, and brought a strange Story, that the Irish were up in Arms, and were coming to London, firing Houses, and putting Man, Woman, and Child to the Sword. This Uproar and Outcry so gathered as it went along, that in a short Time the Trained-Bands and Regular Forces appeared in Arms; and every Body leaving their Beds in an hurry, put Lights in their Windows, and betook themselves, the more fearful to Flight, the more resolute to their Weapons. And what is yet stranger, the same Alarm ran on the very same Night, and with the same Effects, to all Parts of the Kingdom. It was never certainly known what the Cause was of this universal and unaccountable Fright.

The Proceedings of the Prince of Orange.

The Prince of Orange was moving slowly towards London, when the News of the King's Flight met him at Abingdon. He could not at first believe it, till it was confirmed by the Expresses sent him from the City. He had intended to have gone to Oxford to meet the Princess Anne, and receive the Compliments of the University; but this unexpected Incident made him alter his Intention. He found it was requisite to hasten to London; but it happened unluckily that this could not be done with the Expedition that was necessary. For the King's Army lay so scattered on the Road, that if he had gone with no Guard, or with a weak one, his Person might have been in Danger. For though they were generally well inclined to him, he could not safely depend upon that; so that he was obliged to accompany his Troops in the slow Marches such great Bodies use to make. In his Way he issued out a short Declaration commanding the Officers of the disbanded Regiments, as also the Soldiers, to repair to certain Places, and form themselves into regular Bodies as before, and expect farther Orders. He also sent for the Earl of Danby to come to assist him with his Counsels; and ordered the Duke of Grafton with a Regiment of Foot-Guards, to go and take Possession of Tilbury-Fort.

The King
stopped at Feverham.

But when he was arrived at Windsor, he was surpris'd with an unlooked-for Accident. Two Gentlemen came thither Express from Feverham in Kent, and brought Word that the King had been stopped there. It seems that he got safely on board the Vessel provided for him; which would immediately have set Sail, but that the Weather being stormy, the Seamen thought it necessary to give it some more Ballast. While this was doing, Sir Edward Hales happened to send his Man ashore to the Post-Office; but by an odd Chance the Man was seen by a Person whom A.D. 1688. his Master had disobliged, who knew his Livery. This Person thinking he had a fair Opportunity of revenging himself upon Sir Edward, gave the Alarm to some Fishermen, Seamen, and other Free-booters of that Place, who in this Time of Confusion took upon themselves to search all Ships that came there, for Papists and other suspected Persons, whom they made no Scruple of plundering, if there was any thing to be got. This Rabble immediately entered the Vessel to make Spoil of what came to hand; and finding the King in a plain Suit and a Bob Wig, took him for one of Sir Edward's Priests, and offered him many vile personal Indignities; after having robbed him of four hundred Guineas, with many Jewels and Curiosities he carried about him. But it happened that some of better Character coming afterwards on board, a Constable knew the King's Face, and fell at his Feet, begging his Pardon for the sacrilegious Insolences of that rude Rascality; and ordered them to return the King what they had taken from him. But he only took back the Jewels, and gave the Gold amongst them. He would still have been gone, but they brought him ashore as it were by Force, and carried him to an Inn, where they shewed him what Respect they could.

When this Advice came to the Prince of Orange, he sent M. Zuylenstein to see the King safe, and at full Liberty to go where he pleased. But before he arrived there, the Peers and Privy-Counsellors had sent four of their Body to wait upon the King, and to desire him to return to Whitehall; and ordered the Earl of Feverham to wait upon him with his Coaches and Guards. And on the sixteenth Instant he left the Place where he was, and in the Afternoon came into London, as it were in Triumph; and went into Whitehall, attended by several Noblemen and his Guards; the People crowding to see him, and welcoming his Return with loud Acclamations. And the Night concluded with Bonfires, ringing of Bells, and the like Demonstrations of Joy.

The first Thing he did was to issue out an Order of Council for preventing such Outrages as had been committed during his Absence. It was observed that sufficient Care had been taken for this before by the Privy-Council; and this Zeal shewed for the Popish Party after his Return, was interpreted as if he came back only to serve them. He also ordered the Embargo to be taken off that had been laid on all outward-bound Vessels, which was also for the Advantage of his Friends. And during his short Stay at Whitehall, the Palace was crowded with Irishmen, Priests, Jesuits and Roman Catholics after the usual Manner, and one of the Priests sent an imperious Message to the Lord Chamberlain Mulgrave, to supply his Lodgings with Furniture, for that he meant to continue in them. The King began to take Courage, and to talk in his usual high Strain, and to justify what he had

The Council
send to desire him to return.

He comes back in Triumph.

His Proceedings afterwards.

A.D. 1688. had done; so that all Things seemed returning into the old Channel. Insomuch that some that wished well to the King said, that he had been cunningly invited back to Whiteball, with a Design to ruin him more effectually, and to extinguish the last Remains of Pity for him in the Hearts of his Protestant Subjects.

A Consultation among the Prince's Party about him.

When the News of the King's Return was brought to Windsor, the Prince thought the Privy-Council had not used him well, to take a Step of this Consequence without acquainting him with it, whom they had just before invited to take the Government upon him. And now other Counsels were to be taken, suited to this unexpected Obstruction. The Prince heard the Opinions of all the Nobility who were with him; the Number of which was much increased by those who had come to him since the King's Departure. Upon a Debate all agreed, that the Palace of Whiteball being crowded with Irish Papists, Priests and Jesuits, the Prince could not with Ease and Safety remain at St. James's, where he was of Necessity to go the next Day, unless the King himself, and his Popish Attendants were removed to some Distance from London. It was also agreed to adhere closely to the former Point, the King's Desertion of his People; and not to yield up that by entering into any Treaty with him. And because the Earl of Feverham was come from the King with that Offer, it was resolved not to look upon him as a qualified Ambassador; and because he came without a Passport, he was put for some Days under Arrest.

Who agree to remove the King from Whiteball.

The next Consideration was how to dispose of the King's Person. Some moved that he might be kept a Prisoner, at least till the Nation was settled, and Ireland secured; and it was judged, that his being kept in Custody would be such a Check upon his Party, as would oblige them to submit. Ireland was in the utmost Danger; and this Restraint might bring Tyrconnel to deliver up the Government, and to disarm the Papists; which would both preserve that Kingdom, and the Protestants there. But because it might raise Compassion, and beget Disorder, if the King should be kept Prisoner in England, the sending him to Breda was proposed. And the Earl of Clarendon urged it warmly, for the Sake of the Irish Protestants. But the Prince said, that for ought he knew, this might be good and wise Advice, but it was what he could not agree to; adding, that though he could appear against the King at the Head of an Army in this Cause, yet as to his Person, now he had him in his Power, he could not make him a Prisoner: And that he knew the Princess would never enjoy her self, if any such thing were done. Nor did he know what Difficulties it might raise, or what Effect it might have upon the Parliament that was to be called. That for these Reasons he could not suffer any thing to be done against his Person; but allowed that it was necessary to send him out of London; and said, that he would order a Guard to attend him, who should only defend his Person, without putting any Restraint upon him.

At last a Resolution was taken of sending the Lords Hallifax, Sbrowsbury and Delamere to London, who were first to order the English Guards about the Court to be drawn off, and sent to Quarters out of Town; after which Count Solms was to come with the Dutch Guards, and to take Possession of all the Posts about the Court. This caused great Murmurings among the English Guards to be obliged to make Room for Strangers, and they at first refused to move; upon which the Dutch Guards marched up to them with lighted Match, and in Order of Battle. All Men were in Apprehension of a fearful Rencounter; but at last, with some Trouble, the English were persuaded to dislodge.

Three Lords sent with this Resolution.

Which causes Discontents.

The three Lords sent then to the Earl of Middleton, to let him know, that they had a Message for the King, which they must deliver immediately; upon which they were introduced to him, who was then in Bed. They shewed him their Orders, which were signed by the Council at Windsor, and told him, that the Necessity of Affairs required that the Prince should come immediately to London; and that it was judged most conducive to the Safety of his Person, and the Quiet of the City, that he should retire to some House out of Town, particularly to Ham. The King appeared much dejected, and asked, if it must be done immediately? They told him, he might take his Rest first; and added, that he should be attended with a Guard, who should secure his Person, but give him no sort of Disturbance. Upon this they withdrew; and were just gone, when they were brought back by the Earl of Middleton, and asked by the King, if he might not as well return to Rocheſter, since the Prince had desired before that he should stay there, rather than return to London. They promised to send immediate Word to the Prince, who lay that Night at Sion, within eight Miles of London. It was visible that this was in order to a second Escape; and so the Prince readily consented to it.

The Message from the Prince presented to the King.

The King desires to go to Rocheſter.

Accordingly the next Day the King set out by Water for Rocheſter, attended by the Earls of Ailesbury, Litchfield, Arran and Dumbarton, and about a hundred of the Dutch Guards. He stayed at Rocheſter four or five Days in full Liberty; during which Time his Protestant Friends repaired to him; and pressed him to stay and see the Issue of Things, and the Event of a Parliament. They assured him, that a great Turn was made in Mens Minds in his Favour; so that he had reason to hope for good Terms, and an Agreement to his Advantage. He continued for some Time unresolved; till a Letter from the Queen determined him; who with great Earnestness claimed his Promise of following her. This Letter was intercepted, and fell into the Hands of the Prince; who sent it immediately to the King. Upon this, on the twenty third of December, be-

A.D. 1688. tween two and three in the Morning, he withdrew himself a second Time, with the same Privacy as at first; accompanied only by his Natural Son, the Duke of Berwick, and two more; and getting secretly aboard a small Frigate, took his last Farewel of his Countrey, which he never saw more. He left a Paper upon his Table, containing his Reasons for withdrawing himself from Rocheſter. He there complained of the Arrest of the Earl of Feverſham, of the Prince's Guards poſſeſſing the Poſts about Whiteball, and the diſturb- ing him, when in Bed, with a peremptory Meſſage to leave his Palace the next Morning. For theſe Reaſons he ſaid, he could not think himſelf ſafe while in the Power of the Prince of Orange; and had therefore withdrawn himſelf, yet ſo as to be within Call, when the Eyes of the Nation ſhould be opened. The Veſſel in which he embarked, brought him to Ambleteuſe in France; from whence he repaired to St. Germain.

The Prince of Orange comes to London.

Conſultations about the Steps he was to take.

He aſſembles the Peers and deſires their Advice.

In the mean Time, the Prince of Orange came to London, on the ſame Day that the King left Whiteball. Though the Weather was very rainy on the Day he entered the Town, a great Crowd had filled the Streets to St. James's Houſe (which he deſigned for his Abode) in hopes of ſeeing him. But inſtead of gratifying them by ſhewing himſelf publicly, he, by an unſeaſonable Reſerve, went through the Park. So that the People, after having ſtood the Rain for ſome Hours, were obliged to return diſappointed. And this, though a Trifle in itſelf, helped to ſet Mens Spirits on edge.

After he was ſettled, the great Bodies about the Town came to congratulate him; the Biſhops, the Clergy, the City, the Lawyers, and others. Theſe Forms being over, the Settlement of the Nation came to be conſidered. Some Lawyers adviſed the Prince to declare himſelf King after the Example of Henry VII. which, they ſaid, would put an End to all Diſputes, which would otherwiſe prove very tedious and perplexing. And they urged, that he might then call a Parliament, which he could not do otherwiſe; which would be a legal Aſſembly, though his Title were not recognized. But there were many Objections againſt this. It was in the firſt Place, contrary to his Declaration, by which the Settlement of the Nation was referred to a Parliament; and moreover, would make all he had done paſs for an ambitious Attempt to raiſe himſelf to the Throne. So that this was rejected; and the Prince reſolved to guide himſelf by the Advice of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, who became at this Time the ſupreme Directors of the National Concerns. They were accordingly invited to appear at St. James's; whither they came to the Number of above Threeſcore. The Prince came in to them, and let them know, that he had deſired them to meet in order to adviſe of the beſt Methods for compaſſing the Ends of his Declaration, by calling a free Parliament, for the Preſervation and Settlement of the Proteſtant Religion, and the Rights and Liberties of the Kingdom; and having ſaid this he withdrew.

The Lords then ordered the Prince's Declaration to be read, and having voted their Thanks to him for his Expedition, reſolved to aſſemble in their Houſe at Weſtmiſter; and nominated five of the moſt eminent Lawyers, Serjeant Maynard, Mr. Holt, Mr. Pollexfen, Mr. Bradford and Mr. Atkinſon, to aſſiſt them in their Conſultations. When they met at their Houſe, they addreſſed the Prince for Form's ſake, to take upon him the Adminiſtration of Publick Affairs till the Convention ſhould meet; which was accepted of. But how to aſſemble this Convention was thought a Matter of Difficulty. No King was in the Nation; and not ſo much as any Style or Form of Government; the former Writs were deſtroyed, and the Great Seal thrown away and loſt. But at laſt it was reſolved to follow a Precedent made before the Reſtoration; when General Monk ſummoned a Convention to meet in April 1660. and the Prince of Orange was addreſſed to, to ſend his Letters to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal being Proteſtants, and to the ſeveral Counties, Universities, &c. of England and Wales, directing them to chuſe ſuch a Number of Perſons to repreſent them as they ought to ſend to Parliament; and to give Notice to the Perſons ſo choſen to meet on the twenty ſecond of January.

But becauſe it was neceſſary that the Concurrence of the Commons ſhould be had to this new Settlement, and yet no ſuch fixed Body of the Commons ſubſiſted as there was of the Lords, the Prince publiſhed an Invitation, by which all Perſons who had ſerved in any of King Charles the Second's Parliaments, together with the Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen, and fifty Perſons of the Common-Council of the City of London, to be deputed by the Body of the Common-Council, were deſired to meet the Prince at St. James's. According to this Summons, many of the Members, to the Number of an hundred and ſixty, together with the Aldermen and Deputies of the Common-Council, aſſembled at the appointed Day; which was five Days after the Lords had firſt met. The Prince came to them, and told them, that he had deſired them to meet him, to adviſe of the beſt manner for proſecuting the Ends of his Declaration. He then gave them a Copy of his Speech at length, and deſired them to take it into immediate Conſideration.

They all by Agreement repaired to the Commons Houſe at Weſtmiſter; where having choſe Henry Powle, Eſq; their Chairman, the firſt Queſtion they debated was, What Authority they had to aſſemble? Upon which it was ſoon determined, that the Requeſt of the Prince of Orange was a ſufficient Warrant. Then after ſome Deliberation the Aſſembly agreed upon an Addreſs; in the firſt Place deſiring the Prince to take upon him the Adminiſtration of Publick Affairs;

Who addreſſes the Prince to take upon him the Adminiſtration, and to call a Convention.

A Body of the Commons aſſembled.

Who proceeded after the manner of the Lords.

A.D. 1688. fairs; and secondly, proposing to him the summoning a Convention, as the Lords had before done.

The French Ambassador ordered to leave the Kingdom.

At the same Time, some Disturbances had like to have happened by means of the French Ambassador Monsieur Barillon, who appeared very active in promoting Divisions among the Peers; upon which the Prince ordered him to depart the Kingdom in twenty four Hours; which Term he desired to have lengthened, but in vain; he having forfeited the Privileges of his Character, by meddling in Intrigues to disturb the Peace of the State he lived in. He was very ill received at his Return, though he had very faithfully, and too effectually, served his Master in a very long Abode he made here. But the wrong Judgment he had formed of our Affairs at last, by which he had caused his Master to engage his Forces in Germany, when they had a much more important Call in England, made him be so coldly looked on, that 'tis thought it shortened his Life.

The Prince's Administration.

On the thirtieth, the Prince received the Sacrament in St. James's Chapel, according to the Rites of the Church of England, from the Hands of the Bishop of London. The next Day he began with the first Act of his Administration; authorizing all Sheriffs, Justices of the Peace, and other Officers, not being Papists, to act in their Offices till the meeting of the Convention. In the next Place he issued out circular Letters for summoning the same; and ordered all Soldiers who were quartered in the Places where the Elections were to be made, to leave them, the Garrisons only excepted.

He assembles the Peers and Gentlemen of Scotland.

The Prince's Care was also extended to Scotland and Ireland. He assembled all the Scotch Peers and Gentlemen that happened to be in London at this Time, to whom he spoke to the same Effect, as he had done to the English Lords and Commons. The Assembly, after some Debate, agreed to draw up an Address, desiring him to take upon himself the Administration of their Government, as he had done that of England; and, by his Letter or Proclamation, to call a general Meeting of the Estates to meet on the fourteenth of March next, which was readily complied with. When the News of the King's Desertion had reached that Kingdom, the whole Nation declared almost unanimously for the Prince. The Rabble got together at Edinburgh, and fell upon the Mass-Houses with the same Fury as was done at London. But what was worse, in the Western Counties, the Presbyterians rose up, and fell upon the Episcopal Ministers with a horrible Brutality, and treated them with many vile and barbarous Indignities. Nor did they shew the least Distinction or Regard to many worthy Men amongst them, who had appeared zealously against Popery. In the Northern Parts, the Episcopal and Presbyterian Parties concurred with great Friendliness and Unanimity.

They desire him to take the Administration of their Government, and call a Convention.

The Scotch Nation declares for the Prince.

The Brutality of some of the Scotch Presbyterians.

The Face of Things in Ireland.

But in Ireland, the Appearance of Things grew more and more unpromising. Tyr-connel was Master of the Countrey, and had A.D. 1688. disarmed the Protestants. And though upon the News of the surprizing Revolution in England, he seemed daunted and discouraged, and willing to come to Terms; yet in a short Time, finding that no Force was sent against him, he began to take Heart; yet keeping up his Dissimulation, as if he were ready to surrender. By this Means he kept off any Attempt upon him for some Time, which he made use of to strengthen himself the more. The Prince was in no small Perplexity what to do about him. He feared to send any Troops of the English Army, who on Account of the Affront offered to their Countreymen, by making them give Way to the Dutch Guards, and some other little Accidents, were so ill affected to the Prince, that there was Danger of their joining with Tyrconnel. And he could for that Reason very ill spare any of his Dutch Troops. These Considerations made him the more easily entertain a Proposition made to him, as it was thought, by Sir William Temple's Family; which was, to send over Lieutenant General Hamilton to Tyrconnel, with whom he was very intimate. This Gentleman was a Papist, but offered to go over to Tyrconnel, and prevail with him to deliver up the Government; promising that if he failed, he would return and give an Account of his Negotiation. He was counted a Man of Honour, which made him be trusted according to his Desire. But when he came to Ireland, he acted quite contrary to his Word. He confirmed Tyrconnel in his Intentions of standing out, and represented to him that a great Turn was making in England in Favour of the King; but agreed with him that it was necessary to go on with the Appearances of Submission. And this Management was carried on till Tyrconnel had gained what he wanted, which was much Time; which he employed in augmenting his Army, and putting all Things in a Condition to receive King James, who in some Time came over thither from France. But to return to England.

Tyrconnel's Dissimulation.

Hamilton sent to him, but breaks his Word.

The maintaining two Armies, and other Incidents, occasioned so great an Expence as the Revenue would not furnish; upon which the Prince wrote to the City of London, representing the same to them, and desiring a Loan of Money, such as they could conveniently spare. Upon this an unanimous Vote passed in Common-Council, that they would supply his Highness with two hundred Thousand Pounds; which Sum was raised, with great Chearfulness, in four Day's Time; one single Citizen, Sir Samuel Dashwood, subscribing fifty Thousand Pounds.

The City lends the Prince 200000 L.

In the mean Time the Elections for Members of the Convention went on with all possible Freedom; every Man giving his Vote for whom he pleased, without any Solicitation of the Prince, or any of his Dependents. It is observable, that Writs having been sent out for a Parliament twice before the King's Recess, every Place had fixed on its Members; so that the present Assen-

The Convention elected.

A.D. 1689. Assembly consisted very nearly of the same Persons, as would have been elected by King James's Writs. And this gives us a just Idea of the Temper of the Nation at this Juncture; and from thence we may frame a Judgment what would have been the Consequence, if the King had waited the Issue of a Parliament.

They assembled.

On the twenty second of January, the Convention assembled, with a Weight of Affairs upon them, greater and more important than had ever exercised the Cares of a Representative of England before. The Frame of the whole Legal Constitution was dissolved, and in this State of Things, they were to form a new Settlement. Every Head had been busied in Schemes and Projects for regulating this new System of Government; till the Convention sat, whose Consultations now engaged all their Attention.

Their Proceedings.

The Convention kept up as near as possible the Form of a Parliament; and separated themselves into two Houses, of Peers and Commons; the Marquis of Halifax being chosen Speaker of the Lords, and Mr. Powle of the Commons. Then a Letter from the Prince of Orange was read to them, signifying the Occasion of their Meeting, and his Desire that they would use as much Dispatch as possible in their Deliberations.

The first Thing done by both Houses was to appoint a Day of Thanksgiving to Almighty God, for having made the Prince of Orange the glorious Instrument of the Great Deliverance of the Kingdom from Popery and Arbitrary Power. After this they agreed in an Address to the Prince of Orange, to return him their Thanks for what he had done for the Nation; and to desire him to take upon him the Administration of Affairs, the Disposal of the publick Revenue, and the Care of Ireland; which Address was complied with.

They addressed the Prince.

A Letter from King James rejected.

Before the Houses had done any Thing farther, they received a Letter from King James, directed to the Lords and Commons sitting in Convention, in which he made them those Promises, and used those Arguments, which were fitting and necessary at those Times. But it was not read in either House; the Commons first, and then the Lords, rejecting it.

Debates about the Vacancy of the Throne.

At last on the twenty eighth, the Commons proceeded to consider the State of the Nation in a Committee of the whole House. The first Thing said was, that King James having deserted the Kingdom, and not appointed any Person to administer the Government during his Absence, this amounted in Reason and Judgment of Law to a Demise of that Prince; and a Vote to that Effect was moved for. This Motion was opposed by another, that the Throne was not descended, but vacant; a Demise inferring a Descent of the Crown to the next Heir, which could not be in the present Case, since none can be Heir to a living Man. But this was also contradicted by a third Party, and it was said that to vote the Throne vacant, were to depose the King; A.D. 1689. which could not, they said, be done by Law; therefore they proposed that a Regency should be established during the Life of King James, which should govern in his Name. But the Doctrine of the Vacancy of the Throne was most generally received; so that at last the House came to this memorable Resolution, "That King James the Second having endeavoured to subvert the Constitution of the Kingdom, by breaking the original Contract between King and People; and having by the Advice of Jesuits and other wicked Persons, violated the Fundamental Laws, and withdrawn himself out of the Kingdom, hath abdicated the Government, and that the Throne is thereby vacant". Which Resolution they sent up to the Lords for their Concurrence.

The Throne declared vacant.

After this Vote they passed another very remarkable one as follows; "Resolved, that it hath been found by Experience to be inconsistent with this Protestant Kingdom to be governed by a Popish Prince"; which they also sent up to the Lords for their Concurrence.

Soon after they voted, that the Thanks of the House be given to the Clergy of the Church of England, who had preached and written against Popery, and refused to read the Declaration. They voted the same also to the Soldiers and Mariners, and to all who had appeared in Arms to deliver their Country.

This great Work of the Revolution had gone on hitherto with a wonderful Ease and Smoothness; the common Danger, which is a mighty Promoter of Concord, keeping all who were concerned in it unanimous and united. But in adjusting the Form of the new Settlement some Difficulties arose. All Persons were generally agreed in retaining and establishing the fundamental Parts of the ancient Government; but they were not so well agreed in the Method of doing this.

Difficulties in adjusting the new Settlement.

One Party was for setting the Prince of Orange upon the Throne, whose personal Merit, and present Obligations, joined with his Affinity to the Crown, did naturally point him out for that Station. And this Opinion most generally prevailed, especially among the Commons, both in the Convention, and out of it. But there was a very strong Party who were unsatisfied with this Proposal. The high Notions that had been propagated lately of Regal Authority and popular Submission, stuck very close with many. The publick Fears were now in good Measure over-passed, which had kept them before from attending to the Consequence of their Principles. But now the Danger being over, they found they had been carried farther than the Notions they had entertained would permit. They saw indeed the happy Consequences of receding from their Principles; but by a natural Infirmary of Mankind, instead of disapproving their former Opinions for the Sake of these good Consequences, they began to disapprove

A.D.1689. disapprove these good Consequences for the Sake of their former Opinions. So that even this clear Conviction was not sufficient to dislodge Prepossessions that had been so long cherished for sacred and inviolable Maxims; and these Persons, finding that what had now been done was not very consistent with the Notions they had so long entertained, began to apprehend that Matters had really been carried too far. And this Party again subdivided it self into two; one of which could not be satisfied without repairing what had been done amiss, and recalling the exiled Prince; while the other was contented with putting a Stop to any farther Irregularities. And these were for lodging the Government with the Prince of Orange, under the Title of Regent, to be administered by him in the Name of King James; the Reason of which Proceeding was to prevent a formal deposing of the King, which they conceived inconsistent with Law, and which the giving the Title of King to the Prince of Orange, would imply. But the Scheme of recalling King James was so little seconded, that the Promoters of it, some out of Conviction, and some to carry on their Designs under that Cover, fell in with the Party for a Regent; which Party again by Degrees came over to that which was for setting the Crown on a new Head.

The Lords Debates about filling the Throne with a Regent, or a King.

Carried for a King.

Debate about the Original Contract.

The high Notions of Duty and Allegiance prevailed much among the Peers; so that in the House of Lords, when they began to enter on their Debates, the Party for a Regent was near carrying the Question. On the twenty ninth of January, the Vote of the Commons concerning the Vacancy of the Throne, came to be considered in the Upper House. But when the Question was put, a Proposal was made, not to agree with the Commons, that the Throne was vacant, but to suppose it for the present, leaving it to be afterwards farther examined; and first to consider, whether supposing the Throne vacant, it should be filled by a Regent, or a King. This was agreed to, and the Deliberation being entered on, the Earl of Nottingham appeared at the Head of those who were for a Regent; the Marquis of Halifax, and the Earl of Danby being the chief Speakers on the other Side. Upon a Division the Votes were so nearly equal, that the Party for a King carried it but by two; there being fifty one for appointing a King, and forty nine for a Regent. But this latter Party soon lost Ground.

Two Days after the Lords proceeded to the farther Consideration of the Commons Vote. The first Thing considered, was the Original Contract there mentioned; which occasioned a Question to be put, whether, or no, there was any Original Contract between the King and People? This bred warm Debates; some maintaining that Kings hold their Crowns by Divine Right, which was as zealously denied by others, who asserted, That all Power originally belonged to the Community, and to the King only by mutual Compact. The former insisted that no such Contract was in Being; and asked, where it was kept, and how it might be come at? The other Side replied, that it was implied in a legal and limited Government; though in a long Tract of Time, and in dark Ages, there was no such explicit Proof of it to be found. But many Hints were brought from Law-Books, ancient Histories, and the Proceedings at Coronations, to support the Truth of it. The Debate being over, there appeared fifty three Voices for the Mutual Compact, against forty six who were for the Negative. And this Point being agreed on, the next Question, Whether King James had broken the said Original Contract, admitted of no great Dispute. So that the first Part of this Vote was concurred with.

After this the Lords took into Consideration the Word Abdicated, and concluded that the Word Deserted was more proper. They next examined the Word Vacant, and put this Question, Whether King James having broken that Original Contract between him and his People, and deserted the Government, the Throne was thereby vacant? And this Question was debated with greater Heat than any of the former; and it was at last carried, that the Throne was not vacant. But this Vote drew on a Protestation signed by forty Lords. The House of Peers then sent to the Commons to acquaint them, that they had considered of their Vote of the twenty eighth; and that instead of the Word Abdicated, they would have the Word Deserted put in; and next that they would have the Words, and that the Throne is thereby become vacant, omitted.

But these Amendments being considered by the Commons, that House would by no Means agree to them; and a Committee was appointed to draw up Reasons why they could not do so, which were offered to the Lords; who replied to the same in a Conference, but without any Success on either Side. At last the Commons sent to desire a free Conference with the Lords upon the Subject Matter of the last Conference; to which the Lords readily agreed. Accordingly the Commons appointed twenty four of their Members to be their Managers on this great Occasion; and the Lords appointed a Number according to the usual Proportion.

This produced the next Day the most memorable Debate and Conference that had been known for many Ages; which was carried on with all Coolness, Decency, and Attention. The Conference it self is too long to be here inserted, and too important to be abridged. But the Consequence of it was, that the Managers for the Lords having made their Report to the House, the Lords at last thought fit to agree with the Commons.

During these Debates, and the Variety of Management that attended them, the

The Lords Amendments to the Votes of the Commons.

To which the Commons disagree.

A free Conference.

By which the Lords are brought over.

The Prince's Behaviour.

Prince's

A.D. 1689. Prince's Behaviour was very mysterious. He continued mostly at St. James's, silent and reserved, without appearing in Publick; hearing all that was said to him, but seldom making any Answers; nor would he take Pains to bring one single Person over to his Party. He said he came upon Invitation to save the Kingdom, and now he had brought together a true and free Representative of the Nation. He therefore left it to them to do what they thought best for the Good of the Nation; and when Things were once settled, he would be well satisfied to return to Holland.

He opens himself.

After a Reservedness, that had for many Days continued so closely, that none could certainly tell what he expected, he sent for the Marquis of Hallifax, and the Earls of Shrewsbury and Danby, and some others, to explain himself to them. He told them that he had been silent all this while, because he would neither say nor do the least Thing that might seem to intrench on any Man's Freedom in deliberating and voting. That he found some were putting the Government into the Hands of a Regent; that he had nothing to say to it, if they thought it the best Way to settle their Affairs; only he thought it necessary to tell them that he knew the Consequences so well, that he himself would not be that Regent. He said, he found others were for putting the Princess singly on the Throne, and that he should reign by her Courtesie; to which he said, that no Man could esteem a Woman more than he did the Princess, but that he could not think of holding any Thing upon such Terms as the Life of a Wife; nor could he think it reasonable to have any Share in the Government, unless it was vested in his Person, and that for Term of Life. If they thought fit to settle it otherwise, he would not oppose them; but would return to Holland, and concern himself no more with their Affairs. He assured them, that whatever others might think, a Crown was not so lovely a Thing in his Eyes, but that he could live very well, and be very well satisfied without it. He concluded with saying, That though he could not resolve to accept of a Dignity, so as to hold it under the Life of another; yet he thought that the Issue of the Princess Anne ought to be preferred in the Succession, before any Issue he might have by any other Wife after the present Princess.

A strong Party for the Princess.

This was soon reported abroad, and helped to fix the Minds of many. But there were a great Number who had Doubts about the Right of the Princess; and there were many who favoured her before the Prince, out of Policy and Interest; apprehending that she, who by her Youth and Health was like to outlive the Prince, might revenge her self on those who had postponed her. But it had happened before the Revolution, that the Princess had opened her Mind in that Matter to Doctor Burnet; and declared her self ready and desirous to have the Prince preferred to her self; which being now carefully published, A.D. 1689. gave a great Satisfaction. Those who did not know that a religious and virtuous Mind is superior to all this World can give, took her to be a very weak Woman, who could so easily part with a Thing so precious in common Estimation as Power and Command; while others, of more elevated Sentiments, promised themselves a glorious and happy Rule under the Care of so sublime and exalted a Soul, as this Contempt of Worldly Honours seemed to manifest.

Which soon vanishes.

And now the Intentions of both their Highnesses being known, all Things went on easily; and the Lords resolved that the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declared King and Queen, for their Lives, and Life of the longer Liver of them; and that the sole and full Regal Power be in the Prince only, in the Name of them both. And that after their Decease, the Crown should belong to the Heirs of the Body of the Princess: and for Default of such Issue, to the Princess Anne of Denmark, and the Heirs of her Body; and for Default of such Issue, to the Person that should be named, and in such Manner as should be limited by Act of Parliament; and for Default of such Regulation and Limitation, on the lawful Heirs of the Prince of Orange. And these Resolutions were agreed to by the Commons.

The Prince and Princess declared King and Queen.

While this passed, a Committee of the House of Commons, with Mr. Sommers at their Head, were busie drawing up a solemn Declaration of Rights, containing the several Facts and Reasons of King James's Forfeiture of the Crown; asserting the undoubted Rights and Liberties of the Subjects, settling the Succession of the Crown, and appointing new Oaths. And this being finished, received the Concurrence of the Lords House.

During these Transactions in the Convention, the Princess was sent for by the Prince. But she was a long Time kept back by the Coldness of the Season, which froze up the Rivers, and by contrary Winds after the Thaw; so that she did not arrive at London till the Debates were just over. Her unexpected Stay caused the Enemies of the Prince to give it out, that she was kept there by Order, that she might not come over to claim her Right. And hence it came that the Parties were formed, some for the Prince, and some for the Princess, which her Presence would have easily dispelled.

The Princess sent for.

The Earl of Danby, during her Stay in Holland, had sent to her during those Cabals, to know her Mind in that Matter; telling her, that if she desired it, he did not doubt to make a Party for settling her alone on the Throne. But she returned him a sharp Answer; and sent a Copy of the same, with the Earl's Letter, to the Prince; which prevented any more Offices of the same kind. The Prince took this, without any apparent Resentment, or any Expostulation with the Earl of Danby about it; but continued to employ him in the greatest Trusts, and afterwards

A.D. 1689. terwards honoured him with the highest Titles.

She comes to England.

At length on the tenth of February, the Princess left Holland; and in two Days arrived at Gravesend; from whence she came to Greenwich, where she was met by the Prince and Princess of Denmark. There taking Barge, they came together to Whitehall, amidst the Shouts and Acclamations of joyful Multitudes. Before her Appearance, it had been given out, that she was not well pleased with the late Transactions; upon which the Prince advised her by Letter, to put on a Chearfulness at first, that none might be discouraged by her Looks, or made to apprehend she was uneasy at any Thing that had been done. This made her, at her Arrival at Whitehall, put on an Air of Gaiety, that was taken notice of, as not so decent when she was entering her Father's Palace, and going to mount his Throne. But when it was mentioned to her, by some who presumed so far, she made answer, that her outward Appearance was only the Disguise of a deep and real Concern; but that she was at that Time obeying Directions, and might easily over-act a Part that was not natural to her. Her Soul was indeed too great to be affected with those glittering Shews of Pomp and Power that captivate little Minds; and the very Night after her Arrival, as she was in Conversation with the Earl of Danby, who was giving her an Account of all that had passed, and of the Efforts that had been made in her Behalf, she said to him with a more than Roman Virtue: "Do you but take Care to secure the Protestant Religion, the Liberties of England, and the general Good of the Publick, and then make Me what you please, and as little as you please. I value neither Titles nor Honours, but to support these great Things. When you can make them sure without Me, send me away as soon as you will."

Her heroic Sentiments.

The Crown delivered in Form to the Prince and Princess.

Every Thing being now prepared, on the next Day, Feb. 13. the Establishment of the Kingdom was completed in Form. The Prince and Princess being placed on two large Seats, under a Canopy of State in the Banqueting-House, the two Houses of Convention came to attend them in a full Body. Being placed in Order, they caused the Clerk of the Crown to read with a loud Voice their great Instrument, intituled, The Declaration of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons assembled at Westminster, which was to be an everlasting Monument and Sanction of the Rights and Liberties of English Subjects.

The Declaration of Rights.

After having enumerated the several Grievances and Breaches into the Constitution above rehearsed at large, and recited the Causes of the Assembling the Convention, it goes on to declare and assert the following Rights and Liberties to be due to the People of England for ever. "1. That the pretended Power of suspending Laws, or the Execution of Laws, by Regal Authority, without Consent of Parliament, is Illegal. 2. That the pretended Power of dispensing with Laws, or the Execution of Laws by Regal Authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is Illegal. 3. That the Commissions for erecting the late Court of Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes, and all other Commissions and Courts of the like Nature, are Illegal and Pernicious. 4. The Levying of Money for, or to, the Use of the Crown, by Pretence of Prerogative, without Grant of Parliament, for longer Time, or in any other manner than the same is, or shall be granted, is Illegal. 5. That it is the Right of all Subjects to petition the King, and all Commitments and Prosecutions for such petitioning, are Illegal. 6. That the raising or keeping a Standing-Army within the Kingdom in Time of Peace, unless it be with Consent of Parliament, is against Law. 7. That the Subjects that are Protestants, may have Arms for their Defence, suitable to their Condition, and as allowed by Law. 8. That the Elections of Members of Parliament ought to be Free. 9. That the Freedom of Speech, and Debates or Proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any Court or Place out of Parliament. 10. That excessive Bail ought not to be required; nor excessive Fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual Punishments inflicted. 11. That Jurors ought to be duly Impannelled and Returned; and Jurors which pass upon Men in Tryals of High-Treason, ought to be Free-holders. 12. That all Grants and Promises of Fines and Forfeitures of particular Persons before Conviction, are Illegal and Void. 13. And that for the Redress of all Grievances, and for the amending, strengthening and preserving the Laws, Parliaments ought to be held frequently. And all and singular the Premises they do claim, demand and insist upon, as their undoubted Rights and Liberties: And no Declaration, Judgment, Doings or Proceedings, to the Prejudice of the People in any of the said Premises, ought to be hereafter in any wise brought into Consequence or Example."

Then the Declaration goes on: "Having therefore an entire Confidence that his said Highness, the Prince of Orange, will perfect the Deliverance so far advanced by him, and will still preserve them from the Violation of their Rights, which they have here asserted, and from all other Attempts upon their Religion, Laws and Liberties; the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons assembled at Westminster, do Resolve, that William and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange, be, and be declared King and Queen of England, France and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging, &c." After which follows the Settlement of the Succession, and the new Oaths.

After

A.D.1689. After the publick Reading of this Declaration of Rights, the Marquis of Hallifax, Speaker of the House of Lords, made a solemn Tender of the Crown to their Highnesses, in the Name of both Houses, the Representative of the whole Nation. Whereupon the Prince of Orange returned the following Answer: "My Lords and Gentlemen, This is certainly the greatest Proof of the Trust you have in us that can be given, which is the Thing that makes us value it the more: And we thankfully accept what you have offered. And as I had no other Intention in coming hither, than to preserve your Religion, Laws and Liberties; so you may be sure that I shall endeavour to support them; and shall be willing to concur in any Thing that shall be for the Good of the Kingdom, and to do all that is in my Power to advance the Welfare and Glory of the Nation."

The King and Queen proclaimed.

This Ceremony being concluded, a Proclamation was published presently after, at the usual Places, declaring the Prince and Princess of Orange King and Queen; which was received every where with the loudest Acclamations.

Of the Personage and Conditions of King
JAMES.

HIS Person was tall and well shaped; and his Mien and Appearance, though it wanted that Majesty which was in his Brother, was nevertheless such as became a King. His Parts and Abilities were neither abundant nor defective; and what he wanted in Quickness, he made up in Industry. He was a kind Father, a tender Husband, a generous Master, an excellent Oeconomist, and notwithstanding the many hard Things done by his Authority, of a gentle and merciful Temper. In his Youth he had obtained an high Character for a fearless and intrepid Courage; but towards the latter End of his Life, that Reputation forsook him. He was a great Libertine in his youthful Days; but when he was farther advanced in Years, he assumed a more grave and austere Demenor; though he did not quite give over his unlawful Diversions. And even while his Conscience prompted him to attempt the Conversion of his Kingdoms to Popery, he often made Visits to Mrs. Sedley, and made her Countess of Dorchester; though it seems very strange, that a Man who out of a Principle of Conscience could hazard a Crown to introduce his own Religion, should not be with-held by the same Principle from living in a known Course of Adultery. His Bigottry was his great Fault; which gave his Priests such an Influence over him (and he had the Misfortune to be attended by very wicked and very weak ones) that he was capable of any thing from their Persuasions; which led him to disclose his Designs so openly, and with so ill a Grace, as at once gave the Alarm, and ruined his Credit. In a Word, his Virtues were such as would have given him the Character of a good Prince, and made him a great one, had it been his Fortune to have had the Rule over Popish Subjects; and his Failings were such, as proved very happy to the Protestant Country that fell to his Lot. For had the Measures he took to introduce Popery been less precipitate, less unpopular, or less imprudent, he might probably with Time, Patience, and Management, have compassed his Ends; and the Ruin he brought upon himself had fallen upon the Nation.

MAYORS and SHERIFFS of LONDON in this King's Reign.

In 1685.

SIR James Smith, Mayor.
Sir William Goffin, Sir Benjamin Vandeput, Sheriffs.

In 1686.

Sir Robert Jefferies, Mayor.
Sir Benjamin Thorogood, Sir Thomas Kenfey, Sheriffs.

In 1687.

Sir John Peak, Mayor.
Sir Thomas Rawlinson, Sir Thomas Fowls, Sheriffs.

In 1688.

Sir John Shorter, Sir John Eyles, Mayors.
Sir Bazil Firebrass, Sir John Parsons, Sheriffs.

T H E
R E I G N
O F
King WILLIAM III.
A N D
Queen MARY II.

A.D.1689.

KING William and Queen Mary being seated on the Throne in the Forms abovementioned, the King's first Care was to chuse his Counsellors, and fill the great Offices of State. The Privy-Counsellors elected by him were, His Royal Highness Prince George of Denmark, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquesses of Winchester and Halifax, the Earls of Danby, Lindsey, Oxford, Shrewsbury, Bedford, Devonshire, Macclesfield, Nottingham, Bath and Dorset; the Viscounts Falconbridge, Mordaunt and Newport; the Lords Wharton, Delamere, Montague, Lumley and Churchill; Monsieur Bentinck, Mr. Henry Sidney, Mr. Edward Russel, Mr. Henry Powle, Mr. Richard Hambden, Sir Henry Capel, Hugh Boscawen, Esq; and Sir Robert Howard. The Earl of Danby was made President of the Council; the Marquis of Halifax, Lord Privy-Seal; the Earl of Devonshire, Steward of the Household; Mr. Bentinck, Groom of the Stole, and Lord Privy-Purse; Viscount Newport, Treasurer of the Household; Mr. Wharton, Comptroller of his Majesty's Household; Sir John Lowther Vice-Chamberlain; Monsieur Overkirk, Great Master of the Horse to the King; Mareschal de Schomberg, Great Master of the Ordnance; the Lord Montague, Master of the Great Wardrobe; Mr. Zuylenstein Master of the Robes; the Earl of Shrewsbury, Principal Secretary of State; the Bishop of London, Dean of the Chappel; the Lord Lovelace, Captain of the Gentlemen Pensioners; the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Oxford, the Lords Mordaunt, Lumley and Churchill, and Mr. Sidney, Gentlemen A.D.1689. of the King's Bed-Chamber; the Lord Wiltshire, Son to the Marquis of Winchester, Lord Chamberlain to the Queen; John Howe, Esq; Vice-Chamberlain; Mr. Villiers, Great Master of the Horse; and the Countess of Darby, Sister to the Duke of Ormond, first Lady of the Bed-Chamber, and Groom of the Stole to her Majesty.

Besides these, three important Places were to be disposed of, which by reason of the great Trust attending them, were not so soon filled; that of the Lord Chancellor, Lord High Admiral, and Lord Treasurer. The first of these was offered to the Earl of Nottingham, which he declined; and afterwards to the Marquis of Halifax, who also excused himself; whereupon the Seals were given to Sir John Maynard, Anthony Kecke, and William Rawlinson, Esq; in Commission; the two last being knighted. The Places of Lord High Admiral and Lord High Treasurer, were likewise given to Commissioners; the first to Admiral Herbert, the Earl of Carbery, Sir Michael Wharton, Sir Thomas Lee, Sir John Chicheley, Sir John Lowther, and Mr. Sacheverell; and the other to the Lord Mordaunt, the Lord Delamere, the Lord Godolphin, Mr. Hambden, and Sir Henry Capel. The Earl of Nottingham was at last prevailed on to be one of the Principal Secretaries of State. Dr. Burnet, who had been so instrumental in setting forward the Revolution, was raised to the Bishoprick of Salisbury, vacant by the Death of Dr. Seth Ward. The Archbishop of Canterbury refused to consecrate him himself; but gave a Commission to six Bishops to perform that

A.D. 1689. Office for him. Three Days after he was sworn and admitted Chancellor of the Order of the Garter.

Affairs of State.

The first Consideration of State that presented itself to the King, was the turning the Convention into a Parliament; to prevent the Delays in Publick Affairs consequent upon a new Election, and to continue the Members who were generally acceptable to him. This was opposed by some at the Council-Board, but carried by a Majority.

The King makes his first Speech.

To this End the King went in great State to the House of Lords, where he made a Speech, in which after the Complaisance usual on those Occasions, and after having touched on the Affairs abroad, and the State of Ireland, which required a speedy Care, he recommended to them in general Terms to consider on the most effectual Methods to prevent the Inconveniences that might arise from Delays in the Publick Affairs.

A Bill to turn the Convention into a Parliament.

This Speech was received with general Applause; and in pursuance of the latter Part thereof, and by Directions from the Privy-Council to some of that Body, the Peers brought in a Bill to remove and prevent all Questions and Disputes concerning the Sitting of the present Parliament. This Bill was read twice that Afternoon, and having pass'd that House, was sent down to the Commons for their Concurrence.

Debates thereon in the House of Commons.

The House of Commons upon receiving it resolved themselves into a Committee of the whole House, as is customary upon important Occasions. The Question put by Mr. Hambden the Chairman, was this, Whether a King elected and declared by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons assembled at Westminster, Jan. 22, 1688<sup>5</sup>. coming to, and consulting with the said Lords and Commons, did not make as compleat a Parliament and Legislative Power and Authority to all Intents and Purposes, as if the said King should cause new Summons to be given and new Elections to be made by Writs? This Question produced a long and warm Debate. One Part of the House was for adhering closely to the ancient Rules and Methods of our Constitution, and fearful of making the least Alteration in them.

Arguments against the Bill.

Sir Edward Seymour and Sir Thomas Clarges headed this Party, who insisted that the Convention not being called by the King's Writ, could not agreeably to the Laws of England be called or made a Parliament; it being a fundamental Maxim, that none can sit in either House who is not either summoned by the King, if a Peer, or, if a Commoner, elected by the Counties or Boroughs by Virtue of the King's Writ; which was confessedly not the Case of the present Assembly. The other Party agreed in general, that the ancient Forms ought to be observed, but they did not conceive them to be so absolutely unalterable, but that they might sometimes be made to bend to extraordinary Occasions. They argued, that by the Confession of all, a People losing their Prince either by his Death without any Heir, or his voluntary Desertion, were at Liberty to choose not only what other King, but what other Form of Government they should please. A.D. 1689.

Arguments for it.

That this being the Case at the Revolution, the Nation finding it self in that Condition, gave the Power of Administration of Publick Affairs to the Prince of Orange, who by Virtue of that Power caused the Convention to meet. So much they said for the Legality of the Power by which they were assembled. As to the Assembly itself, they said, it was as complete in all respects as it could be; the whole three Estates being present, with the King at their Head. That the Difference of the Summons, whether by Writ or Letter, by which they met, was but a mere Form. Besides they gave Instances of like Irregularities actually happening in other Parliaments, which are nevertheless reckoned good Parliaments, the Nature of Things not always admitting an exact Regularity of Proceeding. That though it might be said that the Calling another Parliament would remove all Difficulties, yet considering the State of Affairs in Ireland and abroad, for which the speediest Remedies would come late enough, it would be unnecessary and imprudent to lose so much Time about a Matter of Form only, since after so much Delay and Hindrance of Publick Affairs, they would be at last but where they were.

These Reasons carried the Question, and the Bill pass'd with some Amendments, to which the Lords agreed; and the whole received the Royal Assent Feb. 23. They did not however satisfy several Members, who before protested they would not submit to the Determinations of such a Parliament, nor sit in it. And some of them were as good as their Word, retiring into the Countrey for frivolous Reasons. This occasioned much Dilatoriness in the Proceedings of the House that Session, which gave King James great Advantages in Ireland.

The Bill passed.

Which occasions great Discontents.

This was the first Appearance of that Spirit of Opposition and Discontent in the House of Commons which haunted King William a great Part of his Life. It appeared a second Time a few Days after, upon a Question that was put, whether the Revenue was expired by the Vacancy of the Throne, or whether it was devolved on their Majesties? The first Part of the Question being carried in the Affirmative. And when a Committee was appointed to settle their Majesty's Revenue, there were some amongst them who were for settling it on them for three Years only.

A Bill was about this Time passed in the House of Lords, and sent down to the Commons, for the regulating the Trials of Peers; but the Party which opposed it in the House of Lords found means to make it be dropped by the Commons.

The King, finding less Respect from the House of Commons than from the House of Lords, resolved for the future to begin among the Peers such Acts as he desired to have passed; which a Court never wants proper Persons to set on foot in either House upon occasion.

Accord-

A.D. 1689. Accordingly the King having much at Heart the freeing the Dissenters from the Burdens laid on them by the Laws then in Force, a Bill was read by the Peers, February 28. for exempting them from the Penalties of certain Laws. Upon that Occasion the Earl of Nottingham moved that a Bill of Comprehension, and another of Toleration, should be presented to the House, by which all moderate Presbyterians might be reconciled to the Church of England, and admitted to Ecclesiastical Benefices. This Motion was universally applauded both by the Spiritual and Temporal Lords, inasmuch that the Earl of Nottingham received the Thanks of the House for making it; and in Pursuance thereof, a Bill was brought in March 11. following, for uniting their Majesties Protestant Subjects. But as all Things may be taken wrong as well as right, some of the Dissenters called this an Artifice to try how they stood affected to the Church of England.

Bill for Ease of the Dissenter.

Other Proceedings of
the Parliament.

On February 27. The House of Commons was acquainted by the King, with the certain News of the late King James's having sailed from Brest with a considerable Number of French Troops, in Order to land in Ireland; upon which the Commons unanimously voted, that they would stand by and assist the King with their Lives and Fortunes, in supporting his Alliances abroad, in reducing of Ireland, and in Defence of the Protestant Religion and Laws of the Kingdom. This Vote was also confirmed by the Peers.

That House enquired at this Time into the Earl of Essex's Death in 1683. spoken of before under that Year, but without making any satisfactory Discovery.

The King had about this Time secured three or four Persons upon Suspicion, but remembring that he was in a Countrey jealous of their Liberties to the last Degree, and in some Measure of himself, he thought it necessary to acquaint the Parliament with it. This Action, though necessary, being obnoxious to Misinterpretation, it was first made known to the House of Lords, who were found more generally respectful to his Majesty than the Commons. This Message was carried by the Lord Viscount Mordant, who having acquainted the House with what was done, let them know at the same Time, that his Majesty thought it might be convenient to secure more Persons at that Juncture. A Committee was immediately appointed to draw up an Address, in which they desired the King to continue his Care of the Publick, and consented that such Persons as were, or should be so committed, might be retained till the first Day of the next Term, if his Majesty should see Cause for it. The Commons made some Difficulty to concur with this Address, which seemed to allow the King a Power of dispensing with the Habeas Corpus Act; and therefore thought it more legal to bring in a Bill to empower his Majesty to apprehend and detain such Persons, as he should find just

A.D. 1689. Cause to suspect were conspiring against the Government. This Bill passed in few Days through both Houses, and afterwards passed into an Act by the Royal Assent.

The same Day the King sent another Message to the Parliament, which being of a more pleasing Nature, was delivered in the House of Commons. Mr. Wharton acquainted the House, that the King being sensible of the grievous Burthen incumbent upon his Subjects by the Duty upon Fire-Hearths, was pleased to agree either to any Regulation of it, or to the taking it wholly away. This Politick Present worked so strongly upon the English good Nature, that the Commons voted Addresses of Thanks to the King, with all the Expressions of Gratitude, Duty, and Fidelity imaginable. The King received also the Thanks of the City of London upon the same Account on March 12.

The King gives up the Duty of Chimney-Money.

On March 5. the two Houses concurred in an Address to the King, according to the Vote of February 27. abovementioned. This Address contained only general and warm Professions of Thankfulness to his Majesty, for the Deliverance he had brought to those Nations, and the strongest Assurances of standing by him with their Lives and Fortunes against all his Enemies.

The King, whose Talent it was to improve Opportunities, laid hold on the present Fit of good Humour in the Commons to dispose them to a more ample Supply; the Sum already granted, tho' amounting to 400000 l. being insufficient for his Occasions. He therefore prepared his Answer to their Address, in Concert with Mr. Powle, Speaker of the House of Commons; which he delivered to them upon the eighth of March, when the two Houses attended him with it. It was contrived with much Dexterity to hit the Humour of our Nation in general, and of the Parliament in particular.

In the first Place he thanked them, in the kindest Words, for their Address, assuring them of his Care in promoting a mutual Confidence, and in managing the Power he had been desired by them to accept. He then acquainted them with the State of Holland, the Expences that Republick had been at for this Nation, and the Danger they were in at that Time. He then touched upon the Condition of Ireland, and the Necessity of sending thither a speedy Assistance, and of equipping a strong Fleet. He concluded with engaging his solemn Word for the faithful Disposal of whatever they should give, and assuring them of his Readiness to expose his own Person for theirs and their Country's Sakes.

This Answer was expressed in such open and sincere, and yet warm and affectionate Terms, as gave a general Satisfaction; which was particularly shewn by an Address of thanks from the City of London to the House of Lords, on the twelfth of March.

The King had not only to deal with the ill Humours of his Parliament, but with the

A.D.1689. the Disaffection of Part of the English Army. The Royal Scotch Regiment of Horse that was quartered at Abington, almost totally deserted, marching towards Scotland; as did also above five hundred Soldiers of Dunbarton's Regiment, headed by five Captains, who took the same Way, with four Field-Pieces. The News being brought to the King, was by him sent to the Parliament; upon which both Houses addressed the King to issue forth his Proclamation, declaring them Rebels. This was done, and General Ginkle being sent after them, soon brought them to Submission. But instead of undergoing any ignominious Death, they were only sent over into Holland. This Accident occasioned an Act soon after for preventing Mutiny and Desertion.

Many refuse to take the Oaths.

March 2, 4, and 5. were spent by the Houses in taking the Oaths to the King and Queen. These were refused by few or none in the House of Commons, but in the Upper House not above ninety Temporal, and eight Spiritual Lords complied. Those eight Prelates were the Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of London, Lincoln, Bristol, Winchester, Rocheſter, Llandaff, and St. Aſaph, who were afterwards followed by the Bishops of Carlisle and St. David's. The Archbishop of Canterbury, with many others of the Clergy, being intangled with some Scruples occasioned by the Oaths they had taken to King James, and the Impressions remaining on them from the Doctrines of Indefeasible Right and Non-Resistance, (industriously propagated by designing Men, and too hastily embraced by those of a different Character) refused the Oaths, though with the Loss of their Preferments. Many others of the Temporal Lords also retired into the Countrey upon various Pretences, but really to avoid owning the present Government.

Farther Proceedings of the Parliament.

The King, who being bred under a Commonwealth, had very little Conception of those sacred and inviolable Privileges, which, in Countries governed by Monarchs, are supposed to attend the Crown, might easily believe that this Defection proceeded more from a personal Aversion to himself, than probably it did. This made him very uneasy; and so numerous Instances of Disaffection appearing among those of the Church of England, inclined him to favour the Dissenters. Therefore when he attended the Houses on March 16. he proposed to them, when they made a Law to settle the Oaths to be taken by Persons in Office, that they would leave Room for the Admission of all Protestants indiscriminately.

In Pursuance of this Proposal, A Bill was set on Foot in the House of Lords, by Influence from the Court, for abrogating the former Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, and appointing other Oaths in their Stead. After the second reading of this Bill, a select Committee was ordered to draw up two Clauses; the second of which was to take away the Necessity of receiving the Sacrament, to make a Man capable of holding an Office. But this last Clause could not be carried, being rejected by a great Majority.

This Attempt failing, the Court Party made another; which was to insert a Clause to prevent the receiving of the Sacrament any otherwise than in Obedience to the Holy Institution thereof. But this was also rejected, and the Bill without those Clauses was sent down to the Commons for their Concurrence.

A Bill for removing Papists from the Cities of London and Westminster, and ten Miles distance from the same, was now set on Foot. This occasioned a Conference between the two Houses; because this general Order obliged the Queen Dowager to send away her Roman Catholick Servants contrary to her Articles of Marriage; and this difficulty was not cleared to the Satisfaction of both Houses till after many Conferences and warm Debates. The King gave his Assent in Compliance to his Parliament; declaring for his own Part that he came over to deliver the Protestants, and not to persecute the Romanists.

On March 28. the Earl of Shrewsbury from the King proposed in the House of Lords to bring in a Bill of free and general Pardon with the Exceptions they should see fitting. He at the same Time desired leave to bring in a Bill for naturalizing the Prince of Denmark; whom the King intended to make a Duke of this Kingdom, that he might sit in that House.

These were both popular Acts; the first by its own Nature, and peculiar fitness at that Season; the second by the Part which the Princess Anne of Denmark, always the Favourite of the English Nation, received of the Honours done to her Husband. Thereupon the Lords ordered two of their Body to attend the King with their humble Thanks.

The Bill for uniting their Majesties Protestant Subjects came before the same House April 4. The Court Party struggled so hard for inserting a Clause about the Indifferency of the Posture at receiving the Sacrament, in order to make Way for some at least of the Dissenters to enter into Offices, that upon a Division the Votes were equal. But in that Case, according to the ancient Rules, it is always carried in the Negative. They failed also the next Day in a Clause in the same Bill, by which a Commission was to be given by the King to the Bishops, and others of the Clergy. It was proposed to add to them some of the Laity; but this also was carried in the Negative, the Votes being equal on both Sides as before. On the sixth of April the rest of the Bill was considered, which was afterwards sent down to the Commons for their Concurrence.

April 9. The King went to the House of Peers to give his Royal Assent to an Act for establishing the Coronation Oath. The Court procured in this Act the Choice to be left to the King, of the Archbishop of

Canter-

A.D. 1689. Canterbury, or Bishop of London, to administer the same; lest their Majesties should receive a publick Affront by the Refusal of the former, which was reasonably to be expected.

The Coronation of the King and Queen.

The Coronation of the King and Queen was performed two Days after with the Magnificence and Splendor usual on those Occasions; and the House of Commons waited upon their Majesties the next Day with a Congratulation in the usual Forms; and received an Answer from the King in his own Name and the Queen's, expressed with the customary Civility.

Proceedings of the Parliament.

Not long after, the Lovers of the Church in the House of Commons perceiving the King's favourable Disposition to the Dissenters, agreed upon an Address to prevent any ill Consequences arising from thence; which being approved by the Lords, was presented by both Houses together. In this Address, which was drawn with much Art, they in the most respectful Terms, and with the utmost Gratitude for what the King had done, let him see their profound Veneration for the Church of England, and the Opposition he would find in any Attempt to its Prejudice. They concluded with desiring him to call a Convocation; and to shew their Readiness to oblige the King, assured him that it was their Intention forthwith to proceed to the Consideration of giving Ease to Protestant Dissenters. The King did not return an Answer till the next Day, when it was delivered by the Earl of Nottingham to the House of Lords. It was expressed in a Style perfectly suited to that of the Address. It contained many Assurances of the King's particular Affection to the Church of England, and of his constant future Care of it; to the strengthening of which, the King hoped the Ease they proposed to give to Dissenters, would very much conduce, which he therefore earnestly recommended to them; and promised that as soon as might be, he would summon a Convocation.

On this Day there was a Conference between both Houses, chiefly about an Amendment made by the Lords in the Bill for abrogating the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy; by which Amendment the Clergy were excused from taking the Oaths. At last after many Meetings it was compromised by a Clause to be inserted, by which the King might allow to such of the Clergy not exceeding twelve in Number, who should refuse the Oaths, a part of their Ecclesiastical Revenues, not exceeding a third part of the same for their Subsistence, to continue during the Kings Pleasure and no longer. This Clause being inserted, the whole passed into an Act by the Royal Assent April 24.

Affairs of Scotland.

The Kingdom of Scotland is so much the same with that of England by Neighbourhood and common Interests, that they generally move the same Way, and follow each other's Fortune. Yet there being some difference still remaining between the two Kingdoms as to the Constitution, the Laws, the Temper of the People, and other accidental Circumstances, it comes to pass that though they arrive at last at the same Port, their Courses are sometimes different. It is therefore necessary to give some Account of what passed there at this Time of universal Unsettlement, and of the Circumstances that attended the new Establishment in that Kingdom.

The Scotch Convention met at Edinburgh March 14. and the first Thing they went upon was to chuse a President. The Marquess of Athol was proposed by King James's Friends; and the Duke of Hamilton by King William's. The last carried it by a Majority of forty Voices; a Prognostication which Way the Stream of this Assembly would move for the future. The first Thing of Importance they entered on, was to secure the Castle of Edinburgh, which was in the Hands of the Duke of Gourdon, a Papist. They summoned him to surrender it; but having trifled with them for some Days, he at last sent them an absolute Refusal; upon which they declared him a Traytor and a Rebel. Upon the sixteenth two Messengers came to them, one from King James, and another from King William, with a Letter from each. It was then debated, which should be first read, and it was carried by a Majority for that of King William; it being alledged, that possibly King James's Letter might order the Dissolution of the Assembly, which might make the Legality of it doubtful, King James being still the King in Name and Title.

King William's Letter was written in a Style of Civility and Kindness, suited to the present State of Affairs; giving them an Account of the Reasons for which they were called together by his Letters, and recommending to them to proceed in the Settlement of their Nation with Speed and Unanimity. He added also some Things, expressing his Desire of an Union of the two Kingdoms.

This Letter was read with great Applause; and a Committee named to draw up an Answer to it in the most thankful and dutiful Manner.

The Letter from King James was now to be opened; but before that was done, an Act passed declaring the Lawfulness of the Convention, notwithstanding any Thing that might be said in that Letter to the contrary. After this that Letter was read, which was penned in commanding and imperious Terms, intermixed with Threats; with very little of the Cajolling necessary on such Occasions. This Letter, not very agreeable in it self, was made yet more unpleasant by being countersigned by the Earl of Melfort, a Person odious to all the Presbyterians of Scotland, who made the greater Part of the Convention; so that it rather made the Assembly more forward than before, to follow the Way they were already in. The Messenger that brought it was at first secured; but that Action having an ill Appearance, upon cooler Thoughts they dismissed

The Scotch Convention meets.

The Duke of Gourdon refuses to surrender Edinburgh Castle.

A Letter from King James, and one from King William, read in the Convention.

The latter read first.

And well received.

The other unacceptable.

A. D. 1689. dismissed him, with a Pass instead of an Answer.

The Kingdom put in Posture of Defence.

Their next Care was to put the Kingdom in a Posture of Defence, to which Purpose they ordered a Proclamation to be published, requiring all Persons from sixteen to sixty to be in a Readiness to take Arms, and put the Militia all over the Kingdom in the Hands of proper Officers; raising at the same Time eight hundred Men to guard the City of Edinburgh. On March 19. they passed an Act, approving the Address of the Scotch Nobility and Gentry in London; wherein having acknowledged the Benefits done to their Nations by the Prince of Orange, they desired him to accept the Administration of the Government of that Kingdom. The same Day upon the reading of some Letters from several Lords and Gentlemen in Ireland, craving Assistance of the Convention, they ordered two thousand Muskets, and twenty Barrels of Powder to be immediately sent them; that a farther Provision of Arms and Ammunition should be bought up for them in Holland; and that two small Frigates should cruise between Scotland and Ireland, for mutual Intelligence between both Kingdoms.

The Convention sends Assistance into Ireland.

The Lord Dundee raises Troubles.

While these Things were doing, the Lord Viscount Dundee held a private Conference with the Duke of Gourdon at the Postern Gate of Edinburgh Castle, at which they concerted Measures to disturb the publick Tranquillity. The Convention ordered Dundee to appear before them, but he retired with thirty or forty Horse to Linlithgow. Upon this a Party of Horse was sent after him; and the Convention apprehending he might surprize Sterling Castle, dispatched immediately away the Earl of Mar, its Governor, to secure that important Fortrefs.

An Answer sent to King William's Letter.

On the 23<sup>d</sup> of March the Convention sent an Answer to King William's Letter, full of Thankfulness, Duty, and Loyalty, promising to observe, and take proper Notice of, those Things there recommended. This Answer was sent to his Majesty that Afternoon.

The Military, as well as the Civil, Power being necessary to compose and quiet an unsettled Nation, King William had sent four Regiments of Foot, and one of Dragoons, under Major General Mackay, into Scotland, to enforce the Orders and Resolutions of the Convention there. Upon their Arrival, they were ordered to be quartered in Leith, and the Suburbs of Edinburgh. And on the 26th a Committee was appointed for settling the Government, which was of eight Lords, eight Knights, and eight Burgeses, the Bishops being left out; and soon after by the Declaration of Rights, that whole Order was abolished in Scotland.

The Order of Bishops suppressed in Scotland.

The total Destruction of this venerable Order is so remarkable an Incident, and the Ease with which an established Hierarchy was changed, without any Disturbance arising from thence, is so surprizing, that it well deserves that we should stand still a little to consider what might be the Causes A. D. 1689. of so wonderful an Event. Besides others, which those who are better acquainted with the Countrey and Times might assign, the following may be reasonably supposed to have had an Influence. First, the very ill Conduct of the Bishops themselves, who either out of servile Complaisance to the Court, or misled by those high Notions of Loyalty and Duty to the Prince which were fashionable in those Days, had done many Things altogether contrary to the Privileges and Rights of a free Nation; had upon the News of King William's Landing, declared their Abhorrence of it, and called it a detestable Invasion; and since the Departure of King James, shewed themselves remarkably partial to him. Another Thing was, that when Episcopacy was first settled after the Restoration, many Acts of illegal and arbitrary Violence were used to confirm and support it against the popular Stream, which ran fiercely in Opposition to it. These Things had given Uneasiness even to those Patriots who were Friends to Episcopacy; and made such as were otherwise indifferent enough on both Sides, prejudiced against it. And besides, the Clergy themselves were much wanting in those Qualifications that adorn and give a Lustre to their sacred Function. Had their Piety, and Learning and Zeal been as universally shining as that of their Brethren of England, it could not certainly have been easie to have overthrown their whole Hierarchy, with so little Opposition, as was made at this Time.

The Throne declared vacant.

The Convention then went on to declare the Throne vacant. In this Declaration they were obliged to proceed upon different Grounds from that in England, who alledged the withdrawing of King James as a Reason why the Throne was vacant. But this Reason could not take Place in Scotland; and therefore they grounded their Declaration on the Invasions made upon the Constitution; by which they said he had forfeited the Crown, and made the Throne become vacant. This being agreed to, they proceeded to an Act for settling the Crown on King William and Queen Mary; with a Declaration of Rights added to it. This Act enumerates the Grievances of King James's Reign, and on that Account declares the Throne vacant. It then proceeds to the Declaration of Rights, after which it declares William and Mary, King and Queen of England, to be King and Queen of Scotland.

The Scotch Declaration of Rights.

The Grievances and Rights there enumerated, are so like to those in the English Declaration to the same purpose, that it is needless to insert it at length: The Article that declares against Episcopacy being the only material Difference.

The same Day their Majesties were crowned King and Queen of England, they were in Consequence of this Act proclaimed King and Queen of Scotland; and two Days after a Proclamation was published, forbidding all Persons to own, or correspond with the late King James. This was partly occasioned

The King and Queen proclaimed in Scotland.

A.D. 1689. ed by some Letters from the Earl of Melfort, King James's Minister, that were intercepted; in which he so openly declared his Master's Intentions to take a severe Revenge upon those who had opposed him, as gave very just Alarms.

The Scotch Coronation-Oath taken by the King and Queen.

The Convention then sent three Commissioners, the Earl of Argyle, Sir James Montgomery, and Sir John Dalrymple, to London, to tender the Coronation Oath to the King and Queen; which was done with great Solemnity at the Banqueting-House at Whitehall. 'Tis observable that in that Oath there is a Clause that the King shall be careful to root out Hereticks; but when the King came to it, he declared that he did not mean by those Words, that he was under any Obligation to become a Persecutor; to which the Commissioners made answer; that neither the Meaning of the Oath nor the Law of Scotland did import it. Whereupon the King replied, that he took the Oath in that Sense; and called the Commissioners and others present to witness it.

Dundee raises Forces.

The whole Island of Great-Britain now submitted to the Rule of King William and Queen Mary, except the Castle of Edinburgh, and a Party in the Highlands headed by the Lord Dundee. The Lord Dundee, after having been worsted in a slight Encounter, was at first almost deserted by his Party. But a Recruit of three hundred Irish being sent over to him, he found means to raise the Highland Clans, and assemble a Body of six thousand Foot and one hundred Horse. General Mackay marched towards him with a Body of four thousand Foot, and four Troops of Horse and Dragoons; whom the other as boldly advanced to meet. The two Armies engaged May 26. on the Blair of Atbol, and a valiant Encounter passed between them; in which Mackay had the worst, and was forced to retire towards Stirling. But the Progress of the other Side was stopt by the Death of the Lord Dundee, who was slain in the Fight; and was the Life and Soul of all his Party. He was a truly virtuous and brave Man; faithful to his Master upon Principles of Conscience and Honour; had great Credit with the Episcopal Party; and was a skilful and valiant Soldier. So that had he survived his Victory, he had probably caused a terrible Convulsion throughout Scotland. But Heaven was too kind to so worthy a Man, to permit him to be a Scourge to his native Country; and therefore took him away to prevent the ill Consequences of his mistaken Fidelity. His Party afterwards could make no stand against the King's Troops, but were worsted in every Encounter; so that they soon dwindled away, and the Chiefs came in and submitted themselves, one after another.

The Castle of Edinburgh surrenders.

The Castle of Edinburgh had been besieged a long Time with great Vigour, and so great a Progress was made in the Attack, that at last the Duke of Gordon was obliged to surrender at Discretion; and on the thirteenth of June delivered up that important Fortress; which caused an entire Tranquillity throughout England and Scotland.

But in Ireland Things had a terrible Look. The Earl of Tyrconnel had secured the most important Places in that Kingdom, had disarmed and pillaged most of the Protestants in the Provinces of Munster, Leinster and Connaught, and imprisoned the chief of them. Only in the Province of Ulster the Protestants were bold and strong enough to declare for King William and Queen Mary, and seize on the Towns of Coleraine, Kilmore, Inniskilling and Londonderry.

King James having in vain applied himself for Assistance to the Emperor, accepted that offered by the French King. And being informed by the Earl of Tyrconnel, that the Kingdom of Ireland was almost all in his Power, he resolved to make his first Effort there. So he set Sail from Brest with fifteen hundred Men, and safely landed March 12. at Kinsale, from whence he went to Dublin. He then issued out a Proclamation for a Parliament of Ireland to meet there on the 7th of May.

Thus the British Dominions were divided between the Father and the Son-in-law, and the Sovereignty of them came to be decided by the Sword. King William informed of this State of Things, had sent some Arms and Ammunition to Londonderry; and named Colonel Lundee Governor. In the mean Time King James, with the Army Tyrconnel had prepared for him, took Kilmore and Coleraine, two of the Towns the Protestants had seized. Colonel Lundee at Londonderry upon Information of this called a Council of War, at which Colonel Cunningham and Colonel Richards, who were just arrived from England with their Regiments, assisted. This Council agreed that the Place was not tenable; as being ill fortified, and wanting Provisions; and therefore an Instrument was prepared by them to surrender the Town to King James, upon Promise of Pardon and Restitution of their plundered Goods. But when this was prepared and brought to be subscribed by the City-Council, it caused a great Uproar. Some not only refused to subscribe, but threatened to hang the Governor and Council for offering a Surrender. While these ill Humours were working, King James with his Army came before the Walls of the Town; but met with so warm a Reception that he retired. The Nearness of the Danger so wrought upon the People, that as soon as they heard what was done in the Council of War, they flew into such a violent Rage against those who assisted in it, that they were obliged to make their Escape out of the Town, and get away as well as they could, one after another.

The People being now become Masters, agreed to hold out to the utmost Extremity; and there being two Gentlemen who were more especially concerned in encouraging them in this Resolution, Major Baker, and Mr. George Walker a Clergyman, they chose those two the Governors. They put the Men of the Town into Regiments, and

A.D. 1689.

The State of Ireland.

King James lands there.

The Resolution of the Inhabitants of Londonderry.

A.D. 1689. and found their Number about seven thousand.

The Roman History does not afford a more noble Example of undaunted Courage, than this Resolution of the Inhabitants of Londonderry. Their Town, as was said above, was ill fortified; their Provisions were scanty, and there was no Prospect of getting more when those were consumed; the Enemy being Master of all the rest of the Country, and confining them within their own Walls. The only hope they had was of Supplies from England; which considering the Distance and Hazards of the Seas, must be of Course both slow and uncertain. In this desperate Condition they were to provoke an Army of twenty thousand Men continually increasing, who if the Town was reduced after an obstinate Defence, were like to take a cruel Revenge for the Lives and Time lost in the Siege. Yet under all these Discouragements, Zeal for Religion and Liberty, joined with a Scorn and Fear of becoming subject to those they hated, so worked up their natural Bravery, that they chose all these Dangers and Difficulties rather than to yield. They sent a Messenger to England to give an Account of their Resolution, and to desire speedy Assistance.

King James besieges it.

On the 20th of April King James invested the Place, and began to batter it the next Day. Afterwards several Attacks were made by the Besiegers, and as many Sallies by the Besieged; in which the latter always had the Advantage.

The Besiegers finding what desperate Men they had to do with, changed their Measures; and proposed to reduce them by Famine, an Enemy that no Courage can repulse. They shut the Town up on all Sides; and to prevent Supplies coming by Sea from England, took care to guard the Passage up the River. This done, they lay still for a considerable Time, leaving the Besieged to encounter with the Enemies that were already within their Walls.

The severe Famine in the Town.

It was not long before the small Quantity of wholesome Provisions they had there, in spite of all their good Husbandry, were consumed by so many Mouths as were amongst them; so that Famine began to shew its meagre and frightful Aspect, and grew every Day more and more severe within the Town; which added to its dismal and sure Attendant, Sickness, made it a Scene of all the Hardships Men can undergo. Their Stores of wholesome Food being gone, it was left to their Choice whether they would surrender, or prolong their Defence by subsisting on such miserable Sustenance as Humane Nature rejects and abhors. And they resolutely chose the latter, though they had even yet no Assurance of any Help or Supplies coming to them; they being so closely shut up that not only Provision, but Intelligence from abroad, was kept from them. Dogs, Cats, Rats, Mice, Hides, Tallow, were not thought too bad to be eaten for want of better Nourishment; and Horse-Flesh was looked on as a Dainty. This unnatural Diet, loathed and refused by the Stomach, produced Fluxes and other Distempers among them, and brought them so low that they were reduced to Skeletons; and many Persons of the more tender Constitutions sunk under the Hardship, and died. Yet they bore all with an amazing Constancy; and had Spirit enough left to repulse the Besiegers with great Slaughter in an Attack they made upon them while they were struggling with all this Misery.

The Messenger they sent to England had so good Success that a Fleet with Supplies of all kinds was sent to them with all possible Speed. But this Assistance took up so much Time in the Preparation and in the Voyage, that it was near two Months after the beginning of the Siege, before those in the Town had any Prospect of it.

A Fleet sent from England to their Relief.

At last on the fifteenth of June, they saw at a great Distance three Ships firing at Kilmore Castle, and attempting to come up the River, but prevented by the Enemies Shot; and not long after they discovered a Fleet of thirty Sail. This revived and cheered them; for they were persuaded that it was come from England to their Relief. But their Courage and Patience had still many Tryals to undergo before this Relief was to prove effectual. For the Enemy had taken

Which is kept from them by the Enemy.

Care to provide against its coming, by raising Batteries of Great Guns in proper Places, lining the Banks of the River with Musqueteers on both Sides, and fixing in the narrow Part thereof, to stop the Ships from getting by, an artificial Bar, or Boom, composed of strong Timbers, fastened together by Iron Chains, and strengthened by a Cable twelve Inches thick, twisted round it. So that it was impossible for the Ships to get up the River, without Danger of being beat to Pieces by the Cannon, or of sticking in the Boom at last, if they were able to stand the Fire of the Batteries. And Major General Kirk, who was Commander, had not Men enough to dislodge the Enemy by open Force. So that it was still a Matter of the utmost Difficulty, not only to bring the Supplies to the Besieged, but even to keep an Intelligence with them; all the Passages being guarded by the Enemy, and all Persons strictly examined.

But that Industry and Dexterity which Military Men acquire above others, by the necessary and continual Use they have for it, found a Means at last to overcome this Difficulty. A Messenger made a Shift to get through the Enemy to the River Side over against the Town, and swimming over, gave the Besieged an Account that the Fleet they saw was come to their Assistance, and would use their utmost Endeavours to get to them. Another Messenger from the Fleet happened to fall into the Enemies Hands; who instructed him in a different Story, and then sent to the Besieged, to tell them that they were mistaken if they thought the Fleet they saw was come to their Relief; that England was all in Confusion, and could not help them; and that they might be satisfied of this

The Besieged get Intelligence from the Fleet.

A.D. 1689. this from a Messenger that had been taken who was sent to the Garrison with this Account. But this Stratagem failed; the Garrison being better informed than they thought they were.

Which cannot get to them.

Soon after they received fresh Intelligence from Major General Kirk, who assured them that England and Scotland were perfectly quiet, and that Troops were ready to march to their Assistance both in England and Ireland; that he had Stores and Victuals for them, but that he dared not venture to bring them up the River; that he would try to do what he could by Land, but that if he found that impracticable, he would come to their Relief, when they could hold out no longer, though at the Hazard of himself, his Men, and Ships. In the mean Time he desired them to defend themselves as long as they could, and husband well what Subsistence they had.

The Distress they were reduced to.

These Advices and Promises raised their Spirits a little, but the Famine raged amongst them with a Fury that increased every Day; and it was a melancholy Thing to see their Friends so near, and yet unable to get at them. They made many bold Attempts to reach the Ships in the River, which were still frustrated by the Enemies Shot. About this Time Major Baker was taken very ill, and his Life being thought in Danger, Colonel Michelburn was chosen into his Place; the Major dying soon after, without seeing the Deliverance of the Place he had so nobly defended. During this, Conrad de Rose, the French General, came into the Camp of the Besiegers. He went to view the Fortifications of the Town, and finding how little the Siege was advanced in all this Time, flew into a most outrageous Fury, and swore he would level the Place with the Ground, and bury those that defended it in its Ruines, putting all to the Sword within it, without Distinction of Age or Sex; and studying the most horrible Torments to punish those that encouraged the others to hold out. After this he changed his Talk, and sent them fair Promises of good Usage if they would surrender, pretending to admire their Bravery in holding out so long. But he found he had to do with resolute Men, who were neither to be frightened with bad Words, nor deceived with good ones. They scorned alike both his Threats and his Promises, and the Governor ordered that no Mention should be made of a Surrender upon Pain of Death; only Lieutenant-General Hamilton, who was Commander in the Irish Camp, having sent them plausible Offers, they hearkened to them so far as to procure three Days Truce, wherein to search for Provisions, they being reduced to the utmost Distress for want of Food. But after they had obtained this Respite, they rejected Hamilton's Proposals with Scorn and Disdain.

A barbarous Order of the French General.

Their inflexible Resolution so enraged the French General, that he sent them an Order, importing, that if they did not surrender by the first of July, he would bring all the Protestants in the Countrey round about, A.D. 1689. and drive them under the Walls of Derry, where they should lie and starve. That if any Troops came from England to their Relief, he would ruine and lay waste the whole Countrey; but if they would surrender, he would use them well, and protect them from all Injuries. But the Besieged received this Letter with the like Contempt and Indignation as they had done Hamilton's Proposals.

King James was too wise and too good-natured to approve of these tyrannical Methods, and countermanded this Order, and spoke of it with great Resentment. But he was not the Master, though in his own Countrey; so that seven thousand Protestants of all Conditions, were fetched to the Camp from the neighbouring Countries, and driven by the Soldiers under the Walls of Londonderry, there to perish with Hunger; being denied all Sustenance from the Camp, and the Garrison being unable either to relieve or take them in. But the Garrison immediately set up a Gallows in View of the Besiegers, threatening to hang all the Prisoners they had taken during the Siege, by Way of Reprials, if the Besiegers treated the Protestants in that inhuman Manner. This made the Friends of the Prisoners intercede with Hamilton, for the revoking that barbarous Order; and they with Difficulty prevailed. So that the poor Protestants were at last suffered to go back to their Habitations, after having stayed so long under the Walls of the Town without Food, that they were half starved. The Garrison found Means to crowd amongst them five hundred of their useless Mouths, and to get in Exchange some able and strong Men out of their Numbers.

Seven Thousand Protestants driven under the Walls of Londonderry.

Upon which the Garrison threatens to hang their Prisoners.

By which the Protestants are released.

But by this Time the very vilest Eatables were become so scarce, that there was no longer Hope of prolonging their Lives even in that miserable Way. Doctor Walker the Governor, who still remained undaunted, was apprehensive their long Sufferings might sink the Spirits of others; and to encourage them, preached a Sermon in the Cathedral, in which he exhorted the Besieged to trust in God, reminding them of many Instances of his Providence since the Beginning of the Siege; and concluding that they would certainly find a speedy Deliverance.

Doctor Walker the Governor preaches to the Garrison.

His Discourse seemed inspired with a prophetic Spirit; for in an Hour after this Sermon was over, they saw three Ships sailing towards them up the River, which came from General Kirk; who hearing of the Extremity the Garrison was reduced to, resolved to relieve them at all Adventures. The Enemy made a furious Fire upon the Ships from every Part, which they bravely received and returned. The foremost Ship went twice with full Sails against the Boom, without making any Impression on it. At last, with a third Effort, the Boom gave way; but at the same Time the Ship was driven back so far, and with so fierce a Shock, that she ran a-ground. The Enemy

The Town at last relieved.

A.D.1689. my upon this set up a joyful Shout, fired all their Guns upon her, and sent out their Boats to board her. The Miseries the Besieged had suffered throughout the Siege, were not equal to the Pain they felt in that short Moment, when they saw their last Hopes, as they thought, fail them. But it did not last long; for the Ship, firing a Broadside at the Enemy that came to attack her, the Shock so loosened her Bottom from the Ground she struck into, that she got clear, and passed the Boom. The other Ships followed her; and through all the Enemies Fire, got safely up to the Town. They found the Garrison at the very Brink of perishing; nine lean Horses, and a Pint of Meal for each Man being all that was left for the Sustenance of above five Thousand Men. The Besiegers broke up their Encampment the very Night after in great Confusion, making a miserable Havock in their Retreat. Mr. Walker the Governor, went to England with an Address of Thanks from the Garrison and Inhabitants to their Majesties, and received from them those Honours and Rewards which were due to his great Services.

The Actions
of the Inniskilliners.

The Men of Inniskillin behaved themselves with no less Valour than those of Londonderry, and while the Irish were employed in the Siege of the latter, made several brave Excursions with an extraordinary Success. The most remarkable Action of theirs was performed on the same Day that Londonderry was relieved, in which two Thousand Inniskilliners fought and routed six Thousand Irish, and took their Commander Mackarty, with the Loss only of twenty Men.

King James meets his Irish Parliament.

Soon after King James had begun the Siege of Londonderry, he left the Camp to meet his Irish Parliament at Dublin. It is easie to conceive of what Temper such a Parliament must be, when the Protestants were all disarmed, and every Moment in Fear of their Lives, and the Papists possessed both of the Civil and Military Power. The King in his Speech thanked them for their signal Loyalty, at a Time when his other Subjects had abandoned him. He alledged, that his earnest Desire of settling Liberty of Conscience, was the Thing that made his Enemies set themselves against him; and concluded with Assurances of doing his Part to make their Nation rich and happy. Soon after he published a Declaration to all his Subjects, full of general Strains of Mercy and Lenity.

Their cruel Act of Attainer.

But the Proceedings of his Parliament were very unsuitable to this Declaration. For soon after their Meeting, they passed an Act of Attainder, that exceeded in Cruelty the bloody Proscription of the last Triumvirate at Rome. There were attainted in this black Act, two Archbishops, one Duke, seventeen Earls, seven Countesses, twenty six Viscounts, two Viscountesses, seven Bishops, eighteen Barons, thirty three Barons, fifty one Knights, eighty three Clergymen, and two Thousand one hundred eighty two Esquires and Gentlemen. All of whom, unheard, were declared Traytors, A.D.1689. and adjudged to suffer the Pains of Death and Forfeiture. So that in this little Kingdom was attainted more than double the Number of those who were proscribed through the vast Extent of the Roman Empire. When the Speaker presented this Bill for the Royal Assent, he told the King, That amongst these many were attainted upon such Evidence as satisfied the House, and the rest upon common Fame. And that the condemned Persons might be hindered from escaping by Flight, the Act was concealed, and no Protestant allowed a Copy of it till four Months were past. After this Assembly had made some other Acts, among which one was for Liberty of Conscience, they were prorogued.

After this all Terms were broke with the Protestants, and an Order was published by Latterell, the Governor of Dublin, forbidding Protestants above the Number of five, to meet together in any Place, under Pain of Death, or Punishment by a Court Martial; and when he was asked whether the Proclamation was designed to hinder their Meeting in Churches, he answered, that it was; and so the Protestant Churches were all shut up throughout the Kingdom. The Churches shut in Ireland.

In England King William declared War against France, the restraining of whose Power was his favourite Design. He was long solicited to this by the Ministers of Spain and Holland, but declined engaging, till he found himself farther encouraged by an Address from the House of Commons; in which they laid before him the Dangers from France, and promised to assist him, if he would declare War against that Crown. King William declares War against France.

Some Days before this Proclamation, a Sea-Fight happened between the English and French Fleet in Bantry Bay, on the Coast of Ireland. Admiral Herbert being informed that a French Fleet was set out from Brest with Supplies from France for King James, stood over to King'sale to meet them; and got Sight of them making into Bantry-Bay. The next Day a Fight began between the two Fleets, which passed without any remarkable Advantage on either Side. This Fight made the War necessary, which was before agreed on. A Sea-Fight in Bantry Bay.

The House of Commons had granted the King a Poll-Bill, and they now added to it a Bill to lay one Shilling in the Pound on Land, which was the first Time a Tax was laid on Land. The first Land-Tax.

An Examination began at this Time to be made into the judicial Proceedings in the latter Part of King Charles the Second's Reign, and in the Reign of the late King; in which some remarkable Strains of Law had been used, as is taken Notice of above in the History of those Times. These Proceedings the House of Lords now thought proper to animadvert upon, and to stigmatize with that Infamy they deserved. Bills were brought into that House to reverse and annul Several Attainders reversed.

A.D. 1689. annul the Attainders of the Lord Ruffel, Colonel Sidney, and the Lady Lisle; and they passed, both thro' that House and the House of Commons, with great Unanimity. The famous Dr. Oates thought this a proper Opportunity to bring himself into Consideration. He laid his Case before the House of Lords, setting forth the Judgments that had been given against him, which he prayed might be reversed, in regard that he had been convicted chiefly upon the Oaths of the St. Omers Witnesses, who were all, except one, Papists; and that the Lord Chief Justice Jefferies had, by brow-beating the Witnesses, intimidated several Persons from being his Council.

Oates applies for Relief.

But his Case was not received at all favourably by the Lords. It was adjudged that it contained Matter tending to the Breach of the Privilege of the House, because it was equally directed to the Lords and Commons: So he was ordered to be committed to the King's-Bench. And three Days after the House agreed not to reverse the Judgments against him.

His Attainder reversed by the Lords.

But a Protestation made by some of the Lords had that Weight with the House, that they suffered Council to plead at their Bar for Oates, upon which they ordered and adjudged the Judgments against him to be reversed. The chief Arguments which swayed the House were, 1. That such cruel and unusual Punishments being contrary to the Declaration of Rights, a Confirmation of those Judgments by the House, appeared like an Infringement of that Declaration. 2. That the divesting Oates of his Canonical Habit was not in the Power of the temporal Courts. 3. That by the Opinions of all the ablest Lawyers, those Judgments were contrary to Law, and ancient Practice.

But his Disability continued.

But though these Motives induced the House to consent to reverse the Judgment, when a Bill was brought up to that Purpose from the House of Commons; they still retained so ill an Opinion of him that they inserted a Proviso, that he should be incapable of being a Witness till the Matters for which he was sentenced were determined in Parliament. This produced a Difference between the two Houses, the Commons thinking it unreasonable to continue a Disability imposed by a reversed Judgment; and the Lords willing to impose some Punishment on him for his Perjuries, which they thought him guilty of. The two Houses insisted so stiffly on their several Opinions, they were near falling into dangerous Heats; when a sudden Adjournment put a Stop to them. However the Commons obtained an Address from the Lords to the King, that he would be pleased to pardon him. The King complied with this, and when he was discharged by Order from the Lords; the King received him into Protection, and allowed him a considerable Pension; which occasioned various Reflections.

Which occasions a Difference between the Houses.

A Bill to confirm the Declaration of Rights, and to settle the Succession.

About this Time the Commons sent up a Bill to the Lords for declaring the Subjects Rights and Liberties, and settling the Succession of the Crown. Upon this Occasion A.D. 1689. the Lords added a Proviso in Favour of the Princess Sophia, Duchess of Hanover. But the Commons disagreed to this; and several Conferences passed between the two Houses without Effect. But the Dispute was compromised by the Birth of the Duke of Glocester, Son of the Prince and Princess of Denmark, which put an End to those Differences by the Prospect of a Successor of our own Country.

The Duke of Glocester born.

The Affairs of the Parliament after this were little remarkable. A Bill for laying Duties on Coffee, Tea, &c. being carried up to the Lords, that House added a Clause thereto. This was at first resented by the Commons; but upon the Reasons given by the Lords they acquiesced. A Bill was passed also for repaying to the States-General, the Sums expended upon the King's Expedition into England. These Things being done, the King assented to the Bills presented to him Aug. 28. and by two Adjournments put off their Meeting again till October 19. It was during this Session that the famous Act of Toleration was passed.

But the most important Transactions of Affairs of this Time were carried on in the Field. Ireland. King James being possessed of Ireland, and assisted by the French, England was obliged both for its Honour and Safety to take that Kingdom out of his Hands by Force of Arms. This proved a Business of Time, Expence and Difficulty; partly from the Nature of the Undertaking, and partly from the Mismanagements used at first in the carrying it on. So that Ireland remained a Thorn in our Sides for no less than two Years. And it was not without Reason wondered at that it was mastered even in that Time.

The long Peace of the two late Reigns, Duke Schomberg sent General for King William. had through Disuse so enervated the naturally warlike Temper of the English, that there was scarcely one of our Countrymen to be found that was fit to command a Land Army in chief. So that Duke Schomberg was sent over to Ireland as General; a Post his Merit would have entitled him to, even without that Consideration. He embarked on the twelfth of August, and in a Day's Time passed over and landed in the Bay of Carrickfergus, with a Force of about ten thousand Men. He attacked the Town of Carrickfergus on the twenty second, and in four Days brought the Besieged to capitulate.

But this was the only Action of Moment he was able to perform. For the Campaign His ill Success at first. beginning so late, met with the rainy Weather that in our Parts often introduces Winter. And the Enemy being Masters of the Country all about, his Army subsisted only on the scanty and uncertain Supplies they received from England. The bad Weather and Provisions, joined with painful Marches, and the other Fatigues of War, introduced Sickness and Distempers among the raw Soldiers; which weakened them to that Degree that the General dared not oppose undisciplined Men in their feeble Condition against the Enemy's Troops, who were so much their Superiors in all respects, but Courage.

A.D.1689. All that could be done he effected; which was to keep the Ground he had got, till a milder Season came on. But during the Campaign, and in their Winter Quarters, the Army continued so sickly, that near two Thirds of the Force brought over from England, was entirely lost before the Return of Spring.

The Fleet
inactive.

The same Misfortunes that attended our Countrymen in Ireland, befell those who were aboard the Fleet; most of the English Seamen being disabled by Sickness. The Summer pass'd at Sea without any considerable Incident; the Confederate English and Dutch Fleets only floating about the Channel without finding any Opportunity of performing the least Service.

An Action in Flanders.

In Flanders an Action happened by an Attack made by the French upon the Town of Walcourt; from whence they were bravely repulsed by the English and Dutch, with the Loss of two thousand Men killed and wounded. In this Action Prince Waldeck commanded in chief, and the Earl (since Duke) of Marlborough was one of the Lieutenant Generals. This was the only memorable Event on that Side; and had no Consequences. On the Side of Germany the Elector of Brandenburg and the Duke of Lorraine had good Success; and took from the French the strong Places of Keyserfwart, Bonne and Mentz.

The Parlia-
ment meets.

By that Time the Campaigns were ended every where the Parliament met. The King made a Speech to them drawn up by himself; which was received with great Applause by both Houses. It tended chiefly to assure them of his Affection, and his Desire to promote his Subjects Happiness; with a Motion for Supplies. But the Dispute about Oates abovementioned, having caused Animosities between the Houses, it was thought fit to stifle all Remembrance of it by a Prorogation; the Parliament being before continued only by Adjournment. Accordingly two Days after, the King, by Advice of the Members of both Houses, came and prorogued them for two Days. This put an End to those Disputes; it being the Custom of Parliament, that a Prorogation puts a final End to all Business of what kind soever that is in Agitation before; which an Adjournment does not.

The Convocation meets, and is adjournd.

The Convocation had been summoned to meet in November. When they met, they entered upon an Affair which the King had much at Heart, the uniting the Church of England and the Dissenters. But there was so little Disposition, in the Lower House especially, to this good Work, that the King seeing there was no Probability of effecting his Purpose, adjourned them to the twenty fourth of January.

The Commons enquire into the Miscarriages in Ireland, and of the Fleet.

The Miscarriages in Ireland, and the Inactivity of the Fleet the last Summer, were so grating to every English-man that had the Honour of his Country at Heart, as made the House of Commons impatient to examine into the Reasons of them. They were provoked to the last Degree, to find the great Expences of the foregoing Year eluded and A.D.1689. fruitless, while our Forces at Land were reduced to the Defensive, and our Fleets that used to be called the Terror of the World, lay idle and inactive; and yet lost more stout Men by Sickness than a Sea Fight would have cost. The Duke of Schomberg to justify himself, wrote over to the King, that his Army had never exceeded twelve thousand effective Men (though there were twenty three thousand upon the Establishment,) most newly raised, and little better than King James's Troops, who were double their Number; that he had waited for Artillery, Horses and Carriages for above a Month; that the Army had all along wanted Bread, the Men and Horses Shoes; and the Surgeons and Apothecaries Medicines. This Account was confirmed by Mr. Lumley and Count Solmes; who added that the Miscarriages were wholly to be charged on Shales, the Purveyor-General to the Army; and that upon Duke Schomberg's Landing there was such a Consternation among the Irish, that he might have marched directly to Dublin, if he had not wanted Provisions and a Train of Artillery. The Commons fired with these Informations, voted an Address to desire the King to cause Shales to be arrested. The King answered them, that upon Information of Shales's Mismanagement, he had sent Orders to that Purpose. Some Time after the King ingratiated himself with the Commons, by acquainting them that he was willing they should name Persons to overlook the Preparations for the War in Ireland; and to inspect the Condition of the Army there. This Message was wonderfully pleasing to the House, who returned their Thanks in a full Body; but excused themselves from any such Nomination, leaving it to the King's great Wisdom. The Commons also examined into the Miscarriages of the Fleet; and found they proceeded from the Fault of those who had victualled the Fleet, and supplied it with unsound Provisions; which produced a raging Sickness among the English Seamen, while the Dutch continued healthy. And the House ordered them to be taken into Custody of the Serjeant at Arms to answer for the same.

A Bill to confirm the Declaration of Rights, and settle the Succession of the Crown passed both Houses. The Lords upon this Occasion inserted that remarkable Clause which was taken into the Act that afterwards settled the Crown on the illustrious Family of his Majesty now reigning; namely, "that if any King or Queen should turn Papist, or marry a Papist, the Crown should descend to the next Heirs, as if the Persons so marrying were naturally dead."

This Bill, with another for raising two Shillings in the Pound on Land, received the Royal Sanction Dec. 16. and soon after a Debate arose in the House of Commons about the Revenue to be settled on the Princess Anne of Denmark. The House was divided into three Parties about it. Those

A Debate in the House of Commons about the Revenue of the Princess who Anne.

A.D.1689. who were most profoundly devoted to the Princess, of whom were very many, were for allowing her 70000*l.* per Ann. Others were for only 50000*l.* while the Courtiers were for leaving the whole entirely to the King's Discretion. After the first Day's Debate, the King sent to the Princess to persuade her to rely on his Generosity; but she civilly declined the Offer, saying, that since that Affair was before the Commons, she thought it best to have it concluded by that wise Body. The Debate being resumed the next Day, the second Party carried the Question, and 50000*l.* a Year was ordered to be paid to her Royal Highness out of the Excise. About a Month after this, nothing material having intervened, the King finding ill Humours increase in the House of Commons, came to the Upper-House, Jan.

A.D.1690. 27. and having passed those Bills that were ready, prorogued the Parliament; which was in about a Week after dissolved by Proclamation; another being summoned to meet on the twentieth of March.

The Spring drawing on, the King who resolved to go into Ireland to be present at the Campaign there, was busy in preparing for it. Recruits were raised for completing the old Regiments, and to be formed into new ones; and seven thousand Danes who were sent by the King of Denmark, were embarked for Ireland.

An unsuccessful Effort was made by the weak Remains of the Scotch Rebels, reinforced by some Supplies from Ireland, to disturb that Kingdom. But being met by the King's Forces they were defeated; and continued quiet afterwards.

The Parliament meets.

March 20. the Parliament met. The King in his Speech let them know his Intention of going to Ireland; and the Necessity of ready Money for that Expedition, and of Unanimity in their Proceedings for the Publick Peace. He recommended to them also an Union with Scotland. He let them know that he intended to leave the Administration in the Queen's Hands during his Absence; and desired them to prepare an Act for that Purpose if they thought it necessary.

The Commons fell upon supplying the King with great Vigour; and established such a Fund for his Use, that he found it easie to raise out of it the present Money he wanted. On the twentieth of May the King gave his Assent to an Act for putting the Government in the Queen's Hands, whenever the King should be absent from the Realm of Great-Britain. An Act for reversing the Quo Warranto against the City of London, was passed the same Day; and three Days after an Act of Oblivion; out of which only thirty five Persons were excepted. The King then thanked the Parliament for the Testimonies they had given him of their Affection, and adjourned them to July 7.

The Parliament adjourned.

Affairs of Ireland.

The Affairs of Ireland began to put on a little better Face towards the Spring. The Sickness among the Soldiers abated, so that they grew fit to take the Field; and in the Middle of February, a Detachment of one thousand English defeated nine thousand Irish. In May the Duke of Schomberg made himself Master of Charlemont by Famine, and soon after the Castle of Balingarrig was taken.

These small Successes raised the Spirits of the Soldiers, sunk with the Distresses they had undergone, and prepared them for the Arrival of the King, who landed at Carrick-fergus June 14. Not long after he reviewed the Army, which was now come to make a formidable Appearance, consisting of 36000 Men, English, Dutch, French Protestants, Danes and Germans, all well appointed.

When King James heard of King William's Landing, he also began to move. His Army, consisting of Irish and French, was nearly equal to that of King William; and he had besides fifteen thousand Men in Garrisons. He led his Forces to meet King William; and the two Armies came in Sight of each other not far from Drogheda. King James was advised to decline Fighting, and therefore repassed the Boyne; designing by Marches and Countermarches to weary out the English Forces. King William informed of this, resolved however to attack him; which brought on the famous Battle of the Boyne.

The Day before the Fight, King William gave Orders to the Army to march to the Banks of the Boyne, and there to encamp along the Sides of the River. While this was doing, the King rode up and down in Sight of the Irish Camp, viewing its Situation from different Places; and after having done so a considerable Time, he alighted from his Horse, being weary, and rested himself for an Hour on a little Eminence. The Irish saw and knew him, and immediately planted two Field-Pieces against the Place where he was. He was no sooner mounted again, but in a Moment they gave Fire. The first Shot passed within an hundred Paces of him, and kill'd a Man and two Horses. But the second, directed by an uncommon Destiny, passed just so near to him, to put him in the utmost Danger, but to go no farther. The Bullet first grazed upon the Bank of the River; then, in its rising, came flanting upon his Right Shoulder, took out a piece of his Coat and tore the Skin and Flesh a little, without any other Damage. All about him were struck with the utmost Terror; while the King himself remained with that Tranquillity and Unconcern that is peculiar to great Minds upon such extraordinary Accidents. The Enemy seeing some Disorder among those who were about him, concluded he was kill'd; which Report flew presently to Dublin, and from thence to Paris, where the People expressed their groundless Joy in Bonfires and Illuminations. King William having got his slight Wound dress'd, mounted again on Horse-back, and shewed himself to the whole Army to dissipate their just Fears. The two Armies were so near that they continued Cannonading each other the rest of the Day; during which the two Kings held their several Councils of A.D. 1690. War to prepare for the important Action expected on the Morrow.

The Battle of the Boyne.

At Six in the Morning of the following Day, in which the Fate of the British Empire, and that of Christendom with it, was to be determined, King William's Forces first began to move. Lieutenant General Douglas with some Foot, and Count Schomberg with the Horse marched to the Right up the River, carrying skilful Guides with them, who could direct the Foot to the fordable Places. The Enemy seeing this from the other Side of the River, sent out their Horse and Foot to the Left, to oppose their Passage over it. But the English having repulsed a Regiment of Dragoons, who appeared on the Banks of the River to hinder their crossing it, got over; and advanced towards the Enemies main Body. The Irish did not stay long to receive them, but when they saw them marching up in good Order, they retreated, being followed close by Count Schomberg.

King William, who was posted lower down the River, judging of what had happened upwards to the Right, ordered his Men now to pass the River, and to begin three Attacks in three different Places. The Dutch Regiment of Foot Guards crossed the River through the Enemies Fire, and when they were got over, fired upon the Irish with such Execution, that they abandoned their Intrenchments. Sir John Hanmore's and Count Nassau's Regiments passed the next; and about the same Time a Regiment of French Protestants, and a Body of the brave Inniskilliners got over. A Squadron of Irish Horse attacked the former without Success; but broke through the French Protestants, who wanted Pikes to keep the Horses off. But before they recovered their own Men, they were intercepted and cut to Pieces. The Dutch Guards, who were still advancing, were twice charged by the Irish, who were as often beat back. The Danes were not so successful; for as they were coming up, they were so vigorously attacked that they were forced to give Ground, and some of them crossed the River again. The Duke of Schomberg seeing this, pass'd the River, and put himself at the Head of the French Protestants, whose Commander had received a mortal Wound, and was carried off. But he had scarce done this, when fifteen or sixteen of the Enemies Horse who had been broke, came riding by the French Regiment, who suffered them to pass thinking they were on their own Side. These Horsemen, knowing the Duke of Schomberg, fell furiously upon him, and gave him two Wounds in his Head. The French Protestants provoked at this bold Attempt, inconsiderately fired upon the Troopers, and shot the Duke through the Neck, of which Wound he instantly died.

Duke Schomberg killed.

And now the King himself with the Left Wing of Horse passed the River. His Horse was bogged on the other Side and stuck fast, so that he was forced to alight. When all his Men were got over, and in Order, he drew his Sword (though the Wound A.D. 1690. he had received by the Cannon-Shot, made it painful to him to wield it) and went at their Head to the Relief of his Foot, who were hard pressed by twice the Number of Irish Troops. The Fight in this Place grew bloody and obstinate; and Victory seemed doubtful which Side to take. At last she declared her self for King William; the Irish were forced to give Way; and Lieutenant-General Hamilton their Commander was made Prisoner.

King William gains the Victory.

King James had been hitherto viewing the Fight from a neighbouring Hill; but now the Victory inclining on every Side to King William's Forces, Count Lauzun, the French Commander, rode up to him, and represented to him that it was necessary to retreat for fear of being surrounded by the Enemy, who drew nearer and nearer to him. That unfortunate Prince, cast down with Disappointments and Misfortunes, and seeing his last Hopes ruined, was easily prevailed on to take the Advice; and marched off in great Haste, making the best of his Way to Dublin.

The Fight was now become an undisputed Victory on King William's Side; and the Enemy fled on all Parts with such Fear, that they never assembled in an Army afterwards that Year. So that the Battle proved decisive of the Fate of both Kings. The Loss on both Sides was not great, the Slain and Prisoners on King James's Part, not being above fifteen hundred Men; and King William's Loss not exceeding five hundred; tho' the Death of the Duke of Schomberg very much enhaunsed the Damage. The King had another great Escape in this Fight, a Piece of his Boot being carried off by a Cannon Ball.

King James came to Dublin, and assembled the Magistrates, to let them know that the Irish had behaved themselves so ill in this Battle, that he would trust himself no more at their Head, but shift for himself; concluding, that though he was now obliged to yield to Force, he would endeavour their Deliverance as long as he lived. He stayed one Night in Dublin, and the next Day hastened to Waterford, where he went on board a French Vessel, and got over into France. His Departure from Dublin was accompanied by the Flight of all the considerable Papists; which set the Protestants at Liberty from the Tyranny under which they had groaned so long.

King James leaves Ireland, and embarks for France.

The next Day after the Battle of the Drogheda taken, Boyne, Drogheda, where was a great Magazine of Stores, was surrender'd to King William; and four Days after he entered Dublin in Triumph. He soon after issued out a Proclamation, promising Pardon and Protection to all the Irish, who should repair to their Dwellings, and surrender their Arms. While King James was Master in this Kingdom, he was forced, by the extreme Scarcity of Money, to coin Pieces in Copper and Pewter, and to raise them to the Value of so much Silver. This had caused a terrible Concussion among all monied People; and King William enters Dublin.

A.D. 1690. and by an odd Reverse of Things, many Persons were obliged to abscond for Fear of being paid their Debts. Therefore King William issued out a Proclamation to reduce the Value of such base Coins to their natural and intrinsic Worth.

Many strong Places were left in the Hands of King James's Forces, which they secured and fortified as well as they could, resolving to make King William pay dearly for his Entrance. Athlone was the first of these that was attacked; which held out so well, that upon a false Alarm of fifteen Thousand Irish coming to relieve it, the Siege was raised. But not long after, Waterford and Duncannon were surrendered. But on a sudden all Men were surprized by the King's leaving the Army unexpectedly, and making towards England. This caused various Speculations. Some said it shewed his Affairs in England were in no good Posture, others that he found himself unable to reduce Ireland this Campaign, the Season being so far advanced. Both these Things proved true; but whether they were the real Causes is uncertain. Others refined still more upon it, and ascribed it to a deeper Design; as if the King was willing to draw the Irish War into Length to make himself necessary, and to accustom his Subjects to bear the Burden of those Taxes, which he was like to bring upon them by the War he intended against France. Whatever the Reason was of his leaving the Army, he changed his Mind before he embarked, and returned thither again, to make what Use he could of the short Remnant of the Summer.

The Siege of Limerick. He marched the Army towards Limerick; before which Place his Forces posted themselves August 9. He sent the Garrison a Summons to surrender, which some were for receiving; but it was opposed by others with so much Warmth, that at last it was carried to defend the Place. But after the Forms of the Siege had gone on for two or three Days, the Progress of it received a cruel Maim, by the Loss of the Besiegers Train of Artillery. For some Deserters from the English Camp having given Notice to the Besieged that it was upon the Road, Colonel Sarsfield, a courageous and vigilant Officer, with a Body of five or six hundred Horse and Dragoons, went out of Limerick, under Cover of the Night, to intercept it. This was so venturous an Enterprize, on Account of the Danger this Party was in of being intercepted themselves by the King's Forces, before they should be able to return into Limerick; that when Intelligence of it was brought into the King's Camp, it was not believed at first; so that the Informer found it difficult to be admitted to the King's Presence. But though the King hearkened to him, so much Time was lost, that the Train was surprized before any Assistance could come. For when the Artillery was arrived within seven Miles of the Camp, Sarsfield, who had hid himself all Day among the Mountains, got Intelligence where it was; and having Guides who brought him to the Place, he fell upon the Convoy after the Day was shut in, when they were in such Security, that they had turned their Horses a grazing; and before they could put themselves in a Posture of Defence, cut some of them to Pieces, and drove away the rest. There being no Possibility in his Circumstances of carrying off any Part of what he had seized, he directed the Carriages and Waggon, with the Bread and Ammunition, to be gathered into one Heap; the Guns to be filled with Powder, and placed in the Ground with their Mouths downwards. Then he ordered the Heap to be set on Fire, which as soon as it reached the Powder, blew the whole Train up into the Air with a frightful Noise; splitting the Guns that were buried in the Earth, and breaking and destroying every Thing near it. The dreadful Blaze and Report occasioned by the firing of so much Powder, were plainly to be seen and heard at the Besiegers Camp, through the Darknes and Stilness of the Night; and was a speedy, but unwelcome Messenger to them of the Loss they had sustained, and occasioned great Murmurings. Sarsfield, after having accomplished this hazardous Undertaking, found Means to avoid the King's Forces, and get safe again into Limerick.

The Siege however went on, and that with good Success for some Time. But after a Breach was made, the Want of Bullets obliged the King to make an Attempt upon the Counterscarp, sooner than would have been otherwise adviseable. This was attended with ill Success, the Besiegers being repulsed with great Loss; and this Disappointment, and the approaching ill Weather, occasioned the raising of the Siege; and the King soon after embarked for England.

While these Things passed in Ireland, the World was amazed, and England alarmed, at the French Greatness and Triumphs at Sea. England and Holland had been thought till then the only Powers who claimed the Dominion in that Element; and the Pretences of these great Rivals seemed to have excluded all other Competitors. But now, by a strange Revolution, these two Powers, who were thought to be singly equal to the rest of Europe, were forced to bow to France alone, though united and combined together.

The French King sent out this Year into the Channel a Fleet of no less than eighty two Men of War; besides a great Number of Gallies, and other small Vessels. This Fleet hovering about the English Coast, the Queen, who held the Administration during the King's Absence, sent Orders to the Earl of Torrington, who was Admiral, to go out to fight them. He sailed accordingly to meet them; and was joined by several English and Dutch Men of War. But he found the Enemy much more his Superior in Number than was expected; so that after a fierce Engagement, in which the

The English and Dutch Fleets defeated by the French.

Dutch

A.D. 1690. Dutch suffered extremely, the Confederate Fleet was glad to bear away. Admiral Torrington was brought to his Trial for Misbehaviour in this Action, he having born away, and stood off soon after the Beginning of the Fight, which left those Ships that were engaged, to be oppressed by the Enemy's Numbers. He pleaded the Inequality of Strength, and the Disadvantage of the Wind, so that he was acquitted. But he was then, and has been since, much censured for his Conduct. It is said in his Behalf, that his Reputation was afterwards fully cleared by some French Officers who were in the Engagement; and coming into England after the Peace of Ryswick, did loudly justify him, and said, he deserved rather to be recompensed than censured, since he had preserved the best Part of the Fleet from being totally destroyed.

The Nation in Fear of a Descent.

The whole Nation was alarmed with the Fear of a Descent, when they heard of this French Victory at Sea; while all true Patriots were filled with Indignation to see their Country in Apprehension from an Enemy, who had never set Foot there before but as a Prisoner of War. But the Behaviour of the Queen and the Publick upon this Occasion soon dissipated these Alarms and Resentments. She took Care to secure Peace within, by seizing on suspected Persons. She ordered the Militia to be put in a Condition to second the Regular Troops; and gave out Commissions for Officers to command the latter. She then extended her Cares to the Fleet, and took all the proper Methods to encourage the Seamen, and to engage the Officers to a vigorous Performance of their Duty. And while the Danger lasted, she appeared on all Occasions with that Tranquillity and Unconcern, which is so necessary for Governors, upon such Emergencies, but can be attained by none but great and noble Minds. Her Courage was imitated by her Subjects; and the City of London, whose Example upon these Occasions always draws in the rest of England, made her an Offer not only of their Militia, but of raising a Regiment of Horse, and a Thousand Dragoons for their Majesties Service, to be maintained at their own Charge, as long as there should be Occasion. But there proved to be no need of putting these Offers in Execution; for the French, after having burnt a small Village on the Coast of Devonshire, and taken some inconsiderable Booty, retired to their Ships upon the Approach of the Militia, and returned to Brest. They found their Correspondence with the Discontented here, either discovered or frustrated, and without Assistance from amongst us, they knew their Enterprize could end in nothing but Loss and Disappointment.

The Earl of
Marlborough's Campaign in Ireland.

Though the King had left Ireland, the Campaign there was not over. For in the middle of September, the Earl of Marlborough arrived there with a Body of Troops. He joined his Forces with some others that were there before under the Duke of Wir- temberg, and they besieged Cork, which did not hold out above seven Days. He then marched to Kingsale, before which he sat down October 3. The Governor being summoned, sent at first a resolute Answer, but when he found a considerable Breach made, he beat a Parley. This Expedition was equally remarkable for its Celerity, and for its Consequences; being performed in a Month's Time, and in a very bad Season of the Year; and because it put a Stop to all Supplies coming from France on that Side of Ireland.

On the Continent, the Duke of Savoy entered into the Confederacy against France; but this Step cost him at first the whole Dukedom of Savoy, the Town of Montmélian excepted; he being defeated by the French at the Battle of Saluffes, and driven out of that Duchy. In Flanders the Dutch under Prince Waldeck, were defeated by the French under the Duke of Luxembourg, after a noble Resistance continued a long Time against a great Inequality of Numbers. But the Loss on both Sides being nearly equal, and the Armies soon after reinforced, the Victory had no Consequences. In Germany the Emperor got his Son Joseph, Archduke of Austria, and King of Hungary, to be chosen King of the Romans. Great Expectations were formed of Successes on this Side, by the Valour and Conduct of the brave Duke Charles of Lorraine, who had done such glorious Things in Hungary against the Turks. But they were disappointed by the sudden Death of that Prince at the Beginning of the Year. The Command of the German Troops was given to the Elector of Bavaria; but the two Armies, of which the French was commanded by the Dauphin, did nothing but observe one another, without entering upon any Action. On the Side of Spain, an Insurrection in Catalonia, occasioned by some Taxes imposed there, contrary to the Privileges of that Principality, gave the Spaniards a good deal of Trouble. The French endeavoured to protect the discontented Catalans, but every Thing was quieted before they could arrive. They got some Advantages over the Spaniards on that Side, but of no Importance.

The Meeting of the Parliament, which should have been September 12, was put off to October; during which Interval, the King was employed in receiving Thanks and Congratulations for his glorious Campaign in Ireland. When the Parliament met, the King told them of the Success of his Arms in Ireland; of the Deficiency of the Funds assigned for that Service, and of the Necessity of a vigorous Prosecution of the War against France. His Speech was answered by Addresses from both Houses; to the King, for his Valour and Conduct in the Reduction of Ireland; and to the Queen, for her prudent Administration during the King's Absence, and in the Time of the French Alarms. These were seconded by Votes of the House of Commons for a Supply Foreign Affairs.

The Parliament meets.

A.D. 1690.

The King and Parliament differ about the forfeited Estates in Ireland.

ply of above three Millions; and that Sum proving also deficient, they voted the raising one Million more upon the Credit, or by the Sale of the forfeited Estates in Ireland. But this Resolution was either designed, or taken, for a Handle of Misunderstanding between the King and the House. For a Motion being made, that the King should have a Part of those Estates reserved for his Disposal, it was disagreed to by the House. And in Return, a Bill sent up by the Commons to the Lords for applying those Estates to the Charge of the War, was laid aside in that House, by the Influence of the Court.

However, the Commons went on to assist the King with great Chearfulness, which was all the material Business they did this Session. They voted a Sum of five hundred seventy Thousand Pounds, for the building of seventeen Third-Rate Ships. When the Bills for these Purposes were ready, the King came January 5. to the House of Peers, and having given his Assent to them, adjourned the Parliament. And because the Forfeited Estates had been made a Bone of Contention, he assured them in his Speech, that he would not make any Grant of them till there was another Opportunity of settling that Matter in Parliament.

Affairs being thus settled in England, the King prepared for his intended Journey into Holland. His Business was to meet there all the Sovereign Princes concerned in the Confederacy against France, either in Person, or by their Ministers, in order to lay a Plan of the future War. He set out on the sixteenth of January in a very rigorous Season; and two Days after arrived before the Gorce. The Vessels being informed by a Fisherman that they were within a League and half of the Shore, the King left his Yacht, attended by the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Devonshire, the Earl of Dorset, the Earl of Portland, the Earl of Monmouth, Monsieur Overkirk, and Monsieur Zuysestein, and went off with three Shalloops, thinking to get ashore in an Hour or two. But the Weather being foggy, and the Sea frozen all about the Shore, the Sight of Land being also intercepted by the Fog, and their Way to it lying through the intricate and uncertain Clefts of the broken Ice, it came to pass that it was eight the next Morning before they arrived at Gorce; that illustrious Company continuing all that Time, which was not much less than twenty four Hours, exposed in open Boats, to the pinching Frost, and the Dangers of the inconstant Winds and Waves.

When he came to the Hague, he was met by the Electors of Brandenburg and Bavaria, the Dukes of Lunenburgh, the Landgrave of Hesse, the Duke of Zell, the Duke of Wolfembüttel, the Prince of Commerci, the Prince of Wirtemberg, Prince Waldeck, the Marquis of Gastanaga, Governor of Flanders, with the Ministers of the Emperor, the Duke of Savoy, the Electors upon the Rhine, and other Princes. The King represented to them the Necessity of Unanimity, and of making a vigorous Opposition to the growing Power of France, concluding with the Readiness he would always shew in doing of his Part. His Reasons were so enforced by the Necessity of Affairs, and the high Veneration they all had for him, that they soon agreed to employ amongst them two hundred and twenty Thousand Men in different Parts, to repress the Attempts of the French.

But a Body consisting of so many disjointed Parts is not so soon put in Motion, as that which is directed by one supreme and Sovereign Head. The French with a Celerity and Diligence that would have been truly admirable, had it not been employed to disturb the World, and fill Europe with Blood and Desolation, had their Forces ready as soon as ever the Season remitted of its Rigour, and sat down before Mons, March 15. The King of England was no less vigilant and active than him of France; but he had to do with Confederates, who were slow and remiss to the utmost Degree. He ordered the Forces to draw to a Rendezvous, and came to the Army himself on the twenty sixth of April. But though he met there a Force of near fifty Thousand Men, all ready to march to the Relief of Mons, he found that the Spaniards, with their usual Negligence, had not provided the least Thing necessary for such an Expedition. So that he had the Mortification to stand by and see the Town taken, as it were, before his Face; while for want of Necessaries his Hands were so bound, that he could not stir to relieve it. Upon this Disappointment he left the Army, and went over into England where his Affairs called him.

In the mean Time the Correspondence between the Jacobites in England, and the Court of St. Germains, was discovered by the Government; and the Lord Preston, and Mr. Ashton, a late Servant to King James, were apprehended below Gravesend, on Board a Vessel which was to transport them into France; and many Letters and Papers of dangerous Import were found about them. They were both tried for High-Treason, convicted, and condemned; but Mr. Ashton only was executed; the Lord Preston escaping by Intercession of his Relations, and making Discoveries.

The King after having spent about three Weeks in England, in giving Orders relating to the entire Reduction of Ireland, and the fitting out of the Fleet, returned to Holland May 3. leaving Lieutenant General Ginckle to compleat the Conquest of that Countrey, which was now looked on as a Thing as good as finished. General Ginckle began the Campaign with the Attack of Ballymore, which surrendered at Discretion the same Day the Batteries began to play. After this Town was taken, and put in a better Condition than before, the English marched towards Athlone. That Town is divided into two Parts, the River Shannon running between them. One of these is

A.D. 1691.

The French Diligence and Success.

Mons taken by them.

The King returns to England.

Lord Preston and Mr. Ashton apprehended.

The King goes over again to Holland.

General Ginckle's Campaign in Ireland.

The Siege and taking of Athlone.

A.D.1691. called the English, and the other, the Irish Town of Atblone; and these two are joined together by a Bridge over the Shannon. The Army came first before the English Town, and a Breach being made wide enough for an Assault, the English Troops bravely attacked, and carried the Place.

But the Difficulty was to take the Irish Town, which was divided from them by a rapid River (the Bridge being broken by the Irish) and protected by an Army of twenty Thousand French and Irish, who came to cover the Place; a Number superior to the English without any other Disadvantage. Several Attempts were made to repair the broken Bridge with Beams and Planks, which all proved unsuccessful; the Irish being Masters of that Part which was nearest them, and destroying all the English Works. At last it was found that there could be no making a Way over the Bridge, unless the Irish were dislodged from the farther Part which they possessed. To effect this there was but one Course to be taken, which was to send a Party to cross the River by a Ford near the Bridge; who when they had gained the opposite Bank, might come round and secure that End of the Bridge the Irish were Masters of; it not being hard to make a Way over it, when the two Parties on each Side of the broken Arch assisted each other. It was a perillous Enterprize to storm a fortified Town under all these Disadvantages in Sight of a superior Army; but the English Bravery was not daunted at it. The Signal being given, a Party of Grenadiers entered the Shannon. The Enemy seeing this, sent an Express to Monsieur de St. Ruth, who commanded the French and Irish Army, with an Account of it; and in the mean Time fired furiously with their great and small Artillery upon those who were passing the River. The Stream ran very swiftly, and the Bottom being full of great Stones, the Soldiers not able to discern them through the Water, stumbled over them; so that with the Violence of the Current, and the stony Bottom, they had much ado to keep their Feet. Yet still they pressed on, though above their Middle in Water, and surrounded with Flame and Smoke, and Cannon and Musket Shot flying on every Side of them. At last they gained the opposite Bank, and possessed themselves of that End of the Bridge that lay next the Irish Town, and assisted those who laid Planks from the other Side over the broken Arch. While this was doing, others were preparing Pontons for the other Part of the Army to pass. So that these Preparations being made with that Celerity the Occasion required, the whole English Army got over; and the Irish terrified at so adventurous an Attempt, fled out of the Town without any farther Resistance; so that the English made themselves Masters of it in less than an Hour.

Which succeeds.

The Express that was sent to the Irish Camp was very differently received. The brave and active Colonel Sarsfield upon Advice of it, came in all Haste to the French A.D.1691. General, telling him he must send immediate Succours, or the Town would be lost. But the other laughed at the News, and at Sarsfield's Concern, and said, it was impossible the English should offer such a Thing, when he was so near; adding, that he would give a Thousand Pistoles they durst attempt it. Sarsfield in a Passion told him, he knew the Enterprize was not too difficult for English Courage to attempt; as he would find too late if he lost any more Time. But the French General was unmoved, and turned Sarsfield's Anger into a Jest, which occasioned hot Words between them, till the Irish, flying from the Town to the Camp, determined the Dispute. St. Ruth then sent Detachments to drive the English out again, but they were forced to retire; upon which St. Ruth decamped that Night, and posted himself near the Castle of Agbrim, which lay between him and the English.

General Ginckle followed him, and found him very advantageously situated. His Camp lay on the Side of a Hill called Kill-comodon, extending two Miles in Length. Before him there was a deep Bog, which made his Camp inaccessible to Horse, except at two Passes at each End, one of which on the Right, was defended by the Castle of Agbrim. The Side of the Hill on which his Camp lay, was cut into many small Inclosures, which were lined with small Shot, who being covered by the Sides of the Ditches, could fire at the Assaultants with great Security to themselves. It was plainly a hazardous Undertaking to attempt the Irish and French Camp in this Situation; but it was necessary; the English Army being got too far to retreat, either with Honour or Safety. St. Ruth seeing their Countenance, as if they designed to attack him, made a Speech very well suited to the Persons and the Occasion; and concluded with ordering his Soldiers to give Quarter to none, especially not to the French Hereticks in the English Army.

Sunday July 12. this Battle began, which The Battle fully determined the Fate of Ireland. A- of Agbrim. bout twelve o' Clock at Noon the English Army began to move, being hindered before by a Fog. The General first sent a Party to secure that Pass which was on the Left Hand of his Army, and to the Right Hand of the Irish; who valiantly opposing them, a fierce Encounter began on that Side, each Party being insensibly reinforced by Assistance from the neighbouring Armies. At last the Irish were forced to retire, and left the Pass to the English. This being done, and a Way secured to come at the Enemy, the English held a Council of War, to consider, whether, since that was done, and the Day far advanced, it would not be better to defer the Battle till the next Morning. This was at first agreed on, but afterwards some Disorder appearing among the Enemy, it was resolved not to delay the Attack, lest the Enemy should march off in the Night, and they should lose

A.D. 1691. lose the Opportunity of so decisive an Action, as it was expected this would prove. Accordingly about four in the Afternoon the English Left Wing began to move towards the Enemy. This was done on Design to draw the Forces of the Enemy from the Pass near Aghrim Castle, that the Passage on that Side might be the safer for the English Right Wing; and this Counsel had its Effect. The Left Wing going through the other Pass, attacked the Irish, and the Fight grew fierce and bloody. The Irish being covered by the Ditches, and guarded by the Hedges upon the Sides of them, shot securely at the English, who were forced to stand their Fire, and break through the Hedges, before they could come upon equal Terms with their Enemies. And when they were come so near, they found the Irish as fierce and undaunted as before, and not to be driven from their Posts, but after an obstinate Resistance. And when they were at last obliged to give Way, they posted themselves in Lines which they had made from Ditch to Ditch, and fired upon the English in Flank, as they passed on to the next Hedge; who found there again the same fierce Enemies, and the same Disadvantage as before. It was a hot Service they were forced to go through upon this Occasion; but the English Intrepidity was not daunted, but still went on, and through all these Difficulties made their Way from Hedge to Hedge, still pressing on, and gaining Ground. This Action lasted an Hour and half, during which the other Part of the Army was not yet in Motion. But now the English seeing several Bodies of the Enemies Horse and Foot passing over from their Left to their Right, to the Assistance of their Men, who were hard pressed by the English Left Wing, they took the Opportunity to get over the Bog that lay between the Enemy and them; the Soldiers in their Passage being up to the Middle in Mud and Water. When they were on the other Side of it, the Fight began in this Part, in the same Manner as it had done to the Left. The English pressed on, and at first had good Success; driving the foremost of the Irish from Hedge to Hedge, till they were got very near their main Body. But the Irish being continually reinforced, which the English could not be, by Reason of the Difficulty of getting over the Bog, they overpowered the English with their Numbers, and forced them to retreat again to the Bog. In the mean Time the Right Wing of the English Horse got over the Pass by Aghrim Castle; but with great Difficulty, and through a furious Fire from that Castle, and some old Walls and Hedges adjoining. They fell upon the Enemy with great Courage; and the Foot, who were driven back in the Center, upon receiving a Recruit of fresh Men, returning to the Charge, the Fight seemed but now beginning. For above a Mile in Length nothing was to be seen but Fire and Smoke, both Sides fighting with equal Fury, and obstinately keeping their Ground.

At last, when Victory seemed as yet undecided, an Accident turned the Scale on the English Side. For St. Ruth the French General, as he was leading some Horse against the English Right Wing down the Hill of Killcommadon, was killed upon the Spot by a Cannon-Ball. The Death of the General put the Irish first into Disorder, which was increased by his having neglected to acquaint any others with the Order of Battle. For Sarsfield, who was next to Command, had been upon ill Terms with him since the Affair of Atblone. Thus the Irish Army soon fell into Confusion; none knowing what Orders were given, or from whom they were to receive them; and the English falling upon them in this Disorder, they made no longer any Resistance, but turned their Backs, and fled on all Sides. A thick misty Rain that fell as Night was coming on, hindered the Pursuit. There were killed in this Fight about four thousand of the Irish, and about seven hundred of the English Forces.

After some Days spent in Refreshment, the English Army marched to Galloway. The Garrison at first spoke high, and said they would defend the Place to the last. But they altered their Minds some Time after, and capitulated. There was now only one Place of Importance, which was Limerick, left in the Hands of the Irish; and the English Army soon bent their March thither. Eleven Days before they reached it Tyrconnel died there; of Grief, as 'tis said, for the ill Posture of his Master's Affairs.

August 25. General Ginckle with the English Army came before Limerick. The same Day they arrived, they took two Forts without the Town, and in two Days after two others; and soon after bombarded it. Nevertheless the Siege met with such Obstructions, that on the seventeenth of September it was debated in a Council of War, whether they should turn it into a Blockade. But at length it was resolved to go on with the Siege; and it was carried on with that Bravery and Success, that on the twenty third the Irish began to capitulate. After many Disputes in relation to the Articles of Surrender, they were at length agreed on Oct. 3. and the same Evening one of the Gates was delivered up to the English. The Surrender of this Town completed the Reduction of Ireland, in which General Ginckle gained himself immortal Honour, and the English Forces recovered their former martial Renown.

The Campaign in Flanders was quite unactive this Summer. The King put himself at the Head of the Army about the Middle of May. He endeavoured to bring the Duke of Luxembourg, who commanded the French, to an Engagement by many Feints and Stratagems of War; but he was not to be drawn to fight. Thus the two Armies continued observing each other during the Campaign. On the seventeenth of September the St. Ruth the French General killed.

The Irish Army totally defeated.

Galloway taken.

Limerick besieged and surrendered.

The Campaign in Flanders unactive.

A.D. 1691. the King left the Army and went to Loo. Soon after he was gone, the Duke of Luxembourg found means to fall upon the Rear of the Confederates, at a Time they did not expect him, and did them some Damage. But that Action had no Consequences, and the Campaign ended with it.

The French successful in Savoy.

The Arms of France were successful both in Italy and Spain this Year. The Misfortunes that attended the Duke of Savoy at his Entrance into the Confederacy accompanied him still. Monsieur Catinat at the Head of the French invested Nice, which after a Siege of thirteen Days surrendered; as did also Villa-Franca, and the Forts of St. Auspice and Montalban. He went from thence to Carmagnole, which despairing of Relief, surrendered also after a short Resistance. When this was done he invested Coni. But this Place put a Stop to the Rapidity of his Success; being strongly situated and fortified, and well garrisoned. The Duke of Savoy sent a Body of three thousand Men to throw themselves into the Place, but they were met by the French and defeated. However, some of them made a Shift to enter the Town, which made the Garrison so much the stronger.

While this Siege was going on, the Duke of Schomberg arrived at Turin; being sent by King William to assist and comfort the Duke of Savoy in the bad Condition of his Affairs; for he was losing all his Countrey apace. He persuaded the Duke of Savoy to attempt the raising the Siege of Coni; but this was disagreed to by the Spanish Governor of Milan under frivolous Pretences; the true Reason being, that he feared the French would gain the Victory, and upon a decisive Action, would fall upon the Milanese. But what could not be compassed by the Arms of the Confederates, was done by an Accident. For a hundred Mules laden with Provision and Ammunition being sent to relieve Coni, convoyed by two thousand two hundred Horse under the Command of Prince Eugene of Savoy, he was joined at some Distance from Coni, by five or six thousand Militia. Upon this Monsieur Catinat sent Word to Monsieur de Bullonde, who commanded at the Siege, not to stir out of his Lines; and to expect a Reinforcement that was coming to him. But this Message was some how mistaken; for Bullonde quickly after raised the Siege in great Confusion; for which Catinat put him under an Arrest.

Soon after eighteen thousand Men commanded by the Elector of Bavaria, came to the Duke of Savoy's Assistance. Their Arrival gave the Confederates such a Superiority, that Catinat was forced to decline Fighting, and send for Reinforcements. And the Confederates invested and retook Carmagnole. But this Advantage was more than balanced by the Loss of the strong Forts of Montmelian, which was taken by the French in November, and made them Masters of the whole Duchy of Savoy.

And in Catalonia.

In Catalonia the Duke de Noailles, who commanded the French Forces took Urgel in Cardagna; and bombarded Barcelona for A.D. 1691. three Days together, which was all that passed on that Side.

On the Rhine nothing was done of Importance. The French had framed a Scheme for surprizing the City of Mentz, which was discovered and prevented. But they took two Towns, Algesheim and Portzheim; so that on this Side also they gained some Advantage.

And on the Rhine.

The King arrived from Holland at Kennington, Oct. 19. and met the Parliament on the 22<sup>d</sup>. He congratulated them in his Speech upon the Reduction of Ireland; and laid before them the Necessity of fitting out a strong Fleet; and maintaining a numerous Land Force. The two Houses returned Addresses to the King full of those Expressions and Assurances of Respect and Fidelity that were suitable to the King's Speech.

The Parliament meets

The Commons on the sixth of November began to consider the King's Wants, and resolved to grant a Supply. And not long after they voted 1575898*l.* for the Fleet, and 1935787*l.* for the Army. These Sums were to be raised by continuing the Excise on Beer, Ale, &c. for another Year; and by a Tax on Land, and Salaries. They afterwards agreed to raise Money by a Poll Tax. But the Business of granting Supplies to King William, had a Fate attending it to move generally very slowly; so that the King was forced to quicken them to the Poll Tax, by a Speech he made to them at the passing the Act for the other Supplies Dec. 31. And the Act for the Poll Bill was not ready for the King's Assent till Feb. 24.

Proceedings
of Parliament.

During this Session a Scheme was set on foot in the House of Commons, for settling the East-India Trade upon a new Foundation: But the Court being against it, it came to nothing. A Bill was also brought in for regulating Trials in Cases of High-Treason, which passed the House of Commons; but the Lords putting in a Clause to alter the Forms of their own Trials, this was disagreed to by the Commons. This Difference of Opinion produced several Conferences between the two Houses, but without Success, so that the Houses being both stiff on different Sides, the Bill was lost between them.

A.D. 1692.

One William Fuller took upon him at this Time to set up for a Discoverer. But his Villany was soon found out; which might otherwise have been attended with as bad Consequences as the Popish Plot was in King Charles the Second's Reign. He desired a blank Pass to be granted him for two Persons to be sent for from beyond Sea, to give Evidence. But no such Persons appearing in six Weeks Time, his Scheme being either broken or ill concerted, he counterfeited himself sick when he was required to attend the House of Commons with them. Some Members were then sent to examine him; to whom he named two Persons, and directed them to the Places where he said they were. But upon Enquiry at those Places, no such were to be found. He was then

Fuller sets up for an Evidence.

A.D. 1692. then ordered to produce them himself, which not being able to do, he was unanimously voted an Impostor; and the Attorney-General was ordered to prosecute him. He was found guilty, and sentenced to stand in the Pillory.

The House of Commons order their Thanks to General Ginckle.

Upon General Ginckle's Return from Ireland, the House of Commons resolved not to let his Services pass without some distinguishing Mark of Honour. They ordered seven of their Members to wait upon him with the Thanks of the House both to himself and his Officers, who under him had contributed to the Reduction of Ireland, for the great Services performed by them. General Ginckle received this glorious Reward and Testimony of his Merit (and he could not easily receive a greater, than the Thanks and Praises of the Representatives of a free and powerful Nation) with a becoming Gratitude and Respect; saying, he valued it above a Triumph, and adding with great Modesty and Justice, that his Successes were chiefly owing to the Valour of the English; that he would communicate their Vote to the Officers in Ireland, and always endeavour the Prosperity of their Majesties and the Government. He was not long after made Earl of Athlone, and Baron Agbrim in Ireland, that the Honours he received might remind him of the Services that obtained them.

The Parliament adjourned.

On the twenty fourth of February the King coming to pass the Poll Bill, he at the same Time put an End to the Session, by ordering the Parliament to adjourn themselves till April 21. but they did not meet again till November.

The King embarks for Holland.

On the fifth of March the King embarked for Holland. During his Absence, the secret Correspondence that had long passed between the Discontented here, and the Courts of France and St. Germans, was ready to break out into an open Fire. Measures were concerted and agreed on for procuring from the King of France a powerful Aid, for re-establishing King James on his Throne. This Project succeeded so well, that the King of France sent a numerous Army into Normandy, to be ready to be transported into England, by a powerful Fleet which was ordered to attend them; King James being to accompany the Land Forces in Person. Preparations were also made by his Party in the North of England to favour and assist this Descent by an Insurrection.

The French King projects an Invasion of England.

The Alarms the Nation was under.

The Conjunction was difficult and dangerous. The French Army, with King James at their Head, lay at La Hogue, in Normandy, ready to embark; and the Mareschal de Tourville with fifty Men of War attended them; a Force superior to the English Fleet, who could not therefore be expected to hinder their Passage. To increase the Consternation, a Report was raised that some of the English Sea-Officers were confederate with the Enemy. Though this was probably but an Artifice to perplex their Counsels upon an Attack, by making them suspected to one another, it served however to keep up the Alarm, and to propagate those Fears that always weaken the Hands of an invaded People. In this State of Things the French King sent Orders to Tourville to go and fight the English Fleet (the Inequality of Numbers making the Victory looked on as certain) that the Seas might be free for the Transports to pass through; which Orders were obeyed accordingly.

The Queen, who during the King's Absence always held the Administration, looked on these Dangers, and provided against them, with a Masculine Courage and Prudence; though no doubt with many inward Pangs for the hard Fate of her high Station, in which she was driven to the cruel Choice of sacrificing either her Piety to her Father, or that still greater Love and Duty she owed to her Religion and Countrey. She gave Orders for hastening out the Fleet, and putting the Militia in Readiness; countermanded the Troops designed for Flanders, who with others added to them, formed a Camp near Portsmouth; issued out Proclamations for apprehending suspected Persons, and for banishing all Papists from London. She took hold of the Report that had spread of the Corruption of the Sea-Officers to ingratiate her self still more with them; and by a Strain of equal Policy and Generosity, sent them Word by Admiral Russel that though a Report was raised by the Enemies of the Government, that some of them were not hearty in her Service, and that she therefore intended to displace many of them, it was entirely false; that she never had any Intention to displace so much as one, as knowing she could have no better Defence than the Courage and Conduct of so many brave Men, in whose Honour and Fidelity she reposed the most entire Confidence. This Generosity of the Queen wrought so much upon that which is natural to our Countreymen, that all the Flag-Officers and Commanders joined in an Address, in which they promised to venture their Lives with all imaginable Alacrity and Resolution in Defence of their Majesties undoubted Rights, and the Liberty and Religion of their Countrey, against all Foreign and Popish Invaders whatsoever. Whether there were any real Foundation for this Rumour of the Jacobites is hard to say; but this is certain, that Rear-Admiral Carter, who was particularly named, died a few Days after, bravely fighting against the French Fleet; which fully clears himself in particular from that Imputation, and makes the Report the more unlikely of the others.

The Queen's prudent Conduct.

But the French Preparations were soon discovered; first by the Conjunction of the English and Dutch Fleets, and afterwards by the Ruin of their own. For the Dutch seeing their own Danger in that of England, hastened out their Fleet with all possible Expedition, and it came Time enough to join the English. This Conjunction quieted all the

The French Designs frustrated.

A.D. 1692. Fears at home, the two Fleets making a Force much superior to that of the Enemy. But by a happy Delay it was effected so late, that the French Court did not hear of it; and therefore sent Orders to Tourville to seek out and attack the English Fleet, supposing he would find it alone; which Orders proved the Ruin of their whole Design, and of a great Part of the French Navy with it. To make the Disaster still more grievous, these Orders were scarcely issued, before a certain Account was brought that the English and Dutch Fleets were joined. Messenger upon Messenger was then sent to the French Admiral to decline Fighting; but they all came too late. For Tourville, when he received his first Orders, knowing that the Execution of them depended on Celerity, hastened out his Fleet with such a fatal Diligence, that they were got to Sea, before the Counter-Orders could reach them; and were advancing with a fair Wind, and crowded Sails to meet their Destruction.

The French defeated in a Sea-Fight.

On the nineteenth of May the French Fleet came in Sight of the English and Dutch off Cape Barfleur; and about eleven in the Morning bore down upon them. The French Fleet consisted of fifty Men of War, many of them large and stately Ships; the Confederates had about seventy. The two Fleets continued Fighting till about half an Hour past Four in the Afternoon; by which Time the French finding they had the worst, began to tow away with their Boats, the great Firing having occasioned a Calm. But a fresh Gale springing up about six, the Blue Squadron renewed the Fight, and maintained it till ten at Night; when the French, having had four Ships blown up, fled and steered away for Conquet Road. In this Fight Rear-Admiral Carter was killed. But all that Night it was very calm, so that neither could the French make off with any Speed, nor the Confederates pursue them. But the next Morning the English saw the French about two Leagues from them, much diminished in Number by those Ships that had fled or been blown up, not seeming to be above thirty eight Men of War. They made after them with all the Sail they could, but it falling calm again, they were obliged to come to an Anchor on both Sides. About eleven at Night both Fleets weighed Anchor again; and the next Morning the French finding themselves pursued closely, and unable to resist, some of them endeavoured to escape through the Race of Aldernay; three of their largest Men of War ran a-ground near Cherbourg; and thirteen of them hawled in for the Bay of La Hogue; where the Transports lay that were to carry the Land-Forces designed for the Invasion of England, who were also there encamped upon the Shore. Those who went into the Race of Aldernay escaped; the English not daring to follow them into that dangerous Road; so that they got off to St. Malo's, after having run prodigious Hazards in their Passage among the Rocks and Shoals in that perillous Streight. But the three that ran a-ground near Cherbourg, were all set on A.D. 1692. Fire and burnt by the Red Squadron. One of them was the Royal Sun, the French Admiral, a Ship of one hundred and four Guns, the other two being the Admirable of one hundred and two Guns, and the Conquerant of eighty Guns. Three Ships of a lesser Rate were also burnt at the same Place. Those who got into the Bay of La Hogue, were pursued by Admiral Ruffel, who dropt Anchor there the same Day. The next Day he stood in, and sent Vice-Admiral Roob with several Men of War, Frigates, Fire-ships, and armed Boats, to destroy the Remains of the Enemies Fleet that were sheltered there. The French had got their Ships so near the Land, that only the small Frigates could do any Service, and they kept firing upon the English Seamen from their Platforms and Batteries upon the Shore. Nevertheless the Sailors went boldly in, and through all the Danger set Fire that Night to six of the Enemy's Men of War; and the next Day to the other seven, together with several Transport-Ships. And such was the Alacrity of the Seamen, that before they set the Ships on Fire they got on board them, and drove the Enemy with their own Guns in the Ships, from their Batteries upon the Shore; and all this in Sight of the French and Irish Army that was brought there to invade England.

Many of their Ships burnt near Cherbourg.

And in the Bay of La Hogue.

The strange Boldness of the English Sailors.

King James seeing his last Hopes ruined, was very deeply touched with Sorrow; and wrote to the King of France to tell him, that he had hitherto supported his Misfortunes with some Constancy, because as yet he had been himself the only Sufferer; but that he was now utterly overwhelmed and comfortless on Account of the Loss his Most Christian Majesty had sustained for his Interests. That he knew too well it was his own unlucky Star which had drawn that Misfortune upon his Forces, always victorious, but when they fought for him. Therefore he entreated his Most Christian Majesty no longer to be concerned for a Prince so unfortunate as himself; but permit him to retire with his Family to some Corner of the World, where he might no longer obstruct the Course of his Most Christian Majesty's Prosperities and Conquests; and where nothing could more contribute to his Consolation, than to hear of the constant Return of his wonted Triumphs by Sea and Land. The French King, in return, endeavoured with great Generosity to comfort him by a kind Answer; wherein he promised never to forsake him in the worst of his Extremities.

King James's Letter to the French King upon this Loss.

The Queen, when the News of this Victory was brought to her, ordered 30000*l.* to be distributed among the Seamen and Soldiers. And because the Consternation the Enemy was in upon the Loss of so great a Part of their Naval Force, might be of Advantage in making a Descent in France, great Preparations were set on Foot for such a Design. On the twenty third of July, the Land-Forces designed for this Expedition

A Descent on France projected.

were

A.D. 1692. were shipped off at Portsmouth, and soon after they set Sail. But whatever the Reason was, four or five Days after Intelligence came, that the Transport Ships, with part of the Fleet, had put into St. Hellen's-Bay. This unexpected Return caused various Conjectures; but all that was publicly known was, that soon after the Commission was opened, which is upon these Occasions, when they are got out to some Distance at Sea, it was agreed in a Council of War to return to England. A Committee of the Privy-Council upon this unlooked-for Incident was sent to the Fleet with fresh Orders; and after they had conferred with the Generals, they returned to London, the Fruit of this Conference continuing a Secret. Soon after the Forces employed upon this Occasion were sent to Flanders.

But is laid aside.

The Campaign in Flanders.
Namur taken by the French.

The Campaign there this Year was unfortunate. The French, under the Command of their King, invested Namur, May 25. The Garrison did not hold out above ten Days, when they surrendered the Town, and retired into the Castle. The King marched with all Expedition to its Relief, and came up with the French Army June 8. The Duke of Luxembourg, who covered the Siege with seventy five Thousand Men, met him. The River of Meuse lay between the two Armies. The King planted his Batteries of Cannon with so much Dexterity, that he commanded the River; upon which he gave Orders to prepare Pontons to cross it, and attack the French Army. But the Weather proved so rainy for a long Time after, that the River being swelled, and the Banks grown boggy and slippery with continual Wet, he was obliged to give over that Enterprize. So that he being unable to raise the Siege, the Castle of Namur was obliged to surrender July 1.

The Battle of Steenkirk.

This Misfortune was succeeded by a Reverse the King received at the Battle of Steenkirk. The French King, after the taking of Namur, left the Army to the Command of the Duke of Luxembourg; who not designing to fight but upon Advantage, posted himself between Engbien and Steenkirk, in a Situation answerable to his Intentions.

But the King being informed of the Nature of the Ground thereabouts, resolved to attack him. The Enemies Camp was covered to their Right by a Wood; on their Front, and to their Left, there were inclosed Fields, furrounded by thick Hedges; and before the Wood and the Inclosures, there was a little Plain about a Mile and half over. On Sunday, August 3. the Vanguard, commanded by the Duke of Wurtemberg, came into this Plain, and crossing it, fell upon the Enemy who were posted behind the Hedges in the inclosed Fields, with such Vigour, that they drove them from Hedge to Hedge, possessed themselves of the Wood, and erected two Batteries of Cannon, on two little Eminences on each Hand of it. While this was done, and these Batteries were playing, the Confederate Army came into the Plain. Four English Regiments were sent into the Wood, and seven more with the Left Wing of Horse, to the Skirts of the same on the Right. When this Disposition was made, the Fight began. For two Hours together nothing was heard but one incessant Roaring of the great and small Artillery, or to be seen but Flame and Smoke. The Vanguard behaved themselves very bravely, and possessed themselves of a Battery of seven Pieces of Cannon. But the rest of the Forces not being come up, they were so sorely pressed by the increasing Numbers of the Enemy, that the Duke of Wurtemberg sent twice to Count Solmes for Assistance. But Count Solmes was, it seems, envious of the Duke of Wurtemberg's Honour in having this Attack assigned him; and to gratify that ill Humour, neglected the assisting him. This obliged the Duke to send to the King himself; who immediately directed a positive Order to the Count, to send more Foot to the Duke of Wurtemberg. But even the King's Orders were ineffectual; for instead of Foot, he sent him Horse, which were entirely useless, in a Ground full of Copses and Inclosures. So that those brave Soldiers who had behaved themselves with so much Courage and Success hitherto, being overlaid with Odds of Numbers, were forced to turn their Backs, and retreat in great Confusion. The King was enraged at this Disappointment, and deeply touched with the Misfortune of those valiant Men, and cried out several Times with great Concern, Oh! my poor English, how are they abandoned! He did what he could on his own Part, and brought up some Foot to their Relief. But so much Time had been already lost, that they came too late. The King seeing this, commanded a Retreat; which was performed in good Order, the Enemy giving him little Disturbance. He repented the Behaviour of Count Solmes so much, that he would not admit him to his Presence for many Months after. And certainly had he inflicted on him any severer Punishment, it had been justly deserved; there not being a more unpardonable Crime, how common soever it be, than for Men to bring their private Humours or Resentments with them into a Field of Battle, or an Assembly of publick Council.

The King retreats.

In this Battle the Confederates lost General Mackay, Sir John Lanier, Sir Robert Douglass, the Earl of Angus, and divers other gallant Officers; above two Thousand Men killed, three Thousand wounded, or made Prisoners, and several Pieces of Cannon taken. The Loss on the French Side was not much inferior; but they gained the Honour of the Field, and the Glory and Reputation that attends Success.

A Domestick of the Elector of Bavaria, named the Chevalier de Millevoix, was discovered about this Time to be in Intelligence with the French; for which he was hanged upon a Tree.

A Com-

A.D. 1692.

A Design to kill the King discovered.

A Criminal of a worse Nature was also discovered, who had engaged in a Design to assassinate the King. This wicked Project had been begun the last Year. It was entered into by one Barthelemi Liniere, Sieur de Granvau, a Captain of Dragoons in the French Service, who together with one Du Mont, undertook to put it in Execution while the King was at Loo; but missing their Opportunity there, they followed his Majesty to Flanders. Thence Granvau returned to the French Army, while Du Mont stayed in that of the Allies; intending to shoot the King in the Back, when he should visit either the grand Guard, or the Lines. But for some Reason or other, Du Mont, after some Weeks Attendance, left the Army, and went to Hanover for that Year. But this Year the same base and villainous Design was resumed; and Granvau, with one Leefdale, whom he had engaged in it, met Du Mont, who came from Hanover at Uden, to concert Measures, and agreed to the same Scheme that had been settled before. But Providence was too merciful to Europe to suffer the Life of a Prince, who was the Support of its Liberty, to be so barbarously taken away; and permitted this black Conspiracy to be discovered by Leefdale and Du Mont, who related all the Circumstances of the Contrivance, and who they were that put Granvau upon this wicked Attempt. Granvau was taken, and condemned to be hanged, drawn and quartered, after he had made a full Confession of his Crimes, without Torture. And with this ended all the remarkable Transactions of the Campaign on that Side.

The Campaign on the Rhine.

On the Rhine, the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and the Markgrave of Baireith, commanded the German Army. What small Advantage was gained there, was on the Side of the French; who in September fell upon a Party of four Thousand Men, commanded by the Duke of Wirtemberg, and killed and took a great Number of them; the Duke himself being among the Prisoners. In December, the French received Orders from their Court to take Possession of Rhinefeld, it being looked on as a defenceless Place. But they met so brave a Resistance, that they were obliged to besiege it in Form in that rigorous Season; and by the great Diligence used by the Landgrave for its Relief, were afterwards obliged to raise the Siege.

The Campaign in Savoy.

On the Side of Savoy, a great Effort was made by the Allies; the French, who resolved this Year to bend the Power of their Arms against Flanders and Germany, leaving Monsieur Catinat very much inferior to the Allies there. The Duke of Savoy marched in the Month of July at the Head of twenty Thousand Men into Dauphiné, where he took the City of Ambrun. Many of the new Converts of the French Protestants came in to his Army; and being protected by the English Forces, made a Recantation of the Errors of the Church of Rome. From Ambrun the Army went to Gap, a City upon the Borders of Provence, whose Inhabitants opened their Gates to Prince Eugene of Savoy, upon his first appearing before it. These Beginnings might have been attended with great Consequences; not only Grenoble, the Capital of Dauphiné, but all the neighbouring Provinces, and the great City of Lyons it self began to tremble. But that Inconvenience which is almost inseparable from Confederate Armies, Divisions among the chief Commanders, joined with a sudden Sickness the Duke of Savoy was taken with, disappointed these hopeful Expectations. So that the Army of the Allies was obliged to leave France again; but not without a great Booty, and doing very considerable Damage.

The Duke of Savoy enters
France.

This Campaign produced an extraordinary Charity to the Vaudois, the Protestant Subjects of the Duke of Savoy, renowned among their Protestant Brethren, for having preserved the Christian Faith and Doctrine pure and uncorrupt, during those many Ages in which the rest of Christendom bowed under the Yoke of the Romish Superstitions. These poor People had lost all Manner of Ecclesiastical Discipline during the Violence of the late Persecution; and were so exhausted by it, that they were not able to maintain so much as a Minister or School-Master. M. Dubourdieu, Chaplain to the Duke of Schomberg in the English Army, found Means to represent their Case to the Queen; whose Christian Heart soon opened towards them in a generous Relief; establishing out of her own Privy Purse, a Fund for maintaining amongst them ten Preachers, and as many School-masters.

In Catalonia there was an entire Inaction; the French being employed another Way, and the Spaniards being too remiss to use the Opportunity to make any important Attempt.

A Plot was invented this Summer to be fathered upon some eminent Persons, but timely discovered. One Robert Young, a Fellow who had the Impudence to put on a Clergyman's Gown, but a shameless abandoned Wretch, was committed to Newgate, till he discharged a Fine imposed upon him for some Roguery or other, which he was perpetually employed in. He concerted with one Pearson, a Fellow-Prisoner, and such another as himself, to contrive a Plot, and charge it upon some Persons who were thought at that Time not so well affected to the Court. Young drew up an Association; and having found Means to get a Sight of the Hand-Writing of the Earls of Marlborough, and Salisbury, Sir Basil Firebrass, the Bishop of Rocheſter, and the Lord Cornbury, he wrote their Names and Titles under this Association, counterfeiting their Hands so dexterously, that it was very hard to distinguish the Cheat. He also forged several Letters in the Earl of Marlborough's Name, directed to himself. In April he sent one Stephen Blackbeard, a Fellow he had engaged, to the Bishop of Rocheſter's House upon a pretended Business, who took

A.D. 1692.

But at length retires.The Queen's Charity to the
Vaudois.A Sham Plot fathered upon the Bishop of Rocheſter, and others.

A.D. 1692. the Opportunity to convey this Association so subscribed, into a Flower Pot standing in a Chimney. When this was done, Young gave Information of this pretended Plot and Association; and the Bishop's House being searched by the King's Messengers, this Counterfeit Instrument was found. The Bishop was put some Days under Confinement; but upon his being confronted, first with Blackbeard, and then with Young, the Villainy appeared so evident, that the Bishop was honourably discharged.

The King meets the Parliament.

On the fifteenth of October the King embarked for England, and landed at Yarmouth on the eighteenth. After some Days spent in Refreshment after his Voyage, and Congratulations upon his safe Arrival, he met his Parliament November 4. He then represented to them, in a very affecting and judicious Speech, the State of Affairs, the Necessity of a vigorous Opposition to the common Enemy, and his own Concern for the Glory and Happiness of his People. His Speech was received with universal Applause, and was answered by suitable Addresses to himself and the Queen.

Proceedings of Parliament.

The Escape made by some of the French Ships into St. Malo's, after the Fight off Cape Barfleur, and the sudden Stop of the projected Descent, were thought to deserve the Enquiry of the House of Commons. The Conduct of Sir John Albby, who commanded that Part of the Fleet that pursued the French Ships that got through the Race of Aldernay, was first examined into. But he cleared himself so handsomely, that the House was fully satisfied with his Conduct, and dismissed him with Honour. The same good Fortune happened to Admiral Ruffel, when the Enquiry about the Descent came on, and the House dismissed him also with an honourable Vote. The House then took into Consideration the East-India Trade, and having ordered a Bill to be brought in for regulating the same upon a new Foot, they went upon a Supply. They voted 1926516*l.* for the Navy, 2090563*l.* for the Land Forces, and 750000*l.* to supply the Deficiency of the Poll Tax of the last Year. These Sums were to be raised by a Tax upon Land, and an Excise upon Malt Liquors, with some Impositions upon other Merchandize.

Among other Bills which were of less Consequence, and were dropped this Session, there was one for free and impartial Proceedings in Parliament, by incapacitating Persons in many Civil and Military Employments, from sitting in the House of Commons. It passed the Lower House, but was thrown out in the Upper; the Courtiers being too numerous there.

The House of Commons in these Times were very watchful and prying into the Administration; and they found but too much Reason for their Care and Censure, by an universal Remissness that ran through the Administration of the publick Affairs and Concerns. Complaints were made of many Abuses and Mismanagements in the Affairs of Ireland; and they were so well made out, A.D. 1693. that the House of Commons in a Body presented an Address to the King about them. The King answered their Address with his usual Complaisance to that House. But whether he was persuaded by some about him, who had a Part in those Abuses, or whether he thought of himself that the Discontented in the House of Commons might take Occasion to give him Trouble upon that Account, he came to the House of Peers five Days after, and having passed the Bills that were ready, prorogued the Parliament till May 2. This was a Method little used before; the Meetings of the two Houses being generally discontinued by Adjournments, but upon this Occasion it was necessary, to prevent this Affair's being resumed at the next Meeting.

The Parliament prorogued.

The Debates in the House of Commons about the Conduct of the Fleet in relation to the Descent, cost Admiral Ruffel, and the Earl of Nottingham their Places; the King saying of his Officers, as Julius Cæsar had done of his Wife, That they ought to be as free from Suspicion, as from Faults. In the Earl of Nottingham's Place, succeeded Sir John Trenchard; and Commissioners were appointed for the Office of Lord High Admiral. The Great Seal was at this Time given to Sir John, afterwards Lord, Sommers. These Things being done, the King went over into Holland, to expect there the Beginning of the Campaign.

This proved a fatal Year to the Confederates in every Part. At Sea we had a terrible Blow, in the Loss of a great Part of the Streights Fleet. For the French Naval Power making the Seas insecure to single Merchant Men, a great Fleet of English, Dutch, Hamburgers, and other Traders, to the Number of near four hundred Sail, bound to the Coasts of Spain, Portugal, and the Ports of the Mediterranean, set out all together for the Sake of the Convoy of twenty three Men of War, commanded by Sir George Rooke, which was appointed to attend them. It being known that the French had a very large Fleet getting ready at Brest, Orders were given to the whole Confederate Fleet of English and Dutch to accompany Sir George Rooke and the Merchant-Men, till they came to such a Latitude, as some said, or as others, till they had certain Intelligence where the French Fleet was. Whether the Orders given were punctually observed or not, is neither certain nor material; it is certain that upon a real or pretended Excuse that they were not sufficiently victualled, the Grand Fleet left the others too soon. For Sir George Rooke, having sent away the Ships bound to the Northern Coasts of Spain, and those of Portugal, and pursuing his Voyage to the Streights with the others, was met within sixty Leagues of Cape St. Vincent, by the whole French Fleet of Men of War, consisting of no less than eighty Sail. At this unexpected Sight, a dreadful Alarm ran through the English and Dutch Fleets, who were utterly incapable of making An unfortunate Year.

The Loss of the Streights Fleet.

A.D. 1693. making any Defence against so formidable a Force. It appeared immediately that nothing was to be done but to give Orders to the Merchant-Men to shift for themselves, and while the Convoy protected them as well as they could, to get into the neighbouring Ports of Spain or Portugal; which they accordingly did. But the French seeing this, sent out some of their Ships after them, while others attacked the Convoy. It was a melancholy Sight to see the defenceless Merchant-Men flying this Way and that Way, from the Pursuit of a fierce Enemy they were unable to resist; while the Pursuers, as fast as they came up with them, took some, burnt some, and sent others to the Bottom with their Cannon. The Loss upon this Occasion was computed to be near eighty Merchant Ships, besides three Dutch, and one English Man of War of the Convoy. Of those that escaped, some got away with Sir George Rooke, who went off with them to Ireland. Some got into the Ports of Portugal and Spain; though these last proved an insecure Refuge, some of the Ships being taken and destroyed in the very Harbour of Gibraltar.

The Campaign in Flanders.

The French besiege Huy.

They march to attack the King.

In Flanders, the French by a vigorous Effort sent so great an Army into the Field, that at the Beginning of the Campaign it exceeded that of the Confederates by one half. The Campaign passed without any remarkable Occurrence till July 14. when Count Tilly, General of the Troops of Liege, marching to join the King, was surprized by the French, and obliged to retire. But soon after the Duke of Wurtemberg forced the Lines made by the French, to cover their conquered Countries, and raised great Contributions there. But this did not keep the Duke of Luxembourg from laying Siege to Huy, a small, but a strong Place upon the Meuse, in the Bishoprick of Liege. This brought the King nearer to that Place, to watch the Enemy while they were employed in that Siege. But as he was upon his March, News was brought him that Huy was surrendered. The Duke of Luxembourg having taken this Town, formed a Design to attack the King, whose Forces had been inferior to his own all the Campaign, and had been much weakened by Detachments sent to reinforce the Garrisons of Liege and Maastricht, which were threatened by the French. To compass this, he made a Feint of besieging Liege, but indeed marched directly to the King's Camp.

He found the King posted on the Sides of a River called the Lesser Geet, which ran behind his Camp, which was extended six Miles in Length along its Banks. The Left of his Camp was entirely covered by a Brook, which ran almost directly before it, only turning off somewhat obliquely to the Left. The Right was on its most extreme Parts covered with Hedges and hollow Ways; and was divided in the Middle by another Brook, which with two Villages on the Sides of it, covered its innermost Parts. Between these two Brooks, and the Villages on the Sides of it, there was a Piece of open Ground, which was the only Part on which the Confederate Camp lay uncovered. A.D. 1693.

The King having News of the Enemies Approach, and finding they designed to attack him, called a Council of War. Many of the Officers proposed to repass the Geet that lay behind them; but the King trusting to his advantageous Situation, resolved to venture a Battle, rather than expose himself to the Danger of being attacked in his Rear. On July 28. about eight at Night the whole French Army came up; but it being so late, the Battle was put off till next Day. During the Night, the King ordered a Retrenchment to be made across the Plain that lay between the two Brooks and the Villages near them; so that the Enemy could not without Disadvantages attack a Camp, that was now covered on all Sides, either by the Brooks, the Villages, or the Retrenchment.

Who prepares to receive them.

The next Morning at Sun-rise, the French Army drew up in Order of Battle, and advanced towards the King's Camp. The Cannon from thence played upon them with good Success, but they stood the firing with wonderful Constancy. About eight in the Morning the Fight began on the Right of the Confederates; and the two Villages that covered the innermost Part were furiously attacked. The Battle was fierce and doubtful, those Villages being gained and lost once and again; but at last the Allies kept their Ground. The Enemy then attacked their Left, and were received there with so much Bravery, that after a sharp Encounter of two Hours, they were repulsed on that Side, and obliged to retire, without daring to make a second Attempt. But the Attack being renewed on the Right, the Face of Things changed; and the Confederates being overlaid with fresh Men succeeding the others, and having spent their Ammunition, were compelled to retreat; while the French posted themselves in the Villages the Allies had so long defended. This turned the Scale of Victory; for the Confederate Army having lost that Defence, the French came upon equal Terms with them on the Right; on which Side the Impression being once made, they poured in such numerous Troops, that the Allies sunk under the unequal Burthen, and gave Way. In the mean Time another Body of the French attacked the Retrenchment. The English Foot defended it with the usual Firmness of our Countrymen; but the Work being slight, as being cast up in haste, they were compelled to abandon it, and the French levelled it with all Diligence, that their Cavalry might come in that Way to attack the Right Wing of the Confederate Horse. This being done, and a fresh Torrent poured in upon those who were already spent and overpowered, that Wing was utterly broken and overthrown. The King seeing the Danger of his Troops, rode in all Haste to the Left, to fetch the English Horse to the Assistance of the others. But the

A.D. 1693. the French broke in on all Parts to the Right with such increasing Numbers, that though the English Troopers came as fast as their Horses could gallop, they arrived too late to restore the Fight. And now the Victory was clearly decided in favour of the Enemy; so great a Part of the Confederate Troops being routed and broken. There remained nothing to do but to bring off in Safety those Forces that were left; which was happily done. The French had now made their Way into the Confederate Camp, which was filled with Disorder and Confusion, every one shifting for himself, and crowding to the Bridges that lay over the River behind them. In this universal Flight and Fear, the Bridges being neither wide nor numerous enough to give a quick Passage to such Multitudes, many of those who were most closely followed by the Enemy were obliged to throw themselves into the River, where abundance were drowned; the Earl of Athlone narrowly escaping the same Fate. The King seeing himself in Danger of being surrounded by the French Troops, ordered three Regiments to secure his Retreat over one of the Bridges, which he gained with great Difficulty. The Confederates lost according to their own Accounts, about six thousand Men, sixty Pieces of Cannon and nine Mortars; but the Baggage having been sent away the Night before, escaped the Enemy's Hands. In this Battle the late Duke of Ormond received several Wounds, and was made Prisoner. The King escaped no less than three Musket-Shots very wonderfully, one of them passing through his Peruke, a second through his Coat-Sleeve, and a third carrying off the Knot of his Scarf, and leaving a small Contusion in his Side. The Glory he gained for his Personal Valour was answerable to the Danger by which he acquired it; his very Enemies admiring it so much, that it was a common Saying amongst them, that they only wanted such a King to make them Masters of Christendom; and confessing that so much Valour well deserved the peaceable Possession of the Crown he wore.

'Tis very probable, that the Loss of the French was very great in this Battle; because, instead of pursuing his Victory, the Duke of Luxembourg continued without Motion for fifteen Days afterwards. But at last he marched to Charleroy, and invested that Place. The Governor, though he had little or no Prospect of Relief, made a brave and honourable Defence, and kept the French Army employed for twenty six Days from the Opening of the Trenches. When he could hold out no longer he obtained an honourable Capitulation, and the Surrender of this Place put an End to the Campaign.

The Campaign in Catalonia. In Catalonia the French began the Campaign so early, that on the twenty ninth of May they invested Roses by Sea and Land; and in seven Days made themselves Masters of that important Place. The taking of Roses was succeeded by Inaction for the rest of the Year.

On the Rhine the French Diligence A.D. 1693. brought them into the Field so early, that they pass'd the Rhine before any Forces of the Germans were in a Condition to oppose them. They then invested Heidelberg, the Capital of the Palatinate, which was surrender'd, and afterwards set on Fire by the French, who committed great Barbarities throughout that Electorate. After this they made several Attempts to attack Prince Lewis of Baden; but being disappointed in them all by the Prudence and Conduct of that General, they broke up; and sent away their Troops into other Parts.

In Piedmont the Duke of Savoy, being recovered of the Sickness that took him at the Close of the last Summer, began the Campaign with the Siege of Pignerol. But Monsieur Catinat, descending into the Plains, so alarmed the Duke for Turin, that he broke up the Siege to observe the French Motions. This brought on the Battle of Marfaglia, in which the Confederates were defeated, with the Loss of most of their Cannon, and seven or eight thousand Men. But this Battle was fought so late in the Year, that the French Victory could not be pursued.

To humble the Pride of that ambitious Monarch, who saw almost all Europe in Arms against him, and yet flying every where from his single Force, it pleased the Divine Providence to send him a Scourge into the Bowels of his own Countrey; a severe Famine, which daily swept away Multitudes of his Subjects. The Misery and Desolation was so great, that in all this Height of Success he was compelled to sue for Peace. But as this was done with his usual Craft and Insincerity, the Allies rejected his Proposals.

Oct. 30. the King arrived at Kensington from Holland; and in seven Days after met his Parliament. His Speech was short, to let them know the Necessity of encreasing the Forces by Sea and Land, and the Supplies by Consequence. It was answered by a Vote of the Commons, that they would support their Majesties and their Government. But before they proceeded on this Vote, they enquired into the dreadful Mis-carriage that had happened to the Smyrna Fleet; and after having spent some Time in this Enquiry, voted that it had been occasioned by a notorious and treacherous Mismanagement. But this general Censure was attended with no Consequences, it being so difficult in Cases of that Nature to find certain Grounds for proceeding against particular Persons.

This being over they fell upon the Supply; and voted two Million five hundred and thirty Thousand five hundred and ninety Pounds for the Army; and two Million five hundred Thousand Pounds for the Fleet. It was also found, that the Funds settled the last Year fell short above four hundred Thousand Pounds. This Deficiency they also proposed to supply. For raising these great Sums, a Land Tax of four Shillings in the Pound was charged again, with the Excise upon Malt-Liquors; to which was added a Duty

The Confederates defeated.

And on the Rhine.

And in Piedmont.

The Battle of Marfaglia.

A Famine in France.

The French King offers Conditions of Peace, which are rejected.

The Parliament meets.

Their Proceedings.

A.D. 1693. Duty upon Salt, Leather, Soap, Wine, and the Tonnage of all Ships and Vessels. And because all these were insufficient, a Poll Tax was again made use of; and in the last Place a Duty laid upon Hackney and Stage Coaches, with another upon Paper and Parchment. The Tax upon Salt, with a Part of the Excise, was formed into a Fund to continue for sixteen Years, of one hundred and forty Thousand Pounds per Annum, and a Million was to be raised by way of Lottery from this Fund.

A.D. 1694.

Bill for free Proceedings in Parliament rejected by the King.

The Representation of the Commons to him.

The King's Answer.

While the Supply was depending, a second Bill for free and impartial Proceedings in Parliament was set on foot; and at this Time passed through both Houses. But when it came before the King when he passed the Land Tax, he refused his Sanction to it. The Commons resented this as deeply as reasonably, and the next Day resolved, that whoever advised the King not to give the Royal Assent to that Bill, was an Enemy to their Majesties and the Kingdom. This Resolution was succeeded by a moving Representation to the King himself, in which, without the least Warmth, and in the most modest and respectful Words, they expressed their Grief and Concern that a Bill of that Importance to the Publick Welfare, made by Advice of both Houses of Parliament, should not obtain the Royal Assent at a Time when the Commons had so freely voted such large Supplies. That they could impute this to nothing but the Insinuations of particular Persons, who advised his Majesty contrary to the Advice of Parliament. Upon which Considerations they humbly prayed, that for the future his Majesty would hearken to the Advice of his Parliament, and not to the secret Advices of particular Persons, who might have private Interests of their own, separate from the true Interests of his Majesty and his People. The King had as little to say in Answer to this affecting Representation, as Men use to have when they are entirely in the Wrong. He told them in general Words, that he was sensible of their Affection to him; that he should always have a great Regard to the Advice of Parliaments; and should look on those as his Enemies who should advise any Thing that might lessen the Confidence between himself and his People. When this evasive Answer came to be considered by the House, it was proposed to apply to the King for a farther Answer. But others maturely considering that the Opportunity was lost for the present Time, and that a farther Mention of this Affair, would only serve to produce and increase ill Humours, which might be of bad Consequence to the other Publick Concerns, they suffered the Question to pass in the Negative. Thus an Opportunity was lost of adding a most noble and necessary Part to the glorious Structure of the English Constitution; which however admirable when compared with others, will continue blemished with one great Defect, unless some happier Time should hereafter compleat it, by adding thereto this finishing Beauty and Support.

When the Bills for the Supplies were ready, the King came to the House and passed them, with others of a more private Nature; and then prorogued the Parliament.

A.D. 1694. The Parliament prorogued.

By the Time this was done the warlike Motions began. Our Naval Forces were unfortunate in some Places, and successful in others. Sir Francis Wheeler conducting a Fleet of Merchant-Ships up the Streights at Sea was cast away, with several of the Men of War and Merchant-Ships near Gibraltar. The Confederate Fleet went out in hopes of blocking up the French Navy in the Harbour of Brest, or of fighting them; but were disappointed of both; the French getting out of the Harbour, and sailing away to the Mediterranean. Admiral Ruffel, who had been restored to his Place, was ordered after them; to prevent their Designs on Catalonia, which Principality was in great Danger from the French by Land and Sea. Before he went he had an Opportunity to destroy a great Number of French Merchant-Men in Bertheaume Bay; of whom he burnt or sunk thirty five, with a Man of War that was to be their Convoy.

But a Design that was laid for destroying the Harbour of Brest proved unsuccessful; which was in good Measure owing to the ill Conduct of some, who kept the Secret so ill that it was Town-Talk in London some Months before it was attempted. This gave the French an Opportunity to provide themselves for it, so that the Confederates were repulsed with Loss. On the seventh of June the Confederate Fleet came before that Harbour; and the Lord Cutts, and the Marquis of Caermarthen went into the Bay, in a small Galley with Oars. They were thundered upon by the Enemy's Cannon on every Side; but that did not hinder them from taking the Depth of Water in many Places amidst all the Fire, and getting out again safely. After they had given the Lord Berkley, who was the Commander, an Account of what they had observed, it was resolved at first to send two, but afterwards eight Men of War, to cover the Soldiers who were to land in the Bay. Accordingly the Ships stood in, and the Land Forces to the Number of nine hundred were put into Boats, and got ashore. But they had not long been there, before a Detachment of French Marines charged them so furiously that they were obliged to retire. And to compleat the Mischief, it happened to be ebbing Water, so that many of the Boats lying a-ground could not be got off, the Men on board them being either miserably slaughtered, or forced to beg for Quarter. Lieutenant-General Talmash who commanded them, was shot in the Thigh. However some of the Boats made a Shift to retreat under the Protection of the Men of War; who had in the mean Time been sorely handled by the Enemy's numerous Batteries, and one of them was left behind. Most of the Land-Men were killed or taken Prisoners; and four hundred Men were killed aboard the Ships. General Talmash being sent to Plymouth, died there of his Wound.

To

A.D. 1694.

Diep and Havre de Grace bombarded.

To make some Amends for this Disappointment, the Lord Berkley sailed towards Diep, and threw one thousand one hundred Bombs and Carcasses into the Town, which set it on Fire in several Places. The Townsmen despairing to quench the Flames, began to run away in great Consternation. Two Regiments of Militia were sent to encourage them; but the Disorder was so great, and the Fire so dreadful, that the Soldiers fled with the rest. But this not being then known to the English Fleet, who might have possessed themselves of the Place in all probability, had they been acquainted with it, they sailed away, leaving the Town almost ruined. They went from thence to Havre de Grace, where they did a great deal of Mischiefe.

The French had been busy at the Beginning of this Year in Intrigues for getting the Cardinal de Bouillon chosen Bishop of Liege, which had been a very great Blow to the Allies. But their Endeavours were disappointed by the Choice of the Elector of Cologne into that Bishoprick. The Campaign began in Flanders not long after, with a very fair Prospect on the Side of the Confederates; who had the finest Army there they had ever had on foot. But the French on their Part bounded their Designs to the covering of their own Territories, which made the Summer inactive; the two Armies being only employed in observing and following each other's Motions. Only towards the End of the Season the King invested and regained the Town and Castle of Huy; with which the Campaign ended on that Side.

The Campaign in Flanders un-active.The Campaign in Catalonia.

In Catalonia the French had great Success. The Marechal de Noailles with an Army of near thirty Thousand Men, arrived at the Banks of the River Ter, where he found the Spaniards intrenched on the other Side. Nevertheless he resolved to pass it, and having founded all the Fords the same Evening, he crossed the River, and attacked the Spanish Retrenchments. After a short Dispute he obliged the Spanish Infantry to abandon their Posts, and to retreat under Cover of the Horfe. Soon after he laid Siege to Palamos, a Town by the Sea Side, about twenty two Leagues from Barcelona, and in about a Week took it by Storm. From thence he marched to Gironne, a well fortified Town, where the Spaniards at first threatened to make a stout Resistance. But in ten Days they changed their Minds, and surrendered the Place upon ignominious Terms. From Gironne the French advanced to Ostalrick, a little Town upon the Road to Barcelona, which they quickly carried without any great Resistance. But their Army becoming sickly by the excessive Heats, the Marechal de Noailles put them into Quarters of Refreshment for some Time; after which taking the Field again, they assaulted and took Castel Folet, a Town a little to the West of Gironne. The Spaniards had taken the Opportunity of the Absence of the French to besiege Ostalrick; and carried on the Siege with so much Success, that the Governor capitulated, and Hostages were exchanged. A.D. 1694. But before the Articles of Surrender were agreed on, the Governor had Advice that Monsieur de Noailles was marching to his Relief, upon which he re-demanded his Hostages, and refused to stand to the Articles; after which the Siege was quickly raised.

The City of Barcelona was the only fortified Place throughout Catalonia, that remained in the Hands of the Spaniards. The French encouraged by their past Success threatened the Siege of this famous City, in which they were to have been assisted by their Fleet, which came from Brest into the Mediterranean, to second their Land Forces on this Side. But the Arrival of Admiral Ruffel into these Seas quashed all the French Designs. For upon the News of his coming the French Fleet retired into Toulon; whom Admiral Ruffel confined there so closely that they were unable to get out. The Absence of their Fleet put a Stop to all farther Progress of the French, and the Action of the Campaign on this Side.

Barcelona besieged.The Siege raised.

That in Piedmont was unactive; the Duke of Savoy being in a secret Negotiation with France, which made him remiss, and the French careless in that Part.

The Campaign in Piedmont.

On the Rhine some Motions were made both by the French and Germans, that seemed to promise some vigorous Action. But they passed over without any Consequence. Towards the End of the Campaign the Germans cross'd the Rhine, and brought off with them a considerable Booty from the other Side.

And on the Rhine.

On the ninth of November the King arrived in England; and in three Days after met the Parliament. He briefly mentioned to them the State of Publick Affairs, the Necessity of Supplies, and a Proposal for the Encouragement of Seamen.

The Parliament meets.

Before the Commons proceeded on the Supply, they ordered a Bill to be brought in for the frequent Meeting and Calling of Parliaments; by which it was enacted that a new Parliament should be called once in three Years. Bills to this Purpose had been set on foot in former Sessions, but were defeated by the Court; who being well pleased with the present Parliament, had no Mind it should be changed. But the Commons now brought it in again, and appeared so resolute for it, that it passed the two Houses with Success. After this Bill was brought in, the Commons voted a Supply of two Million three hundred and eighty two Thousand seven Hundred and twelve Pounds for the Navy; and two Million five hundred Thousand Pounds for the Army.

The Bill for Triennial Parliaments.

But while this was doing, the whole Nation was alarmed with the News that the Queen was suddenly taken ill on the twenty first of December. Her Distemper soon appeared to be the Small-Pox, which increased upon her with that Violence, and was attended with such fatal Symptoms, that in seven Days it ended in her Death; which deprived our Countrey of one of the most excellent Princes that ever filled a Throne.

The Queen's
Sickness and Death.

A.D. 1694. The King, the Parliament, the Court, the City, the Countrey, were struck with the utmost Grief for this invaluable Loss. Though the Multiplicity of Affairs the King was always pressed with, and perhaps too his natural Disposition, did not allow him to be a fond Husband to the Queen, he had yet the profoundest Esteem for her Merit and Virtues. And this being enhaunfed by the Want he now felt of her, and that by the Suddenness of the Loss, his steddly and martial Temper was all melted into Tenderness; and his Firmness of Soul gave way to all the Transports and Weaknesses of an inconsolable Affliction. The same Concern filled the Minds of all those who had been her Subjects. The two Houses of Parliament waited upon the King with their Addresses of Condolence, in which they bewailed with him their common Loss, and endeavoured to mitigate his Grief by taking their Share of it with him, and by the strongest Assurances of Duty and Fidelity on their Parts. Their Example was followed by the City of London, and most of the Corporations throughout his Majesty's Dominions. The King received upon this Occasion a great Satisfaction from the Conduct of the Princess Anne of Denmark. There had happened a Misunderstanding between that Lady and her excellent Sister, which by some about them was heightened to that Degree, that the Princess Anne was obliged to leave the Court, and to live in an obscure Retirement, more like a private Person in Disgrace, than the Heir apparent to the Crown. The King had Reason to apprehend she might shew her Resentment hereafter, by the Interest she had in both Houses, now increased by her nearer Approach to the Throne; and this the more, because by the decease of Queen Mary, the King was left alone, exposed to the Malecontents at home, many of whom had been restrained by the Affection they bore to that admirable Lady, on Account of her Virtues, and of her Relation to King James. But it always happens with such excellent Persons so nearly related, that the Death or Misfortune of one extinguishes at once all past Resentments, and leaves Room for nothing but Sentiments of Love and Tenderness. The Princess upon the News of her Sister's Death remembered nothing but that Love and Harmony that had reigned between them before the late Difference happened, and all past Misunderstandings being drowned in her Grief, she wrote a Letter to the King full of her Concern for his great Loss, and of Kindness and Duty to himself; desiring Leave to wait upon him, and assuring him of her sincere Respect for him, and Concern for his Interests. The Archbishop of Canterbury took this Opportunity to represent to the King the prudent Conduct of the Princess and her Consort, the Prince of Denmark, during their Recess from Court; that they might have given him great Disturbance in Parliament, but that on the contrary those Members of either House who had Places under their Highnesses, were always among the foremost in promoting his Majesty's Interest. These Reasons, with the Princess's Letter, worked so powerfully on the King, that he immediately presented her Royal Highness with most of her Sister's Jewels; and his Sorrow for the Loss of so good a Wife was much alleviated by the Reconcilement of so kind a Sister. A.D. 1694.

The Day after the Queen was first taken ill, the King had gone to the House of Peers, and passed the Bill for Triennial Parliaments. This was either a Piece of great good Fortune, or a very wise Strain; since every one knew that Bill was not approved by the Court, though much desired by the People; and it gave great Satisfaction that the King had passed it at that Time, which implied his voluntary Concurrence; whereas had the Royal Assent not been given to it till after the Queen's Death, it would have been said, that he was compelled to it by the Necessity of his Affairs.

A remarkable Transaction was soon after A.D. 1695. laid before the House of Commons. On the fifteenth of June of the last Year one Lunt had given Information of a Plot to raise War against the King and Queen. That to this End he had delivered Commissions from King James to several Gentlemen in Lancashire and Cheshire; at whose Instance and Costs he had bought Arms, and enlisted many Persons for King James's Service; and was twice sent by them into France to acquaint King James that they were in Readiness, and to receive his farther Commands. This Deposition was confirmed by that of one George Wilson, who had assisted Lunt in the Delivery of these Commissions. Warrants were issued out to seize the Conspirators; but though some suspicious Arms and Papers were found, there did not appear any convincing Proof of the Truth of the Informations. Several Persons were however apprehended and brought up to London, and committed to Prison. From thence they were sent down to their Tryals at Manchester; where Lunt and Wilson, and several others deposed according to the Informations abovementioned. Upon this Tryal Lunt being ordered to point at the several Prisoners by Name, made a Mistake, and pointed to the wrong Man; but because the Mistake might be occasioned by the Crowd, the Judge ordered him to name and touch them with the Cryer's Staff; and then he named them all right. The Prisoners in their Defence produced one Taffe, who had been acquainted with Lunt, and had accompanied him in the Search that had been made in the several Gentlemen's Houses. This Man declared in the open Court, that the whole Plot was nothing but a villainous Contrivance between himself and Lunt; upon which the King's Counsel stopt all farther Proceedings, and the Prisoners were acquitted. When the King's Counsel returned to London, he represented the Plot there as so wicked a Contrivance, that the Government ordered the

A.D. 1695. the Witnesses to be prosecuted for a Conspiracy against the Lives and Estates of those Gentlemen. But they not being satisfied with this, brought the Affair before the House of Commons.

It is examined in the House of Commons.

It underwent there a careful and strict Examination. On the Behalf of the Gentlemen there were urged Lunt's Mistake in Court, Taffe's Declaration, and the Non-Appearance of the Arms and Commissions mentioned in Lunt's Informations. On the other Side it was said, that it was possible the Persons accused might have Notice sent them to burn their Commissions, and hide their Arms; and that though all that Lunt had sworn to did not appear, yet that enough was found to give Cause of Suspicion. That Lunt's Mistake was immediately rectified upon a more accurate Experiment. That as to Taffe, not to mention that his Declaration was not given upon Oath, he was a Person of an ill Character, having taken the Opportunity of being concerned in the Search of the Gentlemen's Houses, to commit many egregious Felonies; for which scandalous Behaviour, instead of the Reward which he pretended to, he had been slighted and reprimanded. That it was no difficult Matter to tamper with such a Person, and by Bribery to get him off; and that it was actually sworn, that this had been done. That this was confirmed by many foul Practices of the same Kind, that appeared to have been made Use of upon this Occasion by the Friends and Solicitors of the accused Persons. And that lastly, the Truth of the Plot was confirmed by the agreeing Testimonies of numerous Witnesses, some at a great Distance from, and utter Strangers to one another. At last, after several Hearings, Examinations of Witnesses, and long Debates, the House thought fit to confirm the Testimonies given of the Plot, by resolving, First, that there was sufficient Grounds for the Prosecution and Trial of the Gentlemen at Manchester; and secondly, that a dangerous Plot had been carried on against the King and Government. Besides this, a Draught of a Declaration to be published at King James's Landing, being found in the Closet of one Mr. Standish, of Standish-Hall, they ordered him to be taken into Custody; and their Messenger reporting that he was not to be found, they addressed the King to issue out his Proclamation for the apprehending him. Upon this Disappointment, the Enquiry was carried by the Persons concerned into the House of Peers; but when the Question was put, after careful Examinations, and many Debates, whether the Government had sufficient Cause to prosecute the Lancashire and Cheshire Gentlemen, it was carried in the Affirmative. Nevertheless at the Lancaster Assizes, Lunt, Wilson, and Womball, another Witness, were tried for Perjury, and found Guilty; and afterwards indicted for a Conspiracy against the Lives and Estates of the Lancashire Gentlemen. But the latter refusing to furnish the Attorney and Solicitor-

And in the House of Lords.

General with Witnesses to prove the Perjuries alledged, the Prosecution was let fall, and Lunt, Womball, and Wilson discharged.

The Parliament was employed this Session in another very important Enquiry. It seems some Soldiers quartered at Roxton, had been guilty of Abuses in exacting Sub-sistence-Money from the Inhabitants. This was petitioned against in the House of Commons, and the whole Matter being heard and examined, this Exaction was voted illegal, and a Violation of the Liberties of the Subject. But in the Course of this Examination, the House receiving Hints of several Abuses and ill Practices committed by the Officers and Agents, they thought it necessary to look farther into them. And upon Enquiry they ordered Mr. Tracy Pauncefort, Agent of the Regiment complained of, with Mr. Guy, a Member of their House, to be committed to the Tower; and Mr. Edward Pauncefort to the Custody of the Sergeant at Arms. They soon after addressed the King against Colonel Hastings, Commander of the Regiment, who was cashiered. The Abuses discovered already, engaged the House to a farther Examination; and they ordered Mr. James Craggs, and Mr. Richard Harnage, two of the Contractors for clothing the Army, to be examined before the Commissioners for stating the publick Accounts. And because they refused to answer upon Oath to the Things demanded of them, the House ordered a Bill to be brought in to oblige them to it.

It appearing that the House was in earnest in redressing these Corruptions, others were encouraged to bring in new Complaints of the same kind; and the Commissioners for licensing Hackney-Coaches being charged with Bribery, a Committee was appointed to examine the Matter; upon whose Report Henry Ashurst, and Walter Overbury Esquires were honourably cleared; and three others, Henry Killigrew, Henry Villiers, and Richard Gee, Esquires, were declared Guilty, and an Address was voted to remove them; which was done accordingly.

These Proceedings of the House of Commons against smaller Corruptions, gave Rise and Encouragement to a common Rumour, that an Universal Corruption had overspread the Nation; that the Court, the Camp, the City, and even the Parliament, were infected. It was said, that it would be to little Purpose to redress these trifling Grievances, and not to look into others of vastly greater Importance. That none but a House of Commons could make the Enquiry; and that unless they did so, it would give Cause to suspect that they screened the Corruptions of others to keep their own undiscovered. These Reports alarmed the House, who thereupon appointed a Committee to search into the Bottom of this reigning Contagion. In the Years 91, 92, and 93. the Parliament had been much busied about the Affairs of the East-India Company, who declined submitting to the Regulations the House of Commons proposed

A.D. 1695.

An Enquiry this Session into Bribery. The Occasion of it.

Some of the Commissioners for licensing Hackney Coaches censured.

An universal Complaint of Bribery.

A Committee of the Commons appointed to enquire into it.

A.D. 1695. to lay them under; and having procured Friends at the Court, found Means by their Interest there, to frustrate all the Endeavours of the House of Commons; and in the Year 93, procured a new Charter from the King; in Opposition to which the House of Commons had voted, that all Subjects of England have equal Right to trade to the East-Indies, unless prohibited by Act of Parliament. The House was induced by several Reasons, to suspect Corruptions upon this Occasion; and ordered the Committee to inspect the Books of the East-India Company; as also of the Chamberlain of London, on Account of the Orphans Bill, which had been lately set on Foot, where Bribery was also suspected.

The Report of the Committee. Soon after Mr. Foley reported from the Committee, that upon inspecting the Company's Books, they found several Sums charged as expended for special Service in the Years abovementioned; but that the greatest Payments were made in 92 and 93, which amounted to eighty seven Thousand four Hundred and two Pounds, Sir Thomas Cooke being Governor. That they found the Ballance of the Company's Cash-Book October 31. last past, to be one Hundred twenty four Thousand two hundred and forty nine Pounds; but that asking the Cashier, if he had this Ballance in Cash, they understood that ninety Thousand Pounds of it was lent upon Sir Thomas Cooke's Notes. That Sir Benjamin Bathurst acquainted them, that discoursing with Sir Thomas Cooke about it, he was informed that the said ninety Thousand Pound was to gratifie some Persons. That Sir Basil Firebrass had acquainted them that he had offered to several Persons, and to Members of the House of Commons among others, to purchase East-India Stock for them, and offered to lay down the Money; and that he had given an Account to the Company of his doing so, who promised to indemnifie him. The same Committee reported, that they found in the City Chamberlain's Books an Order for paying one Thousand Guineas to Sir John Trevor Speaker, as soon as the Orphans Bill should pass; another to pay Mr. Jodrell, Clerk of the House of Commons, one hundred Guineas for his Service on the same Account; and an Entry made of twenty Guineas paid to Mr. Hungerford, Chairman of the Grand Committee, for his Pains and Service.

Upon these Reports, Sir John Trevor and Mr. Hungerford were expelled the House; and it was ordered that Sir Thomas Cooke should give an Account how the eighty seven Thousand four Hundred and two Pounds abovementioned were laid out. He refused to do this at first; upon which he was committed to the Tower; and a Bill was ordered to be brought in to oblige him to make the Discovery. This Bill passed a few Days after, he having been first heard by his Counsel, and was then sent up to the Lords for their Concurrence.

Sir Thomas Cooke examined and committed to the Tower.

A Bill brought in to oblige him to discover.

When this Bill was first read, the Duke of Leeds, President of the Privy Council, stood up, and spoke vehemently against it. This was much taken Notice of, that a Law of so great Consequence and Necessity, should be warmly opposed by so great a Man; and it was the more observed, because he introduced his Discourse with so many Protestations of his own Innocence, as gave Suspicion. After the Bill was read, Sir Thomas Cooke, by Leave of the Commons, he being a Member of that House, was brought to the Bar of the Lords, where he declared himself ready and willing to make Discoveries, but desired to be indemnified from all Actions and Suits, and from Scandalum Magnatum. Upon this the Lords resolved not to proceed on the Bill sent up from the Commons against Sir Thomas Cooke, but to draw up another to indemnifie him.

He is brought before the Lords.

But soon after this, Notice came from Sir Thomas Cooke, that he was afraid he might be misapprehended as to what he said concerning a Discovery; for that when he said that he was willing and ready, by ready he meant only willing; and that he should need four Months to make the Discovery he promised. But this Prevarication so incensed the Lords, that it was talked of resuming the Bill to oblige him to make Discovery, which terrified him so, that he promised to make it in seven Days. During the Time he was preparing it, the Bill for indemnifying him passed both Houses, and had the Royal Assent. A Committee of both Houses were then appointed to examine him.

April 23. he appeared before them, and gave them an Account of the Disposal of sixty seven Thousand, out of the eighty seven Thousand four Hundred and two Pounds abovementioned; and of that of the other ninety thousand Pounds. He said, that ten thousand Pound was paid for the Service of the King; though he could not say the King had it. That this was a customary Present, used in other Reigns, as appeared by the Books of the Company. He said however, that this was paid in Expectation of having their Charter confirmed. That twelve thousand Pound was paid to one Mr. Aiton, recommended to them as a Person who had Friends that could do great Service to the Company by speaking with Parliament Men. That this was to prevent a Bill depending at that Time for a new East-India Company. That three Hundred and thirty eight Pound was paid to Mr. Nathaniel Molineux, who told him he was to pay the Money to the Lord Rivers; but in Truth kept it himself. That one Thousand Guineas were paid to one Colonel Fitz-Patrick since deceased, who pretended he had great Interest in the Lord Nottingham, and promised to do great Things, if he might have such a Sum; but that he believed he also kept the Money for himself. That five Hundred forty five Pounds

A.D. 1695. Pounds were paid to one Mr. Bates, who was said to have Acquaintance with several Lords, particularly the Marquis of Caermarthen, now Duke of Leeds. That forty Thousand Pounds were paid to Sir Basil Firebrass, ten Thousand Pounds to recompense his Losses in the interloping Trade, and thirty Thousand Pounds upon Contracts made with him, which Money he conceived he was to distribute to several Persons. That two Hundred and twenty Pounds were paid to Sir John Chardin; and three Hundred and fifty Pounds to Paul Dominique Esquire, which Sums he believed were expended for the Company's Service. That three Hundred and eighty two Pounds were paid to Captain Germain, to bring him off from the Interlopers, and engage him in the East-India Company's Interest. And lastly, that the ninety Thousand Pounds were expended in buying ninety nine Thousand one Hundred and ninety seven Pounds Stock for the Use of the Company; that he was accountable for it; that part of the Stock was transferred to the Company, and that the other Part was sold for their Use, and that they had the Money.

Sir Basil Firebrass and Mr. Acton examined.

This Examination being reported to the two Houses, Sir Basil Firebrass and Mr. Acton were ordered to attend the Committee. Sir Basil Firebrass deposed, that the forty Thousand Pounds mentioned as paid to himself, were for his own private Use entirely, on Occasion of great Losses sustained by him for the Service of the Company; and that he paid no Part of that Sum towards any Act of Parliament or Charter, nor ever promised to use it that Way. But he acknowledged he had given two Notes for five Thousand five Hundred Guineas to Mr. Bates abovementioned, whom he thought able to do Service in passing the Charter, as being acquainted with several Persons of Honour; which Notes he had from Sir Thomas Cooke, and was accountable to him for the same. That he could not tell what Bates did with the Money, for that Bates would not deal with him on the Terms of telling Names. That Bates introduced him several Times to the Lord President, the Duke of Leeds, who made some Scruples in Point of Law, which were removed by the Attorney-General. That one Day in the last Week Bates came and offered him the five Thousand Guineas again, saying it might make a Noise; of which he took back only four Thousand four Hundred Guineas. That Bates would have paid the Whole, but Sir Thomas Cooke said the Account would not be even if the other six Hundred Guineas were brought to the Account. He confirmed what was said of the Money paid to Colonel Fitz-Patrick, who, as he said, told them he had offered five Thousand Guineas to the Lord Nottingham upon passing the Charter, and five Thousand Pounds on the Act of Parliament; but that the Earl absolutely refused them. That he had heard also that a Note for fifty Thousand Pounds were offered to the Lord Port- land; but that it was refused by him, not without a severe Reprimand. A.D. 1695.

Mr. Acton deposed, that he had received the twelve Thousand Pounds mentioned as paid to him. That ten Thousand Pounds were to be distributed by him among those he thought likely to serve the Company; and that the other two Thousand Pounds were to recompence his Trouble. That he did not distribute any of the ten Thousand Pounds to Members, but to such as had Interest with Members.

Upon Sir Basil Firebrass's Examination, Mr. Bates was summoned. He deposed, that Sir Basil applied himself to him to use his Interest for obtaining a new Charter, and told him they would be grateful; and that he used his Interest with the Lord President, who said he would do what Service he could. That the Lord President had before delivered his Opinion publickly on the Side of the Charter. That in Return for using his Interest with my Lord, Notes for five Thousand five Hundred Guineas were given him; which were all for his own private Use. That he offered them to my Lord, but he refused them. That indeed my Lord's Servant received the Money, but that it was because the Deponent desired the Servant might be sent, as not being used to tell Money himself; and that after the Servant (whose Name was Monsieur Robert, a Swiss) had received the Money, he brought it back to this Deponent, in whose Custody it had remained till he carried back the four Thousand four Hundred Guineas to Sir Basil. That the Reason why he paid back that Money was, because it made a Noise, and because People might think he did not deserve them. But he happened to be taken in a Contradiction upon a second Examination; for he then said that the four Thousand four Hundred Guineas he paid back were brought him by Monsieur Robert.

Mr. Bates examined.

After this, Sir Basil Firebrass added to his other Informations, that upon an Apprehension that their Business stuck with the Duke of Leeds, he applied himself to Mr. Bates; who told him he would not talk to the Duke, but said, that the Company must tell him what they would do. That he answered, that he thought a Present might be made of two or three Thousand Pounds. That Mr. Bates told him he went to St. James's, and had spoke with his Friend, who said, he had more offered him on the other Side, which he said was five Thousand Pounds. That it was last agreed that the Duke should have first two Thousand and afterwards three Thousand Guineas, and Mr. Bates five Hundred Guineas for himself. That from the Time the Notes for five Thousand five Hundred Guineas were given to Mr. Bates, they had free Access to the Lord President, and found him easy, and willing to give the Company any Assistance. That Mr. Bates was shy, and called him his Friend at St. James's. That the Condition of one Draught of a Counter-

Sir Basil Firebrass's farther Information.

A.D.1695. note, which Mr. Bates brought was worded, In Case the Lord President did not assist the Company in passing the Charter, which this Deponent altered by putting out my Lord's Name. That the Deponent did intend, in Case the Charter and Act of Parliament passed, to have distributed the thirty Thousand Pounds in Manner following; to Sir Edward Seymour, Sir John Trevor, and Mr. Guy, ten Thousand Pounds; to the Merchants Interlopers ten Thousand Pounds, and the remaining ten Thousand Pounds to himself. That Sir Edward Seymour chid him for making the Proposal; but that Sir John Trevor gave him some Hints of his Expectation.

When these Examinations were reported to the House of Commons, they were all on Fire. Warm Speeches were made against the Duke of Leeds; and at last it was carried to impeach him. When the Report was read in the House of Lords, the Duke stood up, and made a Speech, in which he asserted, "That he was wholly unconcerned in the Receipt of the Money; that he had indeed spoken with Sir Basil Firebrass, and lent his Servant to Mr. Bates to receive the Money, and that Mr. Bates offered him that Money; but that he obstinately refused to touch a Penny". He had scarce ended his Speech, when he had private Notice that the Commons were proceeding to an Impeachment against him; upon which he went down in Haste to that House, and desired to be heard. His Speech was much to the same Purpose as that he made to the Lords; insinuating besides, that the Charge against him took its Rise from the private Malice of some particular Persons; and desiring them to reconsider what was done, or else to let him have speedy Justice. But the Duke's Speech was not satisfactory; and so the Impeachment was carried up to the House of Lords, attended by many of the Members; and afterwards a Committee was appointed to draw up Articles, which were for contracting with the East-India Company, or their Agents, for five Thousand five Hundred Guineas to procure them Charters; which Sum was received by him, or his Agents, or Servants, with his Privy and Consent.

There can be no Doubt made, but that the Evidence of Sir Basil Firebrass, and more especially the Contradictions in Mr. Bates's Examinations, gave just Cause to suspect the Duke of Leeds; though we should suppose that Suspicion ever so false at the Bottom. But to impeach him upon Hear-say and doubtful Evidence, without having any Witness in their Power, who could positively charge the Crime upon him, was certainly a false Step in the House of Commons; and favoured too much of that Impetuosity and Precipitation that sometimes attends the Proceedings of that Assembly upon such Accusations, and has as often made them frustrate; as it happened in the present Case.

For there being no body but Monsieur A.D.1695. Robart who was like to charge his Duke on his own Knowledge, it came to pass that when the Serjeant at Arms was sent to summon him to attend the Committee, he was not to be found. This made the Commons Evidence very lame, and indeed put a Stop to their Proceedings. They were forced, when the Lords called upon them to make good their Impeachment, after the Duke's Answer and their Replication had passed in the usual Forms, to return them Answer that Monsieur Robart not being to be found, they were not yet ready to make good their Impeachment. This produced an Address from the Lords to the King, for a Proclamation to stop up the Ports, and seize him. But 'tis observable the Proclamation was not published till about nine Days after the Address.

Robart's Flight put an End to the Impeachment, and gave the Duke an Opportunity of triumphing over his Accusers, who had charged him with a Crime before they had Witness to prove it. To clear himself of the Suspicion of having sent him away, he told the House, that when the Messenger of the House of Commons came for Robart, he was out of Town; but that he (the Duke) sent for him immediately. But when the Man returned, and heard his Lord was accused, and Mr. Bates in Prison, he was so terrified, that he went away towards Harwich, designing for Switzerland. That he knew the Man so well, that he believed he would not be here again in haste; and that therefore he hoped their Lordships would let the Impeachment fall, unless the Commons proceeded against him; it being unreasonable that he should lie under the Disgrace of such an Accusation till a Person was forthcoming, who was not likely to be seen here again. But all farther Proceedings in this Matter were stopped by a Prorogation.

Besides the Affairs abovementioned, another of the utmost Consequence employed the Cares and Wisdom of the Parliament this Session. A Practice had been begun a few Years before of clipping and adulterating the Current Silver Coin of this Kingdom. This was done at first sparingly and cautiously, in Regard to the severe Laws made against it. But the Mischief being either not heeded, or wilfully neglected, it throve upon Impunity to that Degree, that by slow Steps succeeding each other, our Money was so pured by the Clippers, that five Pounds in Silver Specie, was scarce worth forty Shillings according to the Standard; not to mention the vast Quantities of Trash and adulterate Money that was then passed about. 'Tis easier to conceive the numberless Inconveniencies that must attend such a State of our Coin, than to give a Reason why the Evil was suffered to increase to such a mischievous Height. But at last the Disease growing so inveterate that all Men felt it, a new Act was passed this Session to prevent

The Duke of Leeds impeached. His Defence.

The Impeachment at a Stand.

An Act to prevent the Clipping of the Silver Coin.

A.D. 1695. prevent the counterfeiting and clipping the current Coin of the Kingdom.

These were the chief Occurrences that passed this Session. The Commons were still warm upon the Pursuit of Bribery; but the Day after the last Speech of the Duke of Leeds, as they were proceeding to impeach other Persons mentioned in the Report of the Committee, they were interrupted by the Black Rod, who summoned them to attend the King in the House of Peers. The King then thanked them for the Supplies they had given, but told them that his Presence being necessary abroad, he thought it proper to conclude this Session. Then the Parliament was prorogued to the eighteenth of June.

The Parliament prorogued.

The Massacre at Glencoe.

The Parliament in Scotland was busied this Summer upon an extraordinary Occasion. After the Death of the Lord Viscount Dundee, who was slain, as was said above, fighting for King James, his Party declined apace; and the Highlanders came in by Degrees, and submitted to King William. But some of them, being secured by the Difficulty of getting to them, or from other Motives, still held out. A Proclamation of Indemnity had been published, by which all who came in by the first of January 1692. were to be pardoned; and this not bringing in all of them, Instructions were sent to the Commanders to allow the Benefit of the Proclamation to all who would take the Oath of Allegiance, even though the Time fixed for their Submission were elapsed. There was one Mac-Jan Mac-Donald, Laird of Glencoe, who a few Days before the Time prefixed was expired, had come in, and offered to take the Oaths, but was sent by the Officer to another Place, because, as he said, he had not Power to administer them. The Laird of Glencoe upon this went away to Inverary, the chief Town in Argyleshire; but the Weather and the Roads being extremely bad, as was natural in that Countrey, and at that Season, he did not arrive there till the Day after the limited Time was expired; notwithstanding which, the Oaths were administered to him and his Attendants. About a Month after, a Body of Soldiers came to Glencoe, and were there quartered. There was for some Time a very good Correspondence between them and the Glencoe Men, the Commander being taken into the Laird's House; but on a sudden, at five o' Clock one Morning, the Soldiers fell upon their Hosts, and murdered eight and thirty Men in their Beds, set Fire to their Houses, and drove away the Cattle; the poor Women and Children being turned out in that rigorous Season without Habitation or Shelter. This horrible Barbarity was resented, as it deserved, by the Scotch Nation; and it occasioned many heavy Reflections on the Government. The King being informed of this, ordered Commissioners to enquire into it; upon whose Reports to the Parliament, the Earl of Braidalbine was committed Prisoner to Edinburgh Castle; the Execution of the Glencoe Men was voted a Murder, and Lieutenant Colonel Hamilton voted guilty of the same. But before any Progress was made in this Affair, the Parliament was adjourned. It was ordered indeed to be resumed at their next Meeting; but whatever the Reason was, no more was heard of it.

The King went over to Holland, soon after the Parliament of England was dismissed, to attend the Operations of the Campaign. The French Success in Flanders ended with their Victory at Landen; which cost them so dear, that they could only stand upon the Defensive the Year last past; and in this Campaign Fortune proved favourable to the Confederate Arms. Their Forces consisted this Year of about twenty thousand Men more than the French; and King William was too active and vigilant to suffer that Advantage to be lost. His Intentions were to attack Namur, a strong Fortress on the Borders of the Duchy of Luxembourg, famous for the Strength of its Situation, and the vast Works cast up about it, which made it reckoned impregnable. It was a Place of no less Importance than Strength; being as it were the Key of France on that Side; there being only the Towns of Dinant and Charlemont beyond it, to cover the Province of Champagne. The King at the Beginning of the Campaign had laid a Scheme for besieging this Town; but was obliged to conceal his Intention, that if possible the Place might be invested before the French should throw in any Reinforcement, which was to be expected upon the least Suspicion of any Design that Way. And the Number and Strength of the Garrison and Fortifications made the Attempt difficult enough already. To this End he made a Feint of attacking the French on the opposite Side of the Countrey; and his Scheme succeeded so well, that he drew all their Forces that Way, without the least Suspicion on their Part of his real Intention. But as soon as he had done this he sent Orders to a Body, which he had kept for that Purpose as near Namur as he could without giving Umbrage, to go immediately and invest the Place. The French hearing of the Motion of those Troops, were very much surprised; and the Marechal Boufflers made all possible Speed that Way with a strong Reinforcement of Troops, with the famous Monsieur Megrigny, and others of their best Engineers and Gunners; and marched with such a critical Celerity, that he arrived at Namur before the Town was wholly invested, or the Lines of Circumvallation compleated; and threw himself into the Place with all the Forces he brought with him. So that the Garrison now consisted of near fifteen Thousand Men, and most of them the best Troops of France. This gave a discouraging Prospect to the Allies; but it is the Nature of great Minds, like that of King William, to be then most present and secure, when all others are filled with Despair or Doubt. He continued firm to his Purpose, and soon after came in Person with the main Body of his Army before the

The Campaign in Flanders.

The King resolves to besiege Namur.

The French throw Relief into it.

But the King persists in his Intentions.

A.D.1695. the Town; leaving a considerable Force in Flanders under Prince Vaudemont to observe the Motions of the French Army there under the Mareschal de Villeroy; who was not like to be idle in those Parts, while the King was employed in the Siege of Namur.

The Difficulty of the Attempt.

The Enterprize was difficult and hazardous. The Town and Castle were provided with all the Defence that Nature, Art and Expence could furnish; and there was a powerful Army on foot which might be at least able to incommode the Besiegers, if not to attack them. The Garrison was brave, numerous, well commanded, and furnished with all Necessaries in all the Abundance that could be desired. So that the French made no doubt of frustrating this Attempt, which they called an unparalleled Temerity, and said that Namur would be the Rock on which the Grand Confederacy would split. But all these great, and in Appearance invincible, Obstacles, were not able to shake King William. They only served to keep his Fortitude, Prudence and Vigilance awake, and make him concert effectual Measures for surmounting all Difficulties; which he did to his immortal Glory, the Astonishment of his Enemies, and the Admiration of all Europe.

The French march to attack Prince Vaudemont.

The Siege of Namur was scarce begun, before the King received Advice of a great Danger his Forces had escaped, which he had left under Prince Vaudemont to cover Flanders. As soon as the King was gone, the French Army under Villeroy put themselves in Motion. Prince Vaudemont not knowing their Design was much perplexed; for on the one hand he apprehended they would follow the King to Namur, in which case it was necessary he should attend them, to reinforce the King's Army in case of an Attack; and on the other hand he feared they might take a contrary Course, and fall upon some of the Maritime Towns of Flanders. He saw that if he marched to the Right he should prevent their surprizing the King, but should leave the Towns of Flanders exposed; if he marched to the Left, he should indeed cover those Towns, but then the French would be two Days March before him in their Way to Namur. But the French had neither of those Intentions the Prince suspected; but knowing that the Forces under his Command were vastly inferior to their own, were upon the March directly to attack him. The Doubt he had been in concerning their Designs, had made him stay in his Camp a whole Day without Motion; which gave the French such an Advantage that they came in Sight of him on the Evening of that Day. He at first ordered his Camp to be fortified, resolving to expect them; but when he saw they not only appeared in his Front, but sent a Party to secure a Post in his Rear, he began to apprehend being surrounded, and to think of making a Retreat. This seemed as dangerous as Fighting, the Enemy being so near; who were not like to miss the Opportunity of falling upon him with twice his Number of Men, as soon as they should perceive the least Motion that Way. But it was the only Counsel that was left; and by the Prince's extraordinary Conduct and Judgment, the Motions towards retreating were so dextrously concealed, that the French suspected nothing of it, till the whole Army of the Allies disappeared on a sudden, and got so far the Start of the French, that they were unable to overtake them. Some few of the French Horse made a Shift to come up with them, and killed a few Men by feigning themselves of the Confederates Side, but they were soon made to retire; and by the next Morning the Troops were all secure under the Walls of Ghent. This Retreat was allowed by all to be one of the most glorious Retreats we find in Story; and the King wrote to Prince Vaudemont, that he had given in this Retreat greater Marks of a General consummate in the Art of War, than if he had won a Battle. The French being thus disappointed, formed a Design upon Newport; but it was prevented by Prince Vaudemont's sending a great Reinforcement to the Garrison. This failing, they attacked Dixmuyde and Deynse, which were surrendered without firing a Gun; for which one of the Governors was punished with Death, the other with Infamy.

He makes a fine Retreat.

During this, the Siege of Namur went on, with such Diligence and Success on the Part of the Allies, that they gained some Advantage almost every Day; notwithstanding the furious Resistance of the Besieged, who defended the Place with all the Bravery and Skill that could be expected from valiant and experienced Soldiers. At last the Outworks being all gained by the Besiegers, and Breaches made in the innermost Fortification wide enough for an Assault, the French seeing that all Preparations for a Storm were ready, declined to stand it; and Count Guiscard who commanded in the Town sent out to capitulate. The Articles being agreed on, the French evacuated the Town, and retired into the Castle.

The Siege of Namur goes on successfully.

The Town surrendered.

While this Siege was going on, the English Fleet was carrying Terror along the Coast of France. The Town of St. Malo's, which was a Nest of Privateers, who had infested our Channel and trading Ships, felt the Fury of an English Bombardment this Summer. But the Loss they sustained on Land, was not answerable to the Mischief they did to us at Sea. The English afterwards set Fire to Granville, but were unsuccessful at Dunkirk and Calais. The French King so resented these Insults of the English on his Sea-Coasts, that he sent Orders to the Mareschal de Villeroy to bombard Brussels. Prince Vaudemont endeavoured to hinder his Approach; but found it impracticable without giving the French an Opportunity of posting themselves between him and the King's Army before Namur, which might have occasioned the raising of that important Siege; the King's Army being unequal to that of the French, unless reinforced by the Troops under the Prince's Command. So that all

The French Sea-Ports bombarded.

A.D. 1695. he could do was to post himself as well as he could, to secure the City of Brussels against any farther Attempt.

The French bombard Brussels.

The French Army soon after appear'd before Brussels, and the Marechal sent a Letter to the Governor, the Prince of Bergben, to let him know that he had Orders from his Master to bombard the Town, by Way of Reprizal for what the English did on his Coasts. That as soon as he could be assured the Sea-Ports of France should be no more bombarded, his Master would not bombard any Place belonging to the Princes with whom he was at War. That as he understood the Electress of Bavaria was within the Town, if the Governor would let him know in what Part she was, he was commanded not to fire there. The Elector of Bavaria had posted to Brussels from the Camp before Namur, and having seen this Letter, sent Answer, that he would acquaint the King with it, and that he should have an Answer in twenty four Hours; acquainting him also, that the Electress was at the Royal Palace. But the Marechal would not stay so long, but that very Evening began to fire upon the City with twenty five Mortar-Pieces, and eighteen Pieces of Cannon that shot red hot Bullets. It was not long before the Fire broke out in several Places. The French continued firing without Intermission all that Night, the next Day, and the Night after that; during which arose a high Wind, which would have spread the Conflagration through the City, if the Inhabitants had not blown up several Houses. But the next Day about Noon the French gave over Firing, and drew off. The lower Town suffered the most by the Enemy's Bombs, and many Houses about the Market Place were laid in Rubbish. The Electress of Bavaria, though she was removed to a safe Place out of the Reach of the Cannon, was so frightened with the continual Roaring that she miscarried upon it.

The Siege of the Castle of Namur vigorously carried on.

The Siege of the Castle of Namur was carried on with a Vigour, equal if not superior to that of the Town. The Besiegers having opened the Trenches, erected no less than twelve Batteries; from whence they played upon the Castle with such Fury as was never known since Gun-powder was invented. The Air was filled with Fire and Smoke, and the Thunder of the Cannon and Mortars; which sent into the Castle such incessant Showers of Bombs and red-hot Bullets, as drove all the Garrison into subterraneous Shelters, except those who by the Discipline of War were obliged to be upon Duty, and stand the terrible Brunt as well as they could. This Fury was accompanied with such a Regularity of Proceeding, that all the Attempts of the Garrison to disturb the Besiegers were continually frustrated.

The Marechal de Villeroy unwilling to bear the Loss of so important a Place without attempting to relieve it, drew together a considerable Reinforcement from the neighbouring Towns, and joining these to his own Forces marched towards Namur.

Prince Vaudemont upon this moved with all his Troops the same Way, and posted himself in a strong Camp within five Miles of Namur. The Marechal de Villeroy made some Offers of attacking the Confederates, but he found the Enterprize too dangerous to be undertaken in earnest. And the King feared him so little, that he gave Orders for a general Attack of the Castle in Sight of the whole French Army; one of the most memorable that ever was made, whether we consider the Extent and Strength of the Works that were to be attacked, the Valour and Skill of the Garrison that defended them, or the Intrepidity and Conduct with which the Besiegers overcame all Difficulties and Opposition. At last after an Action of several Hours, the Allies possessed themselves, though not of all, yet of a great Part of the Enemy's Works; so that finding a second Assault preparing for, the Garrison desired to capitulate. And the Articles being with little Difficulty agreed on, in three Days Time the Castle was delivered up. The King gained immortal Glory by succeeding in this Enterprize, which was thought at first so hazardous. And he had the Satisfaction to find it acknowledged by all, that his own Prudence and Bravery was the undisputed Cause of his Success; to which Fortune seemed to have relinquished any Claim.

A general Attack made upon it.

The Garrison capitulates.

The Marechal de Villeroy, being informed of the Surrender of the Castle of Namur, by a triple Discharge of all the Artillery, and three Salvoes in a running Fire along the Lines of the Confederate Army, laid aside all Thoughts of Fighting; and having sent two Thousand Men to reinforce the Garrison of Dinant, he marched with the rest of his Army towards Mons. As the Garrison marched out of the Castle the Marechal Boufflers was arrested by the King's Order, and seized, by Way of Reprisal for the Garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynse, who were detained contrary to the Capitulation, and many of them forced to list in the French Service. The Arrest of so great an Officer brought the French to Reason; and the Marechal having received Permission to engage his Word for the Release of those Garrisons, he was soon after set at Liberty; and conducted to Dinant. And not long after this both the Armies separated.

In Catalonia the Spaniards were not so unsuccessful as they had been the last Years. Two considerable Parties of the French were beaten by them; and they besieged Palamos with such Success, that they had certainly taken the Place, if Admiral Ruffel, who with his Fleet assisted them in the Siege, had not been obliged to leave it upon a false Report that the French Fleet intended to sail from Toulon into the Ocean. But this put an End to the Progress of the Spaniards, and the Campaign with it.

The Campaign in Catalonia.

The Campaign in Italy was still less favourable to the French, by the Loss they had of the important Place of Casal. This Fortrefs had been blocked up a long Time

The Campaign in Italy.

A.D. 1695. by the Confederate Forces to little Purpose, upon which a Siege was resolved on, and prosecuted with so much Success, that in a few Days the Allies became Masters of it. It was agreed in the Capitulation that the Fortifications should be demolished; and the Duke of Savoy, who was leaning towards the French, caused that Work to go on so slowly, that it kept the Confederates from attempting any other Enterprize this Campaign. On the Rhine nothing was done; the two Armies offering and avoiding Battle in their several Turns.

The Parliament dissolved.

The King makes a Progress.

An idle Report of a Design to poison him at Oxford.

The Parliament meets.

A Bill for regulating Trials for High-Treason.

The King returned to England on the eleventh of October, where the first Thing he did was to dissolve the present Parliament, and call another to meet a Month after, during which the King made a Progress; in the Course of which he made a Visit to Oxford. Being received there with the usual Formalities, it was expected he would dine there; and accordingly a magnificent Entertainment was provided. But it happened that a Letter fell into the Hands of the Duke of Ormond, the Chancellor, which intimated that a Design was laid to poison the King at Dinner; which being shewn him by the Duke, the King inconsiderately giving it Credit, resolved neither to eat nor drink there, but immediately took Coach for Windsor; excusing himself from going to see the Colleges by saying, that this was a Visit of Kindness and not of Curiosity, he having seen the University before. This Slight put upon that eminent Body, and so extreme a Caution upon such slender Grounds, seem unsuitable to the King's Character both for Prudence and Courage, and they were accordingly much resented.

The Parliament met Nov. 22. and chose Paul Foley, Esq; Speaker. The King's Speech was upon the usual Topicks; and was answered by suitable Addresses from both Houses. The first Thing the Commons went upon, was a Bill for regulating Tryals in Cases of High-Treason, which had been lost in former Parliaments, but now passed both Houses. By this excellent Law many Hardships which had before lien on Prisoners in those Cases were removed; and they were allowed to speak for themselves by Council. It was ordered that upon the Tryal of any Peer or Peeres for Treason, all the Peers who had Right to vote in Parliament, should be summoned to appear and vote upon the Tryal. This Bill having passed, the Commons voted two Million five hundred Thousand Pounds for the Navy; two Million seven Thousand eight Hundred and eighty two Pounds for the Land Forces; sixteen Thousand nine Hundred and seventy two Pounds for the Officers of the Marine Regiments; and five hundred Thousand Pounds for the Office of Ordnance, Pay of General Officers, Transports, and other Contingencies.

These large Supplies being granted, they resolved to raise them by a Land Tax of four Shillings in the Pound, and continuing the Duties on Wines, Vinegar, Tobacco, East-India Goods, and Salt; and by laying a Duty on French Wines, Brandies, and Vinegar. A.D. 1695.

But the most important Affair that employed the Parliament, was the State of the Coin. How it was corrupted, has been above taken notice of; and if the Law made the last Parliament had put a Stop to the Progress of the Mischief, it could not remedy that which was already done. The House of Commons in a Grand Committee took this weighty Matter into Consideration.

The ruinous State of the Coin.

The first Question was, whether it was necessary or expedient to recoin the Silver Money; upon which the House was divided, and the Arguments were weighty on both Sides. The Reasons against calling in and recoinning the Silver Money were: That it was not a fit Conjuncture; that the Nation was engaged in a burthensome and doubtful War, by which the Kingdom had already greatly suffered, and of which it grew every Day more sensible. That therefore the People on whose Affection the Government so much depended, should not be provoked by fresh Grievances, and those greater than any they had yet felt; as those would certainly be, that must arise from calling in the Silver Coin. That if this was done, however Things might be managed or accommodated at home, it would be impossible to maintain either the Commerce or the War abroad; for neither the Merchant would receive his Bills of Exchange, nor the Soldier his Subsistence. That if this Design should be prosecuted, Trade must stand still for want of mutual Payments, whence such Disorder and Confusion would certainly follow as would dishearten and discourage the People to the highest Degree, and perhaps reduce them to Despair, which might carry them to terrible Extremities. That therefore the recoinning the Money at this Time, was not to be attempted without hazarding all.

Debates about recoinning the Silver Money.

Arguments against it.

It was alledged by those of a contrary Opinion, at the Head of whom appeared Mr. Charles Montague, Chancellor of the Exchequer, afterwards Lord Halifax; that the Mischief would be fatal if a present Remedy was not found out and applied. That by reason of the ill State of the Coin, the Exchange abroad was infinitely to the Nation's Prejudice. That the Supplies raised to maintain the Army would never answer their End, being so much diminished by the unequal Exchange and exorbitant Premiums, before they reached the Camp. That this was the Cause that the Guineas advanced to thirty Shillings, and foreign Gold in Proportion; and that therefore not only the Dutch, but all other Nations of Europe, would send that Commodity to this Market; till by exchanging our Goods or our Silver for their Gold, we should at last have only Guineas to trade with; which no Body could think our Neighbours would take back at the Value they went for here. That upon these Accounts this Disease would every Day take deeper Root, infect the very Vitals of the Nation,

And for it.

A.D.1695. Nation, and if not remedied, would soon become incurable. That our Enemies must be mightily intimidated by so great an Action, and would sooner agree to honourable Terms of Peace; in case they saw us able to surmount this Difficulty, by retrieving the ill State of our Coin, on which their Hopes of the Nation's speedy Ruin so much depended; and that it would justly create a mighty Esteem abroad of the Wisdom and Greatness of the Parliament of England, which was able to conquer such an obstinate and almost insuperable Evil in such a Juncture of Affairs.

The latter Side prevails. The whole Matter being fully debated and considered, the Commons resolved to call in and recoin the Silver Money, chusing rather to run the Hazard of some great Inconveniences by attempting the Cure of the Disease, than by longer neglecting it, to expose the Kingdom to apparent Ruin.

Farther Debates on the same Subject. This Step being made, the next was to consider whether the several Denominations of the new Money should have the same Weight and Fineness as the old, or whether the established Standard should be raised? And this Question produced many Debates. Some were for raising the Standard; and gave it as their Reason, that the Price of Silver in Bullion being then at six Shillings and three Pence the Ounce, it was necessary to raise the Value of the same when coined to the same Price; otherwise if the Silver in Bullion were dearer than the same in Coin, the Consequence must infallibly be that the Coin would be melted down. That this raising of the Value of the Coin would prevent the Exportation of it, and would besides encourage People to bring their Plate and Bullion to the Mint.

On the other Side it was argued, that this Rise of the Value of Silver Bullion was a mere Fallacy; that it was true People commonly gave 6s. 3d. an Ounce for Bullion, but that was only when they paid for it in clipt Money; which were Shillings and Pence in Name only, but were no more so in the just Sense of the Word, than an Ell can be said to be an Ell after the third Part of it is cut off. That this was so evident, that it was Matter of Fact at that Time, that though with clipt Pieces one could not purchase Bullion under 6s. 3d. the Ounce; yet with new milled Pieces which had not suffered any Diminution, one might buy as much Bullion as one pleased at 5s. 2d. This being made clear, it was easy to see that all that imaginary Value to which the Coin should be raised above its native Worth must be in the Course of Exchange so much Loss to us abroad, and some Time or other a great Detriment at home.

The Commons resolve that the Silver Money be recoined. After the Debates on this Subject, the Commons resolved to recoin the clipt Money according to the established Standard of the Mint, both as to Weight and Fineness; and to make it more easy to the People, they voted a Recompence for the Deficiency of the clipt Money, and that the Loss of such clipt Money should be born by the Publick, and a Fund of one Million two hundred Thousand Pounds was to be settled for that Purpose, which Sum was afterwards raised by the Tax on Window-Lights.

The Parliament was sensible of the Inconveniences that would attend the calling in and recoinng the Silver Money; the principal of which would be a Cessation of Payments, and thereupon an Interruption of Commerce. They therefore agreed to call in the old Money by Degrees, that while some Denominations of Coin were suppressed, others might be Current; hoping that before the last Money should come in to be recoined, so much of the new might circulate from the Mint, as might answer the Necessities of the Nation. Thereupon they resolved, "First, That a Day should be appointed, after which no clipt Crowns, or Half-Crowns, nor any Money clipt within the Ring should pass in Payment, unless towards the King's Revenue. Secondly, That a Day be appointed, after which no clipt Money should pass in any Payment whatsoever. Thirdly, That a Day be appointed for all Persons to bring in their clipt Money, to be recoined into Milled-Money, after which no Recompence should be made for the same"; and the King issued out his Proclamation pursuant to these Resolutions.

The Days appointed by the King's Proclamation for putting a Stop to the Currency of clipt Money were so sudden, that thereby an immediate Stop was put to Trade. This was partly occasioned by the Backwardness of the People to receive any old Money though allowed for the present to pass, apprehending that it would at last be left upon their Hands; partly from the Slowness of Recoining, in Respect to the People's Wants, though dispatched with all the Expedition imaginable in so great an Affair; and partly from the unequal intrinsic Value between the new-milled Money, and those Pieces or Denominations of the old Money which were allowed to be Current. For while the hammered Money, and Pieces not clipt within the Ring, were permitted to pass for the Necessity of Trade, no body was willing to make Payments in new Money, which so much exceeded the old in its intrinsic Worth. And therefore the new Silver-Money, as fast as it issued from the Mints and the Exchequer, generally stopped in the Hands of the first Receivers; for none were disposed to make Payments in the new Silver Coin at the old Standard, when they could do it in Pieces so much below it. Those who had no Payments to make, kept their new Money in their Chests, like Medals or Rarities; and there was Reason to believe, that at first a great deal of the new Money, by the Help of the Melting-Pot, went abroad in Ingots to purchase Gold there, which, by the high Price of Guineas which were at 30s. was become a very profitable Commodity in England. These Inconveniences being represented to the Commons, the House in a grand Committee consider'd Regulations to prevent the Inconveniences that might arise from thence.

The Difficulties the Publick underwent.

A.D. 1696. considered the State of the Nation; and how to prevent the Stop of Commerce during the Re-coining of the clipt Moneys. After some Debates on several Days the Commons resolved, "That the Recompence for supplying the Deficiency of clipt Money, should extend to all clipt Money which was Silver, though of a coarser Alloy than the Standard. Secondly, that such Money be received in all Payments towards his Majesty's Revenue. Thirdly, that a Reward of five Pound per Cent. be allowed to all who should bring in either milled or broad unclipt Money, to be applied in Exchange of the clipt Money throughout the Kingdom. Fourthly, that a Reward of 3 d. per Ounce be given to all Persons who should bring in wrought Plate to the Mint to be re-coined. Fifthly, that for the sooner bringing in the clipt Money any Person might pay in their whole next Year's Tax of 4 s. in the Pound, in the said clipt Money, at one convenient Time appointed for that Purpose. Lastly, that Commissioners be appointed in every County, to pay and distribute the milled and broad unclipt Money, and the new coined Money, and to receive the clipt Money". A Committee was appointed to bring in a Bill upon these Resolutions, which after a second Reading was committed to a Committee of the whole House. It was resolved afterwards to give a farther Encouragement for the bringing in of Plate to be coined, and of broad Money to be exchanged for clipt Money. And two Clauses were inserted in the Bill, one to prevent the melting and Exportation of the Coin, and another to prohibit the Use of Plate in Publick Houses. This last proved the best Expedient to supply the Mints with Silver; there being few Publick Houses who had not Silver Tankards, and other Utensils of the same Metal; the Use of which being prohibited, the Owners chose rather to carry them to the Mint, and turn them into ready Money, than to let them lie useless at home.

A Debate about the Price of Guineas.

At last a Bill for regulating the ill State of the Coin of this Kingdom, passed the Houses and the Royal Assent; at which Time the King gave his Sanction also to the famous Act for regulating Trials in Cases of High-Treason. The next Thing the House of Commons took into Consideration was, the high Value to which Guineas were raised. This produced a Debate. The Reasons against lowering the Price of Guineas were, that the People were easie, and pleased with it; that Abundance of People would be Losers, in whose Hands the Guineas should be found at last, which would raise great Disturbance and Clamour in the Nation; and therefore in that Juncture of Affairs it was not proper to incense the People, who had already suffered so much by the War. On the other Hand it was argued, that there was as great Reason to bring down Guineas, as to recoin the Silver Money at the old Standard. That though the Parliament, by the Necessity of Affairs A.D. 1696. was obliged to suffer for a Time the Guineas to pass at that excessive Rate, that, in some Measure, there might be a Currency of Money, while the Mints were employed in new coining the Silver; yet that now they were obliged to sink the Price of them nearer the old Standard, that the Silver Money might not be stoppt and hoarded up as fast as it issued from the Mints. And that whatever Losses and Inconveniencies private Persons might suffer by the reducing of Guineas, yet that the Mischiefs that arose, and would daily increase by not doing it, did vastly overballance those on the other Side. Upon this it was resolved to lower the Price of Guineas, but that it might be done with the less Grievance and Dilquiet to the People, they were at first reduced to eight and twenty Shillings; thirteen Days after to twenty six, and at last a Clause was inserted in the Bill for encouraging the bringing Plate to the Mint, by which they were settled at two and twenty Shillings; from whence they naturally sunk to their former Price of one and twenty Shillings and six Pence. However, though the Parliament lowered the Value of the Guineas, hoping to bring out the new Money into Circulation, yet by the Artifice and Management of some Men, the People were made to believe that the Price of Gold would be raised the next Session; upon which Abundance of Men that had great Sums of Guineas, kept them close in their Chests. By this Means, though the Circulation of the new Money was a little promoted, yet that of Guineas, by which the Nation chiefly subsisted, was considerably obstructed. The new Silver Money too, which People were made to believe, would be also advanced in Value when the Parliament should next meet, was for that Reason much hoarded up, to the great Damage of Commerce. Another Evil arose during the re-coining of the Money; namely, a general Loss of Credit, which shook the State. But this was cured by a seasonable and wise Remedy, which the Parliament found out the next Session. And such Diligence was used, not only in the Mint at the Tower, but likewise in those which the King ordered to be set up at York, Bristol, Exeter, and Chester; that at last, to the immortal Honour of the Parliament in general, and of Mr. Montague in particular, who was the chief Manager, this difficult Undertaking was happily accomplished; on the Steps of which we have been the more large, on Account of the Rarity as well as Importance of this remarkable Transaction.

With this prudent Care of the National Concerns, the Parliament mixed some Proceedings not agreeable to the King. An Act of Parliament had, it seems, passed in Scotland, for erecting there a Company trading to Africa and the East-Indies; in which it was provided that the Ships, Goods, Members and Servants of that Company, should be free from all Duties and Burthens for Their Price lowered from 30 s. to 22 s.

The Inconveniencies felt by the Publick at this Time.

A Scotch East-India and African Company erected

A.D. 1696. for one and twenty Years. Another Clause was also therein, that in Case of any Damage done to the Company, the King would interpose his Authority to have Reparation made them; and that upon the Publick Charge. This Act produced an Address from the English Lords and Commons jointly, laying before him the great Detriment that would arise to the English East-India Trade from this Scotch Establishment, occasioned by the Advantages granted by the first of those Clauses to the one and the Burthens with which the other was oppressed, to the utter Ruine of the English Trade in Course of Time; and that by the second Clause the King seemed to be engaged to employ the Naval Strength of the Nation to support this new Company, so detrimental to his English Subjects. The King answered them with his usual Moderation, that he had been ill served in Scotland, but that he hoped some Remedies might be found to prevent the Inconveniencies which might arise from that Act. But the Commons went still farther, impeaching a great Number of Persons of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, who were concerned in it. But one Roderick Mackenzie, who had given Evidence against those Persons, changing his Mind, made his Escape while the Committee was drawing up the Impeachments; and though the King issued out a Proclamation to apprehend him, he got away; which lamed all farther Proceedings. But upon this Occasion a Bill was ordered to be brought in for erecting a Council of Trade.

The English Parliament address against it.

A Grant made to the Earl of Portland.

The Commons address against it.

Another Affair was, about this Time, brought before the House of Commons, which touched the King very sensibly. The Earl of Portland had, it seems, begged of the King the Lordships of Denboigh, Bromfield and Yale, in the County of Denbeigh, which the King, whose Weakness lay towards his Favourites, granted, not only to him, but to his Heirs for ever; an Instance of his Favour not only too great in it self, but especially at that Time unreasonable, when the Burden of supporting the Crown lay so heavy upon the Nation. This Warrant coming before the Lords of the Treasury, the Gentlemen of the County desired to be heard against the Grant; and their Reasons appeared so weighty, that the Lords of the Treasury promised to represent them to the King. From the Treasury the Gentlemen attended the Grant to the Privy-Seal, where their Complaints were candidly heard; but the Grant being as yet only superseded, but not recalled, they addressed themselves by Petition to the House of Commons. Upon this Occasion Mr. Price, a Member of that House, set forth the Exorbitancy of that Grant in such strong Colours, that he drew the House to address the King against it; who finding no Remedy but Compliance, said to them that he had a Kindness for my Lord Portland, which he had deserved by long and faithful Services; that he should not have given him those Lands, if he could have imagined the A.D. 1696. House of Commons would have been so much concerned; but that since they were so, he would recal the Grant, and find some other Way of shewing him his Favour.

The Diminution which these Proceedings of the Parliament had brought on King William's Royal Dignity, was made up to him about a Month after by the Discovery of a Plot, which, as usual, raised the Spirits of his Friends, as much as it discountenanced those who were not well affected to him. The Correspondence that was always kept on Foot between the Jacobites here, and King James's Court at St. Germain, began to form it self into a regular Scheme for the Restoration of that Prince. It was projected that an Invasion should be made from France, which should be countenanced and promoted by a sudden Assassination of King William, and the Confusion it was expected the Nation would fall into upon such a terrible and unforeseen Accident. But when this Scheme was communicated in England, most of those who agreed to assist the Invasion, upon their mistaken Notions of Duty and Loyalty, had too true a Sense of Honour and Conscience to agree to the Assassination, and declared themselves against it. Some few only consented to it, who kept their Counsels to themselves, without communicating the same even to those of their own Party who were of a different Mind. The Court of St. Germain, who lived in French Air, and were not so much touched with those Notions of Generosity that English Liberty inspires, endeavoured to keep up both these separate Parties, and to give Encouragement to both. It was agreed between that Court and the Party for the Assassination, that the Blow should be given at the Beginning of 1695. But this did not take Effect, and the King got in Safety to his Army in Flanders.

This put off all farther Attempts till his Return, so that the Summer of 1695. was spent in Consultations about bringing on the Invasion, that it might fall in with the proposed Murder of the King. They sent one Mr. Charnock to solicit the Invasion at the French Court, and to procure a Commission from King James, which was, as some say, to attack the Prince of Orange in his Winter Quarters, by which was understood the killing him; or, as others say, only to levy War against him. The Court of France gave Ear to the Proposal of an Invasion, but acted with so much Refinement, that they gave Charnock a positive Denial; saying, that the King of France could not spare so many Men. Nevertheless they went on with the Preparations for this Expedition, and with such Secrecy, that King James himself did not know the Reasons of them, till every Thing was just ready. Then in December 1695. the Commission was brought over by Sir George Barclay, who being either ordered, or disposed of himself to assist the Invasion by taking off the King, fell

The Assassination Plot.

A.D. 1696. in with those Jacobites who agreed to that wicked Part of the Design. Several Ways were proposed to effect this. Some indeed were for only seizing the King, and carrying him alive into France, but this was laughed at. Others proposed to kill the King at Kensington, by attacking his Guards, and forcing his Palace in the Dead of Night, but this was laid aside as impracticable. Others again were for murdering him as he came on Sundays from Kensington to St. James's Chapel; for which Purpose forty Men well armed were to attack the Guards, which did not then exceed twenty five in Number, while six Men on Foot should shut Hide-Park Gate, and the rest assassinate the King. It was also proposed to kill the Coach Horses as they were entering into the Park, that the Passage being stopped, the Guards might be prevented from coming up, till the Assassins had done their Work. Another Proposal was to murder the King as he returned from Hunting, in a narrow Lane near Richmond, leading to the Thames, on the other Side of the Water, about an hundred and fifty Paces long; in which there is a Gate, that, when shut, would hinder Coaches and Horses from coming that Way. One of the Conspirators was sent to view this Ground, and another to survey the Lane abovementioned; but Sir George Barclay disapproved it; so that this Project also was laid aside. At last they all fixed upon a Place between Turnham-Green and Brentford, in a Moorish Bottom, where there is a Bridge, and divers Roads that cross one another. On the North-Side there is a Road that goes round Brentford, and on the South, a Lane that leads to the River, so that Passengers may come thither several Ways. After passing the Bridge the Road grows narrow, having on one Side a Foot Path, and on the other a high thick Hedge; and here this wicked Attempt was to be perpetrated. And indeed, all Circumstances considered, a fitter Place could hardly have been found; for the King often returned late from Hunting, and usually passed through this Lane, after landing at Queen's-Ferry, attended with only five or six of his Guards. For it was his Custom to enter the Ferry-Boat in his Coach, and as soon as he landed on this Side of the Water, to go on without expecting the rest of the Guards, who waited on the Surrey Side, till the Ferry-Boat returned to bring them over. For this Purpose the Conspirators were divided into three Parties, and were to make their Approaches three several Ways; one Party being to attack the Guards in the Front, another in the Rear, while a third was to fall upon the King himself in his Coach. The fifteenth Day of February was appointed for the Execution of this horrible Design.

But all the while this was transacting, the Court had an Account of what passed by one Richard Fisher, who was informed by one Harrison a Priest, who took him to be of their Party. One Mr. Grimes also gave some Information. But these either not A.D. 1696. knowing, or refusing to tell the Names of the Conspirators, their Informations were but little regarded.

While these Things passed in England, The Preparations in new Levies were made in France during the Winter of 1695. and a great Number of Forces were ordered to file off towards Dunkirk and Calais. A Squadron of Men of War, with four Hundred Transports, and thirty Battalions to be put on Board them were provided there, in order to invade England as soon as the Blow should be given; and the Forces were to be commanded by King James in Person. The Conjunction was very favourable to this Enterprize. A very inconsiderable Number of Troops was then in England; the great Ships were many of them laid up, and those who were fitted out had Orders to sail to the Streights; and besides, the true Design of the French in bringing together this Force was not suspected. But the Divine Providence which has so often saved these Nations, was pleased to dissipate this Storm also.

On the fourteenth of February one Mr. Pendergrafs came at Night to the Earl of Portland, and without Ceremony accosted him in these Words: Pray, my Lord, persuade the King to stay at home to Morrow; for if he goes abroad to hunt, he will be murdered. This unusual Information made the Earl carry him to the King, though it were so late. He then laid before the King the whole Plot; and his Behaviour appearing suitable to a Man of Honour, great Stress was laid upon what he said. The next Day the same Discovery was made by another Person, Mr. de la Rue. These two Informations agreed very well together, but both of them peremptorily refused to name the Conspirators. But at last the King, taking them separately into his Closet, found Means to prevail upon them, a Promise being made them that they should not be used as Evidences.

These Discoveries not being as yet known publicly, King James on the eighteenth of February, came in a Post Chaise to Calais; upon whose Arrival the Troops, Artillery and Stores were ordered to be put Aboard with all possible Diligence. This being done in the Neighbourhood of Flanders, the Elector of Bavaria, and the other Commanders of the Confederate Troops there, were soon informed of it; and apprehending the Danger England was in, gave the King Notice by several Expresses; and the Duke of Wurtemberg stopped all the Ships at Ostend and Bruges, and sent over to England the Forces under his Command for the King's Service. But before this was done, the King had received the Information above related; and the Measures taken here soon put a Stop to the intended Invasion. A Proclamation was issued out for the apprehending of the Conspirators; the Forces in England were put in a Readiness to march, and a Train of Artillery was prepared to attend them.

The Ways that were proposed to kill the King

A Place fixed on.

The Plot discovered by Mr. Pendergrafs.

A.D. 1696. them. Admiral Ruffel went to Deal to command the Fleet; which by a wonderful Providence, had been detained in the Downs by contrary Winds for some Weeks. And this Fleet being reinforced by other Men of War from the River, and twelve Dutch Ships from Spithead, in five or six Days the Admiral had near sixty Men of War, with which he stood over to Calais and Dunkirk, and the Appearance of his Ships put an utter Stop to any farther Progress towards the Invasion of England.

The King communicates the same to the Parliament.

The King having now sufficient Evidence of the Reality of the Conspiracy, went and acquainted the Parliament with it. His Speech was seconded by another made in the House of Commons by Sir William Trumbull, Secretary of State, an able and dexterous Minister; who knowing how commonly (and often how reasonably) the Truth of Plots is suspected, laid before the House the Credibility of the present Informations so skilfully, that every one was perfectly satisfy'd. The Lords and Commons join'd in an Address to the King full of Duty, Affection and Loyalty; and the Commons ordered a Bill to be brought in to empower the King to secure dangerous Persons; to which they added another, enacting, That in Case of the King's Death the Parliament should continue to sit; or if no Parliament were then in Being, that the last preceding Parliament should convene and sit.

An Association entered in to by the Parliament.

After this an Association was brought in to the House, by which the Members engaged themselves to support the King against the late King James, and all his Adherents to the utmost of their Power; and, in case the King should come to any violent or untimely Death, to revenge it upon his Enemies and their Adherents. This Association was signed by many of them with Reluctancy, but the Tide ran so strong that they feared to oppose it. And soon after it was presented to the King by the Commons in a Body; who desired it might be lodged among the Records in the Tower, as a Monument of their Duty and Loyalty to his Majesty; which the King, after returning them Thanks for this Proof of their Affection, promised them should be done. The House of Lords presented their Association not long after, and the Example of the two Houses was followed by all the Corporations of the three Nations.

After this a Committee of the Commons was appointed to examine Sir William Parkyns and Sir John Friend, who had been accused and apprehended for the Plot. The first owned his being privy to the Assassination, that he had intended to assist the Invasion; and that he had seen a Commission from the late King James to levy War against the Prince of Orange and all his Adherents. Sir John Friend disowned any Knowledge of the Assassination; but confessed that he intended to assist King James. This Report being made, it was unanimously resolved that a Bill be brought in for the better Security of the King's Person and Government, by which Nonjurors were to be made subject to the Penalties of Papish Recusants; the Association was ratified, and all Persons who would not sign it, were disabled from enjoying any Office; and a Penalty was inflicted on those who should deny King William's lawful Title to the Crown, or assert King James's. The Hardships laid upon Nonjurors by this Bill, made it liable to some Censure; though in other Respects acknowledged both just and prudent. It was said that those Penalties would fall most heavily upon conscientious but weak Persons; who were never likely to disturb the Government, though they were suffered to live in quiet. That such Persons by forbearance and gentle Usage might in good Time be brought to Reason; whereas now, finding themselves exposed to Suffering for what they thought a Matter of Conscience, they would be only tempted to hold their fond Mistake so much the faster.

In the next Place came on the Trials of such of the Conspirators as had been secured. The first was the Trial of Mr. Robert Charnock, Lieutenant King, and one Thomas Keyes; who upon a full Evidence were found Guilty of High-Treason, and executed. Before Execution, they delivered Papers to the Sheriffs, in which they confessed the Crime they were accused of, but endeavoured to palliate and defend it. Next to these, Sir John Friend and Sir William Parkyns were convicted and executed. Sir John Friend denied his Knowledge of the Invasion and Assassination; but Sir William Parkyns confessed that he was privy to a Design upon the Prince of Orange, but was not to act in it. It was observed, that Sir William Parkyns, at the Place of Execution, was absolved by three Nonjuring Clergymen, which gave great Offence, and two of them were committed to Newgate; but no Punishment was inflicted on them. After these, Brigadier Rookwood, Major Lowick, and Mr. Cranburn were tried, found guilty, and executed; the latter professing himself a Protestant, the other two being Papists. Two others, Cooke and Knightley were afterwards tried and convicted, and the latter by his own Confession. But the King entirely pardoned the latter, and gave Leave to the other to transport himself beyond Sea.

The Affairs done in Parliament to the End of the Session, were not very material. They fell into a Proposal for establishing a National Land-Bank; and a Bill for that Purpose passed both Houses; but the Project proved not only useless but mischievous. A Bill passed both Houses for farther regulating the Elections of Members to sit in Parliament; but this being presented to the King with other Bills on the tenth of April, he refused his Assent to it. This was so resented by the Commons, that a Question was put, that whosoever advised the King to that Refusal, was an Enemy to the King and Kingdom;

A.D. 1696. A severe Law against Nonjurors.

The Trials of the Conspirators.

Proceedings of Parliament.

A.D. 1696. dom; but it was carried in the Negative by a great Majority. The King came to the House of Peers a second Time April 27. when having passed other Bills that were ready, he prorogued the Parliament. A few Days after he embarked for Holland, where he arrived on the seventh of May.

The Campaigns abroad generally unactive.

A Treaty of Peace set on Foot.

The Occurrences of the War this Year were not of much Importance. In Flanders the two Armies spent the Summer in observing each other, the Sinews of War being equally wanting in both Camps; in the French by reason of the general Poverty introduced by the ambitious and expensive Projects, by which its Monarch had ruined his Subjects, while he disturbed the World; and in the English on account of the recoin-ing the Money. The Condition of both Armies made the Way easier for a Negotiation of Peace, begun by Monsieur Callieres, and set on foot by the French King; who finding the Confederates gaining upon him, and his Kingdom exhausted, began to dread the final Event of the War. Whether he had not at that Time the Project he afterwards executed so successfully, of advancing his Grandson to the Throne of Spain, may be reckoned uncertain. Monsieur Callieres addressed himself to the Dutch first, partly because they were thought the most inclined to a Peace of any of the Confederates; and partly because King William had never been yet acknowledged by the Court of France. The Offers made by Callieres were so plausible, that the States gave Ear to them; and they being communicated to the other Allies, were so well received, that it was agreed on all Hands by the Mediation of the King of Sweden, to send Plenipotentiaries to finish what was so well begun.

In Catalonia there happened a small Action between the French and Spaniards, which ended to the Advantage of the French, but was in it self of no great Consequence. On the Rhine Things passed also with the usual Inaction.

The Affairs of Italy.

The main Business of the Confederacy lay on the Side of Italy. During the Winter the Court of France renewed their Intrigues with the Duke of Savoy, to engage him to a separate Peace. The Pope's Nuncio, and the Venetian Envoy seconded the Designs of that Crown, and made in the French King's Name such advantageous Offers to the Duke, that he at last resolved to accept them. For being only bound by Honour to the Allies, he was easily prevailed on to come over to the French, who made him theirs by Interest; a Tie that uses to be much more forcible with Princes than the other. Besides other advantageous Offers the French made him, a Match was proposed between the Duke's eldest Daughter, and the Dauphin's eldest Son, the Duke of Burgundy. It was not safe to carry on this Treaty at Turin, where the Duke's Steps would be narrowly watched by the Ministers of the Allies; for which Reason the Duke gave out, that he had formerly obliged himself by a Vow to make a Pilgrimage to the Image of the Virgin Mary at Loretto, and that his Conscience A.D. 1696. would not permit him to defer it any longer. The Ministers of the Allies were startled at this sudden Fit of Devotion in a Man of the Duke's Character, and easily found that something must be hid under it. The Lord Galloway upon that offered his Service to accompany the Duke; but his Royal Highness with equal Dissimulation, refused to give his Excellency so much Trouble. This increased the Suspicions already conceived, and the Lord Galloway sent Spies after him. But though a Treaty was signed at Loretto by the Duke, through the Mediation of the Agents of Rome and Venice, the Spies could get no Notice of it. By this Treaty the French restored to the Duke all they had taken from him in the War, gave him four Million Livres to repair the Damages he had received in it; and agreed to a Marriage between the Duke of Burgundy, and the Daughter of the Duke of Savoy.

When the Duke was returned to Turin, he still kept up his Dissimulation; partly because the Allies had great Forces in his Countrey, and partly because he desired to secure the Subsidies due to him from the Confederates. But the King of England, at so great a Distance, was better informed than his Minister at Turin; and sent the Duke of Savoy the Articles concluded on between him and France. The Duke was much surprized at the Discovery; but persisted to deny it, till the French coming to his Assistance encouraged him to throw off his Disguise. At last he thought it needless and useless to dissemble any longer, and signed openly the Treaty he had made with the French before in private. The Forces of the Allies retired from his Countrey into the Milanese, whither the Duke followed them at the Head of his own, and the French Troops, and laid Siege to Valentia. Thus, by an Adventure not paralleled in Story, the same General commanded two hostile Armies in the same Campaign; nay, 'tis certain that while he had not yet openly declared himself, he gave Orders in both at the same time, being acknowledged by both for their Commander. But before Valentia was taken, an Express brought the Consent of the Allies to the Neutrality of Italy, which had been some time in Agitation. And this News put an End to all Motions on that Side.

His deep Dissimulation.

The Duke of Savoy forakes the Allies.

The King came over from Holland on the sixteenth of October, and in four Days after met the Parliament. He acquainted them with the Overtures made by the French towards a Peace; observing to them however the Necessity of treating Sword in Hand with so faithless an Enemy, and of a Supply by Consequence equal to those of former Years. And to shew his Concern for the Publick, he hinted to them that some Inconveniencies relating to the Coin were still unremedied; and that it was necessary to find Expedients for the Recovery of Publick Credit, which was in a languishing Condition.

The Parliament meets.

The

A.D. 1696.

Their Proceedings.

The Commons answer'd the King's Speech with a suitable Address, and went upon the three great Affairs recommended to them from the Throne. As to the first, they resolved not to alter the Standard of the Gold and Silver Coin; and because the Circulation of Guineas had been obstructed by the Causes above-mention'd, Encouragement was given to coin Gold at the Mint. They then prepared two Bills for the recoinage of the broad unclipp'd Money, and to encourage the bringing in of Plate to the Mint.

They voted a Supply in the next place of two Million three hundred and seventy two thousand one hundred ninety seven Pounds for the Navy, and two Million five hundred and seven thousand eight hundred and eighty two Pounds for the Land-Forces, with one hundred twenty five thousand Pounds assigned for making good the Deficiency in recoinage the broad Money, and the Recompences ordered for bringing in Plate to be coined. The first two Sums were to be raised by a Poll and Land-Tax, and the latter by Duties upon Plate, and upon Paper, Vellum, &c.

The ruinous State of Publick Credit.

But the great Difficulty the Parliament had to overcome, was the Loss of Publick Credit. Loans of Money had been formerly made to the King upon Funds, which had either proved deficient, or were so remote in the Course of Payment, that it was a great Disadvantage to those who had advanced the Money upon them. This had been a great Inconvenience to the Publick on two Accounts; first, as it was a Loss and Detriment to the Possessors of the Tallies, who were very numerous; and secondly, as it lessen'd the Value of Government-Security, which compelled the Treasury to allow excessive Discounts and Premiums to bring in ready Money there. These Inconveniences, in themselves very great, were enormously increased during the present Scarcity of Money, arising from the recoinage of the Silver Specie. For Men being obliged to part with their Tallies for a present Supply of Cash, the Uncertainty and Remoteness of the Payments made upon them, joined with the Scarcity of Money, made them of so little Value, that they were discounted at forty, fifty, or sixty per Cent. And it is easy to judge from thence what exorbitant Premiums must be paid by the Government for new Credit, when the old was at so low an Ebb. Even the Bank Notes were discounted at twenty per Cent. so sunk was publick Credit at that Time.

Thus by slow and unheeded Steps, and various and concurring Causes, we were become a Nation without Money or Credit. All Men were at a Gaze, and stood wondering what Measures the Parliament would take in such perplexing Difficulties; scarce believing the Wisdom of Man was able to find an Expedient to cure so inveterate an Evil. But the Parliament being fully convinced of the Importance and Necessity of some Remedy, were animated rather than discouraged by the Difficulty of the Undertaking; and they happily succeeded in it. A.D. 1696. In this excellent Work, all agree they were much assisted by the Prudence and Counsels of the late Earl of Hallifax, then Mr. Montague, whom the Laws of History will not suffer to pass unnamed upon this Occasion.

To restore Publick Credit, the Parliament in the first Place enquired into the Causes of its Decay. And they were made sensible that a principal Source of this Mischief rose from the Deficiency of the Aids and Duties to which the Tallies belonged. To remedy this, they resolved to grant a Supply to the King for making good the Deficiencies of Parliamentary Funds; which by an Estimate they found, amounted to five Million one hundred and sixty thousand four hundred Pounds. This Deficiency they provided for by continuing and adding several Duties that were to answer that Sum; which was to be a general Fund for paying off the Principal and Interest due on the deficient Funds. And in the next place, all the fit Provisions were made that punctual and regular Payments should be issued out of this Fund. And because all the Branches of Publick Credit support each other mutually, the Parliament in the next place took into their Consideration the State of the Bank of England, which was then ready to sink.

To do this, they agreed to augment the Capital Stock of the Bank, by continuing the Bank a longer Time, and other Encouragements; and by ordering the new Subscriptions to be made good in Tallies and Bank Notes; in the Proportion of four Fifths of the former, and one Fifth of the latter. Upon this Scheme, into which the Men of Money readily came for the Advantage of entering into that Company, a Million in Bank Notes and Tallies was subscribed and paid. Thus the Bank being eased of a Debt of two hundred thousand Pounds in their Notes, which were brought in upon this Occasion, and strengthened by the Accession of many wealthy Persons to their Society, were enabled to look their other Obligations in the Face. And eight hundred thousand Pounds being required in Tallies, those Securities went no longer a begging, but were sought after by those who proposed to be concerned in this new Subscription. So that so many Bank Notes and Tallies being sunk, and the Value of the rest heighten'd by this Contrivance, Publick Credit recovered apace; the Bank Notes became equal to Money; and the Tallies having a Fund fixed for the Payments, rose to a just Value.

But there remained another Inconvenience which required the prudent Care of the Parliament to find a Remedy to, which was the Scarcity of Money, arising from the recoinage of the Silver and the other Causes above related. A Remedy to this Evil was naturally to be expected, after some time; for the recoinage of the Money went on as fast as the Thing could be done; and it seemed a Contradiction in Terms, to think to furnish the Nation with Money before it

The wise Methods taken to restore it.

Exchequer Bills issued to supply the room of Money.

A.D. 1696. could be coined. But the Parliament, sensible of the terrible Pressure that lay upon Trade for want of that necessary Communication, attempted and compassed that seemingly impossible Work. For there being at this Time a vast Number of Payments to be made into the Exchequer, the Lords of the Treasury were authorised to issue out Bills from the Exchequer to the Value, first and last, of above two Millions; which were to be received by the Treasury as Money, upon any of the King's Duties or Revenues, except the Land Tax. These Bills also bore Interest at above seven per Cent. When these Bills were first issued a small Discount was allowed for them; but when People understood they were to be taken in the Exchequer as ready Money, they arose at last to an Equality. And a great Number of them being for five and ten Pounds, they answered the Necessities of Commerce in its inferior Branches tolerably well. Thus the Defect of Coin was supplied, till the Money of the new Fabrick came to be so plentiful, that the former Inconveniences, and the Remembrance of them, passed gradually away.

Sir John Fenwick's Case.

While these important Transactions went on, they were interrupted a little by an Affair of an uncommon Nature. Among those who were accused for the Assassination-Plot, was Sir John Fenwick, who endeavouring to escape into France, was seized in Kent. He was not wanting in Endeavours to save, or at least to prolong his Life, after he was apprehended. He wrote two Letters to his Lady; in which he proposed to her to get some Jury-men upon his Tryal who should starve the rest; and gave her Advice to apply for him to several about the King. But these Letters being intercepted, turned to his Disadvantage. This failing, he drew up an Accusation of the Duke of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Marlborough, and several other eminent Persons as corresponding with the late King James, and in his Interest. This was at first believed, or at least startled the King and Court; and gained Sir John Fenwick so much Time, that his Friends took the Opportunity to persuade Cardel Goodman, who was one of the Witnesses against him, to go over into France. They made the same Attempt upon Captain Porter, who was the other Evidence; but he discovered it to the Government. However, one Witness being gone, and the Law requiring two, it was plain that Sir John Fenwick must have been of Course acquitted at his Tryal.

A Bill of Attainder passed against him.

The Accusation Sir John Fenwick had fixed upon the great Men abovementioned being so resented by Admiral Ruffel that he desired an opportunity of justifying himself before the House of Commons, the Affair came before that House, and Sir John Fenwick was called upon to make good what he had said. But he prevaricated so much in his Answers about what he knew he could not make out, and the Practices used by him to take off the Evidence against him were so notorious, that a Motion was made for a Bill to attain him of High-Treason, which was carried in the Affirmative. This A.D. 1696. produced very remarkable Debates when the Bill was read the third Time, and it passed but by a small Majority in both Houses. Sir John Fenwick was afterwards beheaded, and denied that he knew any Thing of King James's coming to Calais, or of any Invasion from thence till it was publicly known; but that he had a Notion that something of that Nature might have been attempted by the Toulon Fleet coming to Brest.

The Parliament having dispatched all the important Affairs that lay before them, the King came on the sixteenth of April and prorogued them; and in a few Days after embarked for Holland. Immediately after the Parliament separated, a remarkable Incident happened at Court; the Earl of Sunderland being made Lord Chamberlain in the Room of the Earl of Dorset. Every one was amazed to find a Man who was always looked on as the prime Instrument of the Arbitrary and Popish Counsels of the late Reign, so eminently preferred in this. It gave Room for many Conjectures and Speculations not much to the King's Honour; and was so universally resented, that soon after the Parliament met, he found himself obliged to resign, to prevent a more publick Disgrace.

The Earl of Sunderland promoted.

The Treaty for a general Peace that was begun the last Year, was the chief Business of this. It was agreed in the first Place that the Conferences should be held at Ryfwick, a Palace belonging to his Britannick Majesty; the Ministers of France residing at Delft, and those of the Confederates at the Hague. After this the Preliminaries were signed, by which the Towns of Strasburgh in Germany, the Towns of Mons, Charleroy, and Dinant, and the Duchy of Luxemburg in the Netherlands, with the Places taken in Catalonia, were to be restored by the French; as also the Duchy of Lorrain, according to the Treaty of Nimeguen. The King of France was also to acknowledge King William, and restore to him the Principality of Orange. These were the chief Preliminary Articles.

The Treaty of Peace negotiated at Ryfwick.

While these were in Debate, there was some Action in the Field. In Flanders the French besieged Aeth, and took it; the King openly declaring he would not sacrifice a Man for the Relief of a Town which he knew must be given up by the Peace. For the same Reasons it was so faintly defended by the Governor, that it surrendered after the Trenches had been opened twelve Days. In Catalonia the French besieged Barcelona, investing it by Sea and Land. This Siege continued with dubious Success about a Month; but by the ill Conduct of the Spaniards without, it was surrendered, after a noble Resistance by the Prince d'Armstadt, the Governor.

The Successes of the French during the Treaty.

These Successes of the French might have had an ill Effect upon the Treaty at Ryfwick, if they had not been disappointed in an important Scheme laid by them in another Place. John Sobieski, the King of Poland, who

A.D. 1697. who gained so much Renown by raising the Siege of Vienna, died the last Year, and filled that Kingdom, as usual, with Intrigues and Animosities about the Choice of a Successor. The French, knowing how great an Influence a King of Poland in their Interest must give them over the Empire, proposed the Prince of Conti to succeed him. This Proposal seemed likely to be attended with Success; for there appeared no Competitor to stand against him but Prince James Sobieski, who was yet universally disliked.

The Elector of Saxony opposes him, and carries it.

It seemed very probable that the Prince of Conti would carry the Election, when on a sudden, every one was surprized to hear that the Elector of Saxony was a Candidate; who, though bred a Protestant, was content to renounce his Religion for a Crown. And in that venal Countrey, it was no difficult Matter by a Profusion of Bribes and Promises, in which he outwent the Abbot Polignac, the Prince of Conti's Agent, to get himself proclaimed King by a Majority of the Polish Diet. Some Opposition was made by the Cardinal Primate, and others of the Grandees in the Prince of Conti's Interest, and that Prince arrived in Poland; but his Competitor having an Army at Hand to support his Claim, the Prince found himself obliged to give Way, and returned to France.

The Negotiations of the Earl of Portland, and Mareschal Boufflers.

This Disappointment received by the French, made them more tractable in the Conferences of Peace. While a great deal of Chicanery passed between the German and Spanish Plenipotentiaries, and those of France, King William determined the Matters in Controversie between the French King and himself in a more summary Way. He chose to cut off at once the flow Forms used by professed Negotiators, and to leave the Treaty to two Men of the Sword, the Earl of Portland, and the Mareschal de Boufflers. These two Generals, in four Conferences, adjusted all Things between their respective Masters; after which the King sent the Earl to the Congress, to let them know that, all Points between himself and the King of France being settled, he desired them to be speedy in the Conclusion of the important Work they were about. Many Speculations were raised upon these Interviews of the two Generals; but if any Thing more passed than was at that Time publicly known, the World has not yet been informed of it.

The Treaty signed at Ryswick.

After a long Series of Conferences and Disputes, as is usual upon those Occasions, the Treaty was signed at Ryswick by the Ministers of England, Holland, Spain, and France on the twentieth of September N. S. and about a Month after by the French and German Plenipotentiaries. By this Peace King William got great Honour; the Articles thereof being more advantageous than the State of Affairs among the Allies seemed to give Room for. Many important Places were restored in Flanders and Germany to Spain and the Empire; only Strasburg, which by the Preliminaries was to be given up, was insisted on by the French in the Course of the Treaty, and kept by them. King James, of whom the French King had publicly declared that he would not lay down his Arms till he had restored that Prince to his Throne, was entirely forgot; and King William's Title was acknowledged in the fullest Manner.

An Attack was made this Summer by the French under Monsieur Pointi, upon Cartagena in the West-Indies, a famous and rich Port belonging to the Spaniards, where they took a considerable Booty; having also the good Fortune to escape the English Men of War twice in their Return.

The King returned to England after the Peace was made, and received the joyful Acclamations and Applauses of his Subjects. After much Time had been spent in Rejoycings and Congratulations on Account of the Peace, the King met the Parliament. His Speech, in which he gave them an Account of the Conclusion of the Peace, was not so acceptable in the House of Commons; and was disliked by several, as being expressed in too magisterial a Style, and in Terms that seemed to upbraid the Nation with what he had done for it; and it was disapproved by others, because he professed himself against disbanding the Army. So that their Address of Thanks was six Days before it was presented. It was conceived however in handsome Terms, and received a suitable Answer from the King.

But soon after arose a Struggle between the King and the House of Commons. That House considering in a grand Committee the State of the Nation, fell upon the Debate concerning the Number of Forces to be disbanded. The King, acting by his Representatives the Court-Party there, was for keeping on Foot a numerous and considerable Body of Troops, which was warmly opposed by the Countrey Party. The Arguments on both Sides were weighty, and urged with great Acuteness. On the one Side it was alledged, that we had made Peace with an Enemy who would certainly keep it no longer than it suited his Interest. That he had not yet reduced any of his Forces; and by Consequence was as formidable as ever; so that if that Army which had driven him to sue for Peace should be disbanded, it could not be expected but that he should fall upon us disarmed and defenceless, and impose upon us a second Time that arbitrary Prince we had so happily expelled and kept out before. That it could not be denied that there was Danger to the Liberties of a free People from a Standing Army; but that it was not universally true, either that Liberty was always ruined by Armies, or that it could not be destroyed without them. The Republicks of Venice and Holland who maintain great Forces are yet free, and without any Apprehension of becoming otherwise. And the Liberties of France received the first Blow, not from the sudden Violence of an armed Soldiery, but from the dark and wicked

A.D. 1697.

The Parliament meets.

A Debate about a Standing Army.

Arguments for it.

A.D.1697. ed Policy of a subtle and crafty Tyrant Louis XI. That the Danger of keeping the Army on Foot, was answered by the greater Danger of being without it. For that if we should part with our experienced Soldiers, we might be surprized with ten or fifteen thousand Men from France, who having no regular Force to oppose them, would overrun the Kingdom; since every one knows how insignificant a new-raised raw Countrey Militia must be before old and disciplined Troops. That though it might be said our Fleet would prevent this; yet that we had at the late Revolution an Instance, that a Wind might rise that would carry an Enemy out of their Ports, and keep our Ships confined to our own; not to mention that the Officers of the Fleet might be corrupted, or that a Storm might destroy it. That besides, this Army was not designed to make a Part of our Constitution, but to be kept only for a little Time, till the Circumstances of Europe would better permit the Nation to be without them. That a Regard was to be had to the Disaffection reigning among a great Part of the Nation; and that so long as the People kept the Power of the Purse in their own Hands, they would keep the Military Power in Dependence upon them.

Arguments against it.

On the other Side it was said, that since it appeared beyond Denial, from the History and Experience of all Nations, as well as from the Nature of the Thing, that Standing Armies were of the utmost Danger to free Countries, it signified very little to quote an Instance or two to the contrary, which might be only Exceptions to a general Rule, and therefore a very improper Ground to reason from. But that in Truth the Examples alledged of Venice, Holland and France were nothing to the Purpose; neither Venice nor Holland keeping any Standing Forces, but in their conquered Countries only. And though Louis XI. had incroached upon his People's Liberties without publick Violence, yet that an armed Force was soon found necessary to support that injurious Invasion of the Native Rights and Freedom of Mankind. And that it must be so in all other like Cases, appears very plainly; since otherwise, as soon as the People feel (and they will quickly feel it) a Change in their Condition for the worse, it is impossible but that they must immediately fly upon their Oppressors, and make them disgorge in one Day the ill-got Power they have been acquiring for Years. The extreme Danger arising from Standing Armies being then allowed, it being indeed a Truth too evident to be denied, it remained to consider, whether the Danger from Abroad was such as to compensate so great a one at home. And it was urged, that such a sudden Invasion as was talked of by those on the other Side, seemed a Danger too remote to be mentioned with the other. That so long as we keep the Seas well guarded, an Island like ours has little to fear from any Power which is not already our Superior in Naval Force. That the fitting out a Fleet able to encounter our own, and the other A.D.1697. Preparations necessary for such an Undertaking, must be so long a Work, that we could not miss having Time enough to reinforce our Navy, to send for Forces out of Scotland and Ireland, and to prepare our Militia; after which there would be no great Danger that any Invader would care to come amongst us. Not to mention that our Confederates would have Time to arm, and call off the Enemy's Forces another Way. To the Objection, that a Wind might rise that would carry an Enemy out of their Ports, and confine our Ships within our own, it was answered, that it was hard to conceive even the Possibility of such a Thing, if an Invasion should be attempted from France; but granting that such a critical Wind might naturally happen to blow, yet that no Prince could be supposed to hazard the vast Expence, besides other Dangers that would attend such an Attempt, only in prospect that such an improbable Contingency might at last chance to favour his Design. As to the Objections of the Sea-Officers being corrupted, or Mischiefs by Storms; it was replied, that Accidents so little to be expected would be effectually provided against by a well-trained Militia. That the English Temper is naturally warlike; and that if our Militia is of very little use, it is for want of Experience in the Forms of warlike Discipline, and not of natural Bravery. That the Practice and Skill of the Weapons and Motions used in War, is no such Mystery, but that it may be so easily learned, as in Conjunction with native Courage (which no Nation is less wanting in than our own) to make a good Soldier in no long Time. That if the Gentry, Freeholders and Traders of England were thus trained and exercised, the Remembrance that they were fighting for their own Liberty, Security and Possessions, would inspire them with another kind of Courage in Danger, and give another kind of Edge to their Swords in Battle, than mercenary Soldiers who fought only for their Pay could possibly be capable of. That this was confirmed by the Experience of the late War, in which as great Things had been done by the Vaudois in Savoy, the Miquelets in Catalonia, and the Militia in Ireland, as can be paralleled in History. That it would be the same in England, if the Court would give their hearty Assistance in promoting this Design; if the King would appear in Person at their Head, and give Rewards and Honours to such as should deserve them. And because it might be objected that such a Militia as this is a Standing Army, and would be as dangerous, and much more chargeable, it was answered, that there can be no Danger from an Army, where the Nobility and Gentry of England are the Commanders, and the Body of it is made up of Freeholders, their Sons and Servants; unless it could be conceived that they would all join in an unnatural Design to make void their own Titles to their Estates and Liberties; and as for the Charge, it was not to come

A.D.1697. come in Competition with the Preservation of our Laws and Liberties. As to the disaffected, who were alledged as a Reason for keeping up a Standing Army, it was said, that such a Force might indeed restrain them, but that it would at the same Time increase their Number. It was added, that in Truth there was not a more likely Way to restore King James than to maintain a Standing Army to keep him out. To prove this it was said, that so long as the Authority of a Prince depends on the Affections of his People, his Throne is founded on a Rock; whereas if it depends on a Standing Army, it leans on a Support the most tottering and unsteady that can be imagined. The History of all Nations shews, that more violent and sudden Revolutions have happened by the Caprice and Humours of the Soldiery, than have ever happened in any unarmed Governments. That if with us, two or three of the chief Officers should be disobliged, or have Intrigues with Jacobite Mistresses, or the French King could again buy his Pensioners into the Court or Army, we should have another Revolution, and the People would be only idle Spectators of their Ruin. To all this they added the lesser Inconveniences of a Standing Army; frequent Quarrels, Murders and Robberies; the dishonouring and corrupting of Women, whose Weakness is easily captivated by the showy Outside of Military Men; the Insolencies often committed by them; the Destruction of the Game; and an endless Train of other Mischiefs, too many to be enumerated. However they concluded, that it would be highly unreasonable that those brave Men should be ruined by the Peace, which their Courage and Fidelity had procured; and that therefore the Parliament, out of Gratitude as well as Generosity, ought to give them a Donative proportionable to their Commissions.

The Army ordered to be disbanded.

Other Proceedings of Parliament.

A.D.1698.

After long Debates it was agreed to disband the Army; but to allow a Gratuity to all the Officers and Soldiers. And it was resolved, that ten thousand Men would be a sufficient Summer and Winter Guard at Sea for the ensuing Year. They voted the King seven hundred thousand Pounds per Ann. for his Life, for the Support of the Civil List; three hundred and fifty thousand Pounds for Guards and Garrisons; and two hundred and fifty thousand Pounds by way of Bounty to the disbanded Officers and Soldiers. Because of Deficiencies in the Land-Tax, which sometimes happened, they assessed a certain Sum upon each County, to prevent the like for the future. They then examined the Debts the Nation was liable to on Account of the War, which amounted to not a great deal less than five Millions; part of which they resolved to clear off.

A new East-India Company erected.

There had been long a Contest between the East-India Company, and some Merchants who desired to put in with them for a Share of that Trade, and to erect a new East-India Company under Regulations different from the other. This came now to be decided by the Parliament; who gave it A.D.1698. in favour of the new Company, on Condition they should lend the Government two Millions at eight per Cent. Nine Days after the Bill had received the King's Assent, Books were set open to receive Subscriptions for those two Millions. This was done on Thursday July 14. and by the Saturday following this vast Sum, and something above it, was subscribed; though the Time was so short, that half the Counties in England, and much more Foreigners, had not Opportunity to remit their Commissions for the great Sums they intended to subscribe; so that 'tis very likely that two other Millions might have been taken in, had not the Books been closed so soon. All Europe stood amazed, and could hardly believe it, when this Proof of the English Wealth and Greatness came to be related in foreign Countries, and they were told that after having born the Charge of a long and expensive War, our Nation was able to raise two Millions of Money in less than three Days.

Two Millions raised in three Days.

The House of Commons was next employed in the Discovery and Punishment of two great Abuses. Upon the coming over of the Refugees from France, some of them had been made use of to set up a Manufacture here of Alamodes and Lustrings; which was carried on by a Corporation called the Royal Lustring Company; the Importation of all French Manufactures of the same kind being prohibited. But in Contempt of this Prohibition, several French Merchants and others here in England, kept up a Correspondence in France for those Wares, and smuggled great Quantities of them; and to compleat the Mischief, the same Ships which brought the French Commodities hither, carried away great Quantities of our Wool. This being accidentally discovered, and made out before the House of Commons, that House resolved to impeach the Persons concerned of High Crimes and Misdemeanors; and ordered them to be taken into Custody. But before the Commons appeared to make good their Impeachment before the Lords, eight of them, viz. Stephen Seignoret, René Baudoin, John Gaudet, Nicolas Santini, Peter De Hearce, John Pierse, John du Maistre, and David Barrau, confessed themselves Guilty and were fined; the first ten thousand Pounds, the second three thousand Pounds, the two next fifteen hundred Pounds each, three others one thousand Pound each, and the last five hundred Pounds, in all nineteen thousand five hundred Pounds. The Sum being considerable, the Commons prudently considered how to apply it to some publick Service; and addressed the King that it might be appropriated to Greenwich Hospital; which Address was of course complied with, though not without a great Disappointment to several greedy Courtiers.

Smugglers prosecuted by the Commons.

Another sort of Offenders were this Self sion animadverted upon by the Commons, but had the good Fortune to come off unhurt. It has been already observed of what signal Use Exchequer Bills had been, during

And false Endorsers of Exchequer Bills.

A.D. 1698. ring the recoinage of the Silver Species.

Now because there was an Interest of seven Pounds twelve Shillings per Annum allowed upon the second issuing those Bills out of the Exchequer, after they had been paid in on any of the King's Taxes, whereas at their first issuing from the Exchequer they bore no Interest; this encouraged several of the King's Officers, in the Exchequer, the Customs, and the Excise, to contrive together to get great Sums of Money by false Endorsements on these Exchequer Bills, before they had been circulated about, or brought into any Branch of the King's Revenue. This knavish Contrivance lay chiefly between Mr. Charles Duncomb, Receiver-General of the Excise; Mr. John Knight, Treasurer of the Customs; Mr. Bartholomew Burton, who had a Place in the Excise-Office; and Mr. Reginald Marryot, one of the Deputy Tellers of the Exchequer; which last, to get his Pardon, compounded to accuse the rest. Upon a full Proof, Duncomb and Knight, who were Members of the House of Commons, were expelled the House, and committed Prisoners to the Tower; Burton sent to Newgate; and Bills were ordered to be brought in to punish them. The Bill against Mr. Duncomb, whereby a Fine of near half his Estate (reckoned to be four hundred thousand Pounds) was set upon him, quickly passed the House of Commons, notwithstanding the Opposition that was made to it, particularly by the Attorney-General. But being sent up to the House of Lords, which was equally divided upon it, the Duke of Leeds gave his casting Vote for the rejecting it. It was then the common Report, that Mr. Duncomb dispelled the Storm by a Golden Sacrifice; which however cannot be affirmed, because it never came to publick Notice. Mr. Duncomb was afterwards set at Liberty by Order of the House of Lords; but the Commons resented it so, that they ordered him to be remanded to Prison; and he continued in the Tower till the End of the Session. The Bills against Knight and Burton had the same Fate; and thus the Cloud that hung over this Act of Publick Robbery, spent it self in Vapour and Noise.

But they escape.

The Parliament dissolved.

The Earl of Portland's Embassy to France.

Little was done after this, till the Parliament was prorogued by the King on the fifth of July; which was followed two Days after by a Proclamation for dissolving it, and summoning another to meet on the twenty fourth of August.

At the Beginning of this Year, the King sent a very splendid Embassy to France by the Earl of Portland; who was received every where with all the outward Marks of Honour, but was wholly unsuccessful in his private Negotiations. His Business was to get King James removed from France, and a Moderation of the Persecution against the Protestants in France; but the French Court was inflexible in both those Points. Instead of this, they laid in this Embassy the Beginnings of the famous Partition Treaty, in which it is universally agreed, that they over-reached King William. And no doubt the A.D. 1698. extraordinary Honours shewn to the Earl of Portland, were intended to smoothe the Way for that refined Piece of State-Policy.

The French had another Reason for ingratiating themselves with our Countrey; their Trade hither having been almost ruined by the Prohibitions and vast Customs laid on French Commodities in England during the late War. Monf. Phelippeaux was sent over hither, to revive that Commerce which France found so profitable. But he found his Endeavours to little Purpose; partly because of the high Duties on French Goods, and partly because in the long Time of the War, we had set up so many Manufactures of the same kind, that we had little need of those of France; and had learned to supply our selves with the Commodities of the Product of France from other Countries.

Some Time after the Parliament of Eng- Affairs of land was prorogued, that of Scotland met. Scotland. The Scotch East-India Company applied themselves to that Assembly for their Favour with the King in that Company's Behalf, towards removing the Obstructions that England had put in their Way. The Parliament joined with the Company, and addressed the King in their Favour. But the King not finding himself in a Condition to serve them without disobliging his English Parliament, he found means to wave the giving a positive Answer to the Scotch Representations.

The Peace was now concluded, and so many Offices of Civility and Kindness were interchanged between the contending Parties, as if the Remembrance of all past Wars and Discord were to be for ever buried, and all Fear of any to come were to be banished the Christian World to all future Generations. But still there remained a bitter Root of Jealousy and Contention, which if not carefully looked after, was likely and in no very long Time too, to sprout out, and increase with such a fatal Growth, as to spread it self over Europe, and kill with its poisonous Shadow this fair and tender Plant of Peace. The King of Spain was childless, and of a Constitution so infirm, that his Death was continually expected. As that Branch of the House of Austria from which he was descended would be extinct in him, it was a Matter of no small Difficulty, either for his Subjects at home, or the Powers abroad, to find out a Successor to that potent Crown, who should be universally accepted. It could not be imagined, that the French King, whose Ambition had so long troubled Mankind, should be quiet upon such an Occasion, that Crown having at all Times reserved and hidden Claims upon most of the Crowns and States that are its Neighbours; and being at present so well provided with Forces and Strength to make any of them good. And it could as little be expected that the Powers which had been so long confederate against the exorbitant Greatness of France, should quietly suffer it to receive so immense an Accession of Strength and Riches, as the Spanish Dominions would add

The unsettled Condition of Affairs in Europe.

A.D. 1698. add to it. So that it required no great Discernment to see, that unless some unlooked for Event interposed, the late Peace would be of no long Duration.

The Partition-Treaty proposed by France.

The Terms thereof.

The King accepts it.

The Court of France did indeed take Care to make their Profit of this extraordinary Situation of Affairs; and they pursued and compassed their Ends by a very notable Strain of Politicks. They sent to the King, (who went to Holland soon after the breaking up of the Parliament) the Count de Tallard, with Orders to ply him close about the Partition Treaty. They had, as was said, made an Entrance into this Affair when the Earl of Portland was in France. The Scheme laid by France appeared by the Consequences to be as follows. Knowing that King William's Care and Circumspection could not be unconcerned about the impending Death of the King of Spain, they made him a Proposal, under Pretence of consulting the Publick Tranquillity, which might at once lay his Vigilance asleep, and make Way for the Execution of Projects of a different Nature. They offered to him that in Consideration of the Kingdoms of Naples, Sicily, and Sardinia, the Province of Guipuscoa on this Side of the Pyrenees, Fontarabia, St. Sebastian, Final, and the Places in Tuscany, of which Spain stood possessed, the Dauphin should renounce his Pretensions to the rest of the Spanish Monarchy, which was to be given to the Electoral Prince of Bavaria; the Duchy of Milan excepted, which was to fall to the Share of the Arch-Duke Charles, the Emperor's second Son. The Proposal was very specious; for on the one Hand it seemed likely enough that France having seen so many Designs on the Liberties of Europe frustrated, and having drained both her Treasure and her People in those unsuccessful Attempts, might be sincerely disposed (the King too declining in Age) to suffer Mankind at last to be at Rest. And the great Demands they made for the Dauphin, strengthened the Opinion of their Sincerity; for to quit so great Pretensions without considerable Advantages in Return, would naturally have bred Suspicion. In the mean Time, as they knew the Spaniards would not bear the Thoughts of dismembring their Monarchy, an Opportunity was given them of inducing the Spanish Nation, rather to accept a King proposed by France, than to suffer so large a Part of their Dominions to be for ever alienated. And in this Project the Court of France had all the Success they could desire.

The King closed with this Proposition of Count Tallard, though his Ministers were apprehensive of the Consequences; and he concluded this Treaty of Partition, as it is called, with so much Earnestness that he would not stay for the Lord Somers's Answer to the Letter in which he acquainted him with it, and desired his Advice. This Affair being finished, the King went to make a Visit to the Duke of Zell, his intimate Friend; where he was waited on, and complimented by many of the German Princes. A.D. 1698. His Intention in this Journey was to cement the Union of the Princes of Germany, by a Match between the King of the Romans, and the Princess of Hanover, which was then agreed on, and soon after compleated.

In the mean Time, France was not idle The Negotiations of the French in Spain. The Marquis de Harcourt was sent Ambassador thither by the French King. His Instructions were to persuade the Spaniards to accept of the second of the Dauphin's Sons for their King; but if this could not be done, to hinder the Crown of Spain from devolving on any of the Emperor's Children, who claimed it by Virtue of the Will of Philip IV. Father of the present King of Spain. The Marquis followed his Instructions with great Address and Application. But he found himself thwarted by the Queen, who was entirely in the Emperor's Interest; and being informed of the French Ambassador's Practices, under Pretence that the Air of Madrid was prejudicial to her Husband's Health, carried him to Toledo, without allowing any Foreign Ambassador to follow him. The Marquis de Harcourt quickly saw into the Meaning of this Journey; and judged, very rightly, that being there sole Mistress of the King, she might easily prevail with him to ratifie King Philip the IVth's Will. He followed the King to Toledo, under Pretence that he had received a Memorial, which he had Orders to communicate to none but the King himself. But the Queen understood his Meaning, and excused her permitting him to see the King, by telling him, that she could not suffer his Majesty to be troubled with Business, lest it should retard the Recovery of his Health. But the defeating this Journey of the French Minister introduced a greater Inconvenience; for upon his Return to Madrid, finding those Measures ineffectual he had laid at first, he entered upon new ones, in which he had better Success. And applying himself to Cardinal Portocarrero, he found Means to engage him so far in the French Interest, that he compassed the same Thing another Way.

For greater Security, the French, at the same Time, strengthened themselves by a firm Alliance with the Crown of Sweden, their old Confederate. They also caused a great Encampment to be made at Compiene, not above twenty Leagues from the Frontiers of the Spanish Netherlands, under Pretence of instructing the Duke of Burgundy in the Art of War; and during the Marquis de Harcourt's Negotiations in Spain, ordered sixty Thousand Men to move towards Spain. But the unexpected Recovery of the King of Spain's Health, dispelled all farther Attempts and Views that Way for some Time.

King William knew France too well to depend upon her Faith in the Observance of the Partition Treaty; and therefore omitted no Provision in his Power against a sudden Infraction of it. To this End he mediated

The King mediates a Peace between the Emperor and the Turks.

A.D. 1698. ated a Peace between the Emperor and the Turks, that the Arms of the former might be ready and undiverted upon any future Emergency. And the Lord Paget, his Ambassador at the Porte, assisted by Mr. Colliers, the Dutch Ambassador there, easily prevailed upon the Turks, disheartened with their ill Success in the War, to accept of their Mediation. The Conferences between the Ministers of the Turks on one Side, and those of the Emperor, and his Confederates the Czar of Muscovy, the King of Poland, and the Republic of Venice, began at Carlowitz in Hungary; and went on with that Success, that in about three Months the Treaty was signed. And thus an universal, though not lasting, Peace was established throughout Europe.

The Parliament meets.

Their Temper.

The Commons resolve to disband all the Forces but seven Thousand Men.

The King's Speech to them upon that Occasion.

A.D. 1699.

While this Treaty was on Foot, the King came over to England to meet his new Parliament. When the Speaker, Sir Thomas Littleton, was presented, the King made a Speech; in which, besides the usual Assurances of Affection and Motions for Supplies, he hinted to them, that he conceived it necessary to maintain a good Body of Land-Forces against all Events. But the People were heartily weary of the Burthens they had been charged with on Account of the War. So that the Elections in this Parliament had fallen chiefly upon Persons who were known to have little Complaisance for the Court, which was understood to be the Spring and Source of all martial Projects. And these Members opposed all Propositions from thence, perhaps farther than was exactly reasonable.

The Commons soon passed a Resolution, that no more than seven Thousand Men should be kept on Foot of the Land Forces, who should be all his Majesty's Natural-born Subjects; and that the others should be paid and disbanded. This Vote made the King very uneasy, and wish that he had shewn more Complaisance with the late House of Commons, who were likely to shew him in Return more Complaisance than he found he could expect from this. But he saw there was no Room for contending, but with Civility; and therefore as soon as the Vote abovementioned was turned into a Bill, and had passed both Houses, he came to the Parliament on Purpose to give his Assent to it. At the same Time he made a Speech, in which he let them know, that in his own Opinion it would be dangerous to disband so many of the Forces at that Time; but that he came however to pass it in Compliance with their Desires, that there might be no Appearance of Distrust or Jealousie between himself and them. This Speech produced Addresses from both Houses, in which they returned the King their most hearty Thanks for his gracious Expressions, but at the same Time let him see that they could not agree with his Sentiments on that Point.

The King finding the two Houses concurred in discharging the Land-Forces, gave at last effectual Orders for doing it, though with great Reluctancy. But he was more especially concerned at his being obliged to A.D. 1699. send away his Regiment of Dutch Guards, which had attended him from his Cradle in all the Accidents of his Life. He resolved to make one Effort to try the good Nature of the House of Commons; and sent them a Message, all in his own Hand-Writing, to let them know that the necessary Preparations were making for transporting the Guards, that came with him, out of England; and that he intended to send them away immediately, unless out of a Consideration to him, the House were disposed to find a Way for continuing them longer in his Service, which he should take very kindly. It was moved upon this to appoint a Day to consider of this Message; but the contrary Party was so prevalent, that the Motion was rejected. Instead of that, the House in a Body presented an Address to the King, in which they said they were mightily troubled they could not comply with his Majesty's Message, and at the same Time have due Regard to the Constitution he came over to restore. That they begged of him to trust his sacred Person with his own Subjects, who had so eminently signalized themselves in the late War upon all Occasions. The King answered them with such a Prudence and Moderation, as was suitable to the Occasion, and most likely to work on them. But though his Answer was well taken, it could not make the Commons alter their Resolutions; so that the Dutch Guards were soon after shipped off for Holland, which occasioned some Murmurings among the Well-affected, who thought the forcing away that Regiment was a needless Hardship and Disrespect put upon the King.

The Commons having provided for the Other Proceedings of Parliament. disbanding of the Army, proceeded to consider the State of the Navy; and soon after presented an Address to the King, complaining of several Mismanagements therein. This was chiefly levelled against Admiral Ruffel, whom the King had made Earl of Orford; and who had indeed made such Advantages of his truly eminent Services, as rendered him liable to Suspicion. But the Earl, finding a Storm gathering, avoided its Fury, by laying down his Places of Treasurer of the Navy, and Lord Commissioner of the Admiralty, and taking Shelter in the Harbour of a private Life.

The House in the next Place voted fifteen Thousand Men to be the Guard at Sea for the next Year. And for disbanding the Army, maintaining the Fleet, and Guards and Garrisons, they voted one Million four Hundred eighty four Thousand and fifteen Pounds, to be raised by a Land Tax of three Shillings in the Pound. They afterwards voted Provisions for several Debts; but those Votes were not put in Execution this Session. A Petition of the Old East-India Company, praying that their Case might be taken into Consideration, was received, and a Bill ordered to be brought in thereon; but it was rejected before the second Reading.

On

A.D. 1699. On the fourth of May the King came to pass all the Bills that were prepared for the Royal Assent; and after a short Speech prorogued the Parliament. In about a Month after he embarked for Holland.

The Parliament prorogued.

The Scots plant a Colony at Darien in America.

The Minister of Spain presents a Memorial against it, with which the King complies.

Notwithstanding the Discouragements which the Scotch India Company had received from England, as was above related, they went on with their Designs. And having found a Countrey on the Isthmus of Darien in America, which had never been possessed by the Spaniards, with whom the Natives were continually at War, the Scots found such Means to ingratiate themselves with these Indians, that they were permitted to make a Settlement there, to which they gave the Name of Caledonia. The Project might have been of great Service to the Scotch Nation at any other Season, but was at present certainly wrong-timed. For the Spaniards who claim the Dominion of that whole Countrey, could not be expected to be easie under a Settlement made by a brave and industrious People, in the very Heart of their American Colonies. And the State of Affairs in Europe obliged the King to a more than ordinary Complaisance to Spain at this Time. This the Scots did not consider, which proved the Ruine of their Undertaking. For the Spanish Minister here presenting a sharp Memorial to the King on Account of this new Plantation, in what he called his Master's Dominions, the King could not avoid complying with it. The Scots indeed answered this Memorial by several Representations to the King, in which they endeavoured to shew the Legality of their Settlement in Opposition to the Pretences of the Spaniards, or any other Nation; all which was likely to be true, but not proper to be insisted on by the King in the present Situation of Affairs. So that he gratified the Spaniards so far, as to give Orders to all the Governors of the English American Colonies, not to hold any Correspondence with the Scots Settlement, or any Ways to assist them with Arms, Ammunition, Provisions or any other Necessaries whatever. The Spaniards also made great Preparations in America, to go and dislodge the Scots. They found themselves unable to maintain their Settlement without the Assistance, and much more against the express Will of the King of England, shewn by the Orders abovementioned to the Governors of his Colonies. So to engage him in their Defence they sent him a Representation of their peaceable Behaviour and Disposition, ever since their Landing, and of the Advantages he might hope for by giving their Colony Protection. This was seconded by a Petition from the Scotch Company, who set forth the Reasons the King had to support their Rights and Credit; and besought him to recal the Orders abovementioned; and that the Parliament of their Kingdom might meet in the November following, to deliberate on that weighty and general Concern. But the King was inflexible, and only made them Answer that he was sorry for their Loss; but let them know that he could not help them. As to the Parliament, A.D. 1699. he told them that they stood adjourned to the next March; and that he would call them, when he judged that the Good of the Nation required it. This Answer put an End to all Hopes of Countenance from England, whose Behaviour towards the Scots on this Occasion, bred ill Blood in that Northern Kingdom. On the other Hand, the Scots were certainly indiscreet to make such an Attempt, which could not, if the King gave it the least Countenance, but cause a Rupture with Spain; which at that nice Juncture of Affairs, was of the utmost Consequence. The Colony at Caledonia, after having suffered great Hardships for Want of Provisions, was at last obliged to forsake their Settlement.

The King did little during his Stay in Holland, but receive the Visits and Compliments of Foreign Ministers and Potentates. After a Summer's Rest he embarked for England in October, and in November met the Parliament. The Speech he made, though elaborate, and full of those Expressions of Affection and Care for the Publick that are fitting and usual upon those Occasions, was not suitably answered by the Commons. They remembered that in the Speech the King made at the last breaking up of the Parliament, he expressed a Dissatisfaction with their Proceedings in Relation to the Land-Forces. So that their Address of Thanks for the last Speech, seemed rather an Answer to the former. They besought his Majesty, that since the Necessity of a mutual and entire Confidence between himself and his Parliament was so apparent, he would be pleased to shew Marks of his highest Displeasure towards all who should presume to misrepresent their Proceedings to him, assuring him in Return of the utmost Care on their Parts to prevent any Misunderstandings between his Majesty and his People. The King would not seem to understand their Meaning, and returned them a very obliging Answer.

The Parliament meets.

Their disagreeable Proceedings.

But the Commons soon after fell upon an Enquiry very disagreeable at Court. The Zeal and Unanimity with which the Papists in Ireland had appeared for King James, had produced very numerous Forfeitures of Estates after the Reduction of that Kingdom. As these Lands amounted to a very great Value, the Commons in former Parliaments had made Use of their Interposition to prevent those Estates from being given away among so many undeserving and unreasonable Askers as Kings are sure to be surrounded with, when they have a great deal to bestow. They conceived it would be full as convenient to have the vast Sums that might be drawn from those Estates, which was little less than two Millions, applied to the Publick Service; and Bills to this End had passed their House, which were sent up to the Peers for their Concurrence. But the Lords, either conceiving they would intrench too much upon the Crown, whose Prerogative it is that all Forfeitures in such Cases accrue to it, or being otherwise influenced by the Court, thought fit to stop

They enquire into the Disposal of the Irish forfeited Estates.

A.D.1699. those Bills in their House. So that the Matter lying undecided, the King took the Opportunity to give very costly Tokens of his Favour and Bounty to several Persons whom he thought proper Objects of his Royal Munificence. But the ill Humours of the Commons being now swelled to a very great Height, they determined to make Enquiry into the Disposal of these forfeited Lands; in which they had Reason to expect, from the Nature of Mankind, and of such Affairs, that by a severe Inquisition into the Management there, they could not fail to meet with abundant and plausible Ground for Murmur and Complaint.

The Report of the Commissioners.

In the last Session they had appointed Commissioners to take an Account of these Estates, who by this Time had drawn up a Report which they presented to the House. It set forth that the Value of these Estates was at first computed at two Millions six hundred eighty five thousand one hundred and thirty Pounds, but that this Value was at present very much diminished; partly because several Estates had been restored to those who forfeited them; and partly on Account of several valuable Grants made out of them by the King. It also set forth many great Abuses and very unwarrantable Practices that had been used in all the Management relating to those Estates. In the Conclusion they said, the Lands remaining liable to the publick Claim after the above Deductions were made, might be valued at one Million six hundred ninety nine thousand three hundred and forty three Pounds, without including a Grant valued at three hundred thirty seven thousand nine hundred and forty three Pounds, made out of the private Estates of the late King James, to the Countess of Orkney; a Lady who was thought to be honoured with a very particular Share of his Majesty's Royal Favour.

A Bill for applying those Estates to the Publick Service.

Upon the Perusal of this Report, the Commons resolved that a Bill be brought in to apply all the forfeited Estates and Interests in Ireland, and all Grants thereof, and of the Rents and Revenues belonging to the Crown within that Kingdom, since the Year 1688. to the Use of the Publick. They also resolved to admit of no Petition from any Person whatever touching those Grants, or forfeited Estates. When the Bill was read a second Time, a Motion was made, that a Portion of those Estates might be reserved to his Majesty's Disposal. But it passed in the Negative; and the House added a Resolve, that the advising, procuring and passing those Grants, had been the Occasion of great Pressures on the Nation, and highly reflected on the King's Honour. And that the Officers concerned in passing those Grants had highly failed in their Duty.

A.D.1700. Other Proceedings.

After this they proceeded to the Business of the Supply. They appointed seven Thousand Men to be the Complement for Sea-Service for the Year 1700. and having fixed the Sums for that Service, and for Guards and Garrisons, they resolved to raise the Supply by a Land-Tax of two Shillings in A.D.1700. the Pound.

The Bill for the Land-Tax being read, the House ordered, the Bill for resuming the Forfeited Estates to be joined to it. And soon after the House resolved to present an Address to the King, to represent to him the Resolutions just mentioned relating to the advising, procuring and passing the Grants of the Forfeited Estates; and in six Days after waited upon the King with the same in a Body.

They address the King about the forfeited Estates.

The King was not well pleased with their Proceedings hitherto, as may be easily imagined; and he answered their Address with some Resentment; telling them, "That he was not only led by Inclination, but thought himself obliged in Justice to reward those who had served him well, and particularly in the Reduction of Ireland, out of the Estates forfeited to him by the Rebellion there. He added, that as the long War had occasioned great Taxes, and left the Nation much in Debt, the taking just and effectual Ways for lessening that Debt, and supporting Publick Credit, would, in his Opinion, best contribute to the Honour, Safety and Interest of the Kingdom". This Answer being reported by the Speaker, the Commons were so provoked at it, that they resolved that whoever advised it, had used his utmost Endeavour to create a Misunderstanding and Jealousie between the King and his People. And to justify their Proceedings, they ordered the Report to be published, which shewed the Reasonableness and Fitness of the Enquiry they made, both on Account of the Value of the forfeited Lands, and the indirect Practices relating to them; both which, without Doubt, highly deserved the Animadversion of an House of Commons. To this they added several Resolutions and Addresses of theirs, with the King's Answers; and a Speech from the Throne in 1691. from which it appeared, that the King had not kept his Word with his Parliaments; he having promised them in express Words not to dispose of the Irish Forfeitures, till that Affair was settled in Parliament.

Who gives them an angry Answer.

The Commons incensed.

The complicated Bill having passed the House of Commons, did not go so easily through that of the Peers. This was partly occasioned by the Complaisance of some in that House for the King, but many others were drawn in to follow their Example, to prevent a Precedent of tacking a foreign Bill or Clause to a Money-Bill; a Proceeding justly looked on with an evil Eye by the Upper House. However the Commons got the better this Time, and the Lords, instead of rejecting the whole Bill, only offered some Amendments in that Part which related to the Irish Forfeitures. The Commons unanimously disapproved those Amendments, and desired a Conference; which was held to no Purpose, both Parties being stiff. Next Day two others were held with

The Bill about the forfeited Estates passes the House of Peers with Difficulty.

A.D. 1700. with as little Success; which put the Commons into such a Ferment, that the King, to appease them, sent a private Message to the Lords to desire them to pass the Bill without any Amendments; which they did. The Commons, either provoked by Resistance, or encouraged to go farther by the King's yielding, resolved soon after to address the King to remove from his Council all who were not Natives of England, except Prince George of Denmark. But the King would not give them Time to present this unpalatable Address; and therefore coming the next Day to pass the Bills ready for his Assent, he prorogued the Parliament.

The Parliament prorogued.

The Complaints of the Scots about the Affair of Darien.

During this Session of Parliament the King had a great deal of Trouble, on Account of the Scots India Company. The Council General of that Company wrote to the Secretary of State for Scotland, to intreat the King's Favour in Behalf of some of their Countrymen, who were taken Prisoners by the Spaniards on Account of the Settlement at Caledonia, and lay detained at Carthagena. This Letter being sent by the Lord Basil Hamilton, the King, on Account of some Disrespect he either had, or pretended to have, received from that Lord, refused to admit him to his Presence. However he was content to receive the Lord Hamilton's Instructions in Writing; and in Answer to them promised his Interposition for the Enlargement of those Prisoners. But this did not satisfy the Scots; who were not to be persuaded, but that the Business that Lord came on, was the true Reason that kept him from the Royal Presence. The King's Conduct on this Occasion was supported by an Address from the House of Lords against any Settlement of the Scots in the West-Indies, as detrimental to our own Plantations. The presenting this Address to the King gave him Occasion in his Answer to renew a former Motion he had made to his Parliament for an Union between the two Kingdoms. This Motion was so well received, that the Lords passed an Act to authorize Commissioners to treat thereon, but the Commons refused their Concurrence. The Scots were still discontented, and made another Effort in Behalf of their Trade, by sending up a National Address; in which they desired the King to cause their Parliament to meet as soon as possible, who they knew would espouse the Cause of their India Company very heartily. This Address was presented in March; but the King answered them, that the Parliament could not sit before May, but promised them it should do so then.

The Partition-Treaty altered.

While these Things passed, the Electoral Prince of Bavaria dying, on whom the Spanish Monarchy was to devolve by the Partition-Treaty, a new Treaty was concluded of the same Kind. The Arch-Duke Charles of Austria was to have all the Spanish Dominions within and without Europe, except what by the former Treaty had been assigned to the Dauphin and France. The Duke of Lorraine, instead of his own Countrey, A.D. 1700. which was to be given to France, was to have the Duchy of Milan; and Prince Vaudemont the County of Bitsche.

The Time now came on for the Meeting of the Scotch Parliament. The King sent them a Letter, in which he professed a great Concern for the Misfortunes and Losses the Nation had met with in their Trade, and his Readiness to concur in any Measures for promoting and encouraging it. The Parliament adjourned for two or three Days after they first met; but were scarce set again before they received a sharp Representation from the India Company, complaining of their many Losses, Disappointments and Grievances. This was attended with so many Petitions and Addresses of the same kind, which were seconded by the Disposition of the Parliament itself, that the High Commissioner, the Duke of Queensbury, was afraid to let them sit any longer. And a Motion having been made, that the Colony of Caledonia was a rightful Settlement, and that the Parliament would maintain and support it, the Duke thought proper to adjourn them before the Question was put to the Vote. This Step, which was extraordinary enough, was so resented, that a Majority of the Members agreed upon an Address to the King; in which they complained of this Proceeding, as an Infringement of the Declaration of Rights made at the Revolution. The King when he received this Address, only said, he would consider of it. But when upon a second Application the Commissioners desired his Answer, he told them he could not let them have it at that Time, but they should know his Mind in Scotland. This Application being thus eluded, a second national Address was framed, and carried about to be signed by the several Shires and Burroughs in the Kingdom. But while this was doing, the King sent a Letter to the Duke of Queensbury, and the Privy-Council, which was published in the Manner of a Proclamation. He there declared his Readiness to have asserted the Right of the Colony at Darien, if the State of Things had permitted it; but since that could not be done, he was ready to concur in any Counsels that might shew his Concern for the Prosperity and Welfare of that his ancient Kingdom, being heartily grieved for the Losses it had sustained. That he was confident that Declaration would be satisfactory to all good Men; and would keep them from being misled by Enemies into Measures contrary to their own Security. That his necessary Absence had occasioned the late Adjournment; but that as soon as he could return, the Parliament should meet.

Proceedings of the Scotch Parliament.

July 29. the Nation had an inconceivable Loss in the unexpected Death of the Duke of Glocester, Son of the Prince and Princess of Denmark, at ten Years old; who was the only Child of their numerous Offspring that reached even that scanty Measure of Life. His Death was occasioned by his over-

The Death of the Duke of Glocester.

A.D. 1700. over-heating himself at the Entertainment and Rejoicing made upon account of his Birth-day five Days before; which ended in a Fever. He was a young Prince of great Hopes; having a natural Aptitude and Disposition for those Accomplishments that become those who are born to rule. He was scarce seven Years old when he understood all the Terms of Fortification and Navigation, knew all the different Parts of a strong Place, and of a Man of War; and could marshal a Company of Boys, who listed themselves to attend him. He had sucked in his Mother's Piety, and was always attentive to Prayers; to which excellent Turn of Mind he added a quick and lively Wit. But the Strength of his Constitution was not answerable to that of his Mind; so that he was taken away on the sudden, to the great Loss of the Nation; though with a less Degree of publick Concern than the Occasion deserved. For at that Time two numerous Parties of Jacobites and Republicans prevailed; to whose several Designs the Life of that young Prince was equally an Obstacle. So that the Grief for this invaluable Loss was confined to the Palace of St. James's, the Abode of his Royal Father and Mother, and to the Hearts of those Persons, who in such a divided Nation could retain Temper and Discernment enough to see and lament the Madness of the wild Extremes to which both Sides were hurried.

The War kindled in the North.

A Fire was kindled this Summer in the Northern Parts of Europe, by an Alliance contracted between the Kings of Denmark and Poland, and the Czar of Muscovy, against the King of Sweden. The Pretences they gave for this League were various; but the true Reason was, that the King of Sweden being young and unfixed in his Throne, they hoped so powerful a Confederacy might be able to share his Dominions amongst them, at such a Juncture. King William could not be unconcerned at a War that was so unjust in it self, and might have such fatal Consequences on the Repose of Europe.

The King and States of Holland interpose.

So that England and Holland very soon interposed their friendly Mediation to heal this Breach. But this proving ineffectual, the King sent a Squadron of thirty English and Dutch Men of War into the Sound; which joined with the Swedes, and both together came before Copenhagen. The King of Denmark was at that Time in the Territories of the Duke of Holstein, the Brother-in-law and Confederate of the King of Sweden, which that Prince had unjustly invaded. When the News was brought him of the Danger his Capital City was in, and that besides, the Swedes were landed in the Isle of Zeeland; finding himself unable to relieve his Country otherwise than by a Treaty, he being cooped up with his Army in Holstein by some Swedish Frigates that cruised upon the Coast, he at last consented to enter into Negotiations of Peace. After a Debate of but six Days, the Affairs of his Danish Majesty requiring Dispatch, the Peace was signed Aug. 18, N. S. at Travendale in Holstein, between

The Treaty of Traven-
dale.

Denmark, Sweden, and the Duke of Holstein, with the Exclusion of Muscovy and Poland, with whom the War went on to the Advantage of the Swedes. A.D. 1700.

The King being willing to remove, if possible, the ill Humour Scotland was in on Account of their late Disappointments, summoned the Parliament before he returned to England. He sent them a Letter full of his Concern for their Prosperity and Welfare; with Promises to give his Assent to any Acts they would pass to promote and increase it. He then told them how heartily grieved he was, that he could not assert their Right to the Colony at Darien, without disturbing the Peace of Christendom, and drawing a dangerous War upon that his ancient Kingdom; and desired them to be satisfied with those plain Reasons for not engaging farther in their Quarrel. But notwithstanding this, the Parliament no sooner met, than the India Company presented a Representation of their Grievances to them. This was followed by a National Address to the King, wherein they enumerated many Grievances they were and had been labouring under, and desired they might be redressed. But the King avoided a direct Answer, by telling them that the Parliament being met, he hoped all his faithful Subjects would be satisfied with the Declaration he had made to them. And in effect such Care was taken to soften the Minds of the Members there, that after some Heats about the Affair of Darien, the Storm blew over, and they consented, as the Court desired, to keep on foot a Force of three thousand Men, and to maintain them by a Land-Tax; after which they were prorogued.

The Projects of France for an universal Empire, had been the Scourge of Christendom for the last thirty Years; having been so judiciously laid, and so dextrously executed, that they went on with all imaginable Success till they were on the very Point of Completion, and no humane Succour or Deliverance appeared; when the Divine Providence interposed from above, and scattered them into Air and Smoke. That haughty Prince might have learned from thence to know and acknowledge that just and resistless Power by which he was thus controuled; and no longer to provoke him by such Schemes of immoderate Greatness, as are above the Condition of Mortals, and can neither be framed nor executed without the utmost Guilt. But these Warnings proved insufficient, and he now laid the Plan of another Design more important than any before. And it pleased God to continue the same Method of Providence towards him; granting him Success that rendered him for a Time greater and more formidable than ever; but lifting him so high, only to make his Fall the more ruinous, and his Punishment the more exemplary.

The Designs of France at this Time.

The Marquis de Harcourt, Ambassador of France at the Court of Spain, followed his Instructions so well, that by laying before the Spaniards the Dishonour and Damage that

A.D. 1700. that would accrue to their Nation from the Partition Treaty, disposed them to receive a King from France, though their old Enemy, rather than suffer such an Alienation of their Dominions. He applied himself in particular to Cardinal Portocarrero with so much

The King of Spain bequeaths his Crown to the Duke of Anjou. Success, that he prevailed upon him to get the King of Spain to sign a Will, by which he bequeathed his Crown to the Duke of Anjou, second Son to the Dauphin. This Will was signed Oct. 2, N.S. of this Year, and in about a Month after the King of Spain died. The Will being opened after the King's Death, a Copy of it was sent into France. The Earl of Manchester, Ambassador at the Court of France, being informed of this, asked the French King what he intended to do in this Conjunction; putting him in Mind withal, of the Engagement he was under to the King his Master. But that Tie was like to be of very little Force now; and though the French King told him he would not take a final Resolution till the Earl should receive an Answer to his Dispatches into England, yet before that Answer came he caused the Duke of Anjou to be declared and saluted King of Spain. And what was of yet more Effect, he sent his Troops to take Possession of all the Spanish Netherlands in his Behalf, which they easily became Masters of, there being no Forces there in a Condition to oppose them.

The dangerous State of Christendom. This unexpected Event threw a dark Cloud over the Face of Affairs in Europe. The Evil that had long been feared, was come to pass so suddenly and so fatally, as admitted no Prevention, and seemed capable of no Remedy. France was not only possessed of the Spanish Netherlands, which it had so long been struggling for, but of the whole Spanish Monarchy too; that the Riches of America might recruit the Wealth that Kingdom had been drained of by the expensive Wars of almost thirty Years. England was disarmed, and what is worse, divided; Holland was encompassed by the French Power, which hung threatening over it; the Empire made a fair Appearance, but was weak because disjointed. So that the Affairs of Christendom were brought to as dangerous a Crisis as could easily be imagined.

King William's Conduct. King William saw that, even though the Powers of Europe could be content to acquiesce in this perillous State of Things, the French Ambition, puffed up by their signal and unexpected Success, would not suffer them to be quiet long. So that a War with France appearing unavoidable, he began to consider of the fit Preparations for it. And in the first Place, because the present House of Commons had not been so complaisant as he desired, he thought fit to dissolve the Parliament Dec. 19. and call another to meet in the February following.

A.D. 1701. When the Parliament met, the King laid before them, in his Speech, the Necessity of making Provision for a Succession in the Protestant Line, the Duke of Glocester being dead, and of providing against any ill Consequences from the King of Spain's Death, A.D. 1701. and the Declaration of his Successor. And lastly he recommended to the Commons the Consideration of an Aid, and to supply Deficiencies. The King's Speech being reported to the Commons, they unanimously resolved, that they would support his Majesty's Government. They presented an Address to this Purpose in a Body; which the King having thanked them for, left with them a Memorial he had received from the States-General, concerning which he desired their Advice and Assistance. This being read in the House, and the Commons having considered the Treaties subsisting between England and Holland, and the State of Europe, addressed the King to enter into such Negotiations with Foreign Powers, as might conduce to the publick Safety, promising to support and assist him in maintaining the Treaties made with the States-General. This dutiful Address was answered by the King with all Returns of Kindness and Affection. And soon after he concluded an Alliance with the Emperor and the States, to maintain the Pretensions of the former to the Spanish Monarchy.

The Commons took into their Consideration, the Motion made by the King for settling the Succession in a Protestant Line, and passed a Vote to that Purpose. This was soon carried to other Countries, and alarmed those Foreign Courts whose Princes were related to the Royal Family of England. The Duchess of Savoy, Daughter to the Duchess of Orleans, and Granddaughter to King Charles the First, and as such nearer in Blood than the House of Hanover, ordered her Minister to protest against any Thing that should be done in prejudice of her Right. But though that Minister used a great deal of Art in behalf of his Mistress, he was not much minded; the Proximity of Blood being overweighed by the Profession of a Religion destructive of our own.

The Convocation being assembled with the Parliament, a famous Controversy arose between the two Houses, whether the Power of adjourning lies in the Archbishop, or whether the Lower House have Power to adjourn themselves; the Upper House maintaining the first, and the Lower the second. The Dispute was carried on with a Warmth and Passion that gave too great a Handle to Libertines to slander and ridicule that Reverend Body that was concerned in it; and made pious Men silently wish that Divines would be very cautious to avoid Contention, since their Behaviour upon those Occasions is sometimes so little to their Advantage.

The King was no doubt sufficiently vexed, to find how France had over-reached him by the Partition-Treaty; but he had not yet seen the End of his Trouble upon that Account. The Earl of Portland was generally looked on as the Author of that Treaty, and probably too of some other unpopular Steps (which were not very many) taken during this Reign. The ill Consequences Proceedings of the Convocation.

The Partition-Treaty considered by the Parliament.

A.D. 1701. quences of the Treaty of Partition were notorious; and its being concluded during the Sitting, but without the Advice of Parliament, made it still more exceptionable. So that a fair Opportunity was given the Parliament (with whom that Lord was not gracious) of calling him to Account; and of punishing not only the Faults alledged against him, but others too, only remembered and not mentioned.

The King expected a Storm to blow from that Point of the Compass against his Favourite, which he had Reason to believe would not shew a great deal of Respect to himself. To moderate its Fury when it should rise, and to prevent a second, he resolved to communicate to the Parliament all his Steps in the succeeding Negotiations. And a Treaty being begun with France, for the Preservation of the Peace of Europe, he communicated to the House of Commons the Progress made in it. The Commons having read the Papers, which contained the King's Proposals to France, and the Resolutions of the States for treating, called out to read the Treaty of Partition. This first stirred the ill Humours, and an Address was voted to thank the King for his Condescension in communicating those Papers; and at the same Time to lay before him the ill Consequences of the Treaty of Partition. The Lords were as much dissatisfied upon the same Account; and the Earl of Portland was fallen upon very warmly. He endeavoured to excuse himself, by saying that several other Peers were as much concerned in it as he was. But those Lords all denied that they had given their Consent to it; so that the Earl was left to stand the Brunt by himself. The Peers then sent to the Commons, to desire them to enter into a joint Consultation with their House to prevent such irregular Proceedings for the future, as had been used in the Partition-Treaty. Some Time after they presented an Address to the King, in which they laid before him their Apprehensions from that Treaty, and besought his Majesty to rely only on the Counsels of his natural-born Subjects, and not to trust to Foreigners. While this passed in the upper House, the Commons were examining the Partition-Treaty, which they did with so much Heat, that several very gross Reflections were passed upon the King himself. At last they presented an Address according to their Vote abovementioned; to which, though very little acceptable, the King returned a soft and moderate Answer.

The Negotiations Abroad.

In the mean Time, the Negotiations abroad went on. The French King, though in his present Greatness he little feared the united Power of the Confederates, was yet too politick to neglect the Advantage that might arise from dividing them. He ordered his Minister to persuade, if possible, the States to enter into separate Measures with him, without consulting King William. But the States knew their Interest too well to be so grossly deceived. So that the Minister of England and the States of Holland delivered A.D. 1701. together Memorials to the Count d'Avaux, the French Ambassador, the first insisting in general on a Security for the King and his Allies; and the other particularly demanding the Places and Fortresses of Venlo, Ruremond, Stevenswaert, Luxembourg, Namur, Charleroy, Mons, Dendermond, Damme, and St. Donas, with all their Appurtenances. This Demand was made, not so much in hopes that it would be complied with, as to found the Intentions of the French Court. But they were so lifted up with Pride, that their Minister made answer to these Memorials, that as to the first he had no Orders to make any Reply to it, for that if the King of England had any Thing to demand, he might do it by his Ambassador at Paris, or the French Minister at London. As to the other, he said his Master could give the States no other Security than the confirming the Treaty of Ryswick.

All this the King acquainted the Commons with; who in return advised him to go on with his Measures; and desired that he would pursue the Treaty of 1677. promising that they would effectually enable him to support the same.

But all this was only Words, and not followed by suitable Effects. So that the King seeing their Unwillingness to enter into a War, endeavoured to keep the French at a Bay by a faint Negotiation; and to forward it the more, acknowledged the Duke of Anjou for King of Spain, and sent him a congratulatory Letter. The French on the other hand, were as willing to take the same Measures for different Reasons. For the Emperor, who claimed the whole Spanish Monarchy, had begun the War against France, in support of that Claim; and had sent an Army into Italy, under Prince Eugene of Savoy, to possess themselves of the Provinces there which used to be under the Dominion of Spain. And the French, who did not question to drive him out if their Arms were not diverted, were willing to keep up a fair Appearance with England and Holland.

Both Parties being thus agreed, the Negotiations at the Hague went on all the Summer with much Form, but little Effect. In the mean Time the House of Commons seconded their Address against the Treaty of Partition with an Impeachment of the Earl of Portland, the chief Manager therein; which was followed by Impeachments of the Lord Somers, the Earl of Orford, and the Lord Hallifax; all for High Crimes and Misdemeanors. They afterwards addressed the King to remove them from his Councils and Presence for ever; to which the King returned an ambiguous Answer. Yet the Commons either were, or for some Reasons pretended to be, so well pleased with it, that they returned the King their Thanks for it.

On the other hand the Lords disliked this Proceeding of the Commons. They thought it an Anticipation of their Sentence, if upon the Presentation alone of an Impeachment,

The Lords of Portland, Orford, Somers and Hallifax impeached.

Differences between the two Houses.

A.D. 1701. ment, the Commons should get so heavy a Censure laid on an impeached Peer, when the Charge against him was not yet exhibited, and much less made out. And the Address of the House of Commons being voted eight Days before it was presented, the Lords in that Interval presented another, in which they desired the King to pass no Censure on the impeached Lords till they had received a Tryal. The King was inclined enough to favour the impeached Lords; and did comply in Effect with this Address. But he stood so much in need of the House of Commons, that he thought fit to countenance them so far as to give no Manner of Answer to the Address of the Lords; which somewhat piqued them.

The Danger
Holland was
in.

Mean while the Republick of Holland was in a perillous Condition. The French Feet were upon their Throats, and they had no means to make any effectual Resistance in case of an Attack. They sent over to the King an Account of the great Danger they were in, and their Inability to defend themselves against the formidable Power that almost surrounded them. The King was desirous to assist them, and laid their Representation before the two Houses. The Commons having deliberated thereon, unanimously resolved, that they would effectually assist his Majesty to support his Allies, in maintaining the Liberties of Europe, and that they would immediately provide Succours for the States-General; and ordered that Resolution to be presented to the King by the whole House. The King received them with great Kindness, and thanked them for the Zeal they expressed for the Common Cause. The Lords also returned their Thanks to the King for having communicated the King's Letter to them.

States.

The Parliament had now sat above three Months, and though they had promised at the Beginning of the Session to support and assist the King to perform the Treaty of 1677. with the Dutch, no Bills of Supply were mentioned, nor was any Thing done to succour that Republick, but passing Votes in their Behalf. This bred great Murmurs among some without Doors, who thought the Danger of that State too great, and too imminent, and too much our own Concern, to be treated so remissly. But the Commons went on in their own Way, and exhibited their Articles of Impeachment against the Earl of Orford first, and then against the Lord Somers; the chief Matter against both whom was the Part they were said to have in the Treaty of Partition. This Impeachment produced a Breach between the two Houses. The Lords pressed the Commons to make good their Impeachment against those Lords, and to exhibit their Articles against the Lord Hallifax, and the Earl of Portland. The Commons on the other Hand, either finding their Proofs defective, or for other Reasons, were very backward. So that many Messages and Conferences passed between the two Houses with little Effect, but to produce

The Articles of Impeachment exhibited.

A Breach between the
two Houses.

and increase a Misunderstanding. The King A.D. 1701. on his Part forbore to intermeddle either Way, which Conduct was much applauded. At last the Lords appointed a Day for the Trial of the two impeached Lords, and sent Notice of it to the Commons; who alledging they could not be ready on that Day, the House of Peers proceeded to the Trial without them, and acquitted the two Lords. The Commons were inflamed at this, and made a Protestation against these Proceedings of the House of Peers; wherein they charged all the ill Consequences that might attend the Delay in supplying the King, on those, who to cover their enormous Crimes, endeavoured to make a Breach between the two Houses. On the other Hand the Lords declared, that this and other Resolves of the House of Commons, contained unjust Reflections on the Honour and Justice of the Peers; and attributed the ill Consequences of deferring the Supplies to the unnecessary Delays of the Commons.

In the mean Time the Articles against the Lord Hallifax were sent up to the Lords, in which he was charged with having procured unreasonable Grants to himself, and advised the Treaty of Partition. In his Answer he defended himself by alledging the Smallness of the Grants; and that he had made several Objections to the Partition-Treaty in General, but was never advised with upon any particular Clause or Article.

Another Dispute also arose between the two Houses upon these Impeachments. The Commons insisted that the impeached Lords should not vote in each other's Cases; and that a Committee of Lords should be appointed to adjust with a Committee of the House of Commons, the Time and Manner of the Proceeding, in order to the Trial of the Lords. To the first Demand the Lords answered, that if the Peers, in whom the Right of Judicature inherently is, should be deprived of the Exercise of it before Conviction, the Innocent might be wronged. To the second they said, that the Right of Judicature being solely in themselves, the Appointment of Time and Place belonged entirely to them also. This Difference produced very great Heats, which ended in the Lords dismissing the Impeachments against the Lord Hallifax, and the Earl of Portland; with one of an old standing against the Duke of Leeds, mentioned above in the Year 1695.

The Im-peachments dismissed by the Lords.

The Houses had another Difference about a Bill for stating the Publick Accounts; so that there being no Hopes of any good Intelligence between them, the King came and put an End to the Session. During the Heats between the two Houses, the Vote for settling the Succession in the House of Hanover was turned into a Bill, and received the Royal Assent.

The Act passed for settling the Succession in the House of Hanover.

Not long after the Parliament was dismissed, the King went to Holland, where he employed much of his Time in viewing the Fortifications of Berghen-op-zoom, Fort Philip.

A.D. 1701. Philippina, and other Places; formerly Frontiers towards Spain, but now towards the more formidable Power of France. While he was there, the French Court, seeing the Firmness of the States in doing nothing but in Concert with the King of England, broke off the Conferences, and recalled their Ambassador; who at parting left a Memorial with the States, penned in so haughty and menacing a Style, as plainly shewed that the Court of France thought themselves above keeping Terms with their Neighbours any longer.

King James dies in France, and the pretended Prince of Wales proclaimed there King of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

This appeared still more evidently by what happened soon after. On the twenty sixth of September, N. S. the abdicated King James died at St. Germain's en Laye; and though there was no open Rupture between himself and King William, the French King caused the pretended Prince of Wales to be proclaimed with great Solemnity, King of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Had this Proclamation only affected King William in particular, the Insult on our Countrey had been very great; and we have seen by a late Instance, that Englishmen, however divided, will agree in resenting a personal Indignity offered to their Prince. But as the Parliament had at their very last Meeting settled the Succession in a Protestant House, it was become a National Affront too, and shewed how secure the Court of France was of provoking the neighbouring Powers.

The Resentment expressed by the King and Nation.

This impolitick Contempt shewn for our King and Countrey, was accordingly resented. The King sent Orders to his Ambassador in France, the Earl of Manchester, to come away immediately without taking his Audience of Leave; and ordered Monsieur Poussin, the French Secretary in England, to leave the Kingdom by a certain Day. The Parliament was not sitting, but Addresses came from every Part of the Nation, filled with all the Indignation that could be expressed for so great an Insolence. And perhaps nothing more effectually roused the Spirits of the English, and engaged them to a vigorous Prosecution of the future War, by which the French Greatness was afterwards brought so low, than the needless Pride of that Court, which induced them to provoke our Countrey so unreasonably. So true is that Saying of the Wise Man, that Before Destruction the Heart of Man is haughty.

King William in the mean Time was busie in perfecting an Alliance between the Emperor, England, and Holland, which was concluded in September. This Treaty was framed in the Nature of Proposals upon which France might come in; and accordingly the same was communicated to the Spanish Ambassador, otherwise it was agreed to have Satisfaction given to the House of Austria, in Relation to the Spanish Succession, to recover Flanders out of the Hands of the French; and that the English and Dutch should keep whatever they could conquer in the West-Indies. But the Court of France was so far from making the least Step towards an Accommodation, that they prohibited all Sorts of Goods and Merchandizes of the Growth and Manufacture of England, Scotland, and Ireland, some few excepted, upon which they laid excessive Duties. So that all Things tended to an open Rupture.

The King embarked for England at the Beginning of November, and landed there on his Birth-Day, November 4. But he found his Health declining apace, and his Strength almost exhausted by the long and constant Fatigues he had gone through for thirty Years; and not long after his Arrival he told the Earl of Portland in his Garden at Hampton-Court, that he found himself so weak that he did not expect to outlive another Summer. Nevertheless he applied himself to Business with as much Diligence as his Weakness would let him. The first Thing that came before him was, to consider whether he should not dissolve the present Parliament, the Commons having treated the impending Dangers from France with so much Negligence. The King was at first against it, on Account of some Expressions in the Speech he made to them at parting, which implied that he should meet them again. But this Scruple being got over, a Proclamation was at last issued for dissolving the Parliament, and summoning another to meet on the thirtieth of December, to the great Joy of one Part of the Nation, and the no less Mortification of another.

The King declines in his Health.

The Parliament dissolved.

The Elections were carried on with great Heats and Animosities; but the Dangers from France so wrought upon the Electors and Elected, that the Members proved of a Temper more complying with the King's Inclinations than the last. The Parliament met at the Time appointed, and the King made an excellent Speech to the two Houses, in which he mentioned to them the Indignity offered to himself by the King of France, in proclaiming the pretended Prince of Wales; and the Danger to which Europe lay exposed by his setting his Grandson on the Throne of Spain. He acquainted them with the Alliances he had concluded for the common Good, which he promised should be laid before them; adding a Motion for Supplies, and a pathetick Exhortation to Dispatch and Unanimity.

The new Parliament meets.

The two Houses were in a very good Humour; and sent agreeable Addresses to the King. But before any Business of Consequence could be perfected, the King's sudden Death quite changed the Face of Affairs.

A.D. 1702. The King dies soon after.

Works of Piety in his Reign.

THE noble Hospital of Greenwich was begun in this King's Time, for the Reception of Seamen who have been employed in their Countrey's Service, and are disabled by Age or Wounds; and for the Relief of their Widows, and Education of their Children. A Design worthy a Christian and a British King, and a trading Nation on like ours; and which would be still more highly laudable, were it not that in the Management of that Royal Foundation, some Persons find Cause to regret the usual Unthrif and bad Oeconomy that too often attends the Dispensation of Publick Money. This Hospital is designed to hold two Thousand Seamen, and the Revenue of it is reckoned to be fourteen Thousand Pounds per Annum. After so splendid and magnificent a Donation as this, it seems trifling to mention any of inferior Value; yet there was another of a private Man, which has proved of such extensive Usefulness, and has been attended with such happy Consequences, as claims a very particular Mention; namely, the Lecture instituted by Robert Boyle Esq; for the Defence and Confirmation of the Divine Authority of the Christian Religion. That illustrious Gentleman made so happy an Use of his Searches into the Works of the Great Creator, that he was not only one of the most eminent Philosophers, but one of the most devout and exemplary Christians of his Time. This excellent Person, at his Death, bequeathed a Stipend of fifty Pounds per Annum, to maintain a Lecture of eight Sermons in the Year, to be preached at the Church of St. Mary-le-Bow in London; the Design of which Sermons was to be the Defence and Confirmation of the Truth of Natural and Revealed Religion, against the Objections of Atheists, Deists, and other Enemies of Christianity. The great Fame of the Donor, as well as the Generosity of the Stipend, has engaged many of the most eminent Persons among our Divines, to employ their Labours in that excellent Design; who have so happily answered the pious Intentions of the Founder, that it is much owing to the admirable Writings composed on this Occasion, that the Evidence of our Christian Belief is become so clear and demonstrative as we now, to our Comfort, find it; and that the Profession of our Faith is not as in other Times and Places, stayed only on the weak Props of Authority and Custom, ever flitting and changing; but rooted on the Adamantine Basis of immutable and eternal Reason.

Of the Personage and Conditions of King William and Queen Mary.

AS to the Person of the former, he was of a middle Size, but ill-shaped, and somewhat Round-shouldered; his Face of a light brown Complexion, and hard-featured; his Nose Aquiline; his Eyes exceeding good and piercing; his Hands very fine and white, and his Constitution always weak and infirm. He sat well on Horseback, which Posture best became him. It is universally acknowledged, that as to his Publick Character, he wanted no Qualification that goes to the making of a Wise and Great King; and the same appears sufficiently by what has been above related of him. His private Character had nothing in it very extraordinary. Hunting and Shooting were the Relaxations he used after the Fatigues of Business, and the Toils of War; for he had little Taste for Literature, Science, or the beautiful Arts. He loved the Company of Men of Wit, which seemed the only polite Entertainment he was delighted with; for as to Musick and Poetry, he had scarce any Relish for them; and though he would sometimes admire a fine Picture, it was only when it came in his Way; for he never encouraged Painters, or other Artists. He had some little Knowledge besides of Fortification and the Mathematicks. Besides Dutch, which was natural to him, he spoke French to a great Perfection; and English and German tolerably well. Though he had a wonderful Evenness and Steadiness of Temper on great Occasions, he would be peevish and passionate about small Matters; but it was soon over; and he would be then the best-natured Man in the World. He was parsimonious to a Fault, and did not at all understand how to reward; being a Niggard where he should have been Liberal, and Profuse where he should have been Thrifty; neither knew he much better how to punish, being sometimes too easie, and sometimes too severe. He had a Piece of Superstition in him; which shews that great Minds have their Weaknesses; and that was, that he avoided beginning a Journey, or any Enterprize, on a Monday. He was not insensible to the Fair Sex, it being known that he had two Mistresses; and he would sometimes drink freely. He had a Reservedness of Temper which was not agreeable, especially to the English Nation; and this, joined with some other Incidents, which created him Enemies, kept him from being so well beloved as he deserved. For there appears no just Reason to suspect him of any ill Design against his People; and if he did some unpopular Acts, it seems to have been only for want of right Information. But however it was, whether through Misfortune or wrong Management, he had the Unhappiness throughout his Reign, to be very little trusted by his Parliament and People, and this want of Confidence exposed him to many Mortifications. So that if his own Ambition had any Part in raising him to the Throne of Great Britain, we may safely say, his Fault did not pass without its Punishment.

Queen Mary was adorned with every Thing that is lovely and attractive in Woman-kind. Her Person was tall and well-proportioned; and while she was Princess of Orange her Shape was genteel and slender, though she afterwards grew somewhat more corpulent. Her Complexion was not fair, but the Features of her Face being regular and well set together, and her Eyes lively and piercing, she might be called a beautiful Woman. But her Mind was a Summary of every Princely Qualification, and Christian Virtue. She had all that Solidity of Judgment, Depth of Reflection, and Strength of Mind, that gives the Character of Wise to those of our Sex; which she had greatly greatly improved by Reading; being conversant with the best and most useful Writers in the English, French, and Dutch Languages, which were almost equally familiar to her. She had Abilities equal to the highest Employments; as appeared when during the King's Absence, the Administration was twice put into her Hands; at both which Times the Nation was under dangerous Alarms from Abroad. But she supplied the King's Place on those difficult Occasions with that consummate Prudence, that neither her Subjects nor her Enemies could be sensible that he was away. But at the same Time, never was so great a Capacity, for Government joined with so little Appetite to it; and she laid aside her Authority with as much Indifference, as she had managed it with Dexterity. Her Piety was sincere, fervent and habitual; and withal set off and adorned with such a constant Sprightliness and Cheerfulness of Behaviour, as made that Virtue appear inviting and agreeable, even to those whom Experience had not made sensible of its Charms. She had a sublime Idea of the Christian Religion in general; and a particular Veneration and Affection for the Church of England. And she understood it as well as she loved it. The King her Father had endeavoured to bring her over to the Church of Rome, while he was driving on Matters with that Violence in England; and wrote her a Letter to propose to her those Arguments he thought might induce her; which no doubt were of the strongest his Priests could help him to. But without consulting any one Person, and with less than a Day's Time to think of it, she sent an Answer conceived with that Force and Solidity, as put a Stop to any Attempts of that kind for the Future. She read the Scriptures very much; and Books relating to them; and next to these she bestowed most of her Time on Books of History.

She delighted in Acts of Charity and Beneficence; and said she wondered that the true Pleasure that accompanies doing Good, did not engage Princes to pursue it more effectually. Besides her ordinary and extraordinary Charities among her own Subjects, she reached out her Compassion to the Exiles whom the Persecution had driven hither from France. Nor were her charitable Cares limited within these Bounds; but extended themselves to distant Countries; the poor Vaudois in the Vallies of Piedmont, and the scattered and harassed Remnants of the Churches in Bobemia, being refreshed by her Christian Bounty, though so far remote.

Her Conjugal Virtues, her Humility, her Candour, her Sincerity, were equal to her other Excellencies. In those Steps of her latter Years which seem capable of a hard Construction, she weighed the Reasons, she went on with great Caution and Exactness. And she was only determined to accept the Crown, because she was persuaded that no other visible means were left to preserve the Protestant Religion, not only here, but every where else.

Her Behaviour at her Death was suitable to her Life. She found it approaching with Unconcern; and received the Intimations of it with perfect Resignation to the Will of God. She declared that she felt the Joys of a good Conscience, and the Power of Religion giving her Supports, which the last Agonies could not shake. She received the Blessed Sacrament with a Devotion that inflamed and melted all that saw it; and not long after ended her Life.

The Death and Burial of King William.

HE had been in a weak and decaying State of Body for a considerable Time before he died; but he would not be restrained by it from his favourite Diversion of Hunting. But on the twenty first of February, as he was riding from Kensington, to hunt near Hampton-Court, his Horse fell under him, as he was putting him to the Gallop, and threw him off so unluckily, that with the Fall his Right Collar-Bone was broke; upon which he was carried to Hampton-Court, where the broken Bone was set. In the Afternoon the King, contrary to every Body's Advice, would needs return to Kensington, finding himself pretty well, and slept most of the Way in his Coach. However there was for some Time a good Appearance of his Recovery; till on the fourth of March, after having taken some Turns in the Gallery at Kensington, he sat down on a Couch, and fell asleep, by which he got Cold, and was soon after taken with a shivering Fit; which turned to a Fever, accompanied with a Vomiting and Looseness. Upon this the Physicians were sent for, who administered several Remedies which gave him some Ease, but could not restore his Health. For from that Day forward his Strength and Spirits decayed, till on Sunday the eighth of March, he expired about eight o' Clock in the Morning. As soon as he was dead, the Lords Lexington and Scarborough, who were then in Waiting, spoke to the King's Surgeon, to take from his Left Arm a black Ribbon, which tied next his Skin a Gold Ring, in which was some of the Hair of the late Queen Mary; which shewed the tender Remembrance he preserved of that excellent Lady. He was buried on the twelfth of April, with as much Solemnity as was consistent with a private Funeral; and was deposited in King Henry the Seventh's Chapel, in the same Vault where the Bodies of King Charles the Second and Queen Mary had been laid.

MAYORS and SHERIFFS of LONDON in this King's Reign.

In 1689.

SIR John Chapman, Mayor.
Sir Humphry Edwin, Sir John Fleet,
Sheriffs.

In

In 1690.

Sir Thomas Pilkington, Mayor.
Christopher Letbulier, Sir John Houblon, Sheriffs.

In 1691.

Sir Thomas Pilkington, Mayor.
Sir Edward Clarke, Sir Francis Child, Sheriffs.

In 1692.

Sir Thomas Stamp, Mayor.
William Ashurst, Richard Levett, Sheriffs.

In 1693.

Sir John Fleet, Mayor.
Sir Thomas Lane, Sir Thomas Cook, Sheriffs.

In 1694.

Sir William Ashurst, Mayor.
Sir Thomas Abney, Sir William Hedges, Sheriffs.

In 1695.

Sir Thomas Lane, Mayor.
Sir John Sweetapple, Sir William Cole, Sheriffs.

In 1696.

Sir John Houblon, Mayor.
Sir Edward Wills, Sir Owen Buckingham, Sheriffs.

In 1697.

Sir Edward Clark, Mayor.
Sir John Wolfe, Samuel Blewet, Sheriffs.

In 1698.

Sir Humphrey Edwin, Mayor.
Sir Bartholomew Gracedieu, James Collet, Sheriffs.

In 1699.

Sir Francis Child, Mayor.
Sir William Gore, Sir Joseph Smart, Sheriffs.

In 1700.

Sir Richard Levett, Mayor.
Sir Charles Duncomb, Sir Jeffery Jefferies, Sheriffs.

In 1701.

Sir Thomas Abney, Mayor.
Sir Robert Beachcroft, Sir Henry Furness, Sheriffs.

THE REIGN OF Queen Anne

A.D. 1702.

Queen Anne begins her Reign.

AS soon as the News of King William's Death could be made known, the two Houses of Parliament assembled, according to that most prudent Constitution in the Act declaring the Succession. The Lords then sent a Message to the Commons to acquaint them with the King's Death; whereupon they unanimously voted to address the Queen, to condole with her, and congratulate her Accession to the Crown. Then the Lords acquainted the Commons that they had given Orders for proclaiming the Queen that Afternoon.

The Privy-Council assembling at the same Time, the Queen came to them and made the solemn Declaration usual on those Occasions. She then caused all those who had been Privy-Counsellors to the late King, to take the Oaths to her self in the same Quality. At the same Time she wrote to the Privy-Council of Scotland, to empower that Council to act as before, and to order them to issue out the same Power to all in Office in that Kingdom, to act in like Manner, till new Commissions should be sent. The two next Days were spent in receiving the Addresses and Congratulations of the two Houses of Parliament, the Archbishop of Canterbury with the Bishops then in Town, and the City of London. On the third Day the Queen went to the House of Peers, and made her first Speech to the Parliament, in which she recommended to them the reducing the Power of France, and an Union of the two Kingdoms; and it was answered by Addresses from both Houses full of Duty and Loyalty.

These Forms being over, the Queen began to apply her self in earnest to the serious and weighty Cares of her high Station. But before we enter upon the History of this Reign, it will not be amiss first to take a View of the State of Affairs both at Home and Abroad, at the Beginning of it.

By settling the Duke of Anjou on the Throne of Spain, and by seizing the Spanish Netherlands, the French King was become Master in Effect, though not in Name, of the Power of Spain as well as that of France; besides the immense Wealth of the Spanish West-Indies. Burgundy and Alsace had increased his Dominions towards Germany; and the Electors of Bavaria and Colen who were in Alliance with him, augmented his Strength on that Side. Thus he had France and Spain and Flanders, and a great Part of Germany, with the Gold and Silver of Peru and Mexico, all at his Devotion. So that his Power in the late Reigns, which even then filled all considering Men with very melancholy Apprehensions, was almost inconsiderable when compared with his present Greatness. To oppose this formidable and ambitious Prince, England, Holland, the Emperor and Empire of Germany had united themselves by the Management of the late King, and formed the Grand Alliance, to which the King of Portugal and Duke of Savoy soon after acceded. The Emperor of Germany on his Part laid his Claim to the whole Spanish Monarchy; and wanted the Assistance of the other Allies to make it good. Holland saw at their Gates, the same Power that had brought their Republick into so much Danger in 1672; so that it is needless to say what Alarms and Apprehensions that State must be under. The German Princes and Imperial Cities near the French Frontiers were in the same Condition, and under the same Fears as the Dutch. England was secure indeed, by its happy Situation and inward Strength, from any sudden Attempt; but had too much Interest in the Welfare of the neighbouring States, to be an idle Spectator of their Slavery and Ruin. And besides, the Affront offered to our Countrey by proclaiming the Pretended Prince of Wales, was too great to pass unresented. So that for these different Reasons, these Powers were easily engaged in that famous Confederacy. The War

A.D. 1702.

The State of Affairs Abroad.

A.D. 1702. War indeed was not yet proclaimed; but every one saw that an open Rupture could not be far off.

And at home.

This was the State of Affairs abroad. At home our Countrey was happy in a Queen, who had no Views but for the Prosperity and Welfare of her People, and whose Inclinations and Aims could not be better expressed, than in her own Words in her Speech to the Parliament, when she told them that she knew her Heart to be entirely English. And her Love and Care of her Subjects was answered on their Parts, by the most entire Confidence, and the most ardent Affection. She was attended by many great and wise Counsellors; only infected with the Disease of Courts, Envy and Emulation of each other. As Princes are seldom without Favourites, the Queen had a particular Affection for Sarah the Countess of Marlborough, who enjoyed an uncommon Degree of Favour with her. The Earl of Marlborough, this Lady's Husband, was both a Soldier and Statesman of acknowledged Sufficiency; though his Merit did not now appear with that dazzling Lustre that it did afterwards. This Nobleman had married a Daughter of his to the Son of the Lord Godolphin, an experienced Courtier, and a wise and able Minister; and this Alliance uniting the Interests of those two great Men, they found Means to supplant their Competitors by the Countess of Marlborough's Credit with the Queen, and to procure the Staff of Lord Treasurer for the Lord Godolphin, and the Commission of General for the Earl of Marlborough. These two Offices they discharged with much Glory to themselves, Success abroad, and Applause at Home; and thus by a Felicity that rarely attends those Royal Intimacies, the Influence of the Favourite, and the Publick Interest pointed the same Way.

But the Nation was not more strengthen'd by this perfect Harmony between the Queen and the People, than it was weakened by its intestine Divisions. The Beginning, or rather the Revival of these unhappy Differences, happened about the Time of the Popish Plot; and they continued with very ill Consequences, and worse Prospects, till the End of King Charles the Second's Reign. But after King James had ascended the Throne, and began to drive on so violently in favour of Popery, the imminent Danger frightened both Parties into Agreement, when Reason could not bring them to it, and they joined heartily against the common Enemy. But the Revolution bringing Quiet and Security with it, the Remembrance of past Dangers gradually vanished, and the old Animosities, as is the Nature of Mankind, began to sprout again; the Jacobite Notions of some, and the Republican Principles of others heightening and inflaming those little Divisions, which Differences of Opinion about the Publick Management will unavoidably produce in free Countries. When the Nation was thus divided, the two Parties did not want Heads. And the great A.D. 1702. Men on both Sides soon finding the Pleasure and Convenience of being obeyed and courted by numerous Bodies, were, to be sure, not very solicitous to quench those Feuds which increased their own Power, and the Number of their Dependants. But upon King William's Death, the universal Love which the Nation bore to the Queen, extinguishing the Hopes of the Jacobites and Republicans, there remained only the Interests of the Leaders on both Sides to keep up the Diffensions. And as a Fire once kindled is easily maintained, these latter found it no difficult Matter to continue the former Quarrels, and apply them to their own private Views and Interests. And thus the well-meaning Part of the Nation, who had now no real Ground of Contention, was so deluded as to be blown up into Madness and Fury for the Interests of a few private Men; and to think their Leaders and Favourites were contending for the Security of all that was near and dear to them, while the real Dispute was only who should enjoy the Authority and Revenue that waits upon Publick Offices. For without doubt, there were on one Side as well as on the other, many Persons of excellent Abilities; alike devoted to their Country's Interest, and alike too subject to those Errors and Passions that mislead great Men from pursuing the same; who were therefore equally to be trusted, and equally to be suspected.

The Queen in the first Place sent a Letter to the States-General, to assure them of her Friendship, and steady Adherence to the Measures lately taken with them. And soon after the Earl of Marlborough was sent over, to enter into a more strict Alliance with that State. These Steps encouraged the Dutch to look their present Dangers in the Face with Alacrity and Firmness.

The House of Commons settled the same Revenues on the Queen as had been granted to the late King. Upon this Occasion the Queen, when she went to pass the Act to that Purpose, promised to allow one hundred Thousand Pounds per Ann. out of her own private Revenue to be applied to the Publick Service; which wonderfully delighted the People, and was acknowledged by Addresses of Thanks from both Houses of Parliament.

The War abroad appearing unavoidable, A Consultation was held in the Privy-Council thereupon. The Earl of Rocheſter proposed, that the English should engage therein only as Auxiliaries, which was opposed by the Earl of Marlborough; who alledged not only that the Honour of the Crown was concerned to make good the late King's Engagements, but that France could never be reduced within reasonable Bounds, unless England engaged as Principal in the Quarrel. This Opinion was agreed to by a Majority, and a Declaration of War was drawn up. This was communicated to the House of Commons for their Advice thereupon; who promised to assist her Majesty to the utmost

A.D. 1702. utmost in carrying on the War. And upon this Assurance War was soon after proclaimed against France.

Proceedings
of Parliament.

Little was done of Importance after this, during this Session of Parliament. Complaint was made to the House of Lords, of a Report raised and propagated by some violent Party-Men, both in Speech and Writing, (as there is nothing so extravagant which such Persons will not believe or invent,) of a Design carried on by a numerous Party to defeat the Queen's Succession, and to place the Elector of Hanover in her Throne. The House was sensible of the dangerous Tendency of such Reports, and having declared them false and scandalous, ordered the Attorney-General to prosecute some who had published the same in Writing. Another Complaint was made to the House of a Pamphlet, containing many Reflections on King Charles the First, and tending to the Subversion of Monarchy; which was voted malicious and villainous, and ordered to be burnt by the Hands of the Common Hangman. Another Censure was passed on a Sermon on the thirtieth of January, in which the Preacher was as extravagant in the opposite Extreme, and insinuated, that the Jews were less wicked in crucifying our Saviour, than the English Rebels in murdering King Charles the First. The Lords resolved, that there were many Things in that Sermon that gave just Scandal to all Christian People. The two Houses joined in an Address to the Queen to prohibit Commerce with France, with which she promised to comply. Soon after the Lords addressed her to encourage Privateers, and Attempts upon the Spanish West-Indies, of which she promised to take Care. Two Days after, the Queen went to the Parliament, and having pass'd the Bills that were ready, put an End to the Session by a Prorogation.

Affairs of Scotland.

The Affairs of Scotland proved very thorny and perplexed; and the Proceedings of many of that Nation gave no small Trouble here. The ill Humours there took their Rise from the following Causes. It was always the Custom before the Revolution, that the Parliament of that Nation was chosen annually; but King William broke into this Constitution, and continued the Convention-Parliament throughout his whole Reign. This Innovation bred ill Blood there; which was mightily increased by the Opposition England had made to all the Endeavours of the Scots to extend and improve their Commerce; and especially by their ill Treatment about their Settlement at Darien. The Scotch Nation so universally resented these Things, that the Queen was advised to continue that Parliament, to prevent the Consequences of a new Election, while the People were in such a Temper. This was arbitrary enough, so that it is no Wonder if it raised very furious and dangerous Heats. Several of the Scots Nobility came to London, to lay before the Queen the Illegality and Unreasonableness of such a Project; but the Advice of

The Parliament there
continued.

those who preferred Convenience to Equity A.D. 1702, prevailed; and the Queen remained inflexible. A Proclamation was issued out appointing that Parliament to meet on the ninth of June; and James Duke of Queensberry was named to be the Queen's High Commissioner. The Queen wrote a Letter to the Parliament, with Professions of Kindness and Affection to that her ancient Kingdom, her Concern for their Loss at Darien, and Proposals for an Union.

When the Parliament met, Duke Hamilton, before the Queen's Commission was read, stood up. He then made a Speech, in which, after many Professions of Loyalty to the Queen, he said that he deemed their Sitting as a Parliament, not to be warranted by Law; and having read a Protestation to that Purpose, took Instruments of what he had done, and went out of the House. His Example was followed by Eighty of the other Members. And this Act was so pleasing to the People, that as they came out they were saluted with loud Acclamations from Persons of all Ranks and Degrees. Nevertheless the other Members continued sitting, and passed an Act for recognizing her present Majesty; and an Act to declare the Sitting of the Parliament legal, and all Opposition thereto High-Treason.

Some Members refuse to acknowledge it.

The Dissenting Members went on, and sent an Address to the Queen to justify themselves. But it was not accepted, and the Queen resolved to maintain this Session of Parliament, and signified the same by a Letter to them. The Parliament proceeded to pass an Act for a Land Tax; and another to appoint Commissioners for an Union. After this it was proposed to settle the Succession in Scotland upon the House of Hanover; but this was so vigorously opposed, that the High Commissioner dared not hazard the Vote; and therefore broke up the Session. The Commissioners for the Union met soon after; but a Difference between them about the Interests of the Scotch India and African Company, put a Stop to all farther Progress for this Time.

The Parliament breaks up.

But the great Scene of Affairs lay in the Military Operations by Sea and Land. Before King William's Death, he was informed that the Princes and Dukes of Wolfenbuttle were raising Men for the French Service with French Money, in the very Bowels of the Empire. To repress this Attempt, so dangerous both in its Example and Consequences, that great Prince had concerted Measures with the Dukes of Hanover and Zell, to fall upon those Princes and disarm them. The King died, but the Design went on successfully; and the Elector of Hanover with his Troops made an Irruption into that Principality, and blocked up Wolfenbuttle, the Capital City. The Princes being so hard pressed were obliged to submit; and the Troops they had raised for the French Service, were taken into the Pay of the Elector of Hanover.

The Actions
Abroad.

The Elector of Cologne had admitted French Garrisons into all his strong Places;

A.D. 1702. so that the Republick of Holland was surrounded almost on every Side by the Troops of that Nation. To remove this Thorn from their Side, the Siege of Keyserfwaert, a strong Post in that Electorate, had been concerted by King William. This Enterprize had been carried on; but slowly and with Difficulty, on account of the bad Weather. This was the State of Things on that Side, when the Earl of Marlborough came to the Hague, on his Way to the Army. He was ordered to use his Endeavours with the States to engage them to prohibit all Commerce with France: But it seems they found it turn so much to account, that his Representations proved ineffectual. During this Negotiation, News was brought that Keyserfwaert was surrendered to the Prussian and Dutch Troops.

An Attempt had been made by the French upon Nimeguen, which was near succeeding. But the English and Dutch Troops, who were at a great Distance, having Notice of the Danger that Town was in, marched to secure it with such critical Expedition, that they came up to it half an Hour before the French, and saved it. While the Army was near this Town, the Earl of Marlborough arrived there. The Mareschal Boufflers who commanded the French Army, made it his great Care throughout this Campaign to avoid an Engagement. The Earl of Marlborough finding it impossible to draw him out of this cautious Conduct, made use of the Opportunity to besiege and take first Venlo, then Roermonde, and lastly Stevenswaert, three strong Places upon the Maeſe; by which the Navigation of that River was opened, and Maestricht, almost blocked up, was freed and secured. And following the Tide of his Success, the Earl afterwards besieged the City and Citadel of Liege, and made himself Master of them. This last Action put an End to the Campaign, the Season of the Year not permitting the Soldiers to continue in the Field any longer.

Thus on the Side of Holland, the Event of Affairs appeared favourable to the Confederates. On the Side of Germany the Elector of Bavaria threw off the Mask, declared for the French, and surprized Ulm, the Capital for the Suabia, and an Imperial City. Upon this Act of Hostility, the Imperial Diet at Ratisbon resolved to declare War against France and Spain; and requested the Emperor to proceed against the Elector of Bavaria, according to the Constitution of the Empire. On the other Hand, the Elector sent a kind of Manifesto to the Circles of Suabia and Franconia, requiring them to accept a Neutrality, and not to meddle with Foreign Affairs. But these Orders were little regarded. Soon after some Letters between the Elector, and Mareschal Catinat, the French General, were intercepted, by which the Practices of the Elector to disturb Germany, in Conjunction with the French, plainly appeared. Upon this the two Ministers of Bavaria and Cologne were forbid to come any more to the Imperial Diet; and on the thirtieth of September N. S. A.D. 1702. the Declaration of War was published. Though this happened so late in the Year, the Season did not pass over without an Encounter. For Prince Lewis of Baden, who commanded the German Army, having weakened his Forces by great Detachments sent to hinder the Conjunction of the French and Bavarians, was attacked unexpectedly in his Camp by the former, who were very much superior in Number. The German Horse were at first put into such Disorder, that the Battle seemed utterly lost. But the Foot behaved themselves so well that they turned the Scale, and obliged the French to fly in their Turn. The Court of France to keep up the Spirits of their People at the Entrance of the War, ordered Te Deum to be sung as for a Victory; and made the Commander, Monsieur Villars, a Mareschal of France. But the Advantage appeared to be on the Side of the Germans, who not only prevented the joining of the French and Bavarian Forces, but soon after obliged the French to repass the Rhine. And with that the Campaign ended.

In Italy the Success was as doubtful as on the Side of Germany. Prince Eugene of Savoy, who commanded the German Forces, was attacked by the French and Spaniards at Luzzara, who being very much superior in Numbers, thought to have surrounded him. But he made so brave a Stand, that he drove them from the Field, and opened his Way through them. But the Inequality of Numbers gave the others so great an Advantage, that tho' they had the worse in this Encounter, they gained several Posts from the Germans afterwards, and the Success of the Campaign seemed determined on their Side.

The Operations of War were as active in another Part of the World. King William had laid the Plan of a Design to invade Spain; having Intelligence that many of the Spanish Grandeess were ready and willing to declare for the House of Austria, if they could be supported by a Body of Forces. With this Intention great Preparations were begun, and after his Death carried on diligently both in England and Holland. Every Thing was now ready, and the Confederate Fleet sailed from St. Hellens July 1. It consisted of fifty Ships of the Line of Battle; thirty English, and twenty Dutch, commanded in chief by Sir George Rooke; which convoyed a great Fleet of Transports, carrying near fourteen Thousand Land-Forces, under the Command of the Duke of Ormond. They steered their Course towards Cadiz, but were so long detained by Calms and contrary Winds, that it was the twelfth of August before they came to an Anchor in the Bay of Bulls, about two Leagues from that City. Advice being brought that there were two very convenient Bays to make a Descent, a Council of War was called. The Duke of Ormond vehemently pressed to land the Soldiers there, and make a sudden and vigorous Attack upon the Town; which was filled with so much Consternation at this unexpected

The Campaign in the Netherlands.

The Empire declares War against France. An Action in Germany.

The Earl of Marlborough's Success.

The Campaign in Italy.

An Expedition to Cadiz.

The Elector of Bavaria declares for the French.

A.D. 1702. peated Visit, that they seemed not at all likely to make any Resistance. But this was opposed by others, especially the Sea-Officers; so that it was at last resolved to attack first the Fort of St. Katherine, and Port St. Mary, to make their Approach to Cadiz the more secure. Accordingly the Land-Forces were set on Shore in the Bay of Bulls, and made themselves Masters of Rota, Fort St. Katherine, and Port St. Mary's. But when the Soldiers had possessed themselves of Port St. Mary's, and found the Houses forsaken by the Inhabitants, but replenished with Stores of good Wine, they drank of it so greedily, that the Discipline of War could no longer restrain them. So that though they were forbid to offer any Injury to the People, (our Army coming as Deliverers and not as Invaders) they fell to plundering and doing all the Mischief that the usual Licence of Soldiers, inflamed by Drunkenness, and what was worse, encouraged by the Example of their Officers, could put into their Heads. This was one great Cause of the ill Success of this Enterprize. For the News of these Disorders being propagated among the Spaniards, gave them such an Aversion to our Troops, that none of Note came to join them during their Stay there. In the mean Time the Garrison of Cadiz recovered their Surprise, and were considerably reinforced. They secured the Passage into the Harbour by a strong Boom, and sinking of Ships at the Entrance; so that it was judged impracticable to force it till the two Forts of Puntal and Matagorda were reduced. The Fort of Matagorda was attempted by a Body of six Thousand Soldiers under the Command of Baron Spaar the Dutch General. But the Ground proved so boggy, that the Besiegers could neither erect Batteries upon so yielding a Foundation, nor dig Trenches deep enough to cover the Men. So that after some fruitless Efforts, it was at last resolved to abandon the Design; and the Troops being all re-imbarked, the Fleet set Sail for England.

Which proves unsuccessful.

The Fleet fails back for England.

They receive Advice of a Plate-Fleet arrived at Vigo.

As they were pursuing their Voyage Homewards, full of Discontent, and Shame, and Murmuring, and mutual Complaints, and Accusations, which ever accompany disappointed Enterprizes, it happened that Sir George Rooke sent three of his Ships into Lagos-Bay upon the Coasts of Portugal, to water there. Mr. Beauvoir, Chaplain of the Pembroke, out of Curiosity went ashore, and chancing to meet the French Consul, the latter upon Mr. Beauvoir's speaking to him in French, commenced an Acquaintance with him, and entertained him two Days at his House. During the Conversation that passed between them, the French Consul in boasting of his Master's Strength, let slip a Hint, that he had a great Fleet just arrived from the West-Indies, at Vigo upon the Coasts of Galicia. It happened too, that before Mr. Beauvoir went aboard again, he met another Gentleman, who was sent Express by the Imperial Minister to the Fleet with an Account of the same Thing. Upon these Advices the Fleet was a little comforted, and hoped by some notable Action at Vigo, to make amends for the Disappointment at Cadiz.

The Fleet came to an Anchor before Vigo, October 11. They found in that Port thirty Men of War, and two and twenty Galleons, under the Command of Monsieur Chateau-Renault. There was a narrow Streight at the Entrance of the Harbour, guarded by a Fort, and also by several Batteries erected upon the Shore; besides a strong Boom laid across it. Within the Harbour the Enemies Men of War were ranged in the Form of an Half-Moon, with their Broadfides towards the Streight that gave Entrance into it. When the Confederates saw this formidable Preparation made for their Reception, they judged that it would be impossible for the Ships to make Way into the Harbour, through the Fire of so many Cannon as were planted along the Streight they were to pass through. It was therefore resolved to set some of the Land-Forces ashore, who should attack the Fort, and possess themselves of the Batteries, before the Ships came up. This was accordingly done, and two thousand five hundred Men were landed under the Command of the Duke of Ormond. The Spaniards attacked them, after they were set on Shore; but the English bravely repulsed them, and marched on to the Fort; which they took, and possessed themselves of a great Battery of thirty eight Pieces of Cannon. Then Vice-Admiral Hopson came up, and went with all the Sail he could make against the Boom, and broke it, and got into the Harbour. But his Entrance there had like to have cost him dear; for the other Ships that followed him stuck in the Boom, and were forced to cut their Way through it; while the Vice-Admiral's Ship stood alone exposed to all the Enemies Cannon. A Fire-ship also laid him Aboard, and set his Ship on Fire, upon which many of the Sailors leapt into the Sea. But it happened that the Fire-ship blew up; and having a great Quantity of Snuff aboard (it being only a Merchant Man made Use of upon that sudden Exigency) the Snuff almost put out the Fire. So that by the Endeavours of those who remained aboard, the Ship was preserved. Mean while the Boom was cut to Pieces by the English and Dutch Ships, who making their Way through it, came one after another into the Harbour. The French Admiral seeing the whole Fleet ready to fall upon him, and the Fort and Batteries ashore possessed by the English, ordered his own Ship to be set on Fire; and the same Thing was done by the other Ships of his Fleet; so that fifteen Men of War were seen flaming at once; the Men making their Escape to Land. The Galleons had been carried up the River; but Orders were given to set these also on Fire, lest they should be seized by the Conquerors. The English and Dutch were now busily employed in saving what they could from

A.D. 1702. They fail to Vigo, and take and destroy the whole Fleet.

A.D. 1702. from the general Destruction, and they preserved ten Men of War, and nine of the Gallies; the rest being either sunk or burnt. The Booty was very considerable, though the Enemy did their utmost to destroy what they could not carry away. It was computed that about fourteen Millions of Pieces of Eight were saved out of the Gallies by the French, before the English and Dutch Fleet came up; and that about six Millions were either taken or destroyed. But there were rich Goods also aboard them, valued at as much more, of which about a fourth Part was saved by the Enemy, another fourth Part taken, and the rest destroyed. This Service performed, the Fleet sailed away for England, leaving Sir Cloudesley Shovel to refit as many of the Enemies Ships as could bear the Sea, and destroy the rest. The Success at Vigo silenced the Murmurings about the Miscarriage at Cadiz. Some Officers were questioned about their Misbehaviour there which had so fatal Consequences; and Sir Henry Bellasis, who was found faulty, was dismissed from the Queen's Service.

While these Things passed abroad, the Queen dissolved the Parliament. She spent some Part of the Summer in a Progress through Oxford to Bath, and in October met the new Parliament. After the usual Forms of Addresses were over, the News came of the Success at Vigo, upon which the Queen ordered a Day of Publick Thanksgiving, to be solemnized for the Blessings of Providence on the Arms of the Confederates at Vigo, and in Flanders. And the Queen came in Person to St. Paul's Cathedral, followed by both Houses of Parliament, and the great Officers of State.

The Proceedings of Parliament.

The Commons having voted a Supply for maintaining the Land-Forces for the present Year, the next Thing that came before them was a Complaint made by Sir John Packington against the Bishop of Worcester, who it seems had stickled warmly in Opposition to Sir John at the Election of Members for the County of Worcester. The Commons, after hearing Witnesses, resolved, that the Complaint was well-grounded, and that the Bishop had acted contrary to the Privileges and Liberties of the Commons of England; and voted to address the Queen to remove him from the Place of Lord Almoner, which he then held. The Lords hearing of this, thought the Privileges of their Order invaded, if a Peer was to suffer a Penalty without the Judgment of their House. So that they presented an Address before that of the Commons, in which they requested the Queen not to shew any Mark of her Displeasure to the Bishop, till he were found guilty of some Crime by due Course of Law. But the Influence of the House of Commons, or some other Cause was so forcible, that when the Address of the Lower House was presented, the Queen promised them to do as they requested. Shortly after, the Queen having represented to the House, that there was little or no Provision made for Prince George of Denmark in Case he should survive her, the Commons resolved to settle one hundred thousand Pounds yearly upon him.

The Earl of Marlborough about this Time arrived from Holland; and it was not long before Sir Edward Seymour waited upon him with the Thanks of the House of Commons for his Services the last Campaign. Those Services were certainly very great and eminent; and though his present Successes were but faint Glimmerings of the glorious Actions he afterwards performed, yet none could have believed that King William's Place could have been so happily supplied. But his noble Talents were sullied and diminished by a mean Fault, and the most unworthy of an heroic Mind, an inordinate Love of Money; a Disposition which his Circumstances (which were low at his first setting out in the World) had made formerly excusable, but ought certainly to have been left in his Ascent to the high Advancement he was arrived to. He had not been long in England, before his Lady persuaded the Queen to add to the Title of Duke, which was a Remuneration worthy his Services, an additional Pension of five thousand Pounds a Year out of the Post-Office, under Pretence of supporting the Honour. But because this could be granted only during the Queen's Life, she was prevailed on to send a Message to the House of Commons, to desire them to make his Pension perpetual. The Duke's Friends were angry, and his Enemies delighted, with such a Meanness in his great Character; so that when the Queen's Message came to be considered, there was so much said against it, and so little for it, that the House resolved upon an Address, in which they represented to her Majesty the evil Consequences such a Precedent of alienating the Crown Revenues might have; concluding with a short and grateful Mention of the Duke's Merits, which by a noble Mind ought to have been prized above a Pension. The two Favourites were nettled at this Disappointment; and it gave Occasion for many severe Reflections upon them.

The Commons oppose a Grant of five Thousand Pounds per Annum made to the Duke of Marlborough.

The Earl of Ranelagh, who had been Paymaster-General of the Army, underwent a Censure from the House of Commons, for having misapplied the Publick Money. He endeavoured to divert the Storm by laying down his Place, which was divided between John How Esq; and Sir Stephen Fox; but nevertheless he was soon after expelled the House. A Bill was ordered to be brought in to resume all Grants made by the late King William, and apply them to the Use of the Publick; but it was dropped before it passed the House. A Motion was made for a Bill to hinder any from sitting in Parliament who enjoyed Office or Employment, which was rejected. But it gave Occasion to order another Bill, enacting, that no Person should be chosen a Member of the House of Commons, who had not a sufficient real Estate; but this was thrown out in the Upper House.

Other Proceedings of Parliament.

A.D. 1702. Soon after the Commons, upon a Message from the Queen, agreed to augment the Forces with ten Thousand Men, but upon Condition that the States should prohibit all Commerce and Correspondence with France. The Lords also addressed the Queen to the same Purpose. The Reason why the House insisted on this Prohibition was, that the French found it difficult to remit Money to Italy or Germany, without the Help of the English, Dutch, and Geneva Merchants. And a Discovery was made about this Time of an Intercourse of Bills of Exchange, between some French Bankers at Paris, and some Merchants at London.

The unhappy Diffensions of our Countrey had now taken a new Turn; the Fears of Popery, which had once occasioned them, being taken away by the Revolution in 1688. and the Laws made since that Time. It might then have been hoped that all Differences would have been for ever buried, when the old Enemy, Popery, was entirely reduced; and a perfect Concord among Protestants seemed to be ratified by the Act of Toleration. But the peevish Humours of some Persons on both Sides, infected the others; and from a few particular Instances, the zealous Members of the Church of England on one Side, and the warm and inconsiderate Part of the Dissenters on the other, were scared with mutual panic Fears. The Churchmen were made to fear the Ruine and Subversion of the Church from imaginary Contrivances and Attempts of the Dissenters. And these in Return grew as jealous of a persecuting Spirit in the Church of England, which their own Fancies had raised to fright themselves with. And because no present Grounds appeared for such Surmises on either Side, they raised them from the Remembrance of past Transactions, which having no Relation to the present State of Things, ought to have been eternally forgot.

A Bill to prevent Occasional Conformity brought into the House of Commons.

This Temper of Mens Minds brought in this Session a famous Bill to prevent Occasional Conformity. Of this Occasional Conformity there were two Kinds. One was introduced by some moderate Persons among the Dissenters, who though they forbore to communicate with the Church constantly, yet thought proper to do so some Times, to shew their Charity, and that they looked upon those of both Persuasions to be equally the Flock and Servants of our Saviour Jesus Christ. But there was another Occasional Conformity of a less commendable Nature. For, because the Test Act made it necessary that all Persons in Office of Trust or Power should receive the Sacrament according to the Usage of the Church of England, many of the Dissenters, who pretended at other Times to be with-held from joining themselves to the Church by Scruples of Conscience, would yet venture to communicate with her, in order to qualify themselves for such Places. This was without doubt a very unjustifiable Practice, and had given great Offence to many conscientious Persons among the Dissenters, as well as of the Church of England. To put a Stop to this, a Motion was made in the House of Commons for a Bill to prevent the like for the future. The Motion was received, and a Bill was ordered to be brought in accordingly; which passed the Lower House with great Ease, being set forward by Persons of different Characters, for different Reasons. Some who were hearty Lovers of the Church, and of strict and regular Lives, concurred in it to remove what they thought a Scandal to Religion in general, and of dangerous Consequence to the Church of England in particular; and others who were no Ways concerned about Religion, because a Zeal for the Church seemed a proper Method to increase and promote their Interest. And thus Mr. Bromley, who made the Motion, and was a Gentleman of real Seriousness and Piety, was joined in preparing the Bill with Mr. Saint-John, (since Lord Bolingbroke) whose Severity and Strictness of Life has never been much commended. When this Bill was carried up to the House of Lords, it was not so well received. Some thought it better to leave the Matter a little more loose, lest by excluding the Occasional Conformists of the second Kind, they should also make a Breach with those of the first Kind. And others affected to shew their Zeal against it, because their Interest and Credit lay among the Dissenters, and those who favoured them. The Lords however did not reject the Bill, but made several Amendments to it, which the Commons disagreed to. A free Conference was held about them between a Committee of both Houses, but with little Success. So that both Parties being stiff, the Bill was dropped between them.

The Bill dropped.

A Division happened between the two Houses upon another Occasion. The Commons had appointed Commissioners to inspect the Publick Accounts; upon whose Report the House resolved that the Lord Hallifax, Auditor of the Receipt of the Exchequer, had been guilty of great Mismanagements. The Lords also examined some of the Proceedings of the said Commissioners, but came to a Resolution opposite to that of the Commons, namely, that the Lord Hallifax had rightly performed the Duty of his Office. In the Course of the Lords Enquiry they had sent a Message to the Commons, to desire that the Commissioners might attend upon their Committee. This Message was not answered when the above Resolution was passed; but soon after the Commons at a Conference represented to the Lords, that they could not comply with their Lordships Desires; because they could not see what End the Lords could propose to themselves in this Examination; since they could neither supply any Deficiencies, the Grant of all Aids being in the Commons, nor yet apply any Surplusage, if any such should appear; nor could they, if any Mismanagement should be discovered, take Notice of it, even in their judicial Capacity,

A Difference between the two Houses.

A.D. 1702. pacity, otherwise than at the Complaint of the Commons; nor could any Information the Commissioners might give, entitle the Lords either to acquit or condemn. For these Reasons they observed that the above Resolution was irregular, and the more so, because it tended to prejudge a Cause that might regularly have come before them, either by Complaint of the Commons, or by Writ of Error from the Courts below. The Lords were provoked with these Representations; and resolved, that the Lords have an undoubted Right to take Cognizance of all Publick Accounts, that their Proceedings, in Relation to the Lord Hallifax, were regular; and that the Commons at the Conference, had used reflecting and unparliamentary Expressions and Arguments.

The Lords then desired a Conference with the Commons, at which they presented them with these Resolutions. The Commons were as warm on the other Side, and desired another Conference with the Lords; in which the House gave to their Committee the following Heads to go upon at the Conference. "I. That no Cognizance the Lords can take of Publick Accounts can enable them to supply any Deficiency, or apply any Surplusage of the Publick Money. II. That the Lords can neither acquit nor condemn any Man, upon any Enquiry arising originally in their own House. III. That their Attempt to acquit the Lord Hallifax was unparliamentary, and unprecedented. IV. That the Expressions used by the Commons were neither Reflecting nor Unparliamentary. V. That the Lords delivering their Resolutions, instead of Reasons, in Answer to the Reasons of the Commons, was not agreeable to ancient Methods". When the Managers on both Sides met, those of the Commons opened the several Particulars they were charged with; and said, that if the Lords did controvert any of those Points, they were ready to maintain them. But the Lords made no Answer to any of the Particulars, excepting that which related to the Resolution concerning the Lord Hallifax; upon which they acknowledged, that they were no Court of Enquiry to form an Accusation; that their Proceedings, in Relation to that Lord, were no Trial; nor was their Resolution any Judgment or Acquittal; but that he might still be prosecuted as before. But that which gave Occasion to that Proceeding was, they said, the Resolution of the House of Commons reflecting upon a Member of their House. The Managers of the House of Commons having replied to this, and the Lord Hallifax having spoken for himself, the Conference broke up; as did the Session it self by a Prorogation not long after, this Dispute having no farther Consequences.

During the last Summer there happened an Action in the West-Indies, between a French Squadron under Monsieur du Casse, and a Squadron of English Ships, under Admiral Bembow. But the Captains of the English Admiral not seconding his Endeavours, the A.D. 1702. French Squadron escaped; Admiral Bembow losing his Leg by a Cannon-Shot, of which Wound he afterwards died. Three of the Captains, Kirkby, Wade, and Constable, were tried at a Court-Martial for Cowardice, and Neglect of Duty; and Kirkby and Wade were shot to Death at Plymouth. Some little Actions also passed by Land in America, but without any remarkable Consequences.

The Distempers of Scotland were not at all lessened by what passed in the last Session of Parliament. The Queen's Council finding it impracticable or unsafe to continue that Assembly any longer, had summoned a new one; in the Choice of which the Stream ran strongly in Favour of those who were like to oppose the Measures from the Throne. When the Parliament met, and the usual Forms were past, Duke Hamilton proposed an Act for recognizing the Queen's Authority, and her Right and Title to the Crown of Scotland. This was easily received: But the Ministry there, knowing how obnoxious they were on account of the continuing the last Parliament, endeavoured to slide in a Clause, by which it should be made High-Treason to impugn or quarrel her Majesty's Right and Title to the Crown; or her Exercise of the Government from her actual Entry to the same. The Meaning of the latter Part of this Clause was well understood; and vigorously opposed by those who were dissatisfied with the Proceedings in the last Parliament, which this Clause might have been interpreted as a Confirmation of. It produced a warm Debate, in which the Party that opposed the Ministers had a great Advantage, being at full Liberty to explain themselves; whereas the other Side dared not give their true Reasons. But what Argument could not do, some secret Intrigues brought about; for though the discontented Members had a Majority, they were prevailed on to let the Clause pass upon some private Motives; it being, however expressly declared at passing it, that the Meaning of that Clause should not extend to justify the Actings in the late Parliament, if they should be thereafter questioned. Four Days after the Act received the Royal Assent.

In the next Place an Act for a Supply was presented. But this was interrupted by an Overture, that the Parliament should in the first Place, and before all Things, proceed to make such Constitutions and Regulations in the Government, as might secure Religion and Liberty after the Queen's Decease. It brought on a long and warm Debate which of these Overtures should be first received; and at last it was determined in favour of the latter. But before this Affair was entered into, an Act for Toleration of all Protestants in the Exercise of their religious Worship was presented and read. One would scarce have thought that a Law so equitable, so humane, so solid a Foundation of National Happiness and Security, in-

Admiral Bembow killed.

A.D. 1703: The Parliament of Scotland meets.

Their Proceedings.

The Parliament prorogued.

A Fight at Sea in the West-Indies.

An Act for Toleration opposed by the Scotch Kirk.

forced

A.D. 1703. forced too by the amiable and christian Moderation and Tenderness shewn by the Established Church in England, could ever miscarry, when recommended by such weighty Arguments, and so winning and attractive an Example. But such was the Temper of the Scotch Kirk, that neither the Interest and Welfare of their Countrey, nor Christian Charity and Brotherly Love, nor that beautiful and inviting Pattern set them in the neighbouring Kingdom, could either persuade, or melt, or shame them into Reason. They did not blush to present to the Parliament a Representation against this Act, in which they adopted some of those trite and exploded Arguments that were used formerly in England against a Toleration of the Dissenters; concluding with these extraordinary Words: "That to enact a Toleration for those of that Way (which God of his infinite Mercy avert) would be to establish Iniquity by a Law, and would bring upon the Promoters thereof and their Families, the dreadful Guilt of all those Sins, and pernicious Effects that might arise thereupon." This Representation put a Period to all farther Hopes in that Matter.

Farther Proceedings of the Scotch Parliament.

The Parliament of Scotland consisted of two different Parties, as usual, called the Court and Countrey Party. The latter of these took its Rise, or at least received a great Increase from several ungracious Steps that were taken in the last Reign; the Continuation of the Parliament, and the rough Treatment the Scots had received from England about their Settlement in America, and the Interests of their African and Indian Company. These Things were deeply resented by many there, who thinking the English Nation, on account of their superior Wealth and Power, despised the Scots, thought to make their Nation more considerable by thwarting all Measures agreeable to the English Government. This Party was increased by all those who were devoted to the Interests of the late King James, or the Pretended Prince of Wales, who though not numerous by themselves, carried a considerable Weight into either Scale. This it was that gave Occasion for the Overture abovementioned, to secure the Religion and Liberties of Scotland after the Queen's Decease. This Overture being received, the Marquis of Arbol, who made it, offered an Act for the Security of the Kingdom in Case of the Queen's Decease. This Act was now read, and the Parliament proceeded to debate on it; and it was agreed to consider the same, Paragraph by Paragraph.

An Act for Security of the Kingdom proposed.

It is examined Paragraph by Paragraph.

The first Clause mentioned was, that upon the twentieth Day after the Queen's Decease, the Estates of the Nation should meet, and that the Government of the Nation should be in their Hands. This was easily agreed to. The next was, that no Papists should be Members of the Estates; which was also carried without Difficulty. After this, another Clause was offered, that no Englishman or Foreigner, having a Scots Title, and not having an Estate of 1000 l. Sterling yearly Rent in Scotland, should be capable of sitting and voting there. This also passed; but not without a Debate, and a Protest against it. It was afterwards proposed to consider of Limitations to be laid on the Successor after the Queen. This produced violent Heats. For a Member urging that the Queen's Letter to the Parliament empowered them to expect her Concurrence in any Thing that might secure the Liberty and Welfare of the Kingdom, the Lord Commissioner answered him, that he did not expect to hear such Comments made upon the Queen's Letter, and that he did not think he meant that any Limitations should be laid on her self or her Successors. The Member answered, that no Limitations were offered to the Queen, or to the Heirs of her Body, but that some designing Statesmen among Foreigners, had influenced and overawed the Scots Government and Ministry to abandon the Scots Interest. He was backed by another, who said, that he was now convinced that whatever came from the Throne proceeded from the Influence of English Councils. This was taken Notice of by some Members about the Throne, who interrupted the other, insinuating that such Expressions were not to be suffered. But this set the House in a Flame, who cried out upon Breach of Privilege, and demanded that the Member might speak without Interruption, and explain himself. At last Silence being made, the Member added, that he could easily explain himself, that he spoke not as a Slave, but as a Free-man. That he knew the Truth of what he said, and that nothing could save Scotland from Slavery, but withdrawing themselves from under the Dominion of an English Prince, after the Queen's Decease, without Heirs of her Body. However, at last it was carried by twenty six Voices not to proceed to Limitations. It was proposed afterwards to consider of a Regency, in case the Successor to be nominated were under Age; but it was resolved to leave this to the Meeting of the Estates. A Clause to empower the Estates to nominate a Successor of the Royal Line, and of the Protestant Religion, being next taken into Consideration, it was moved that these Words should be added, "of the true Protestant Religion, as by Law established in this Kingdom." This was offered in order to exclude the House of Hanover; which was not only unacceptable to the Jacobites there, but to many others of different Sentiments, because that Family was named to succeed in England; and the popular Stream in Scotland ran much towards a distinct Government from ours. But this Addition, when put to the Vote, was rejected.

The following Clause was afterwards offered, "providing the Successor to be named by the Estates, be not the Successor to the Crown of England; unless in this Session of Parliament, such Conditions of Government be settled, as may secure the Honour and Independency of the Crown of this Kingdom,

A.D. 1703. "dom, the Freedom, Frequency and Power of Parliaments, and the Religion, Liberty and Trade of the Nation from English or Foreign Influence." This Clause also produced a strenuous Debate; when the House being in great Heats and Confusion, some Members moved for a Delay. This was seconded by the Chancellor, who without staying for a Vote, or asking the Opinion of the House, adjourned the Parliament by the Commissioner's Order for four Days. This Adjournment threw the House into a furious Uproar; and a great many Members protested against it as illegal, and took Instruments of it. And that very Night an Address to the Queen was signed by sixty Members, and by fifteen or twenty the next Morning. It raised great Heats also at the next Meeting; but the Difference being at last compromised, they proceeded on the Clause before them. The Queen's Advocate offered another, importing, "That no Person should be King or Queen of both Kingdoms, unless a free Communication of Trade, Freedom of Navigation, and the Liberty of the Plantations be fully agreed to, and established by the Parliament and Kingdom of England in favour of Scotland, to the Satisfaction of the present, or any future Scots Parliament, or Meeting of Estates". It caused a long Debate, which of these two Clauses should be admitted; the Court Party standing for the latter, and the Country Party for the former. At last a Member stood up and moved, since both Sides were so tenacious of the several Clauses, that they might both be added to the Act of Security; which was agreed to. Some other Clauses of less Importance were added, and the Act passed by a Majority of fifty nine Voices.

The Act passed the House

An Act proposed to settle the Succession on the House of Hanover.

Which is fiercely rejected.

This important Act being carried, some were for proceeding to farther Securities for the Liberty of the Nation: But this with much ado was diverted, and the House went upon the Consideration of Trade. An Act was then offered for the importing French Wines, which raised very great Heats; but at last, after a long and angry Debate, was marked a first Reading. When this was over, the Earl of Marchmont presented an Act to settle the Succession on the House of Hanover. This Motion was received at first quietly enough; and the Clerk began to read the Act. But when he came to that Paragraph where the Princess Sophia, &c. were mentioned by Name, the Words were no sooner out of his Mouth, but the whole House was in a Flame. Some moved to have the Overture burnt; others to have the Lord that offered it called to the Bar, and others to have him sent to the Castle. But with much ado the Chancellor procured Silence, and the Clerk was ordered to read it through. But when that was done, and a Motion was made that it should be marked a first Reading, so fierce an Opposition was made, that the Promoters of the Act dar'd not put it to the Vote; but only desired that it might be marked in the Minutes that such a Thing had been presented, as was customary. But this also was opposed with great Warmth; and it was said, that though it was both customary and proper, that every Thing which was moved in the House should be marked in the Minutes; yet that such an Act as this of the Earl of Marchmont ought to have some particular Mark of Indignation set upon it. At length the Question being proposed, whether this Overture should be marked or no, it was carried in the Negative by fifty seven Voices.

The Act of Security had indeed passed the House, but it was only a dead Letter till the Royal Sanction should give it Life and Vigour. It was earnestly pressed by many of the Members, that the Lord Commissioner might be desired to give immediately the Royal Assent to the Act. While this Proposal was arguing and canvassing in the House, the Commissioner sat by with so much Indifference that some began to suspect they would find Difficulty in bringing him to it; and therefore moved, that the House might address the Queen for her Assent. But others who liked the Thing, moved however to defer it till they knew the Commissioner's Intentions. This Motion was approved and seconded by a great many; and the Commissioner was earnestly pressed to say whether he was instructed in that Matter. But he made them no Manner of Answer. This kindled the Flame with greater Fury than ever. A Member stood up, and in a warm Speech said, that their Nation being in a desperate Case, must make suitable Provisions. That if a Prince should succeed to the Crown of Scotland and England together, whoever it should be, or however it might happen, their Nation would become Slaves, unless they secured themselves by proper Conditions of Government; to which End he offered an Act. This was not accepted; the House being warm upon the Act of Security, and eagerly pressing the Commissioner to give the Royal Assent to it. But he continued so inflexibly silent, that the Members, weary of making fruitless Instances, left him, and went upon other Business.

But the next Day the Commissioner spoke to the House. He told them, that he was ready to give the Royal Assent to all the Acts they had passed this Session, the Act of Security only excepted, which he said required the Queen's farther Consideration. This raised as great a Fury as ever; but such Management had been used, that when it was put to the Vote, whether they should address the Queen, or proceed to other Business, the latter was carried by twelve Voices.

The Provisions made by the Act of Security being frustrated, it was moved to proceed to some others. An Act had been proposed by Mr. Fletcher of Salton, tending to that End, which was now called for. The Purport of it was, that no Offices of Trust and Power should be disposed of by the Prince, without Recommendation

The Commissioner refuses his Assent to the Act of Security.

Other Acts proposed to that End.

A.D. 1703. of Parliament. But this Scheme was not only opposed by the Courtiers, but disliked by several of the Country Party, as approaching too near to the State of a Commonwealth. The Court Party seeing this, moved at the same Time for a Subsidy; and caused the Question to be put, Whether the House should proceed to Mr. Fletcher's Act, or to consider of a Subsidy? For they saw the first would hardly be carried. But the other Party avoided this Blow by offering another State of the Vote, Overtures for Liberty, or Overtures for Subsidy. The Courtiers saw that Overtures for Liberty would certainly be carried; and they had no Way to avoid it but by adhering to the former Question. Mr. Fletcher seeing this, frustrated their Design, by desiring Leave to withdraw the Act he had presented. This brought the Matter to a Crisis; the Members calling all round the House for a Vote upon the Question, Liberty or Subsidy; and severe Reflections upon the Ministry were heard on all Sides. The Commissioner at last stood up and moved, that an Act might be read for a Subsidy, promising that after a first Reading it should be no more heard of for three ensuing Sittings. This Motion, when the House was calling eagerly for a Vote of another kind, threw the Members into an outrageous Fury. Some said, it was now plain their Nation was to bow their Necks under the Yoke of Slavery, prepared for them from that Throne. Others said, if their Privileges and Liberties were to be thus torn from them, they would rather die Freemen, than live Slaves. Some pressing for the Vote said, that if there was no other Way of obtaining that undeniable Privilege, they would demand it with their Swords in their Hands. The Rage which transported the House was such, that the Commissioner grew apprehensive of the Safety of his Person. At last he ordered the Chancellor to acquaint the House, that they should go upon Overtures for Liberty next Session. Upon this Assurance the Members met, and prepared an Overture to be laid before the House. But the Commissioner not liking it, he called for the Bills that were ready for him, and gave the Royal Assent to them: After which he adjourned the Parliament.

The House in a violent Heat.

The Parliament adjourned.

The Campaign in Germany.

The Transactions abroad this Year were very various and remarkable. On the Side of Germany the warlike Motions began earliest, and continued longest. The French began the Campaign betimes with the Siege of Fort Kehl; over against Strasbourg, upon the Rhine. The Elector of Bavaria appearing evidently to be in the Interest of France, the Emperor ordered his Forces to make an Irruption into his Countrey, which they did in two Places. But the Bavarians being in Arms, one of those Parties received a signal Defeat. The Elector also took Ratibon, where the Imperial Diets use to be held; and the French, after an unsuccessful Attempt, opened a Passage into Swabia, and joined the Bavarian Forces. The Emperor and Empire were in the utmost Danger A.D. 1703. from so great a Body of Troops in the very Heart of their Countrey. There were indeed German Armies to make Head against them; but the utmost they could do was to keep the French at a Bay. But this was not long to be hoped for; for there appeared on the sudden a new and almost unthought of Danger from the Side of Italy. For the French King had ordered the Duke de Vendosme, who commanded his Army there, to pass the Mountains, and make his Way to join the French and Bavarian Forces. This appeared no difficult nor tedious Undertaking; the small Countrey of Tyrol being the only Interval between the Elector of Bavaria's Countrey, and the Alpine Mountains that separate Italy and Germany. And the Elector of Bavaria was to enter the Countrey of Tyrol, to facilitate the Passage of the Duke de Vendosme. This Enterprize, had it succeeded, would have proved in all Likelihood the Ruine of the Emperor, but it pleased Providence to disappoint it. For the Measures between the Elector of Bavaria and the Duke de Vendosme were so ill concerted, that the Elector invaded Tyrol at one End, before the French were ready on the other. And the Elector, being met by the German Forces, was obliged to retire to his own Frontiers. The Duke de Vendosme came afterwards; but when he had made a Shift to get over the Mountains, he found his Progress stopped by the Germans; and received Advice at the same Time of the Elector's Retreat. This obliged him to repass the Mountains, after doing some considerable Mischief in the Countrey; which saved the Empire from a most imminent Peril.

The Empire
in great Danger.

Which is happily escaped.

The Elector returning from his unsuccessful Expedition into Tyrol, joined the French Army again, and marched towards the great and wealthy City of Augsburg. They came within Sight of it; but, by the Conduct of Prince Lewis of Baden, were obliged to quit it. But soon after a Body of Imperial Troops was surprized and defeated by the French and Bavarians; and about the same Time the Fortrefs of Old Brisac was taken by the French. Not content with this Success, Marechal Tallard sat down before Landau, notwithstanding the Season of the Year, for it was now the Beginning of Winter. That Place being of very great Importance, the Confederate Powers were so much concerned for it, that after the Army in the Netherlands was put into Winter Quarters, they ordered a great Body of Forces to be detached from them, and to go to assist in the Relief of Landau. The French did the same from their Army; and this Detachment got to the Besiegers at Landau, before the Confederate Forces arrived there, or indeed had any Knowledge that the others were come. This engaged the Hereditary Prince of Hesse-Cassel, who commanded the Troops of the Allies, in an imprudent Attempt upon the French, in which he was defeated, and obliged to retire at a Distance. The Governor of Landau understanding this, and having

Landau besieged and taken by the French.

A.D. 1703. ving no farther Hopes of any Relief, surrendered the Place. And the French and Bavarians making Use of the favourable Time, would not yet leave the Field, but came a second Time before Augsburg. The Governor defended it bravely a few Days. But the Affairs of the Germans were in so low a Condition, that a Letter was sent him to make the best Terms he could, there being no Possibility of relieving him. This Letter was intercepted by the Elector, who, upon reading it, sent it to the Governor by the Messenger that brought it. So that a Capitulation was soon agreed on; and the Garrison marched out, and left their Place to the French and Bavarians. The taking this Place ended the long Campaign.

An Insurrection in Hungary.

The Emperor was not only distressed by the unjust Invasion of the French, and the Defection of the Elector of Bavaria, but also on the Side of Hungary; in which Kingdom the awkward Politicks of the Court of Vienna, by Persecutions and Oppressions of different Kinds, had raised a formidable Insurrection. The Hungarians gained so many Advantages over the Emperor's Troops, that there was no small Apprehension of a Siege at Vienna itself. At the same Time they published a Manifesto, in which they solemnly declared that they had not the least Intention of withdrawing themselves from the Emperor's Allegiance, desiring only to enjoy peaceably their Religion and Liberties under him. But neither the Reasonableness of the Complaints of these People, nor the dutiful Protestations they made, nor the imminent Danger the whole Empire was in, could work upon the untractable Councils at Vienna, so as to make them allow that poor Nation the just and cheap Redress they desired.

The Campaign in the Netherlands.

In the Netherlands, and on the Lower Rhine, the Confederate Arms, under the Conduct of the Duke of Marlborough, were attended with Prosperity and Success. The Duke began this Campaign with the Siege of Bonne, in the Territories of the Elector of Cologne, which was taken in less than a Month, by the usual Forms in Sieges. The French stood upon the Defensive on this Side; but the Duke being employed in the Siege of this Place, they took the Opportunity to form a Design against the Confederates. A great Number of their Troops were dispersed about Maestricht, their Assistance not being necessary in the Siege of Bonne. These Forces the French Generals endeavoured to surprize; and by a March in the Night, arrived in the Neighbourhood of Tongeren where a great Body of those Forces lay, before any Alarm was given. Two Regiments were taken there, and the rest of the Troops that lay thereabouts, hastened away to Maestricht, to shelter themselves under the Cannon of its Ramparts. The French had intended to have pursued them, and to have bombarded the Town, but they lost so much Time at Tongeren, the Regiments that were made Prisoners there having defended themselves for eight and twenty Hours, that before they could come up, the Confederate Forces had rallied, and were formed into Order of Battle, in a very advantageous Situation. This broke the French Measures; who after some Feints of attacking the Allies, marched back again.

Bonne being taken, the Duke of Marlborough came and rejoined the Confederate Army; which being superior to the French in Number, he endeavoured to draw them to a Battle, but in vain; they retiring continually before him till they were got within their Lines.

While every one was intent on the Motions of the two great Armies, the States received an unexpected Alarm on the Side of Antwerp. The Dutch maintained a Body of Forces on that Part of the Countrey, to guard their Frontiers against the French who were in Possession of all the Countrey to the Westward of the Scheld. These Troops were observed by a suitable Number of French Forces, defended by Intrenchments. These two Bodies had continued hitherto without any Motion, quietly watching each other. But the French found Means to get a Reinforcement sent them from the main Army, with so much Secrecy, that the Confederates had not timely Notice of it. With this Addition of Strength they came out of their Lines, and attacked the Dutch Troops. These defended themselves very bravely, and the Fight was sharp and obstinate. But the French had so much the Advantage of Numbers, that the Dutch were forced to give Way; and it was not without Difficulty that the whole Army escaped being cut off and destroyed. But the Courage and Prudence of the Commanders, assisted by the coming on of Night, enabled the Dutch Forces to draw off to a secure Distance; though not without leaving three Thousand of their Men behind them. But the Duke of Marlborough took such Care to reinforce them, that this Action had no farther Consequences.

The Duke after this formed a Design to force the French Lines, but was opposed by the Field Deputies of the States. These last, finding the French would not be drawn to a Battle, were willing to make Use of the Opportunity to drive them to a farther Distance from their own Countrey, by taking the strong Towns they were possessed of in its Neighbourhood. So that by their Management, the Design of attacking the French Lines was laid aside; and the Siege of Huy in the Bishoprick of Liege was resolved on. In seven Days the Garrison was brought to capitulate, and were made Prisoners of War, in order to be exchanged for those Troops of the Allies that were taken at Tongeren. After this Town was taken, it was again proposed to attempt the French Lines, but diverted by the Dutch Deputies a second Time for the same Reason. So that a Resolution was at last taken to besiege Limburg, which surrendered after a Siege of eighteen Days; and the taking of this Town concluded the Campaign.

A.D. 1703.

An Action between the French and Dutch.

Huy and Limburg taken.

A re-

A.D. 1703. A remarkable Accident happened in France about this Time. In the Province of Languedoc, there is a mountainous Countrey called the Cevennes; the Inhabitants of which were chiefly Protestants, till they yielded with the rest of their Brethren to the Rage of the Persecution in 1683. The Countrey being poor and remote, some Protestant Ministers had lately made a Shift to conceal themselves there, and to preach among them sometimes, with that Secrecy which the unrelenting Fury of the Persecution made necessary. This being at first unknown or neglected, the People turned by Degrees to their former Worship; and sometimes assembled secretly in the Woods, to perform their Religious Exercises after the Manner of the Protestants. But this came at last to be taken Notice of, and the Barbarities of the Persecution were again renewed. Troops were posted in several Places, with Orders to watch all such private Meetings, and to fire upon all those whom they should find at such Assemblies, without Pity or Distinction; and if any should escape, to burn their Houses. These Orders did not fail to be executed with Severity enough; and the Countrey soon became a Scene of Desolation and Misery. There was an Abbot who resided in this Countrey, who not content with the ordinary Cruelties, caused the Men who were found at those Meetings to be emasculated. But at last it happened, that in June 1702. some unhappy Protestant being committed to Prison by this wicked Wretch, who designed to treat him with his usual Barbarity; his Acquaintance had so great a Kindness for him, that notwithstanding the Danger of such an Attempt, forty young Men of them took up Arms, broke open the Prison, and set him at Liberty. And being now out of all Hope of Pardon, animated by Despair, and enraged by the Remembrance of past Injuries, they seized upon the Abbot, and used him as he designed to treat the other. They had now proceeded so far, that there was no Hope of Safety but in going farther. They went next into the neighbouring Villages and Towns, with their Swords drawn in their Hands, crying out, Liberty, Liberty! and persuading others to join with them. And they found some whose Resentments got the better of their Fears, so that in no long Time they made a Body of three or four Hundred Men. The Intendant hearing of this, sent Orders to seize them; but the Troops that came upon that Errand were repulsed. The Intendant at first was not much concerned at this; for looking upon this Insurrection as a tumultuary Enterprize that would easily be suppressed by a greater Number of Forces, he proposed to send a Body of Troops among them to live at Discretion, while he put the Soldiers Pay into his own Pocket. And to play this Game the better, he neglected to acquaint the Court of France with what had happened. But by this Negligence the Insurrection gathered Strength, and the Number of those who were in Arms increased to two Thousand. A.D. 1703. who not only became the Masters in their own Countrey, but made frequent Excursions into the Plain, where they did Abundance of Mischief, burning Churches, and putting the Priests to the Sword. The French Court sent at first eight Regiments to suppress them, but the Strength and Numbers of the Cevennois were become too great to be suppressed with so small a Force. So that the Court was obliged to treat this Insurrection more seriously, and to send a formed Army of ten or twelve thousand disciplined Men thither, under the Mareschal de Montrevel. The Cevennois, at the Approach of this formidable Force, having before their Eyes all the Miseries and Cruelties they must expect to undergo from an exasperated and merciless Enemy, gathered Strength from Despair. Those who had not yet engaged, knew if the Soldiers got into the Countrey, little Distinction would be made between Guilty and Innocent; so that they now took up Arms, chusing rather to die in Battle, than live to be subject to a tormenting and intolerable Tyranny. Some barbarous Cruelties committed by the Mareschal's Troops confirmed them in these Resolutions. So that they boldly came out to meet the regular Forces, and defeated them once and again in the open Field, till they compelled them to take Shelter in the walled Towns.

The Successes of these brave Defenders of their Liberties and Religion, coming to the Knowledge of the Powers confederate against France, they grew more attentive to it. And several of the French Refugees here soliciting the Queen to interpose for their Assistance, it was agreed in Council to endeavour to supply them with Arms, Ammunition, and Money, by Means of our Fleet in the Mediterranean. To this End several French Refugees were sent by Land through France to the Cevennes, to acquaint the Camisars (which was a Name those People were known by) with the Queen's good Intentions to relieve them by her Fleet, and with the Signals the Ships would make, and the other Signals that were to be made at Land by the Cevennois to answer them. But the Passages to the Cevennes were so narrowly watched, that only one of those who were sent thither by Land had the good Fortune to succeed; the rest being taken at the Passage of Pont St. Esprit, and either broken alive upon the Wheel, or made Galley-Slaves. However, this Intelligence had been sufficient had the Assistance at Sea been able to do what was proposed. But when the Fleet came into the Mediterranean, the Season was so far advanced, that it was thought improper to hazard it upon a Coast both dangerous and unknown. However it was resolved to send two Men of War with a good Quantity of Arms, Ammunition, and Money, who should make the Signals agreed on; and if they could speak with the Camisars, might consult on proper Methods for bringing them a greater Supply.

Assistance is sent to them from England, but in vain.

But

A.D. 1703. But these two Ships had scarcely parted from the Fleet, when they were informed by the Master of a small French Vessel which they took, that the Mareschal de Montrevel being informed of their Design, had taken the necessary Means to disappoint them. In Obedience to their Orders they however went on; and sailing into the Gulph of Narbonne, they made the Signals in the Manner and Place appointed; but receiving no Answer from the Shore, and thinking it unsafe to stay longer in that dangerous Sea, they failed away to join the Grand Fleet, which was then at Leghorn, and not long after returned home without making any other Attempt.

The Parliament meets.

Their Proceedings.

A Scotch Plot.

The warlike Operations being every where quiet, the Queen met the Parliament. After the usual Forms of Compliments and Supplies were over, the Bill for preventing Occasional Conformity was revived, and passed the House of Commons; but was again thrown out by the Lords. Soon after this, the Queen acquainted the Parliament, in a Speech made to the two Houses, that she had received Informations of dangerous Practices in Scotland by the Emissaries of France; promising to communicate the same to them. Upon this the House of Lords appointed a Committee to examine the same as soon as they should be imparted to the House. But this was resented by the Commons, who addressed the Queen against it, as a Violation of her Prerogative, which they intreated her not to suffer. This Address was answered by a Representation to the Queen from the Lords, that it is their undoubted Right to take Examinations of Persons charged with Criminal Matters; and that the Address of the Commons was unparliamentary, groundless, and highly injurious to the House of Peers. Afterwards they proceeded to the Examination of Papers and living Witnesses in Relation to the Plot; and resolved, "That it did appear to the House that there had been a dangerous Conspiracy carried on, for raising a Rebellion in Scotland, and invading that Kingdom with a French Power". But whether the Evidence, though sufficient to ground such a Resolution on, was not clear enough to charge any particular Persons, or whether there was some other Reason, it is certain that this Affair, though it made a great Noise at first, was afterwards dropped, and no more was heard of it.

A Difference between the two Houses about Elections of the Commons.

Another Difference between the two Houses happened this Session. One Matthew Ashby commenced an Action against William White, Mayor of Ailesbury, and others, for refusing to admit his Vote at the Election of Members to serve in Parliament. This Cause was brought up by Appeal before the Lords, who gave Judgment in Favour of Ashby. The Interposition of the Peers in an Affair relating to Elections in the House of Commons, was resented by the latter, who came thereupon to the following Resolutions. "That it is the sole Right of the Commons (except in Cases otherwise provided for by Act of Parliament) A.D. 1703. "to examine and determine all Matters relating to the Right of Election of their own Members. That no Qualification of an Elector, nor Right of any Person elected, is cognizable elsewhere than before the House of Commons, except in special Cases as above; and that the contrary Practice would be attended with great Inconveniencies. That Matthew Ashby, for having entered an Action at Common Law on that Account, is guilty of a Breach of Privilege. And that all Persons concerned in Prosecutions tending to bring such Controversies to be determined by any other Jurisdiction, whether as Parties, Attornies, Solicitors, or Pleaders, are guilty of an high Breach of Privilege". These Votes of the House of Commons were answered by the Lords; who resolved, "That every Person having a Right to vote at Elections for Members to serve in Parliament, and being wilfully hindered by the Officer who ought to receive the same, may maintain an Action in the Queen's Courts against such Officer. That to assert that Persons receiving such Wrong have no Remedy by the ordinary Course of Law, is against the Freedom of Elections, and tends to encourage Corruption and Partiality in Officers. That the declaring Ashby guilty of a Breach of Privilege, was an unprecedented Attempt upon the Judicature of Parliament, and tended to subject the Law to the Votes of the House of Commons. That the terrifying Electors from prosecuting Actions at Law, when they are debarred of their Right of Voting, and the deterring Lawyers from acting in such Cases, by voting the same to be a high Breach of Privilege of the House of Commons, was assuming a Power to controul the Law, and subject the Property of Englishmen to the Votes of that House". These Differences increasing, and the Parliament having nothing of Importance left them to do, the Queen soon after thought fit to dismiss them by a Prorogation.

The Parliament prorogued.

About this Time the Queen revived the most Ancient and Noble Order of the Thistle in Scotland; and the Duke of Argyle, the Duke of Athol, the Marquis of Annamdale, the Earl of Dalkeith, the Earl of Orkney, and the Earl of Seafield, were made Knights; the Queen dispensing with the Ceremonies and Solemnities of their Installation. The Ensigns of the Order are, a green Ribbon, which the Knights wear in the same Manner as the Knights of the Garter wear a Blue; and a Star with the St. Andrew's Cross. Their Motto is, Nemo me impune lacessit.

The Order of the Thistle revived.

The Emperor had caused the Arch-Duke Charles to be proclaimed King of Spain at Vienna. But the Power of England and Holland being necessary to make good the Claim, that Titular Prince was obliged to make a Progress into those Countries. He arrived in England not long after the Session

The Arch-Duke comes into England.

A.D.1703. of Parliament was begun, and was received at Court with great Splendor; which Reception was answered on his Side by that Condescension and Obsequiousness which the State of his Affairs required. After a few Days Stay at Windsor, he set out for Portsmouth, and going aboard, the English and Dutch Fleet set Sail, to convoy him to Portugal. But after they had been about three Days out at Sea, there arose so furious a Storm from the South-West, that the Transports could bear the Sea no longer, and were forced to make the best of their Way into our own Harbours. The Men of War stayed out a little longer; but so many of them were damaged, that they found it necessary to put in, in order to refit. This was done with so much Expedition, that in a very short Time the whole Fleet got out to Sea again, and arrived safely in Portugal.

He sets sail for Portugal.

A.D.1704.

The Beginning of a glorious Year.

We are now entering upon the Transactions of a Year that shines among the brightest recorded in Story. The same wise and just Providence that had permitted the wicked Projects of the French Monarch to succeed and prevail, so as to infest and alarm all Europe for almost forty Years, had prepared in this Year a Day of Vengeance and Chastisement for him; that ambitious Princes in future Ages might remember him and fear; and to escape his Punishment, avoid his Crimes. And now, in one important Day, his vast Designs, the Labour of an Age, were dissipated, and brought to nothing; his Armies, that had been the Terror of Europe for half a Century, were disarmed and destroyed; and Christendom was delivered from the long Fears and Alarms which his Power and Ambition had raised; while the full Glory of this happy Success rested upon our Queen and Countrey. As if this Honour were given, and appropriated from above to the English Nation, to be in every Age the Scourge and Rod in the Hand of Heaven, to correct and chastise the proud Swellings of haughty and tyrannic Power.

The Emperor sues for Aid to the Queen.

The disconsolate State of the Emperor at the Close of the last long Campaign, has been above related. His Condition was so helpless, that he was obliged to seek Protection from England and Holland. Count Wratislaw, the Imperial Envoy in England, humbly represented to the Queen the imminent Danger of his Master's Countries by the French and Bavarian Forces on one Side, and those of Hungary on the other. That the Emperor of Germany, once the chief of Christian Princes, had now no Refuge to fly to from the utmost Ruine and Desolation, but her Majesty's Goodness and Compassion, and the Power of her Arms. He therefore besought her Majesty to give Orders to her General to consult with the States of the speediest Methods for saving Germany from a total Subversion; by which she would obtain immortal Honour to herself, and the Blessings and Thanks of a mighty Prince for an Obligation never to be forgot.

This Representation was favourably answered; the Duke of Marlborough having some Time before laid a Plan for the Relief of the distressed Emperor. He went over into Holland about the Middle of April, and laid before the States the Design he had formed. The Successes on the Side of the Dutch Frontiers during the two last Campaigns, having secured that State from any sudden Danger, they were, after some Difficulty, brought to concur in it, and to order a Part of their Forces to be assisting therein.

A.D.1704.

Which is granted him.

The Duke soon after took Leave of the States, and went to the Army. He ordered it to be assembled as soon as possible, and a Bridge to be laid over the Maese at Ruremond; which was done to blind the French. This Stratagem had its Effect; for the Enemy concluded that his Design was to march towards the Moselle, and make an Irruption into France by the Way of Lorraine. They were confirmed in this Error by the Way he took as soon as the Army began to move. For he advanced thro' the Duchy of Juliers, and the Electorate of Cologne, to Coblentz; a Place situated on the Conflux of the Rhine and the Moselle. A great Body of Troops, under the Mareschal de Villeroy, were ordered that Way to oppose him; but they were much disappointed, when instead of marching up the Moselle towards Traerbach, which they expected he would first attack, they found him advance along the Rhine through the Electorate of Mentz, and the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt's Countrey. They then supposed he intended to besiege Landau; and the Mareschal de Tallard crossed the Rhine in order to oppose the Duke's imagined Passage. But not long after he had made this Motion, he was informed that the Duke had turned to the Left, and was upon full March towards the Danube through the Duchy of Wurtemberg; which manifested his true Design, when the Enemy could not prevent it. When the Duke had entered the Duchy of Wurtemberg, he halted for some Time; and there it was that he first met Prince Eugene of Savoy. A strict and intimate Friendship was soon contracted between them, which continued to the End of the War; undisturbed, either by Rivalships for Fame, or differing Sentiments, which so often divide Confederate Generals. Soon after Prince Lewis of Baden came to meet him; and between these three great Commanders, the Motions of the Armies were concerted. It was not to be doubted that the French would come to the Assistance of the Elector of Bavaria, and therefore it was agreed that Prince Eugene should repair to the German Forces on the Rhine; either to prevent the Passage of the French, or to keep them from joining the Elector. The Duke of Marlborough, and Prince Lewis of Baden, were to force their Way into Bavaria.

The Duke of Marlborough's March to Germany.

He meets Prince Eugene and Prince Lewis of Baden.

The Elector who was encamped near Ulm, an Imperial City on the Danube, hearing

A.D. 1704. ing of the Motions of the Allies towards his Country, crossed that River to observe them; and sent to secure an advantageous Camp that lay on its Banks. On the Confluence of the Danube and the Leck, which last River divides Bavaria from Swabia, stands the Town of Donawert, where there is a Bridge over the Danube, which gives free Passage into the Elector's Country. This Place, besides its Garrison, was covered by a numerous Body of Forces, posted at Schellenberg hard by upon a rising Ground, and defended with strong Intrenchments. Thither the Confederates directed their March; upon which the Elector sent a strong Reinforcement to the Troops who were already posted there. The Duke of Marlborough went first with a great Body of Horse and Foot, Prince Lewis of Baden following with the rest of the Army. The Duke found the Enemy very advantageously situated; but the Importance of the Place made him pass by the Difficulties in taking it. The Attack began by the English and Dutch Foot, who were at first so rudely repulsed, that they twice gave Way. But Prince Lewis of Baden having the Fortune to light on that Part where the Intrenchments were weaker, forced them, and getting over, bore down all before him. The Enemy being made to yield in one Place, soon gave Way on all Sides; so that the English and Dutch forced the Intrenchments in a third Attack. The Enemy's Camp was then filled with Fear, and Flight, and Slaughter; the Confederates pursuing the Bavarians to the Banks of the Danube, and either killing or taking Prisoners those who did not escape by swimming over the River. The Fight was very bloody; and it was reckoned that no less than five Thousand Men were killed on each Side; the Confederates losing Abundance of Lives before they could enter those strong Intrenchments; and the Danube preventing the Escape of the Bavarians after the Allies had broke into their Camp. The Cannon, Ammunition, Tents, and all the Spoils of the Field fell into the Hands of the Confederates. The Elector, informed of this Defeat of his Forces at Schellenberg, sent Orders to his Garrison at Donawert to burn the Bridges and Magazines, and to leave the Town, to prevent their being taken by the Allies. But these pressed so closely upon them, that the Garrison was forced to leave the Town before those Orders could be fully executed. The Allies being possessed of Donawert, passed over with great Celerity into the Elector of Bavaria's Country. And Newburg and Rain, two small Places near at hand, were taken two or three Days after.

The Allies pass into Bavaria.

In the mean Time, the Elector of Bavaria found himself in the utmost Distress and Perplexity. He saw his Country exposed to utter Ruine and Desolation, while himself was unable to afford it any Assistance. For not being in a Condition to meet the Allies in the Field, he was forced to retire from them, and shelter himself under the Cannon of Augsburg; abandoning his Dominions A.D. 1704. that he might preserve his Army. But before the Confederate Generals proceeded farther, it was thought proper to offer him Terms of Accommodation. These being more favourable than the Elector had Reason to expect in his present Circumstances, were soon agreed on; and the Elector promised to come in Person to the Confederate Camp to sign them. And thus a general Calm and Tranquillity was upon the Point of being established again in Germany, after the violent Storms that had torn it so long.

But it happened unfortunately that before this was done, News came that the Mareschal de Tallard had made his Way through the Black-Forest, and was upon full March to join the Elector. This Advice dissipated all Hopes of Peace; and the Elector sent Word, that since the King of France made such great Efforts to assist him, he thought himself obliged in Honour to remain firm to his Alliance. This Message kindled the War again more fiercely than ever; and Word was sent the Elector, that if he would not perform his Promise, his Country should be put under Military Execution. This not prevailing, by a Severity that could only be excused by the Necessities of War, a Body of Forces was sent out with those dreadful Orders. These Troops went on plundering, burning and destroying all the Towns and Villages as far as Munich, the Capital City of the Electorate; so that for twenty Miles round the whole Country was on a light Fire; the poor Inhabitants being driven into the Woods and Fields, without Habitation or Shelter from the Weather, after having seen all they had, carried away or destroyed. This fierce Execution being over, the Confederate Generals deliberated on their future Proceedings. And it being impossible to attack the Elector in his strong Camp near Augsburg, it was resolved to besiege his fortified Towns, and to begin with Ingolstadt, on the Banks of the Danube, a little below Donawert.

While these Things passed, the Mareschal de Tallard having got through the Black Forest, came marching along the Side of the Danube, towards the Elector of Bavaria; Prince Eugene with the Forces under his Command, attending him all the Way on the other Side. The Mareschal being come within about a Day's March of the Elector, left his Troops and went to the Elector's Camp. These two Commanders met and embraced one another with great Joy; the Elector thanking the Mareschal for the seasonable Succours he had brought him, and the Mareschal complimenting the Elector on the great Firmness he had shewn to his Master's Alliance. Their Armies when united, made a very formidable Force; and it was agreed, since the Forces under Prince Eugene were not yet joined to those under the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Lewis of Baden, to endeavour to attack them while they were separate and alone. To this End the

The Elector is offered Terms; which he at first agrees to.

The French march to join him.

Upon which he rejects those Offers.

His Country put under Military Execution.

The Mareschal de Tallard joins the Elector of Bavaria.

A.D. 1704. the Elector left his Camp at Augsburg, and joined with the French Troops under the Mareschal. The united Army began then to move, with a Countenance as if they meant to pass the Leck to attack the Duke of Marlborough, but with a real Design to cross the Danube, and fall upon Prince Eugene. But the Prince was too circumspect and penetrating to be so surprized; and as soon as their Armies were joined, rightly judging what their next Motion would be, he went to the Camp of the Duke and the Prince of Baden, to acquaint them with his Suspicions; and ordered his own Forces to leave their Camp, and possess themselves of another Post, which was both nearer to the main Army, and more advantageous. It was agreed by the three Generals, that Prince Lewis of Baden should go on with the Enterprize of Ingolstadt, and that the Duke of Marlborough joining with Prince Eugene, should confront the French and Bavarian Army. From this Conference Prince Eugene returned to his own Camp; being assured by the Duke of Marlborough, that he would come to join him as soon as possible. That very Day the Elector and the Mareschal crossed the Danube, and landed at Lawingen, about ten or fifteen Miles from Prince Eugene's Camp. Upon this the Prince sent away his Foot and Part of his Horse to the strong Camp at Schellenberg, whence the Bavarians had been driven before; Workmen having been sent thither upon the first Suspicion of the Enemy's Approach, to put it in a defensible Condition. Himself with the rest of his Cavalry passed the Night in the other Camp; but kept the Horses saddled, that no Time might be lost upon any sudden Emergency. The next Day, the Prince being informed that the Duke of Marlborough with the whole Army was near, and that the Enemy did not stir, sent again for those Troops that were at the Camp at Schellenberg. And in the Evening of that Day the Duke of Marlborough himself arrived there with the main Army.

The Confederate and French Armies come within Sight of each other.

The two Armies being so near, the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene went out the next Morning at Break of Day to view the Enemy, and found them advancing towards the Confederate Camp. At one o' Clock that Afternoon the Quarter-Masters of the Enemy's Army came to mark out a Camp, upon a rising Ground between two Villages, about three or four Miles distant from the Confederates, called Lutzingen and Blenheim; the latter of which is made immortal, by giving Name to the memorable Victory gained near it on the following Day. And before Night the Enemy's Army came in View, and encamped upon the Ground marked out for them, lying in Sight of the Confederates.

Upon this Approach of the Enemy, the two Generals resolved to attack them the next Day. Two Reasons are said to move them to this Resolution. First, it was apprehended the Enemy might fortify themselves in that Post, and from thence ruin the neighbouring Countries in such a Manner, A.D. 1704. that the Duke's Army (on whose Presence the Safety of the Empire depended) should be obliged to leave Germany for Want of Subsistence in the Winter. In the next Place the Confederate Generals were informed, that the Mareschal de Villeroy intended to follow the Mareschal de Tallard into Germany, to join him with a great Body of Forces. And these Things made it necessary to use the utmost Celerity.

The two Armies were very near of the same Number, being between fifty and sixty Thousand Men each; the French according to our Accounts, having some odds. They were both encamped on the very Banks of the Danube, which bounded the Left of the Confederates Camp, and the Enemy's Right; both were situate upon rising Grounds, with a Rivulet running along the Foot of each, a large Plain of about four Miles over lying between them. At three o' Clock in the Morning on the thirteenth of August, the Confederate Army began to move, and crossed the Rivulet that ran by their Camp on several Bridges. The Enemy had soon Notice of this, and immediately called in the Horse that were foraging, and prepared themselves for the Fight. Five small Villages that stood in the Plain between the two Armies, were soon after set on Fire by the Enemy. The Allies coming into the Plain ranged themselves in Order of Battle, and the Enemy did the same, making two opposite Fronts of Cavalry and Infantry of four Miles in Length. The Left Wing of the Confederates was commanded by the Duke of Marlborough, who was opposed by the Mareschal de Tallard; their Right Wing by Prince Eugene, who was to attack M. de Marfin, and the Elector. The Batteries of Cannon (of which the French had ninety Pieces, and the Confederates only fifty) were erected upon proper Eminences; and Bridges were laid over a Rivulet which ran at the Foot of the Enemies Camp, and parted the two Armies. At last at almost one o' Clock in the Afternoon all Things being ready, Orders were given for a general Attack.

It began at the Village of Blenheim, which The Battle of Blenheim standing upon the very Banks of the Danube which bounded the Right Wing of the French, the Mareschal de Tallard who commanded there, had filled it with Troops both of Horse and Foot, lest the Confederates possessing it should gall his Wing in Flank. Twenty Battalions were ordered for the Attack of this Place, and the five foremost which were English, marched up through a dreadful Fire to the very Pallisadoes with which the Village was defended. But their Loss was so great before they came thither, (for they stood the Shot of above fifteen thousand Men all the while they were advancing) that though they came up to the very Muzzles of the Enemies Muskets, and some of the Officers on both Sides exchanged Thrusts of Swords through the Pallisadoes, they were obliged to give back.

A.D. 1704. back. In their Retreat, a great Body of Horse of the French Gens d'Armes and Carabiniers issued out from the Village, and pursued them so fiercely, that they were in great Danger of being all cut off. But a Body of Hessian Foot, who were ordered to sustain the English, made such a terrible Fire upon the French Horse, that they could not stand it; but were driven back to the Village. A Brigade of English Horse then passed the Rivulet, who were met by fresh Troops of the French, and after a short Skirmish were overpowered by Numbers, and many of them obliged to repass the Rivulet; till a second Storm of Shot from the Hessian Foot obliged the French to retire again. The Village of Blenheim was attacked in another Place by another Body of Troops, but with the like ill Success; the Assailants being driven back with great Loss, after three or four gallant, but unsuccessful Attempts. Mean while the Confederate Horse of the Left Wing crossed the Rivulet without Opposition from the Enemy, some over the Bridges, and some swimming through the Water. It was a great Oversight in the French General to suffer this; but it is said, that the Enemy so much despised the Attempts of the Confederates, that while they were crossing, some of the French Commanders said, the more of them get over, the more there will be to kill. If this was true, their Confidence cost them dear. For the Confederate Horse putting themselves in Order of Battle, and having recovered a brisk Charge from the French Cavalry which put them into some Disorder, they renewed the Fight with such Success, that they gradually gained Ground, till they advanced to the Top of the Hill. The French fought with great Courage, and gave back very slowly; and as often as they were broken, rallied again. But the Day was come in which the Greatness of France was to have its Period. The Mareschal de Tallard, finding his Cavalry unequal to that of the Confederates, caused ten Battalions to advance to sustain them; and the Fire of these Foot stopped the others for some Time. But now the Scale of Battle turned; for the Troops of the Allies being soon reinforced by some Infantry, the Confederate Horse made another Attack with so much Success, that they quite broke and routed the French Cavalry, and compelled them to abandon the Foot; who being charged on all Sides, were entirely cut to Pieces. While this Slaughter was making, the Mareschal made a Shift to rally his broken Horse (for almost all the Foot he had with him were killed,) that he might consider what to do in this desperate Condition. He would now have recovered his Dragoons and Infantry that were in the Village of Blenheim; but while he was deliberating to compass this, the Confederates made another more furious Charge upon his Cavalry, which utterly routed and dispersed them. One Party took their Way to the Right towards Morselingen, another right forwards towards Hochstet, while a third Party was driven A.D. 1704. down the Hill to the Banks of the Danube in the utmost Confusion and Disorder. The River was soon full of Men and Horses; some throwing themselves in to escape by swimming; others pushed off from the Banks by the Crowd behind them. Abundance were drowned before they could reach the opposite Shore; for though the Danube is not very wide in that Place, being near its Source, yet the Throng and Tumult were so great, every Man pressing with Haste and Fear to get before his Fellow, and fresh Multitudes every Moment plunging in to escape the fierce Conquerors who were in hot Pursuit of them; or killing and taking the hindmost, that neither the Horse's Strength nor the Rider's Skill could avail any Thing amidst such an universal Distraction and Terror. The Mareschal de Tallard was born along by the Flight of his Men to the River Side; but he chose to yield himself to the Pursuers, rather than try so hazardous a Passage amidst a tumultuous Crowd, whom Danger had made insensible of Distinction or Respect; so that he was there taken Prisoner with many of his chief Officers.

This is what passed on the Left Wing of the Confederates. On the Right Wing they had the same Disadvantages to get over, and a more vigorous Resistance to encounter. Their Forces were no sooner over the Rivulet, but they were charged so fiercely by the French, that great Numbers of them were killed, and many of the rest were obliged to retreat over the Rivulet. After some Time they rallied, and made a second Attempt; but were again repulsed with Loss. They were not yet disheartened, but ventured upon a third Attack, in which they at last made the Enemy give Way, and having once put them in Disorder, pursued their Advantage till Victory declared itself entirely for them. So that by that Time the Duke of Marlborough had completed the Defeat of the Mareschal de Tallard on the Left, he saw the Elector retreating on the Right from Prince Eugene's Forces, who closely pursued him. The Troops that had been posted in the Village of Blenheim by the Mareschal de Tallard, were now cut off from the rest of their Army. So that being surrounded on all Sides, they capitulated, and surrender'd Prisoners of War; there being no fewer of them than twenty eight Battalions of Foot, and twelve Squadrons of Dragoons.

Thus this memorable Battle ended in one of the completest, and most important Victories that has been ever known. It is reckoned that the Loss of the French in this Battle, amounted to near eight and twenty thousand Men, besides four or five Thousand more who left them in their Retreat: So that above half of this great Army was left behind. The Damage of the Allies amounted to about four Thousand Men killed, and seven Thousand wounded. The Duke of Marlborough had a remarkable

A.D. 1704. Escape in his Person, a Cannon-Ball grazing under his Horse, and covering him with Dirt, without any other Harm.

The Consequences of the Victory.

This glorious Victory shed a bright Light of Joy and Security over all the Christian World. Had this Battle been lost, there can be no doubt that the Liberties of the German Empire had soon been ruined, and those of Europe with them; so that the Fate of Christendom hung upon the Event of this important Day. But the Consequences of this Victory put an End to the Fears that had disquieted the World before. For the broken Remains of the French Forces being not in a Condition to make Head against the Confederates, they were obliged to retire to their own Country. So that the Electorate of Bavaria became a Conquest without Blood or Sweat; the Circle of Swabia recovered its Freedom, and the Empire Safety and Tranquillity; and the Loss of so many Veteran Troops as were killed or taken at Blenheim, gave a Shock to the French Power, which it never recovered afterwards.

The Duke of Marlborough was willing to make use of the universal Consternation the Enemy was in upon this Defeat, by entering upon some important Enterprize. On the German Side of the Rhine all Things submitted; so that it was resolved to attack Landau, on the other Side of that River. During this Siege the Duke of Marlborough secured the City of Triers. Landau being obliged to surrender after a long Siege, the Confederates besieged Traerbach, and the Surrender of that Place ended the Campaign.

Mean Time the Queen was daily entertained with the Congratulations of Foreign Powers, and the Loyal Addresses of her Subjects, on the Glories with which the Divine Providence had blessed her Reign. A Day of Thanksgiving was appointed for the Success of her Arms; upon which Occasion the Queen came to St. Paul's Cathedral, with very great Solemnity, attended by her whole Court, and the chief Officers of State. Two Months after the Duke of Marlborough arrived in England, after having received a Profusion of Respects and Presents in Germany and Holland. He brought with him the Mareschal de Tallard, and twenty six other Prisoners of Note, with the Colours and Standards taken at Blenheim; which were ordered to be hung in Westminster-hall. The Prisoners were sent to Nottingham and Litchfield, to be guarded at large by a Regiment of Horse, and allowed all Manner of Freedom for ten Miles round.

The Campaign in Savoy and Portugal.

The Campaign in Savoy was successful on the Side of France; Vercelli, Ivrea, and Verue being surrendered to the French. In Portugal the Presence of King Charles III. of Spain produced not that Benefit that was expected. After the Ceremonies were past between the two Kings, the Operations of the Campaign began to be entered upon. But these were retarded by many Obstacles. The Soldiers that were brought over by the Fleet were very sickly; and for want of proper Accommodations, which were not taken Care of beforehand, many of them died. Besides this, it being agreed in the Alliance with England, that the King of Portugal should provide Horses for the Cavalry, the French Ambassador had taken Care to buy up all the best Horses; so that those who were provided were not of a proper Size or Strength. The chief Command was also divided. For by the Custom of Portugal the Governors of the Provinces command in Chief all the Troops within their own Districts: So that the Duke of Schomberg who was appointed General of the English and Dutch, was always matched with Portuguese Commanders, who were generally not very fit for the Office, and perhaps, for that very Reason, the more backward to be advised by those who were. The Campaign began with these ill Omens, and suitable Success. The Spaniards under King Philip, called by the Confederates the Duke of Anjou, invaded Portugal, and carried all before them, before the Portuguese were in a Condition to oppose them. But at last they took the Field, and made an Irruption into Castile, to call off the Spaniards to their own Country. But their Progress was soon stopped by the Heats of the Summer Season, which are violent in that Country, and obliged the Armies to put into Quarters of Refreshment. The Court of England endeavoured to rectify what was amiss, by sending the Earl of Galloway to command the English and Dutch Auxiliaries. He took the Field as soon as the Heats were over, with Design to invade Castile. But the Spaniards used such Precautions as checked his Progress, till it was Time for the Armies to go into Winter Quarters.

In the mean Time Sir George Rooke received Intelligence, that the Garrison of Gibraltar, at the Mouth of the famous Streights it gives Name to, was very weak. Upon this Information he sailed thither, with a good Body of Marines aboard. When he came before the Place, he first landed the Soldiers upon a small Neck of Land that joins the Promontory of Gibraltar to the main Land, to cut off all Assistance from the Continent. He then summoned the Governor to surrender; and upon his Refusal cannonaded the Town with great Fury. The Spaniards being driven from a Battery at the Southermost of the two Moles that form the Haven, the Sailors landed and took Possession of it. The Enemy had laid a Train to the Powder-Magazine there; which being fired, the Magazine blew up, and killed and wounded above an hundred Men. But this Accident did not hinder the Sailors from advancing, and taking a Redoubt between the Mole and the Town. The Place was very strong; and the taking it might still have proved a Work of Time and Difficulty; but the Suddenness of the Attack, and the Weakness of the Garrison, made amends for other Disadvantages. So that after no more than three Days Siege, this important Place fell into our Hands; which soon

Gibraltar taken by Sir Geo. Rooke.

A.D. 1704. soon after stood a Siege of six Months, and at last drove the Besiegers from before it. Soon after this an Engagement happened between the Confederate and French Fleets, who fell in with each other near Malaga; the former consisting of fifty three, the latter of fifty two Ships with twenty four Gallies. The Victory was uncertain; but the Fight had this good Consequence, that the French Fleet, being glad to retire to their own Coasts, could not be assisting in the Siege of Gibraltar, which the Spaniards attempted in three Months after; the Marquis de Villadarias, with eight Thousand French and Spaniards attacking it on the Land side; and six French Frigates assisting them by Sea. But Sir John Leake, who was left by Sir George Rooke at Lisbon, hearing this, hastened to the Relief of the Place with such Celerity, that he surprized two of the French Frigates in the Bay. He then reinforced the Garrison with two Thousand Men, and returned to Lisbon. And the Place was so bravely defended by the English Garrison under the Prince d' Armstadt, and so seasonably relieved, from Time to Time, by the English Fleet, that at last, after a Siege of five Months, the French and Spaniards were compelled to break up from before it.

The Scotch Parliament meets.

An Act of Security passed.

The furious Animosities that had been raised in Scotland on Account of the Act of Security abovementioned, had that Influence upon the Queen's Counsellors here; that it was resolved to gratify the Scots Nation in that Matter. The Parliament there being met, and the usual Forms past, it was proposed to proceed upon such Limitations and Conditions of Government, as should secure the Freedom and Independency of that Nation. This was carried by a great Majority, and an Act was ordered to be drawn up to that Purpose, called like the other, the Act of Security. By this it was enacted, "That in the Event of the Queen's Death, the Parliament then in Being should meet at Edinburgh on the twentieth Day after; or if no Parliament should be then in Being, the Members of the last. That these should cause the Claim of Right to be read to the next Successor, and administer the Coronation-Oath. That upon the Death of the Queen, or any other King or Queen, without lawful Heir or Successor, the Estates might nominate and declare the Successor, and settle the Succession on the Heirs of the said Successor's Body; the said Successor and his Heirs being of the Royal Line of Scotland, and the true Protestant Religion. Provided also, that such Successors be not at the same Time Successors to the Crown of England; unless in that, or in some ensuing Parliament, the Honour and Sovereignty of the Kingdom of Scotland be secured". And for a farther Security to that Kingdom it was there enacted, "That all Protestant Hereticks and Burghs, should provide Arms for all the fencible Men, and be impowered to discipline and exercise them". While this Act was in Agitation, the Parliament resolved to grant a Sess for six Months. The Act of Security having passed the House, received a few Days after the Royal Assent. After this the House resolved that the Examination of the Plot by the House of Lords in England, was an undue Intermeddling with the Concerns of Scotland, and an Encroachment on the Sovereignty and Independency of the same. This being over, they proceeded to grant a Supply. Several other Laws were proposed while this was going forward; but as soon as the Supply was granted, the Commissioner told them, that the Queen thought a short Recess would now be necessary, and prorogued them.

The Parliament prorogued.

At the Beginning of the Winter, the Parliament of England met. The Queen received the Addresses of her two Houses of Parliament, to congratulate her on the happy Successes of her Arms; in relation to which it was observed, that in the Address of the House of Commons, the same Terms were used in mentioning the Successes under Sir George Rooke, as those under the Duke of Marlborough, which shewed a secret Disinclination of some in the House to that great Commander. The House of Commons went however with great Cheerfulness upon the Supplies of the Year, and made such Dispatch in them, that on the ninth of December the Bills for that Purpose received the Royal Assent.

The Parliament of England meets.

Their Proceedings.

The Bill for preventing Occasional Conformity was so much the Favourite of some Gentlemen in the House of Commons, that its ill Success before did not discourage them from moving to bring it in again. This Bill raised a very high Ferment in the Nation, being opposed and espoused with great Warmth by the two contending Parties. Some Members were so warm for the Bill, that they proposed that the same should be tacked to the Land-Tax Bill then on Foot. For the House of Lords not having Power to alter any Money-Bill, but either to reject or pass the Whole, it was thought that they would be obliged to pass the Occasional Conformity Bill so tacked, rather than put a Stop to the Operations of War, which depended on the Supplies. This Zeal on one Side raised as much on the other. It was said that the Lords had made it a standing Order of their House not to receive any other Matter tacked to a Money Bill. So that the Consequence of this Tacking would be to create invincible Difficulties between both Houses, and Delays in the carrying on the Publick Concerns, that might be of the utmost Prejudice. These Reasons so prevailed, that the Motion for Tacking was rejected. The Bill however passed the House of Commons for Form's Sake; but when it came before the Lords, it was thrown out.

The Act of Security, and other Acts passed in Scotland the foregoing Session, gave Umbrage here in England; and both Houses of Parliament took them into Consideration. The Lords resolved in a grand Committee, "that the best Method to prevent the Inconveniencies that might arise from the late Acts

A.D. 1704. " Acts passed in Scotland, was by making such " Laws here. That the Queen be enabled
 " by Act of Parliament, on the Part of " England, to name Commissioners to treat
 " about an Union with Scotland, provided
 " those Powers be not put in Execution
 " till Commissioners should be named on " the Part of Scotland by the Parliament
 " there. That Scotchmen should not enjoy
 " the Privileges of Englishmen, unless set" tled in England, Ireland, or the Plantati" ons, or in the Land or Sea Service, till
 " an Union be made, or the Succession set" tled, as in England. That the bringing of " Cattle from Scotland to England be pre" vented: That the Queen's Ships be or" dered to take such Vessels as they should " find trading from Scotland to France; and
 " that Cruisers be appointed for that End.
 " And lastly, that the Exportation of En" glish Wool into Scotland be hindered".

A.D. 1705.

These Resolutions were ordered to be turned into Bills. Two Days after the Lords addressed the Queen to order Newcastle to be put into a Condition of Defence, the Port of Tinmouth to be secured, and Carlisle and Hull to be repaired; the Militia of the four Northern Counties to be disciplined, and provided with Arms and Ammunition; and regular Troops to be posted on the Northern Borders; with which Address the Queen promised to comply. The House of Commons also having taken the same Things into Consideration, resolved as follows. " That the Queen be enabled to " appoint Commissioners to treat of an " Union. That all Natives of Scotland not " settled in England, or the Dominions
 " thereof, nor in Service of the Army or " Navy, shall be accounted Aliens, unless
 " the Succession in Scotland be settled on " the House of Hanover. That Provision " be made to prevent the Importation of " Scotch Linnen into England or Ireland;
 " and to permit the Exportation of the " Linnen Manufactures of Ireland, in En" glish Bottoms, to our American Plantati" ons. That immediate Provision be made " to prevent the conveying of Horses,
 " Arms or Ammunition into Scotland".
 And a Bill was ordered to be brought in upon these Resolutions; to which Bill the House of Lords gave their Concurrence.

The Houses of Parliament had honoured the Duke of Marlborough with their Thanks for the Part he had in the Successes of the last Campaign; but the House of Commons proceeded farther, and by proper Management was induced to address the Queen to consider of some proper Means for perpetuating the Services performed by him. The Queen made Answer, " That she intended to grant to him and his " Heirs the Interest of the Crown, in the " Honour and Mannor of Woodstock; and " Hundred of Wootton; towards which she " desired the Assistance of the House; and " that the Lieutenancy and Rangership of " the Parks, with the Rents and Profits of " the Mannor and Hundreds, being grant" ed for two Lives, her Majesty desired A.D. 1705.

 " that Incumbrance might be cleared". With all this the Commons readily complied. Orders were also given for erecting the magnificent Structure there, known by the Name of Blenheim-House; that the Rewards of the Duke's great Actions might be proportioned to the Services that obtained them.

Soon after this a new Dispute broke out between the two Houses. Five Men of Aylesbury brought their Actions at Common Law against William White the Mayor, for not allowing their Votes at the Election of Members. The House of Commons having, in the Case of Ashby against the same White, declared this a Breach of Privilege, (as was related above) ordered these Men to be committed to Newgate for the same. The Persons so committed brought their Habeas Corpus to the Court of King's Bench; and Mr. Page, Mr. Montague, Mr. Lechmere, and Mr. Denton, had the Courage to plead that they might be discharged. The Lord Chief Justice Holt was of Opinion that they might; but the three other Judges being of another Mind, the Prisoners were remanded. But two of these, more resolute than the rest, refused to acquiesce in this Judgment; and petitioned for a Writ of Error to bring the same before the Lords. The Commons were all in a Flame upon this, and addressed the Queen not to give Leave for the bringing any such Writ of Error. They farther resolved, that those who had been concerned in the Prosecution of the Writs of Habeas Corpus, or had endeavoured to procure the Writs of Error, were Disturbers of the Publick Peace, and endeavoured to overthrow the Rights and Privileges of the Commons of England. The Queen returned the Commons an evasive Answer. But the House was not to be appeased, but ordered the four Councillors, who had pleaded for the Discharge of the Persons committed, to be taken into Custody of the Serjeant at Arms. And lest a Writ of Error should be granted, and those Persons by that Means be set at Liberty, they ordered them to be removed from Newgate, and taken into Custody of their Serjeant at Arms; which was done with great Circumstances of Severity and Terror.

The House of Lords had been hitherto silent; but now being petitioned by the imprisoned Persons, they found themselves obliged to interpose. The whole Matter being debated in the House, they at last resolved, " That neither House of Parlia" ment has Power, by any Vote or De" claration, to create to themselves any " new Privilege that is not warrantable by
 " the known Laws and Customs of Parlia" ment. That every Freeman of England
 " who takes himself to be injured, has a " Right to seek Redress by Action at Law;
 " and that the commencing and prosecuting
 " an Action against any Person (not entitled " to Privilege of Parliament) is no Breach " of the Privilege of Parliament. That the " House of Commons in committing those
 " Men

A.D. 1705. "Men to Newgate, upon Pretence that their
 "so doing was contrary to a Declaration,
 "a Contempt of the Jurisdiction, and a "Breach of the Privilege of their House,
 "had assumed to themselves alone a Legis"lative Authority, by pretending to attri"bute the Force of a Law to their Declara"tion; had claimed a Jurisdiction not war"ranted by the Constitution; and had as"sumed a new Privilege to which they have "no Title by the Laws and Customs of "Parliament; and have thereby, so far as
 "in them lies, subjected the Rights of En- "glishmen, and the Freedom of their Per"sons, to the arbitrary Votes of the House
 "of Commons. That every Englishman, "who is imprisoned by any Authority what"soever, has an undoubted Right by his "Agents or Friends, to apply for, and ob"tain a Writ of Habeas Corpus, in order to "procure his Liberty by due Course of "Law. That for the House of Commons "to censure or punish any Person for as"sisting a Prisoner to procure a Writ of "Habeas Corpus; or by Vote or otherwise,
 "to deter Men from soliciting, prosecu"ting, or pleading upon such Writ in Be"half of such Prisoner, is an Attempt of "dangerous Consequence, a Breach of the "many good Statutes provided for the Li"berty of the Subject, and of pernicious "Example, by denying the necessary As-"sistances to the Prisoner upon a Commit"ment of the House of Commons, which "has ever been allowed upon all Commit"ments by any Authority whatsoever. And
 "lastly, that a Writ of Error is not a Writ
 "of Grace, but of Right; and ought not "to be denied the Subject, when duly ap"plied for, though at the Request of either
 "House of Parliament; the Denial thereof
 "being an Obstruction of Justice, contrary
 "to Magna Charta". Several Conferences "were held between the two Houses upon the "Subject of their contrary Resolves, but to "no Effect. And the Serjeant at Arms being "served with two Writs of Habeas Corpus,
 "returnable before the Lord Keeper, in Behalf "of Mr. Montague and Mr. Denton, two of the "Council for the Aylesbury Men, the House of "Commons resolved, "That no Commoner
 "of England, committed by the House of "Commons, for Breach of Privilege or "Contempt of that House, ought to be, by "any Writ of Habeas Corpus, made to ap"pear in any other Place, or before any o"ther Judicature, during the Session of "Parliament, in which such Persons are "committed. That the Serjeant at Arms
 "should make no Return, nor yield any "Obedience to those Writs; and that for "such his Refusal, he have the Protection "of the House of Commons. And that "the Lord Keeper should be acquainted "with those Resolutions, that the Writs
 "might be superseded, as contrary to Law,
 "and the Privilege of the House". Some "Time after they ordered the whole Pro"ceedings of the Houses in Relation to this "Affair, to be printed. The Lords on the other Hand attended the Queen with a Re- A.D. 1705.

 presentation and Address, in which they set forth, that the Proceedings of the House of Commons were wholly new and unprecedented, and besides dangerous to the Subjects Liberties; and therefore that they humbly requested her Majesty to give Orders for the issuing out the Writs of Error.
 The Queen answered, that she should have granted the Writs of Error desired in this Address, but finding an absolute Necessity of putting an immediate End to the Session, she was sensible there could have been no farther Proceedings in the Matter. The Lords were so pleased with this Answer, that they voted the Thanks of their House for it. And the very same Day the Queen came to the House of Lords, and put an End to this famous Dispute by a Prorogation; and before this Prorogation was determined, dissolved the Parliament by Proclamation. The Parliament dissolved.

About that Time the Campaign began;
 but through the Supineness and Remissness of the German Councils, the great Expectations justly raised were disappointed. During the Winter the Duke of Marlborough framed a Project for improving the great Success at Bleinheim, by attacking in the Summer the Frontiers of France, by the Way of the Moselle. To this End he had agreed with the States to be content with his Absence from their Frontiers, by representing to them that the French were like to be so fully employed by his Army, that they would have little Leisure or Inclination to give Disturbance any where else. He also sent to Prince Lewis of Baden to desire an Interview with him, to consider of proper Measures to make the German Forces concur in this Enterprize; which was agreed on, and Creutz- nach in the Palatinate was appointed to be the Place of Meeting. The French had early Intelligence of the Duke's Intentions, and with that Diligence and Celerity which they had shewed in the whole Course of the late long Wars, entered upon an Expedition to prevent him before he took the Field, by securing some of the neighbouring Posts.
 To this End the Mareschal de Villars came before Homburg; and because his Business required Dispatch, sent Word to the Governor, that he knew the Place was not tenable against his Army; and therefore since Resistance could signifie nothing but to occasion loss of Time in a Siege, he threatned that if he did not surrender immediately, he would cause him to be hanged, and all the Garrison put to the Sword. But the Governor made him a resolute Answer, and fired upon his Men; which obliged them to draw off to a convenient Distance. The Stop the French met at this Place defeated their Design; and M. Villars being informed that Troops were drawing together to fall upon him, he retired.

The Duke took the Field immediately after this. He first went to confer with Prince Lewis of Baden, with whom he agreed on the Measures to be taken. He then

A.D. 1705. went to the Army, which was in the Neighbourhood of Triers; and soon after the Forces began to remove. They crossed the Rhine and the Saar, where being met by a Reinforcement, they marched directly towards the Mareschal de Villars, who was encamped with a French Army about eight Hours March from them. The French, upon the Sight of the Confederates, abandoned their Post, and hastened to possess themselves of an advantageous Camp; which they fortified with all Diligence, by casting up Intrenchments, and cutting down Trees; so that it was impossible to attack them with tolerable Prospect of Success.

The ill Conduct of the Germans.

But this was not the Duke's Design; which was only to face the French Army, while the Germans behind him should attack Saar-Louis, a strong Place on the Saar, which it was necessary to secure before he advanced farther. But the Slowness and Remissness of the Germans maimed and frustrated the Duke's well-laid Schemes; for when he expected the German Troops to be besieging Saar-Louis, he heard that scarce any of them were so much as moving that Way. Messenger was sent upon Messenger to the Imperialists, Wirtembergers, Prussians and Palatines, to quicken their March; and to other Princes who had promised to find Artillery, Horses, and Waggons, to hasten those Preparations. But these Instances either came too late, or were ineffectual; so that the Duke was obliged to lie still and unactive, and undergo that intolerable Trouble of expecting, with the utmost Impatience, those who seemed scarcely to think of Him. In the mean Time he had the continual Mortification to find his Projects growing less and less practicable; his Army being cooped up in a Neck of Land between the Saar and the Moselle, where the Forage was almost consumed; which without any Attack from the Enemy, would soon oblige him to turn back. He waited in this Uneasiness and Vexation of Mind so long, till he found the Season of Enterprising was lost; and though he still continued in those Parts, it was rather to clear himself from the Imputation of dislodging too soon, than from any Hopes he retained of executing what he had designed. But while he was thus struggling with the Shame and Vexation that attends Disappointments, a sudden Advice from the Netherlands determined him at once to abandon this Enterprize.

The Occurrences in the Netherlands.

Upon the March of the Duke of Marlborough to the Moselle, the States resolved to stand upon the Defensive. To this End they had given Orders to those Forces of theirs that were left to cover their Frontiers, to intrench themselves near Maastricht, that in Case they should be attacked by the French, they might shelter themselves under the Cannon of that strong Town. They imagined indeed, that nothing would be attempted on that Side by either Army; it being expected that the French would be obliged to send so great a Detachment from thence to oppose the Duke of Marlborough, as should A.D. 1702. disable them from undertaking any Enterprize in the Netherlands. But this proved a Mistake. The French soon found, that the Remissness of the Germans had more effectually maimed the Duke of Marlborough's Undertaking, than any Opposition of theirs could do. So that being excused from weakening their Army in the Netherlands, they took the Advantage their great Superiority gave them, and began to act offensively. They came out of their Lines, and in the first Place invested the small Town of Huy. The Town not being long defensible, the Garrison retired into the Castle, where they made a brave Defence: But not being in a Condition to maintain themselves long, they surrendered the same in a few Days. From thence the French Army marched to Liege, and invested the Citadel.

The News of this coming to the Duke of Marlborough's Camp, the Deputies of the States there were put into a great Alarm, and earnestly pressed the Duke to hasten his Return to the Netherlands, to guard the Frontiers of their State. They represented to him, that the Forage all about was so consumed, that the Army could not subsist in that Camp; how long, and to how little Purpose, they had waited for the German Forces and Assistance that were promised them; and that it would be Loss of Time to spend any more about an Enterprize which the Faults of others had made frustrate. The Duke was sensible of the Reasonableness of these Representations, and broke up his Camp; and with swift and long Marches, arrived in the Netherlands soon enough to save the Citadel of Liege; the French abandoning the Town upon the News of his Approach.

The Duke of Marlborough comes to their Assistance.

He had not long been in the Netherlands before he found that the former ill Conduct of the Germans had not yet left them. The Duke at leaving those Parts, had appointed a Force of seven Thousand Men to cover Triers, and other Posts near it; who were to be joined by the Troops of Westphalia, and were commanded by Lieutenant General d'Aubach. The Mareschal de Villars, upon the Duke's leaving the Countrey, having no Enemy before him, advanced towards the Saar; and M. d'Aubach hearing of this March, sent Orders to the Governor of Saarbrück to quit the Castle, and blow up the Fortifications, as soon as the Enemy should appear. This unaccountable Step of his surprized every one; but it would have been well if it had been the only Fault he committed. For after this, he went to Triers, and though no Enemy appeared in Sight, destroyed the vast Magazines that had been erected there at a prodigious Expence, blew up the Fortifications, burnt the Boats designed to make Bridges, and quitted the Place. Besides this, so little Care was taken to keep the German Forces together, that the French forced their Lines in one Place, and had very nearly done the same

A.D. 1705. same in another. These unaccountable Mismanagements obliged the Duke to send his Aid-de-Camp to the Emperor to lay these Things before him.

The Duke
forces the French Lines.

In the mean Time the Duke's Arrival in the Netherlands changed the Face of Things there; the French upon his advancing towards them, retiring within their Lines. The Duke then ordered Huy to be invested; and the Place not being relieved, surrendered soon after. The Army continued for some Time unactive after this, while the States were deliberating upon a Proposal sent them by the Duke for attacking the French Lines. This being returned with their Approbation of whatever Measures the Duke should think fit to take, the Attack was prepared for. It was an Attempt of such a Nature, as depended more on Stratagem than open Force; and the Dispositions made for it were suitable. The Duke ordered the Army to move in such a Manner, as if he intended to attack the Lines near Namur, which drew the Attention and Forces of the Enemy that Way. But when he understood that this Amusement had its Effect, he decamped on a sudden by Night, and by the next Morning appeared at several Miles Distance from the Place where he was expected. The Line in the Place he came to, was but thinly guarded; so that without any great Difficulty the Confederate Troops entered it. The French hearing of this Motion of the Allies, had hastened thither all the Troops they could send, to defend the Line. But they came too late, the Line being forced before they could put themselves in Order; and the Confederate Troops falling upon them, put them to Flight, killing and taking great Numbers of them, with some of their Cannon. Thus a mighty Advantage was gained, had it been as well pursued. For as the French Army was inferior to that of the Confederates, their only Security was to cover themselves with these Lines, which they had cast up for a prodigious Way with great Labour and Expence. The Lines being entered, it was to be hoped some notable Exploit might have been performed, either against the French Army, or some of the Towns they possessed. But the French Generals, as soon as they heard the Confederates had broke into their Lines, lost no Time, but sent with all Diligence to secure an advantageous Post at Parck, near the City of Louvain; which covered not only that Town, but also Brussels and Antwerp. And howsoever it came to pass, or with whomsoever the Fault lay, no Care was taken to prevent this. So that this great Success of entering the Lines, passed over without those important Consequences that were at first expected from it.

The Duke after this framed another Scheme, for attacking the French Army, as they lay encamped between Over-Ysche, and Neder-Ysche. But when the Army was drawn up, and the Orders were about to be given for an immediate Attack, the Deputies of the States refused absolutely to consent to it. A.D. 1705. The Duke was forced to submit, but with great Reluctance; and he sent an expostulatory Letter to the States about it. England also espoused the Duke's Cause with great Warmth, and the Earl of Pembroke was named Envoy-Extraordinary to go over to Holland to expostulate with the States. The States hearing of these Things, became sensible of their Error, and sent Monsieur Buys, one of their Body, to assure the Duke of their Readiness to give him all reasonable Satisfaction. And General Slangenburgh, who out of a private Pique to the Duke, was said to have created that Opposition to him, was displaced. But all this could not restore the Opportunity lost; so that no Action of Moment was attempted, before the Armies went into Winter-Quarters. At the Beginning of the Winter the Duke of Marlborough went to Vienna, where he was received by the Emperor with great Respect; and the Lordship of Mindelheim in Suabia was conferred upon him, with the Style and Title of Prince of Mindelheim. From thence he returned to England, thro' Berlin and Hanover, bringing with him several Prisoners of Distinction, who were taken at the forcing of the Lines.

The Affairs of the Duke of Savoy were in a very hazardous Posture; the French gaining Ground upon him continually. The Duke made a Shift by throwing up strong Intrenchments, to cover his Capital City of Turin from a Siege. And Prince Eugene, with wonderful Conduct, Resolution and Success, making his Way through prodigious Difficulties, came to his Assistance. This brought on an Engagement, which though of a dubious Event, had this Consequence, that it preserved the small Remainder of the Duke of Savoy's Dominions for this Year.

On the Side of Portugal, the Siege of Gibraltar, which employed the French and Spanish Forces in a long and fruitless Attempt, gave an Opportunity to the Portuguese Forces to invade Spain. This they performed with good Success; and took Valencia d'Alcantara by Storm, and Albuquerque on Conditions. After this, the English and Dutch Commanders prevailed on the Portuguese to attempt the Siege of Badajoz; but the Mareschal de Theffe covering the Place with four Thousand Men, the Summer Heats coming on, and the Want of some Necessaries for such an Enterprize, obliged them to put it off. On another Side of the Portuguese Frontiers, they also recovered the Town of Salvaterra, and took and plundered Sarca. The Summer Season being over, the Portuguese took the Field; but were so slow in their Motions, that the Siege of Badajoz, which was now agreed on, was not begun till the third of October. The Siege went on at first with so good Success, that it was thought it could not miscarry. But it happened unfortunately that a Bomb from the Enemy fell upon one of the Batteries of the Besiegers; and bursting there blew up the Powder, and killed some of the Gunners

The Campaign in Savoy.

The Campaign in Portugal.

A.D. 1705. ners. The Earl of Gallway Commander of the English, and General Fagel of the Dutch, ran thither immediately to give Orders upon this Emergency; and as they chanced to have both their Arms lifted up, a Cannon Ball came from the Castle, which passing through General Fagel's Sleeve, took off the Lord Gallway's Right Hand a little below the Elbow; so that he was forced to be carried away to have his Arm cut off. Soon after the Mareschal de Thesse came near the Town; and by pretending to offer Battle to the Confederates, got a Relief of one Thousand Men into Badajoz, and then retired again; which unexpected Supply made the Confederates raise the Siege. The Earl of Gallway had the Honour of being condoled with by the King of Portugal, and receiving a handsome Present from his Royal Mistress, upon the Loss of his Right Hand; besides that of having it generally believed that his Misfortune hindered the taking of Badajoz.

The Confederate Fleet was very successful this Summer; and made a new Impression on Spain. They arrived at Lisbon in the Middle of June, having on board five Thousand Land Forces commanded by the Earl of Peterborough. While the Fleet and Soldiers were refreshing themselves there, and the Earls of Peterborough and Gallway were debating about the proper Measures to be taken for compassing the Earl of Peterborough's Designs, the Prince of Hesse d'Armstadt arrived from Gibraltar. That Prince gave King Charles III. such positive Assurances of the Disposition of the People of Catalonia to him (which he was supposed to understand, having been Viceroy of that Principality) that King Charles resolved to go on board the Fleet, and run the Adventure with the Earl of Peterborough. The Fleet put to Sea again, and having called at Gibraltar, and exchanged some Soldiers with the Garrison, they passed through the Streights into the Mediterranean. They landed first at Altea in the Kingdom of Valencia; where they were received with the utmost Joy and Welcome by the Inhabitants, and the neighbouring Countrey. From Altea they set Sail for the Coasts of Catalonia, and arrived in the Bay of Barcelona, the Capital of that Principality.

King Charles III. sets sail for Spain.

He lands in Catalonia.

They found the Informations well grounded, that had been given of the good Disposition of the Catalans to King Charles. The Fleet no sooner appeared in the Bay, but the People that lived in the open Countrey, and were not awed by Garrisons, unanimously declared for that Prince; and with great Joy and Readiness assisted the Landing of the Soldiers. The next Day after the Troops were set on Shore, they marched towards Barcelona; and encamped at a very small Distance from the City, and began to invest it to prevent any Succours arriving there. And the Countrey People concurred so heartily with the Confederate Forces, that because the Number of Troops brought by the Fleet was not sufficient to surround a City of so great a Circumference, they joined their Assistance in securing the Avenues. When all necessary Dispositions were made on Shore, King Charles landed; and was received by the People with the greatest Joy and Transport that could be imagined.

But this Affection of the People was little better than empty Shew; or at least did very little facilitate the Operations of War. The English Commanders found their Undertaking attended with many and great Difficulties. The Multitude that met them at their Landing were not to be trusted with any Enterprize; the City of Barcelona (which it was expected would surrender at the first Appearance of the Confederates) was defended by a Garrison half as numerous as the Army that was to besiege it; and besides this, the proper Materials for a Siege (which was not looked for) were wanting. For a Fortnight together Councils of War were held upon the State of Affairs; but it was constantly agreed by a Majority of the Land Officers, and sometimes even unanimously, that the Siege of Barcelona was impracticable. Only King Charles, whether pleased with the Affection the People shewed for him, or weary of bearing a vain Title without any Dominion to countenance it, was desirous an Attempt should be made for eighteen Days; and the Earl of Peterborough in Complaisance to the King, joined with that Opinion against his own Judgment. The Sea-Officers were hearty and unanimous for the Attack, but the King not liking their Proposal of bombarding and cannonading the City, which he desired to save, their Advice was rejected. Two other Expedients were proposed; the first to put the Forces on board, and pass over into Italy to the Assistance of the Duke of Savoy, who was at the last Extremity; the second to march by Land along the Sea-Coast, with the Fleet in Company, to try the Affections of the Inhabitants, and to reduce some Towns; that if any reasonable Encouragement should be found from Catalonia, or the Kingdoms of Valencia and Aragon, the Troops might quarter themselves in the Countrey, and raise a Body of Forces that might march towards Madrid at the Beginning of the next Spring. But at last the Council of War came to an unanimous Resolution to embark the Forces, and go to the Assistance of the Duke of Savoy.

While every one was busied in Thoughts and Preparations for re-imbarking, the Earl of Peterborough, according to some, and the Prince of Hesse, according to others, formed a Design of detaining the Forces there, by a bold but important Enterprize. On that Side of the City of Barcelona, where the Fortifications were weakest, it was covered by a strong Fortrefs called Fort Montjuich, which commanded the Town. This Place it was proposed to surprize; and to conceal the Design, whose Success depended upon Secrecy, the Cannon, Stores and Baggage were drawn off to be reimbarked; and it was given out that the Army was to march by Fort Montjuich attempted.

A.D. 1705. by Land to meet the Fleet at Terragona.

In the mean Time Scaling-Ladders, and other Necessaries for such an Attempt were got ready. All Things being prepared, a Body of one Thousand Men were ordered to march out of the Camp about Sun-set, and take their Way towards Terragona; but at Ten at Night, to change their Course, and march directly to Fort Montjuich. About Midnight another equal Detachment was sent from the Camp to follow them; to which were added some Dragoons to cut off Relief from the City. But the Night being very dark, and the Way the Soldiers passed through so very narrow that only one Man could go abreast, it was break of Day before the first Detachment could reach the Foot of the Mountain. And besides, the March of those Soldiers had been discovered to the Fort by some Miquelets: So that when they arrived there, they found the Garrison in Arms, and prepared to receive them. This did not deter the Confederates from beginning the Attack; which they did with so much Bravery, that the Spaniards, after having made a terrible Fire upon them as they were advancing, were not able to stand a close Engagement with them, but gave Way on all Sides, and left the Outworks in their Possession; themselves retiring into the Donjon, or inner Castle. But it happened as the Prince of Hesse was leading up the Soldiers to the Attack, through a Shower of Bullets from the Fort, a Musket-Ball wounded him in the Thigh. His Presence of Mind was such, that he took no Notice of the Shot he had received, but went on encouraging the Men as before. But the Effusion of Blood from his Wound was so great (the Ball having torn a large Artery) that he dropt down, after having walked about fifty Paces; and being carried into a Cottage, expired quickly after. This damped the Courage of the Soldiers, who held the Prince in great Esteem. Another Misfortune happened immediately after. The Spaniards seeing the Disorder the Soldiers were in upon the Loss of their Leader, cried out, (whether upon Design or in Derision is uncertain) Long live King Charles! and made Signs to the Assailants to come to them. This Feint was too easily believed, and a Colonel with about two hundred and fifty Men, advanced towards them. The Spaniards held open the Gate, till the others were just come up; when on a sudden they all presented their Muskets at the few English; commanding them to surrender themselves Prisoners. They found no Remedy but Obedience; being exposed to a furious Discharge on every Side of them, without Shelter or Defence; so that they delivered themselves up. Besides this, a Recruit of two hundred Grenadiers came into the Castle from the Town, after having defeated some Catalans that were appointed to cut off the Communication. These Accidents so discouraged the Confederate Forces, that the chief Commander gave Orders for a Retreat. When the Earl of Peterborough had heard of these Misfortunes, he came in A.D. 1705. all haste to encourage the Troops; knowing that his Settlement on Spanish Ground depended on the Event of this Day. But when upon his Arrival he found the Soldiers retiring, transported with Indignation, and the Fear of Disappointment, he drew his Sword, and throwing away the Scabbard, commanded the Men to face about, saying aloud, Those that are brave Men will follow me. He then put himself at their Head, and marched up before them to the Place they retreated from. His Example so animated the Soldiers, that they made a second Effort with such Success, that they regained the Ground they had lost before, and lodged themselves there. The Marquis de Risbourg, who had brought the Reinforcement from the City, seeing them march up again with such Resolution, and fearing to be cut off from the Town, retired thither with all Speed. And soon after the Catalans taking a Fort between the City and the Castle, all Communication was cut off between them.

The Prince of Hesse killed.

The Confederates then began to batter the Donjon. But the Cannon they made use of, being only such as they found accidentally in the Posts they had taken, proved not of a sufficient Bore to break such strong Walls as those of the Castle. Upon this they plying the Besieged with Bombs and Granadoes, but with little Success for two Days. But on the third Day it happened that Colonel Southwell, who began the Attack at the Outworks, traversed one of the Mortars, and directed it to a little Chapel where he suspected there was a Magazine; and fired it with so lucky a Hand, that the Bomb fell among the Powder, and blew it all up. And as soon as the Consternation of the Blast was over, the Garrison came running out, and surrendered themselves to the Colonel; who in Recompence of this Service, was made Governor of the Place.

Fort Montjuich taken.

The taking this Fort encouraged and enabled the Earl of Peterborough to go on with the Siege of Barcelona. Four Batteries of Cannon, and two of Mortars were erected. And the Bomb-Vessels of the Fleet so well seconded the Batteries on Shore, that before three Weeks were expired, the Governor sent out to capitulate.

In the mean Time the Catalans and Miquelets were so active and zealous, that all the great Towns in Catalonia were obliged to declare for King Charles. Besides this, Don Raphael Nebot, a Catalan, and Colonel in the Service of King Philip, came over to King Charles with six hundred and fifty Horse; and soon after, with the Assistance of some other Forces, made a great Progress in the Kingdom of Valencia, all which declared also for that Prince, one or two Places excepted.

Barcelona being put into the Hands of King Charles, and the Countrey all about appearing so devoted to him, it was now debated what should next be done. It was agreed that the King should reside there, with

A.D. 1705. with all the Land-Forces, and as many of the Marines as could be spared; together with six Ships to be left in the Harbour of Barcelona; the rest of the Fleet being Part to go to Lisbon, and Part to return home.

A farther Progress made by the Earl of Peterborough.

The Joy at Barcelona, on Account of these swift and rapid Successes, was soon diminished by a great and impending Danger that threatened them quickly after. King Philip, and those of his Party were at home, where they had long been settled, and France was a near and useful Neighbour to him. It was not long before King Charles's Court were informed that San Mattheo, an important Town on the Borders of Catalonia and Valencia, which had declared for him, was attacked by six thousand of the Spanish Forces. Upon this the Earl of Peterborough was desired to give his Directions for the Relief of it. But instead of sending Orders, he went thither himself; and by an amazing Dexterity and Conduct, though he had but twelve hundred Men with him that he could depend upon, he caused the Spaniards to raise the Siege, without exposing the Smallness of his Numbers. From thence he went into Valencia, where he procured a great Number of Horses to mount his Foot; and by a Stratagem possessing himself of Morviedro, secured the City of Valencia, which was in great Danger from the Enemy. But the farther Occurrences on this Side reaching into the next Year, we shall put off the Relation of them, till they come in their Order at that Time.

The Parliament of Scotland meets.

The Parliament of Scotland, which sat this Summer, proved not so refractory as it had formerly been. That Assembly met on the twenty eighth of June; but many of the Members being absent, the Lord High Commissioner, which was now the Duke of Argyle, adjourned them for five Days. The Queen's Letter was then read, in which she recommended to them the settling the Protestant Succession in Scotland, and an Union with England. The Parliament having spent some Time in the Consideration of Trade, fell upon the Topicks mentioned in the Queen's Letter. A Resolve was then proposed and agreed to, that before they named a Successor, they would have a Treaty with England, with Relation to Commerce, and other Concerns; and also that before that Nomination they would frame such Limitations and Conditions of Government, as might secure their Religion and Liberties under a Successor. The Court-Party then proposed an Act for a Treaty with England about an Union; and the Countrey-Party to go upon the Limitations; and the latter carried it. An Act was then read, enacting, "That after the Queen's Decease, without Heirs of her Body, all Officers of State, and Privy Councillors and Lords of Session, should be chosen and appointed by the Parliament, and accountable to the same; and Vacancies in those Offices be supplied during the Intervals of Parliament, by Persons appointed by the Council, to continue in the same till next Session of Parliament"; which Act was approved. An Act for calling Triennial Parliaments was also read and approved; with another, appointing Scotch Ambassadors to be present when the Sovereign had Occasion to treat with Foreign Princes and States. Other Limitations upon the Crown were afterwards proposed, but rejected by the House.

These Things being over, the Court-Party brought the Act for a Treaty with England for an Union, to be considered. Exceptions were taken, that in the English Act for an Union it was provided, that the Scotch, as well as English Commissioners, should be nominated by the Queen. This was interpreted, as if the English Parliament took to themselves a Power to command the Scots; and an Address to the Queen was moved for, to represent to her, that the Parliament could not comply with a Proposal made in such injurious Terms; but they were ready to comply with her Majesty's Desires of an Union, if the same were proposed in a proper Manner. But this Motion was rejected. The Temper of the House was now, by some secret Causes, so much changed, that the Opposers of the Union found it was in vain to oppose the Thing in general, and therefore endeavoured to clog the Act with some Clauses that might make the Treaty ineffectual. To this End they offered a Clause to be added to the Act, providing that the Union to be treated of should no Ways derogate from the fundamental Laws, ancient Privileges, Offices, Rights, Liberties and Dignities of the Scotch Nation. This was opposed by the Court-Party, who alledged that the Union proposed, being an entire or incorporating Union, this Clause was inconsistent with it, since the abolishing of Scotch Parliaments must be a necessary Consequence. This caused a warm and long Debate; but it being put to the Question, the Clause was carried by a Majority of two Voices only. A Clause was afterwards offered, forbidding the Scotch Commissioners to enter England, till a Clause in an English Act (mentioned as above) by which all the Scots are declared Aliens, be repealed. This Clause had like to have overturned the Act; for as it was very questionable whether the English Parliament would have repealed that Clause, it laid an invincible Difficulty in the Way. And the Motion took with the House. But the Court-Party evaded it, by moving that the Clause might not be joined with the Act of Treaty, but made an Act by it self; which Motion succeeded. And thus this important Act was carried through the House. And soon after, a Supply of six Months Sess being granted, the Parliament was adjourned.

An Act brought in for a Treaty about an Union with England.

The Act passed, and the Parliament adjourned.

The new Parliament of England assembled October 25. and the Commons chose John Smith Esq; Speaker. The Queen's Speech, and the Addresses being over, the Commons proceeded to the Supplies, and the Lords to consider the State of the Nation. The Lord

The Parliament of England meets. Their Proceedings.

A.D. 1705. Lord Haversham made a Motion, that the Princess Sophia should be invited to come into England, but it was rejected. It had however this Effect, that a Bill was passed for placing the Administration at the Time of the Queen's Demise, if the next Protestant Successor should be then out of the Kingdom, in the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, or Lord Keeper, the High Treasurer, the President of the Council, the Lord Privy-Seal, the Lord High-Admiral, and the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's-Bench at that Time being, till the Arrival of the Successor. The Lords afterwards brought in a Bill for repealing that Act, which gave so much Offence to the Scotch Parliament, as was just now said. Soon after this, the Queen communicated to the Houses the Accounts she had received of the great Successes in Catalonia, and was congratulated thereupon.

A Report that the Church was in Danger.

The publick Pretences which the Leaders of both Parties invented to cover their private Ends, throughout this Reign, were on the one Side a mighty Sollicitude for the Church of England; on the other, a wonderful Zeal for the Hanover Succession; under which false Colours they strove with a sincere Warmth and Concern for their own Power and Greatness. At the Beginning of the Queen's Reign, the Duke of Marlborough and the Lord Godolphin had sided with the former Party, till in about two Years afterwards, a Coldness grew between them; which appeared in the Addresses to the Queen in 1704, in which those of that Party affected to compare the Successes at Sea with those of the Duke of Marlborough at Land. And soon after the Act of Security being passed in Scotland, which gave, as has been said, so much Offence here, the Lord Treasurer found it necessary to dissipate a Storm which he apprehended from the other Party, by closing with them. And thus the Earl of Nottingham, and the Duke of Buckingham came to be removed; and it appeared that the Stream of Royal Favour was like to take a different Course, from that which it had before observed. These Things alarming the deserted Party, many Pamphlets were published, insinuating that the present Ministry were Enemies to the Church of England, and that the secret Contrivances and open Attacks against it were so powerful and numerous, as to bring that truest Pattern of Primitive Christianity into the utmost Danger.

These panick Fears gained Ground so much among those who were zealously devoted to the Church, that the Ministry thought proper to have them silenced by a Resolution of Parliament. The Lord Halifax moved in the House of Lords, that a Day might be set to enquire into that pretended Danger, which was appointed; the Lords who were out of Place, with their Friends and Followers, being solicitous to prove the Danger of the Church, to cast an Odium on those who were in Power. These were joined by a very few, who sincerely apprehended ill Consequences from the present State of Things. On the one Side it was urged, that the Act of Security lately passed in Scotland, was one Cause of the Churches Danger; because by that Act the Presbyterians of Scotland being empowered to arm themselves, were enabled to destroy it. That the next Successor to the Crown was absent beyond the Seas, which might be of ill Consequence on a sudden Exigency. That the Loss of the Occasional Conformity Bill was another Cause of the Churches Danger; the Refusal of so small and so reasonable a Security, giving Cause of Suspicion. To these Causes of Danger were added the Increase of Presbyterian Academies; and the Licentiousness of the Press; from whence there were uttered many dangerous Pamphlets against Religion in general, and the Church of England in particular. On the other hand it was said, that the Act of Security in Scotland could not be seriously thought a Danger to the Church, it being a Thing wholly foreign to Church Affairs; and the former Heats in Scotland being so well allayed: Nor could the Absence of the Successor be looked on as a real Ground of Apprehension; so effectual Care having been taken by a late Act to provide for the Administration of the Government in case of any unexpected Accident. That the Occasional Conformity Bill had been already considered by the House, which had determined the Question relating to it. That as to the setting up of Presbyterian Academies, and the Licentiousness of the Press, though it were indeed to be wished such Things could be entirely prevented, yet that while the Nation was governed by a Queen, who had given such glorious Proofs of her Affection to the Church, such small Inconveniences were much too weak to lay so great a Stress upon. Upon the whole the House resolved, "That the Church of England is by God's Blessing, under the happy Reign of her Majesty, in a safe and flourishing Condition; and that whoever shall suggest that the Church is in Danger under her Majesty's Administration, is an Enemy to the Queen, the Church, and Kingdom." This Vote being sent down to the Commons, they also concurred with it. And the two Houses addressed the Queen to punish those who should report that the Church was in Danger under her Government. This Resolution we have been the more particular upon, because it had very great Consequences four Years afterwards.

This Vote occasioned a great Difference between the two Houses of Convocation, where there was Fuel enough laid in by former Transactions to take Fire with a Spark. The Ministry seem to have laid great Stress upon carrying this Point of the Safety of the Church under their Administration; and thought their Design would be compleated, if they could get the Convocation, who were most concerned, to concur in the same Declaration as had passed the whole Legislature.

A.D. 1705.

Upon which a Vote to the contrary passes both Houses.

The Convocation disagrees about it.

A.D.1705. ture. It was no difficult Matter to get the same Majority in the Upper House, who had voted that Way in the House of Peers, to frame an Address to the same Purpose; in order to be presented by the Convocation. This was done accordingly, and the Address was sent down to the Lower House for their Concurrence. But there had been such Disputes between the two Houses about the Power of proroguing that Assembly, as was sufficient alone to breed an Opposition. But besides this, there was a Majority of the Lower House not so well affected to the present Administration: So that the Lower House refused to agree to the Address; and drew up another, in which the same Things were said, but expressed in softer and more general Terms; which was to be presented by the Lower House alone. This being approved, was carried to the Upper House, who refused to receive it; and ordered them to return and consider of the Address that was sent them. This bred a great Debate in the Lower House; and several there protested against their Proceedings, and carried their Protestation to the Upper House, who approved it. The Queen, finding the Houses were not like to agree, dispensed with their Address, and put an End to the Session. The passing that Vote of the Churches Safety, concluded also all the material Business done by the Parliament, which not long after was prorogued in like Manner.

The Parliament prorogued

A.D.1706.

A fatal Year to France.

The Year 1706, the Occurrences of which we are going to relate, manifested what could hardly be believed before, that the Glories of the Year of the Victory of Bleinheim, might not only be renewed but exceeded. The gigantic Structure of Universal Empire, which France had so long been rearing, and which had received so rude a Shock two Years ago, was in this Year utterly broken and defaced; and stood for the future to the View of the World, a battered and ruinous Pile, the Contempt and Detestation of the present Age, and an exemplary Monument to Posterity of the Pride and Punishment of the vain Builder.

The Campaign in Flanders.

The Campaign began in Flanders with the Return of the Spring. But whereas through the cautious manner of Fighting used among such regular and experienced Warriors as were here employed on both Sides, general Engagements seldom happen till after the Campaign is pretty far advanced; it fell out now, by an unusual Concurrence of Events, that the Armies were scarce known to be in the Field, before the News came of a glorious and complete Victory. The French with their usual Diligence, had taken Care that their Army should be assembled as early as possible. The Duke of Marlborough, whose Happiness it was, thro' the whole Course of this War, that his natural Vigilance and Activity were never obstructed by the want of any Thing that Money could procure, was too careful and diligent to be much behind-hand with them; and took the Field with the English and Dutch Forces. But there were two other A.D.1706. Bodies of Troops, one of Danes, the other of Prussians, which he expected to join him. The latter of these was upon the March; but either through the Remissness of those who sent them, or because it was not usual to begin any Enterprize of Importance early, they set out so late that they could not be expected in the Army in some Weeks. The Danes were in a high Mutiny, on Account of some Arrears of Pay due to them; and when they were ordered to come to the general Place of Rendezvous appointed for the Troops to meet in, positively refused to stir out of their Quarters, till those were cleared off.

The French Court had Intelligence of this Mutiny of the Danes, and the Distance of the Prussians; and knew that the Want of these Troops in the Confederate Army rendered it considerably inferior to their own, which was full and complete. Upon this, they sent positive Orders to the Marschal de Villeroy, who in Conjunction with the Elector of Bavaria commanded their Army, to seek out the Confederates and fight them. But by the Time the French Commanders had received these Orders, the Duke of Marlborough was ready to meet them. For as he had before laid Schemes to draw them out of the cautious Measures used by them the last Year, which their present Conduct saved him the Execution of; so he had taken such Methods with the Danes, that they had left their Quarters, and were at that very time moving towards him. He then sent to them to hasten their March; and they increased their Speed so critically, that they came to the main Army, so soon as to perform very signal Service, and so late that the Enemy did not suspect they were there. In the mean time the French Army decamped, and made all the Haste they could to find the Confederates; who were prepared and desirous to meet them. And thus a most decisive Action happened within three Days after the Armies had first come into the Field. For it was not till May 20. that the English and Dutch Forces joined at the appointed Rendezvous; and the Battle of Ramellies was fought on the twenty third of that Month.

The French march to attack the Confederates

The French Army in the Morning of that Day, was met by the advanced Guard of the Confederates, advancing directly towards them. Upon Notice of this, the Duke of Marlborough ordered Preparations to be made for the Battle. The French seeing the Duke so ready for the Encounter, possessed themselves of a strong Camp, and drew out their Army in Order of Battle. The Confederates did the like; the two Armies making two long Fronts of Horse and Foot stretching out for four Miles. Their Numbers were nearly equal, the French having a little Advantage. Between the two Centers of the Armies there sprang up a Rivulet, which turning towards the Right of the Confederates, covered that Wing. There was besides a little Morass on its Banks.

The Battle of Ramellies.

The

A.D. 1706. the Duke of Marlborough judging from thence that the Strefs of the Action would lie on his Left, strengthened that Wing with two Lines of Dutch and Danish Horse, ranged at the very Extremity of the Left Wing, and somewhat behind the other Troops.

About half an Hour past one in the Afternoon the Batteries of Cannon on both Sides began to play; and soon after the Fight began on the Left. On that Side the French had posted a Body of Foot behind some Hedges, whose firing galled the Confederate Horse; upon which Monsieur d' Auverquerque, who was next in Command to the Duke of Marlborough, ordered some Forces to go and dislodge them, which was done accordingly. The Enemy seeing this, ordered fourteen Squadrons of Dragoons to dismount, and in Company with of Battalions of Foot, to dislodge the Confederate Party again. But Monsieur d' Auverquerque ordering at the same Time the whole Body of Horse of the Left Wing to advance, this Design was prevented; and the Dragoons being met as they were coming on, were turned to Flight; and before they could recover their Horses, were most of them killed or taken Prisoners. At last the Dutch and Danish Cavalry, coming up with the Enemy, charged them vigorously, and the Fight began. For above an Hour together the two Parties were engaged, Man to Man, and Horse to Horse, in a fierce and obstinate Combat; and many brave Soldiers fell slain and wounded on both Sides; nor could it be determined which had the Advantage. At length it appeared, that the Danish Horse had broken and routed those Squadrons that opposed them; but that the Dutch, who were nearer the Center, were forced to give Way to the French, and retreat in great Confusion. The Duke of Marlborough seeing this, sent for twenty Squadrons from the Right Wing, to reinforce the Left; and in the mean Time hastened to encourage and assist the broken Cavalry with his Presence and Counsel. In this Place he narrowly escaped a very great Danger. For as he was mixing himself with the broken Dutch Squadrons, to encourage them to face about, and make a second Stand, he was known by some of the Enemy, who pressed eagerly forwards through the Throng to attack him. To increase his Danger, he fell from his Horse at the same Time; being, as some say, born down by the disordered Dutch Cavalry. In this Condition he had either been killed, or taken Prisoner, had not some Confederate Foot that were near, hastened in Time to his Aid, by whose Assistance he mounted on Horseback again. In doing this, he escaped a still greater Peril than the former; for as he was getting upon a fresh Horse, a Cannon-Ball came so near him, as to take off the Head of Colonel Brindfield, his Gentleman, who, as he was holding the Stirrop for his Master's easier Mounting, fell dead before him under the Horse's Feet.

But this Danger over, the Duke so well A.D. 1706. restored the Fight by ordering those Dutch Squadrons that were yet entire to charge, and rallying those that were broken, that before the Aid he had sent for from the Right Wing was come up, the Victory was clear on this Side. The Dutch Horse returned to the Fight with such Success, that the Enemy's Squadrons being charged in Front by the Dutch, and in Flank by the victorious Danes, were entirely cut in Pieces. In the mean Time the Village of Rammellies, which was in the Center of the French Army, was vigorously attacked by twelve Battalions under General Schutz. The Enemy having the Advantage of the Ground, defended themselves very resolutely; till seeing the whole Line of the Confederate Infantry marching up towards them, and the Dutch and Danish Horse advancing to surround them, they endeavoured to retire. But it was now become too late, for the Cavalry marched after, and overtook them; so that almost all of them were either killed, or taken Prisoners.

The Infantry of the Enemy's Left Wing seeing their whole Right Wing broken and destroyed, and the Conquerors marching towards them, endeavoured to make a Retreat under Cover of their Horse, who drew themselves up in Order, for that Purpose. But the English Cavalry found Means to get over the Rivulet and Morass which covered the Enemies Horse of that Wing, and came up, and attacked them. The Enemy, being thus overpowered by Numbers, were forced to give Way; and though they rallied again to cover their Infantry, they were obliged to retreat a second Time, and abandon the Foot; who being so closely followed, took three different Ways to avoid the Pursuit; but not many of them escaped. Those of the Allies who pursued the Enemies Center, overtook an entire Body of seven Squadrons of Spanish and Bavarian Troops, guarding their Cannon which was marching in a Line before them. The Mareschal de Villeroy, and Elector of Bavaria were among these Troops, which was almost the only Body left entire. But the Pursuers charged them so vigorously, that these also were broken and dispersed; and the Elector and the Mareschal narrowly escaped being made Prisoners; some of their Officers being taken within ten Yards of the Place where those two Commanders were. Thus

The French Army routed.

The Loss of the Enemy in this Battle was reckoned about ten Thousand Men, of which the one half were slain, and the rest made Prisoners. The Cannon, heavy Baggage, and the like Spoils of the Field, fell also into the Hands of the Confederates. The Loss of the Allies was computed at about

The Duke of Marlborough in Danger.

10 K

bout

A. D. 1706. about one Thousand Men who were slain, besides about twice that Number wounded.

The Consequences of the Victory.

The Consequences of this Victory were no less important, than the Action it self was glorious. The French Army was so utterly broken, that there was no Hope of saving the scattered Remains of it, but by flying out of the Reach of the Conquerors Pursuit. So that they never stopped their Flight till they were arrived beyond Courtray, near fourscore Miles from the Field in which they were defeated. Nor did they continue long there, it being found necessary, in order to prevent the great Desertion of their Soldiers (which always attends a Defeat) and to provide the Frontier Places with Garrisons able to stand against the fortunate Victors who were soon expected there, to cause the Army to separate. Part of it was then sent to reinforce the Garrisons of the Places that were most exposed; and the Remainder was formed into two Flying Camps.

In the mean Time, all the Spanish Brabant and Dutch Flanders being abandoned by the Enemy, became an easie Conquest. Louvain, Brussels, Malines, Alost, Ghent, Bruges, Antwerp, Oudenarde, surrendered without firing a Gun; so that all the Northern Part of the Spanish Provinces submitted to the Allies; Dendermonde and Ostend excepted.

The Duke of Marlborough after this besieged Ostend, which surrendered in eight Days after the Trenches were opened. He thence proceeded to Menin; which Place, after a sharp Resistance, was also yielded up. And the taking of Dendermond and Aeth, which were successively besieged, concluded the Campaign.

The Loss the French had sustained in Flanders, was redoubled by an equal Blow they received at the very same Time in Spain, by the raising the Siege of Barcelona. But to give a proper Account of that important Event, we must look backward upon what happened the last Year.

The Campaign in Spain.

The great and unexpected Ease with which King Charles was settled in Catalonia, and the wonderful Progress made there by the Earl of Peterborough, are related above. But the Germans ill Conduct was never to leave them in whatever Part of the World they were. The Court at Barcelona, as if nothing was to be done, and no Danger could be possibly apprehended, gave themselves up to Indolence and Remissness; from whence they fell into Court-Jealousies and Piques. These Impertinences took them off from all Care of Affairs; which they rarely meddled with, unless it were to trouble and perplex the Earl of Peterborough, who, notwithstanding his great Services, grew out of Favour with them. For being a Man of Action and Fire, and of a Temper naturally frank and easie, he could not be brought to treat the stately Insignificance of the German Ministers, with that Form and Distance they required. Thus no Care was taken for the present, or for the future; the Soldiers were suffered to lie starving and dying, by those for whom they fought; no Provision was made of Stores of any Kinds; and the very Breaches of the Fortifications of Barcelona, and Fort Montjuich, were left unrepaired.

King Philip's Ministers were of a very different Character. They had been formed under a Prince, who scarce knew what it was to lose Time or Opportunities; and were accustomed to have a continual Eye, not only on Things present, but future and remote. The Progress made by the Earl of Peterborough was too sudden and unexpected to be prevented; but no Diligence was wanting to stop it. Forces were sent for immediately from the Frontiers of Portugal and France, and even from Italy, Flanders and the Rhine. So that by the Beginning of this Year, King Philip had assembled an Army of fourteen Thousand Men near Madrid; besides which, the Duke de Noailles had entered Catalonia on the Side of Roussillon with eight Thousand Men more.

King Philip forms a Design against Barcelona.

It was agreed in King Philip's Council to join these two Armies, and march directly to Barcelona; in which Place they did not want Correspondents that informed them punctually of the supine Neglect of the Governors there. But to make the Blow more sure, this Design was to be concealed and dissembled, till the precise Time when it was to break out into Execution. To this End the Armies made several Feints, as if they designed to attack Gironne, Lerida, Tortosa, and other Places on the Frontiers of Catalonia; by which Amusements they drew off many of the Forces, the Engineers, and much of the Ammunition, to those Places. Besides the Land-Forces, a Fleet of twenty four Men of War, with other smaller Vessels, was ready at Toulon, to block up the City of Barcelona by Sea, and to concur with the Operations of the Besiegers ashore.

The Design was thus carried on with the greatest Prospect of Success; for there were not a Thousand regular Forces in the City; and the Court there was so fast asleep, that though the French and Spaniards came every Day nearer and nearer to them, they did not so much as repair the Breaches of the very Fortifications that defended them.

At last the Court at Barcelona was awakened by the Appearance of eight French Men of War in the Bay; which opened their Eyes, and roused them into a little Care and Circumspection. These Ships had been sent out from the main Fleet to intercept three English Frigates who were expected at Barcelona with Money from Italy; and to make their Prey the surer, they cast Anchor in the Bay it self. This was a wrong Step, and by giving Alarm, proved the Ruin of the Enterprize; besides which, they missed of their Booty too; the English Ships having timely Notice that they were waited for, and landing their Money at another Place. The Court and Inhabitants of Barcelona now saw they were in the utmost Danger; and began to bestir themselves. They sent for all

The Court of Barcelona alarmed.

the

A.D. 1706. the Regular Forces that could be gotten from neighbouring or remote Places; some of which were forced to travel one hundred and twenty Miles in two Days upon Mules; and the Inhabitants fell to repair the Fortifications, abundance of their very Clergy setting their Hands to the Work. Nevertheless the Danger of the King's Person was so great in being shut up in a City so ill provided for Defence, that he was persuaded by many to endeavour his Escape. But he took a noble Resolution, rather to abide the utmost Extremities, than forsake a People that shewed so much Affection for him; and this Resolution was indeed that which preserved the Place.

The Siege begun.

The French and Spaniards at last came before the Town, making an Army of twenty two Thousand Men; and the Fleet entered the Bay. The Siege continued for a Month, but the Success of it was not suitable to the great Advantages with which it was begun. Fort Montjuich which had been taken by the Earl of Peterborough in three Days, now held the Besiegers employed twenty two Days. And the Earl of Peterborough's Troops, with the Catalans, harrassing their Camp, and in spite of the Enemy's Care, furnishing the City from Time to Time with Assistance, the Siege made but a slow Progress. Nevertheless as the Forces of the Earl of Peterborough were not numerous enough to enable him to attack the Enemy, and the Besiegers gained Ground, though but slowly, the City had been lost, and our Footing in Spain with it, had not Relief come thither in a very seasonable Time.

The English Fleet comes to assist King Charles.

The Earl of Galloway, and the English Ambassador in Portugal, suspected the true Design of King Philip's Forces, as soon as they heard of their Motions. And having communicated these Suspicions to Sir John Leake and the Dutch Admiral, who with their Squadrons lay then in the Tagus, they fitted out their Fleet, and put out to Sea. And meeting at Gibraltar a great Reinforcement, and being joined in the Mediterranean by another, they made such Expedition, that they arrived at Barcelona just when the Besieged began to lose Hopes.

The Siege is raised.

At their Approach the French Fleet left the Bay, which the English and Dutch entered the next Day; and set ashore with all speed the Land Forces that were on board. The Earl of Peterborough, who came off to the Fleet from Terragona, ordered some of them to march up to the Breach immediately. That Sight discouraged the Besiegers so that in two Days after they raised the Siege, with such Haste and Fear, that they left all their Cannon, and their Stores of Ammunition and Provision behind them; besides fifteen hundred sick and wounded Men, whom the Mareschal de Theffe, the French Commander, not being able to carry off, recommended to the Care and Humanity of the Earl of Peterborough, by a Letter sent to him the next Day after they decamped. Their Flight was hasty and precipitate; and their Rear was harrassed and insulted by the Catalans, and some Horse sent out of the Town, at Break of Day. As these were skirmishing with the hindmost of the Enemies Forces, a Total Eclipse of the Sun happened about nine in the Morning; which covering the whole Countrey with a sudden Darkness, increased the Horror of the Slaughter and Flight. And because the French King had assumed the Sun for his Device, this Accident was thought ominous by the ignorant Multitude on both Sides; and added very much to the Consternation of the Enemy, and the Alacrity of the Pursuers. The French Army suffered so much in this Siege, that they dared not adventure to return to Madrid by the Way they came, but marched with all Speed towards France, from whence King Philip came to Madrid, by a long Circuit round the French Frontiers, and through the Kingdom of Navarre.

But his Abode at Madrid was of no great Continuance. For the Confederates had so much the Superiority on the Side of Portugal, that the Duke of Berwick, who commanded the French and Spanish Forces, could not hinder them from taking Alcantara, and from thence marching directly into Spain. The ill News which they heard from Barcelona of the Danger of that City, retarded their Progress a while, fearing to be surrounded by advancing too far into an Enemy's Countrey. But when at last they were informed that the Siege was raised, and the Besiegers Army was driven into France, they resolved to make their Way immediately to Madrid. King Philip was returned to Madrid about the Time this March began. As soon as he had Notice of it, and that they were advancing directly towards him, he found himself obliged to retire. The Army that was driven from before Barcelona he had left in France, (but with Orders to follow him) while himself hastened to Madrid, to compose all Disorders that his Absence might occasion. So that the Allies now marching towards him, he had not Troops at hand sufficient to make Head against them. Upon this he left Madrid, to meet his Army which was returning through Navarre; and at the same Time gave Orders to all his other Forces that were dispersed throughout Spain to come to join him. And three Days after his Departure, the Confederate Army came to Madrid, which City made its Submission to King Charles III. as soon as required; as all the Cities and Towns had done, through which they passed in their Way thither.

The Confederates march to Madrid.

There was now little to do but for King Charles to come to take Possession of the Capital of Spain. For though King Philip was assembling a powerful Army upon the Frontiers, the Forces of the Allies when assembled together, were no Ways inferior. The Generals about Madrid sent Express after Express to King Charles to desire him to hasten to them, and prevent the Return of King Philip. But so unaccountable an Infatuation attended the Councils at Barcelona that the Opportunity was lost; and the King,

A.D. 1706. King, instead of coming directly to Madrid, lost thirty Days in an insignificant Progress to Saragossa, contrary to the Advice of all the Commanders, and of the English and Portuguese Envoys.

They are obliged to retire from thence.

This Delay frustrated all the past Success. For in that Time King Philip had assembled together so great a Body of Forces, that he was able to come out to meet the Confederates. He found them not in a Condition to face his Army, their Troops being dispersed; some of them attending King Charles in Arragon, and some waiting for him under the Earl of Peterborough in Valencia; all which Confusion was occasioned by the wrong Management of the Court at Barcelona. So that when King Philip advanced towards that Body of the Confederate Forces that had possessed themselves of Madrid, they found themselves obliged to give Way to him, and to leave him in Possession of that Capital. And though King Charles and the Earl of Peterborough arrived afterwards in the Army, the Recruits they brought with them were not sufficient to enable the Army to make Head against the Enemy. So that all that could be done by the Confederates was to take Quarters in the Kingdom of Valencia; and to secure that Kingdom, Arragon and Catalonia, and an Entrance into Castile against the next Summer. At the Time the Campaign drew to an End, the Confederate Fleet, under Sir John Leake, reduced the City of Alicant, and the Islands of Majorca and Ivica.

The Campaign in Savoy.

On the Side of Italy, the Campaign which began with a lowering and ominous Aspect, concluded with a happy and prosperous End. The Duke of Vendosme, who commanded the French Army, having had the good Fortune to open the Campaign with a very notable Defeat of the German Forces at Calcinato, entered upon the Siege of Turin, the Capital City of Piedmont, and the only Place of Consequence in the Duke of Savoy's Dominions that was not taken from him. The Duke of Savoy, whose Safety or Ruine depended on this Siege, omitted nothing in his Power to strengthen the City by new Works, and the Garrison by all the Forces he could possibly spare. On the other Hand, the Preparations made by the French were so great, and their Army designed to carry on the Siege was so numerous, that the Duke's Family were obliged to leave Turin, and take Refuge at Genoua, there not being any Place of secure Abode for them throughout what was once the Duke of Savoy's Dominions. The Duke himself, with what small Forces he could keep with him, was compelled to retire into the Vallies of Lucerne, among his poor Protestant Subjects the Vaudois. The only Hope he had of Relief, was from Prince Eugene of Savoy, who was in Italy on the Frontiers of the Venetian State with a German Army; and had Orders to assist him. It is observable, that to enable the Prince to perform this Enterprize, two hundred and fifty thousand Pounds had been subscribed in England by Way of Loan to the Emperor. A.D. 1706.

In the mean Time the Siege began, and continued from the Middle of June, to the Beginning of September. The Garrison defended themselves like resolute Men, and made the Besiegers pay dear for every Inch of Ground they gained upon them. On the other Hand, a Faintness and want of Vigour appeared in all the Operations of the Besiegers, who spent much needless Time and Labour in hunting the Duke of Savoy from Place to Place. Mean while, Prince Eugene, through prodigious Difficulties, made his Way over four Rivers defended by Intrenchments; the Troops who were set to oppose his Passage flying before him. At last he arrived so near Turin, as to join his Army with those small Forces the Duke of Savoy had with him. The City of Turin was by this Time in very great Danger, not so much from the Enemy's Attacks, as for want of Ammunition, of which immense Quantities had been spent in their long and obstinate Defence. So that as soon as the Prince and Duke were joined, it was agreed to attack the French with all Expedition.

Turin besieged.

The Duke of Orleans, (since the Regent of France) and the Mareschal de Marfin commanded the French, the Duke of Vendosme having been sent to the Army in Flanders some Time before. Their Army was encamped on a Plain, between two Rivers; across which Plain, from River to River, there ran a very strong Intrenchment; so that they could not be attacked without great Disadvantage; besides which, their Army was considerably more numerous than that of the Allies. However, Necessity pressing, the two Confederate Generals resolved to encounter these Difficulties; and they gloriously overcame them.

The Day of Battle being come, and the Army put in order for the Attack, they marched up boldly through a furious Fire to the Entrenchments, and broke into them so soon, and engaged the Enemy with such Success, that in two Hours the Battle was over; and the superior Army, covered with such strong Defences, was by main Force, and with an easie Contention, driven from their Camp, and forced to fly on all Sides; abandoning their Camp and Works, and all their Materials and Instruments of War; besides great Numbers of their Soldiers, who being in the advanced Works near the Town, were cut off from the rest, and were obliged to surrender themselves Prisoners. All the Spoils of the Camp, Cannon, Mortars, heavy Baggage, Ammunition, fell into the Hands of the Conquerors; except some Magazines of Powder, Bombs and Granadoes, which the Enemy in their Flight set Fire to, and blew up.

The Siege raised, and the French defeated.

In this Fight, and some small Actions before it, the French are said to have lost twelve Thousand Men. The Duke of Orleans received two Wounds, one on his left Arm, and another on his Side, besides three Contusions from Shot that chanced to light upon his Armour. The Mareschal de Mar-

fin

A.D. 1706. fin was taken Prisoner, but being mortally wounded, did not long survive the Fight. And the French Army, not being in a Condition to make Head against the Pursuit of the Confederates, retired to the Borders of France.

The Consequence of this Victory was, that the French were obliged to abandon Italy; most of the Towns they held in the Milaneze, or in the Territories of the Duke of Savoy, being soon after taken by the Confederates. And before the next Spring, the King of France consented by a formal Treaty, on Condition of withdrawing his Troops, to evacuate all the Places they were possessed of beyond the Mountains.

Thus this Year brought forth a Train of happy Events round almost all Europe. The Queen of England late crowned with Glory; all the Successes of this Year, which freed Christendom from long and cruel Alarms, being justly attributed to the Influence of her Power and Fortune. For it was an English General that won the Battle of Ramellies; it was an English Fleet that raised the Siege of Barcelona; and it was a Loan of English Money that enabled Prince Eugene to bring his Army to save Turin. And the late Conduct of that Prince, for whom so much was done in Spain, has shewn that the Retreat from Madrid, though reckoned a Misfortune at that Time, deserves a very different Name. So peculiar a Blessing attending this Reign, that the very Disappointments of it may be accounted happy.

A fruitless Attempt for a Descent in France.

After the Victory at Ramellies, an Attempt was entered upon to make a Descent in France; and a great Fleet was made ready under Sir Cloudesty Shovel, who convoyed a Body of Land Forces, under the Command of the Earl Rivers. But this Fleet steering Westwards towards the Mouth of the Channel, it happened that when they passed by Plymouth, the Wind fell contrary; and continued so obstinately in that Point, that after a long Stay in Torbay, into which they were driven, it was resolved to lay aside that Enterprize. And the Land Forces aboard were ordered to be transported into Spain.

The Campaign on the Rhine.

On the Rhine the War was carried on with the usual Inactivity, or rather ill Success. By the Negligence of the Germans, it came to pass that the French came into the Field with an Army vastly superior to that of Prince Lewis of Baden, who commanded the Army of the Empire. So that the French took Haguenau; and would probably have proceeded much farther, had not their Losses in the Netherlands and Spain put a Stop to them, by calling for great Bodies of Forces from the Rhine. But the Imperial Army was still so weak, that Prince Lewis was not in a Condition to undertake any Thing. It is thought, that the Trouble he met with upon this Account contributed to bring upon him a lingering Sickness, of which he died soon after.

Great Pains was taken in Hungary to produce an Accommodation between the Emperor and the Hungarians. But neither the Influence of Allies, to whom they had been A.D. 1706. so much obliged, nor the humble and moving Representations of an oppressed People, could incline the Court of Vienna to consent to moderate Counsels.

The French King, being either discouraged by the Superiority the Allies had gained over him, or perhaps with Intention to divide them, had last Year made secret Overtures of Peace to the States, which were flatly rejected. The Misfortunes he met with this Year obliged him to renew those Instances, probably with more Sincerity than before. The Elector of Bavaria wrote in his Name to the Duke of Marlborough, and the Field-Deputies of the States, to desire that a Place might be chosen between the two Armies, wherein Conferences of Peace might be entered upon. But these Proposals not being offered to the other Allies, were looked on as a Design to amuse and divide; the rather because the French King had not made any particular Offers. So that the Queen and the States unanimously agreed to reject them.

Thus we have gone through the remarkable Occurrences abroad in this memorable Year. The Union with Scotland.

The Transactions at home were no less extraordinary, the happy Union between the Kingdoms of England and Scotland being concluded this Year. The Queen, by Virtue of her Power allowed to her by the Parliaments of England and Scotland, appointed the following noble and eminent Persons to be Commissioners. On the Part of England, Thomas Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; William Cowper Esquire, Keeper of the Great Seal of England; John Archbishop of York, Sidney Lord Godolphin, High Treasurer of England; Thomas Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, President of the Council; John Duke of Newcastle, Keeper of the Privy Seal; William Duke of Devonshire, Steward of the Household; Charles Duke of Somerset, Master of the Horse; Charles Duke of Bolton, Charles Earl of Sunderland, Evelyn Earl of Kingston, Charles Earl of Carlisle, Edward Earl of Orford, Charles Viscount Townshend, Thomas Lord Wharton, Ralph Lord Gray, John Lord Powlet, John Lord Sommers, Charles Lord Hallifax, John Smith Esquire, William Cavendish, Marquis of Hartington; John Mannors, Marquis of Granby; Sir Charles Hedges, and Robert Harley Esquire, Principal Secretaries of State; Henry Boyle Esquire, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Sir John Holt, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench; Sir Thomas Trevor, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas; Sir Edward Northey, Attorney-General; Sir Simon Harcourt, Solicitor-General; Sir John Cooke, Advocate-General; and Stephen Waller, Doctor of Laws. On the Part of Scotland, James Earl of Seafeld, Lord Chancellor of Scotland; James Duke of Queensberry, Lord Privy Seal; John Earl of Mar, and Hugh Earl of Loudoun, Principal Secretaries of State; John Earl of Sutherland, John Earl of Morton, David Earl of Wemyss, David Earl of Leven, John Earl of Stair, Archibald

A.D. 1706. Archibald Earl of Roseberry, David Earl of Glasgow, Deputies of the Treasury; the Lord Archibald Campbell, Thomas Viscount Duplin, the Lord William Ross, one of the Commissioners of the Treasury; Sir Hugh Dalrymple, President of the Session; Adam Cockburn of Ormestoun, Lord Justice Clerk; Sir Robert Dundas of Arncliffe, and Mr. Robert Stewart of Tillicultrice, Lords of the Session; Mr. Francis Montgomery, one of the Commissioners of the Treasury; Sir David Dalrymple, one of her Majesty's Solicitors; Sir Alexander Ogilvie, Receiver General; Sir Patrick Johnston, Sir James Smollet, George Lockhart of Carnwath, William Morison of Prestongrange, Alexander Grant, William Seton of Pitmeddon, John Clark of Pennycuik, Hugh Montgomery, Daniel Stewart, and Daniel Campbell Esquires; Mr. George Dodding-ton was appointed Secretary to the English Commissioners, and Sir David Nairne to those for Scotland.

These Commissioners met on the sixteenth of April, and continued sitting till July 23. at which Time they presented to the Queen the Articles of Union. The most material of these Articles were to the following Purpose. "That the two Kingdoms be united into one Kingdom, by the Name of Great Britain. That the Succession to that United Kingdom remain to the Princess Sophia, and the Heirs of her Body, being Protestants. That the United Kingdom be represented by the same Parliament, to be called the Parliament of Great Britain. That in this Parliament sixteen Peers, chosen in Scotland, shall sit and vote in the House of Lords; and forty five Members in the House of Commons. That all the Subjects of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, shall have full Freedom and Intercourse of Trade and Navigation, throughout all the Dominions and Plantations thereunto belonging; and that there be a free Communication of all other Rights, Privileges, and Advantages belonging to the Subjects of either Kingdom.

Great Disturbances in Scotland thereupon.

The Articles of Union were by the Acts of the two Kingdoms that enabled the Queen to appoint Commissioners, to be laid before the Parliaments of both. That of Scotland met the first, and was in a very good Disposition to approve the same. The Parliament considered the several Articles successively, and they were agreed to, and carried by a great Majority. But without Doors the People were differently affected. Pamphlets in Multitudes came out against it, which raised such a Spirit as broke out at last into dangerous Tumults. They insulted the Members who were known to be well affected to the Union; and the Lord High-Commissioner was once assaulted by them, and some of his Servants were hurt. Addresses and Representations came from every Side of Scotland; and at Dumfries the Articles of Union were burnt publicly, great Numbers attending it. Nevertheless it must be owned that this Party was more considerable by its Violence, than by its Numbers; it being observed that A.D. 1706. out of thirty four Shires, only thirteen addressed; and of these, 'tis said, that the better Sort refused to join with the rest; of sixty six Burroughs only seventeen, of sixty eight Presbyteries only three, and of nine hundred thirty eight Kirks and Parishes only sixty. And the Parliament went on so steadily, that the Articles of Union were agreed to there with very little Alteration. The Act for the Union being passed, and some Supplies given, they proceeded to elect the Peers and Commoners who were by the Articles to represent Scotland; after which they were adjourned.

Before the Parliament of Scotland separated, that of England assembled. The wonderful Successes of the Year made a glorious Theme for mutual Congratulations between the Queen and the two Houses. The Thanks of both the Houses were also given to the General. And because his Services (which were doubtless very great and signal) were thought to deserve an extraordinary Reward, the House of Lords asked Leave of the Queen (as the sole Fountain of Honour) to bring in a Bill to perpetuate the Title of Duke of Marlborough on his Posterity, which for want of Male Issue would otherwise expire with the present Possessor, whose Children were all Daughters. And by this Bill it was ordered, that the Honour and Mannor of Woodstock, and the House of Bleinheim, should always go along with the Titles. This Bill was read three Times in one Day in the House of Commons, and passed Nemine Contradicente. The Commons went through the Supplies with such Zeal, that in eighteen Days the necessary Provisions for the Year were ready. The Queen came to the House of Lords soon after to pass the Bills ready for her; and then the Houses adjourned themselves.

During this short Recess, a second Day of Publick Thanksgiving was observed December 31. for the wonderful Successes with which Providence had blessed the End, as well as the Beginning of this triumphant Year. And for the greater Solemnity, the Queen came to St. Paul's Cathedral, accompanied by the illustrious Attendance of both Houses of Parliament, the Great Officers of State, and Magistrates, through a Crowd of innumerable Spectators with united Tongues and Hearts applauding their gracious Sovereign, and the Blessings sent down from above on her auspicious Reign.

The Parliament being again assembled, the House of Commons was prevailed on to shew in their Turn an Instance of their Favour to the Duke of Marlborough. And an Application being made to the Queen, she desired they might do it by continuing to the Duke's Posterity for ever, the Pension of five thousand Pounds per Annum, which she had granted to him for Life only. A Bill was accordingly brought in to that End, and easily passed both Houses. Thus by a Fortune as uncommon as his Merits, this great Commander saw the three Branches of our

A.D. 1706. our Legislature contending, as it were, with Emulation to heap Wealth and Honours upon him.

The Treaty of Union being at this Time ratified in Scotland, the Queen came to acquaint the Parliament with it, and to order the same to be laid before them. It passed both Houses by a great Majority, and in no long Time; but not without Opposition from the discontented; partly because it is the Custom of all Parties to oppose every Thing that comes from the other Side, and partly for the following Reasons. It was said, that the Union was ratified in Scotland, not without the most flagrant Tokens of universal Discontent; and that the different Constitutions of Church-Government, which were ratified thereby, made so entire a Coalition impossible. Some Objections were also made to the Inequality of the Proportion of the Taxes which Scotland was to pay, and the Shortness of the Time spent in deliberating upon so important an Affair. But these Difficulties were passed over by the two Houses; and the Bill for an Union received the Royal Assent.

There was but little done afterwards, by the two Houses, of Importance: So that after the Commons had provided a Supply to answer an Equivalent that was to be granted to Scotland for some of their Customs and Excises which that Kingdom was to be charged with, and which were to be applied to the Debts of England, the Queen came to the House of Peers, and prorogued the Parliament.

The Parliament prorogued.

A.D. 1707.

The Campaign in Spain

By this Time the Year 1707 was begun, in which the Disappointments and Misfortunes that attended the Arms of the Confederates, seemed to threaten a Change of Fortune. The Campaign in Spain (which was the great Scene of Action this Year) was now entered on. It was agreed by a Council of War, that the Confederate Forces should join into one Body, and march into Castile; which was done accordingly, tho' against the Advice of the Earl of Peterborough, who declared for a defensive War in Spain, while the Confederate Army in Savoy should attack France on that Side. But he had been lately removed from the Command of the Army, by the Influence of the other General, who, as it is supposed, grew jealous that the Glories of the Earl of Peterborough might eclipse his own; so that his Opinion was but little considered. And soon after he set out for Italy.

But a Series of Errors and Misfortunes of different Kinds, made this Counsel attended with a fatal Disaster. The Earl of Galloway upon this Resolution sent for some Forces that were in Catalonia, which the Viceroy refused to let him have. King Charles was also persuaded by his Councillors (who were always given to thwart the General) to make a Journey from the Camp into Catalonia; upon which Occasion he took some Troops from thence to attend him thither, which was a farther weakening the Army. He promised indeed to return with those Troops, and the rest of A.D. 1707. the Forces in Catalonia, when it should be thought proper to march towards Madrid. But he was not so good as his Word.

The Army thus diminished took the Field; but the Troops which came from England proved very sickly, as having been almost six Months at Sea, so that they declined apace. The Allies soon attacked and mastered two or three Places, with the Enemy's Magazines, which they seized or destroyed; and forced some Bodies of the Enemies to retire before them. They next laid Siege to Villena, an inconsiderable Place; but which made a stout Defence. But as they were here employed, they received Intelligence that the Duke of Berwick was at Almanza with an Army, much superior to their own; and which was also to be reinforced by seven or eight thousand Men more under the Duke of Orleans. To increase their Perplexity, they had received Word from King Charles, that he designed to march another Way, towards Roussillon, with the Troops in Catalonia. He also desired the Earl of Galloway to stand upon the Defensive, and to divide the Army on the Frontiers of Valencia and Aragon, to cover those Provinces. But this could not be done for both Kingdoms, so that the Kingdom of Valencia must have been left for a Prey to the Enemy. Upon this a Council of War being held, it was unanimously agreed to prevent this Disgrace by attacking the Enemy, before the Succours under the Duke of Orleans should join them. The French and Spaniards were already too much superior to the Confederates; and besides, the very Night after this Counsel was resolved on, Advice came that most of the Succours expected were arrived in the Enemy's Camp. However, the Earl of Galloway still persisted in his Resolution to fight, and ordered the Army to march. The Troops set out at Break of Day; but the Enemy was at so great a Distance from them, that it was Noon before they arrived within a Mile of them. This long March very much harrassed the Soldiers; so that when they came to the End of it, they were cruelly fatigued, and out of Breath. To complete the Mischief, the Place of Battle being a Plain, favoured the Enemy's Superiority, which was chiefly in Horse. When the Earl of Galloway saw so near the great Disadvantage with which he was to fight, he repented his coming so far. But it was too late to turn back without exposing his Rear; so that he made a Virtue of Necessity, and put his Army in as good Order as he could. The Dispositions being made, about three in the Afternoon the Earl began the Attack. The Fight was fierce and bloody; the Valour of the Confederates compensating the superior Numbers of the Enemy. On the Left, the English Dragoons drove the Spanish Horse before them, as the English and Dutch Foot in the Centre did also the Enemies Infantry. But on the Right, the Portuguese Horse being charged by some Squadrons

The Battle of Almanza.

A.D. 1707. Squadrons from the Enemy, were so broken and routed that they abandoned their Foot; who being surrounded, were almost all killed or taken Prisoners. All this while on the Left, the Confederates stood several Charges of fresh Squadrons without giving Ground. But the Advantage gained by the Enemy on the Right, enabled them to pour in such increasing Numbers upon them, that at last, most of their Officers being killed or disabled in the fierce Charges they had so long sustained, they gave Way to the Shock, and were driven one upon another, and put to Rout. The Foot being forsaken, were surrounded, and for some Time miserably slaughtered. Major-General Shrimpton, Brigadier Maccartney, Colonel Hill, and other Officers, who had been engaged in the Centre, seeing the Battle lost, made a Shift to gather together the dispersed Soldiers of the broken Regiments, and join a Body of Dutch and Portuguese, who had been rallied by Count Dhona, and Don Juan Emanuel; and these Forces, tho' with great Danger from the Enemies Pursuit, retired to some Hills two Leagues off. But upon a false Report that the Enemy were surrounding them, Count Dhona and Major-General Shrimpton sent to surrender themselves Prisoners at Discretion. Only Don Juan Emanuel refused to consent to so dishonourable a Capitulation; and to shew how little Need there was of it, retired with a few Portuguese Horse. The Earl of Galloway on his Part, gathered together the Remains of his broken Cavalry, and made the best of his Way into Catalonia, which Principality he defended with great Bravery and Prudence.

This fatal Battle exposed the Kingdoms of Valencia and Aragon to the Fury of the Conquerors, who treated the People with great Severity, suppressed their ancient Privileges, and burnt the Town of Xativa to the Ground. Only Denia and Alicant were possessed by the Confederates in the Kingdom of Valencia; the first of which stood a Siege, and bravely repulsed the Enemy from before it. The Dukes of Orleans and Berwick then took Mequinenza; and followed the Earl of Galloway into Catalonia. He being encamped under the Cannon of Lerida, they proposed to attack him; but finding the Attempt too dangerous, they desisted. The Earl of Galloway having provided Lerida to stand a Siege, retired to Barcelona; and the Duke of Orleans soon after besieged it. The Place made a noble Resistance for two Months; after which Time, there being no Prospect of Relief, the Prince of Darmstadt, the Governor, surrendered; and was complimented by the Duke of Orleans for his brave Defence. After this Siege was over, the Armies retired into Winter-Quarters.

Brigadier Stanhope's Negotiations at Barcelona.

Brigadier Stanhope, who was not only a Commander in the Army, but the Queen's Minister with King Charles, took the Opportunity of the tottering State of that Prince's Affairs after the Battle of Almanza, to engage him in a Treaty that might have proved very advantageous to our Countrey, had A.D. 1707. that Prince obtained the Crown of Spain, and been also grateful to those who set it on his Head. By a secret Article of this Treaty it was agreed, that if King Charles should become Master of Spain, a Company of Commerce to the Indies should be formed, consisting of Subjects of Great-Britain and Spain. But that if unforeseen Accidents should hinder the erecting such a Company, the King of Spain should grant Licence to ten Ships of five hundred Tons each, or any Number whose Burden should not exceed five Thousand Tons; who should trade in those Countries for all Merchandizes which the Spanish Subjects were permitted to traffick for; on Condition of paying the ordinary Duties, and no other. This Article was thought so advantageous to our Countrey, that King Charles himself was a long Time before he could be persuaded to ratify it. But the Accidents that fell out afterwards freed him from his Uneasiness upon that Score.

The Campaign on the Side of Portugal was insignificant; but what little Advantage was gained, was with the French and Spaniards. They entered Portugal, and took Serpa and Moura. After this they threatened Olivenza; but the Portuguese beginning to move, put a Stop to that Enterprize. In the Autumn Campaign Ciudad Rodrigo was retaken by the Spaniards; and soon after the two Armies retired into Winter-Quarters.

There was a very bad Prospect on the Side of Germany. The Diet at Ratisbon was remiss and unactive as usual; and the French early and diligent. So that they passed the Rhine, and entered Suabia, and exacted great Contributions throughout the Duchy of Wurtemberg, the Circles of Suabia and Franconia, the Palatinate of the Rhine, and other Countries. The Mareschal de Villars who commanded the French, had a fair Opportunity to attempt some greater Enterprize; and it was indeed thought that he designed to restore the Elector of Bavaria to his Dominions. But the Expedition made into Provence by the Confederates, drew so great a Body of Forces from him, as disabled him from making any farther Attempt. And the Elector of Hanover (our late Sovereign) taking upon himself the Command of the Army, the Scale turned a little. A Stop was not only put to the French Progress; but a considerable Body of their Forces was also defeated.

Before the Campaign began in Flanders The Duke of this Year, the Duke of Marlborough was employed in Germany upon a Negotiation of great Importance. The Kingdom of Poland had been long torn in Pieces by the different Factions of King Augustus and King Stanislaus, the former supported by the Czar of Muscovy, and the latter by the King of Sweden. The Affairs of the former were brought very low by the continual and rapid Successes of the King of Sweden; who at length gave the deciding Blow by a sudden Invasion of Saxony, King Augustus's Hereditary Dominion. This brought King Augustus

The Campaign in Portugal.

And on the Rhine.

The Duke of Marlborough sent to the King of Sweden.

A.D. 1707. thus into that desperate State, that he was forced to submit to the King of Sweden in all his Demands, and to renounce solemnly all Right or Title to the Kingdom of Poland for ever. But the Stay the King of Sweden made upon this Occasion in Germany, gave great Umbrage to the Allies. He was at the Head of a noble and every where victorious Army; the strict Correspondence which France, by its peculiar Maxims of State, ever cultivated with that Northern Crown, was well known and remembered; and there could be no Doubt but the French Arts would be busy to raise up some Pretext to cause a Disturbance in Germany by his Means. The British and Dutch Ministers had endeavoured to prevail upon him to desist from the Invasion of Saxony, but in vain. The Answer he gave them was very dry, and unsatisfactory; and he at the same Time received the French and Bavarian Ministers to his Audience. These Things gave very great Alarms to Great-Britain and Holland; and their Ministers desired him to explain his real Intentions. But they could not get any express Answer from him, and all the Satisfaction they could obtain from him was that he would open himself to the Duke of Marlborough. Whether this was done out of State, that he might have the Honour of being attended by so illustrious a Messenger, or out of Curiosity to see a General so renowned for Martial Glory, is uncertain.

The dangerous State which Germany was in during the King of Sweden's Stay there, was so manifest, that the Queen was obliged to comply with his Demands, and send the Duke of Marlborough to him. The Duke crossed the Seas into Holland, and from thence went to Alt-Ranstadt in Saxony, where the Quarters of the King of Sweden were. He went immediately to Count Piper, the Favourite and chief Minister of that Prince; and, as it is reported, smoothed the Way to his Negotiation by a Present of a hundred Thousand Guineas to the Count. He was soon after introduced to the King of Sweden's Audience. The Speech made by the Duke was of a Soldierly Brevity, tinged with a courtly Flattery. The King of Sweden returned a very obliging Answer; and gave the Duke of Marlborough such Assurances that he would not undertake any Thing to the Prejudice of the Common Cause, that the Duke stayed there but a few Days, and then returned to the Netherlands to take the Command of the Army. And the King of Sweden was as good as his Word; not giving any Disturbance to the Allies during his Stay in Germany, which was till the Beginning of September.

The Campaign in Flanders was incon- siderable. The Loss the French had sustained the last Year by venturing too far, made them cautious now. The Duke once made a Motion with intent to fight them; but he was informed that the Enemy, having drained their Garrisons, were too much Superior in number. He would have undertaken a Siege; but it was feared that the French would take the Opportunity to fall upon the A.D. 1707. open Towns and Cities of Brabant that had surrendered the last Year. So that the Armies remained two Months in their Camps without any Motion. Towards the End of the Summer, the Detachments the French made for Provence having weakened their Army, the Duke of Marlborough marched with a Design to attack them; which obliged them to leave their Camp, and retire under the Cannon of Lisle; in which Retreat they lost Abundance of Men. But the Duke of Marlborough who pursued them, was so much retarded by the great Rains that fell at that Time, that before he could come up with them, they were out of Danger of being attacked by him. The Duke, finding his Endeavours to fight eluded by the cautious Measures of the Duke de Vendosme, who commanded the French, left the Army and went to Germany, to prevail, if it were possible, upon the Empire to be more diligent and punctual for the future than they had hitherto been. And in about a Fortnight after his Departure, the Army went into Winter-Quarters.

The great Victory gained before Turin by An Attempt on Toulon. the Confederates, gave so great a Turn to their Affairs on the Side of Italy, that they were this Year in a Condition to be the Assailants. A Project was formed for making an Inroad into France on that Side, and either to take or destroy Toulon and Marseilles; the two only considerable Ports of France upon the Mediterranean Sea; which would have ruined the Maritime Power of France on that Sea, and secured the Trade of England and Holland. But the Court of Vienna, for their private Advantage, moved to divide the Army, and carry one Part to secure the Kingdom of Naples. This was warmly opposed by Great-Britain and Holland; but the Germans were obstinate and carried their Point; representing that the Forces were sufficient for both Enterprizes. Those Troops that were sent to Naples, being favoured by the general Concurrence of the People, made themselves Masters of that Kingdom with very little Trouble. But the Enterprize against Toulon had not so good Success. The Duke of Savoy and Prince Eugene, who commanded on that Side, amused the French with a long Scheme of Marches and Counter-marches, as if they designed to invade Dauphiné; but when they had fixed them in that Expectation, on a sudden they turned to the Sea-Coast; where meeting the Confederate Fleet, which was appointed to attend them there, they forced the French Intrenchments on the River Var, and crossed it. From thence they marched towards Toulon, with all the Speed that was practicable in their Circumstances. But through the Want of Magazines, the great Heats of that Countrey, and other Disadvantages, it came to pass that no less than fifteen Days were spent in this March. And during that Time, the French had with their usual and admirable Diligence found means to repair the Fortifications of Toulon, and to A.D. 1707. cover it with a considerable Body of Troops, defended by strong Intrenchments. But their Activity would not have saved the Town, had not the German Counsels, as usual, concurred with the French Endeavours. For when it was debated in a Council of War, whether the Confederates should attack the French, it was unanimously agreed by all the Commanders except Prince Eugene, that the Forces they had with them were not sufficient to attack the French in their Intrenchments. And thus the dividing the Confederate Forces frustrated this Enterprize. One of the Enemy's advanced Posts, called the Hill of St. Catharine, was attacked and carried. But it was retaken not long after. In the mean Time the French were daily receiving Reinforcements of Horse and Foot, which made the Allies despair of taking the Town, and to content themselves with bombarding it, which they did for a Day and a Night with very good Success; destroying a great Number of Houses, blowing up several Magazines, and firing or disabling eight Men of War. This being done, and the Sick and Wounded put aboard the Ships, the Duke of Savoy decamped, and returned into Piedmont; the French not offering to disturb him in his Retreat. He concluded the Campaign with recovering Susa; an important Post, which shut up the Entry of the French into Piedmont, and opened a Passage for the Duke into Dauphiné or Savoy.

The Enterprize frustrated.

Sir Cloudesley Shovel lost.

The Fleet in the Mediterranean under Sir Cloudesley Shovel, met with a fatal Disaster in their Return home. For when they were come near the Mouth of the Channel, by a Mistake in their Course, they steered directly upon a dangerous Ledge of Rocks, to the Westward of the Isles of Scilly, called the Bishop and his Clerks. The Association, in which the Admiral himself was, struck and foundered immediately; not one being saved that was aboard her. The Eagle and the Rumney had the same dismal Fate. The Firebrand also foundered on the Rocks; but the Captain, and twenty four of the Men saved themselves in the Boat. The Phoenix was driven on the Rocks; but the Captain escaped and his Crew. The Royal-Anne and the St. George commanded by Sir George Byng and the Lord Durley, were in the utmost Danger, but happily escaped. Sir Cloudesley Shovel's Body was found floating the next Day by some of the Countrey-People, who stripped it and buried it in the Sand. But it was afterwards discovered, and interred in Westminster-Abbey. He was one of the greatest Sea-Commanders our Island ever produced; having the two Qualifications of an Admiral in great Perfection, a consummate Skill and Understanding in Maritime Affairs, joined with a fearless Courage; so that in Times of the greatest Danger he was always himself, vigilant, circumspect and attentive. And with this, he was a generous, honest, good Man; a Lover of the Religion and Liberties of his Countrey. He was the Workman of his own Fortune, having raised himself to that high Station from the lowest A.D. 1707. in the British Navy.

In the latter End of this Year, the Parliament met as usual; which by the Addition of the Scotch Members, received the Title of the first Parliament of Great-Britain. The Commons chose John Smith, Esq; their Speaker, who being presented to the Queen, was approved. The two Houses then adjourned by the Lord Chancellor's Direction for a Week. At the End of that Week, the Queen came to the House of Peers, and made a Speech, in which she gave an Account of the State of Affairs abroad; adding the customary Motions for Supplies, and Exhortations to Affection and Unanimity. The Commons presented their Address of Thanks soon after; with their full Approbation of her Majesty's Speech and Measures. But the House of Peers was not so obsequious, there being a great Number there very much dissatisfied with the present State of Things, for the usual Reasons that make great Men so. The General and Prime Minister being now raised as high as Royal Favour and Popularity could carry them, became regardless or forgetful to reward some of their old Friends; and confined the Current of Honours and Profits too much within the Channel of their own Families and Dependences. These private Resentments in many of the Peers awakened, as is customary, a great and sudden Concern for the Redress of publick Evils. So that when it was moved to return the Thanks of the House for the Queen's Speech, several Lords opposed it; and moved that the State of the Nation might first be considered. And those who had been long discontented joining with those who lately became so, made a Majority that carried it against Addressing before the State of the Nation was considered. The House resolving it self on the Day appointed into a Committee of the whole House, a Petition was presented to the House by near two hundred Merchants of the City, complaining of their great Losses at Sea for want of Convoys and Cruizers. This raised a very high and warm Debate, which ended in appointing another Day for examining the Allegations of the Merchants in their Petition. The Ministry was treated upon this Occasion with so much Freedom, that it was thought necessary to silence these Clamours in an effectual Manner. And because the Earl of Wharton was one of the Leaders of the lately discontented, the Duke of Marlborough took him aside after the Debate was over, and expostulated with him. And the Conference is supposed to end in promising the Earl the Government of Ireland; which was given him some Time after, and perfectly satisfied him as to the Methods by which Affairs were conducted. And because the Earl of Peterborough repented the Sights that had been put upon him after his eminent Services, Endeavours were used to allay his Resentment.

In the mean Time the House of Commons went on cheerfully with granting the Supplies

The first Parliament of Great-Britain. Their Proceedings.

A.D. 1707. Supplies for the Year. Petitions and Complaints from the Merchants were also read in this House; and some Members who were Traders spoke very sharply against the Mismanagements of the Admiralty. Soon after the House ordered a Bill to be brought in for repealing the Act of Security passed in Scotland; and another for establishing one Privy-Council for both Kingdoms; and for settling the Militia, the Power of Justices of the Peace, and the Form of issuing Writs for electing Members of Parliament, in the same Manner in Scotland as in England.

Some Whispers having passed about that the Intrigues of certain discontented Persons retarded the Commons in advancing the Supplies, the Queen at passing the Act for the Land-Tax, made a Speech, in which she hinted, that her Favour and Encouragement would fall upon those only who would cheerfully concur in supporting the War. This Speech was much resented; and brought on the next Day an important Debate in the House of Lords about the Affairs of Spain, and the Conduct of the Earl of Peterborough there. The Earl of Rochester moved, that the Earl might receive the Thanks of the House for his Services in Spain. The Lord Hallifax, who was on the other Side, agreed in praising the Earl of Peterborough's Actions; but moved that those Thanks might be deferred till his Conduct had passed a formal Examination by the House. This Discourse brought on the Consideration of Methods to retrieve the Affairs of Spain; upon which the Earl of Rochester moved, that we might stand upon the Defensive in Flanders, and send fifteen or twenty Thousand Men from thence into Catalonia, alledging a Saying of the old Duke of Schomberg, that attacking France by the Way of the Netherlands, was like taking a Bull by the Horns. This was seconded by the Earl of Nottingham. The Duke of Marlborough who was present, found himself closely touched by this Proposal, upon which he stood up and endeavoured to shew the Danger of such Conduct, which would, he said, expose all the great Towns of Brabant; and by Consequence all the Advantages hitherto gained in the Netherlands; and by renewing the Danger Holland had been delivered from, give Strength to the Clamours of the discontented there, who were impatient for a Peace. In speaking this, his natural Calmness of Temper forsook him, and he delivered himself with so much Warmth as gave a Handle for Reflection. Upon this he endeavoured to justify himself by saying, that the Thing was of too great Importance to be spoken of without Concernment. He then added, that Measures had been concerted for sending powerful Succours to King Charles from the Emperor, and to persuade Prince Eugene to command in Spain; and that though the usual Slowness of the Germans gave Cause of Suspicion, yet that he could answer they would be more punctual for the future. This ended the Debate, and the House agreed to address the Queen to return their Thanks for the vigorous Resolutions she had expressed in her late Speech for carrying on the War. And soon after the two Houses agreed in an Address to the Queen, to represent to her that no Peace could be safe or honourable, if Spain and the West-Indies continued in the Possession of the House of Bourbon; and to return their Thanks for the Instances she had used with the Emperor for restoring the Affairs of Spain. The Queen answered them, that she perfectly agreed with them, that the entire Monarchy of Spain ought to be restored to the House of Austria, and that she would continue her Instances with the Emperor. But if any such were made, it soon after appeared that they were ineffectual. Not long after this the two Houses adjourned themselves, as is usual, about the Christmas-Holidays.

During this Interval a Discovery was made, of a dangerous Correspondence held with France by a Clerk in the Office of Mr. Secretary Harley, one William Gregg. This unhappy Man having in his Way of Living outgone his Income, was drawn in by his Necessities or Extravagances to enter into a Correspondence with France to supply them. He had not long gone on in this Way before he was discovered; and committed to Newgate for High-Treason. And when he came to be indicted he pleaded Guilty; either in hopes of Mercy, or knowing that the Evidence against him was too plain to be denied. He received Sentence of Death as in Cases of High-Treason, but it was not executed till three Months after.

About this Time there appeared in London, a strange kind of Enthusiasts. Towards the End of the last Year, there came over from the Cevennes in France, three Men who associated themselves with the French Protestants in Soho. These Men (whether really or pretendedly mad is uncertain) used to fall into strange Fits and Agitations, and to utter Prophecies of different kinds, in which they endeavoured to imitate the Expression of the Sacred Writings. This causing a great deal of Disturbance among those they lived with, and some weak People being so foolish as to attend to them, the Ministers and Elders of the French Chapel in the Savoy thought themselves obliged to animadvert upon them. Two of them named John Cavalier, and Durand Fage, refused to appear; but a third, called Elias Marion, came, and boldly justified their Inspiration. Upon this the French Church made an Act, in which they were declared Impostors and Counterfeits. But this did not suppress their Madness; but in some Time they began to spread themselves into other Parts of the City; great Multitudes, as may be easily imagined, attending them every where. The Predictions uttered by them were very wild and extravagant Stuff; threatening dreadful Judgments from Heaven upon the City of London; which were delivered with that Positiveness, and in such frantick Terms, as alarmed the Weak, and drew the Pity and Concern of the wiser Sort. These

A.D. 1707.
Gregg's Treason discovered.

The French Prophets in London.

A.D. 1707. These People going on in their mad Career, and their Numbers increasing) as there is no Whimfie so wild that will not find Followers) the French Church caused three of them to be prosecuted, viz. Elias Marion above-mentioned, John d'Audé and Nicolas Facio; the last of which being one of the greatest Mathematicians of the Age, it was very surprizing to find him in such crack-brained Company. And they were accordingly sentenced to be publicly exposed twice on a Scaffold, with a Paper over their Heads denoting their Offence. This ridiculous Piece of Enthusiasm might have continued longer than it did; but it happened that the Madness of these People carried them so far, as to prophesie (and to fix the Day for it besides) that one Dr. Emes, who was one of their Followers and died not long after he became so, should rise again. This being printed with their other wild Predictions, caused great Multitudes to come to the Place on the Day prefixed; and those mad People who gave out the Prophecy, were so besotted as to attend there themselves in hopes of seeing the Completion of it. But their Expectations being disappointed (as will be easily believed) their Pretences became so ridiculous, that in a short Time no more was heard of them.

Three of them punished.

They pretend to raise a dead Man.

Other Proceedings of Parliament.

The two Houses at their next Meeting went upon the Affairs of Spain, the Misfortunes in that Country hanging very heavy upon the Minds of all true Patriots. This Enquiry was forwarded by those who were disobliged at Court; there being great Suspicions that the Affairs of that Kingdom had been neglected to increase the Glory, or gratify the Jealousie of the Commander in the Netherlands. The Lords first entered upon examining the Conduct of the Earl of Peterborough, which received the Honour of their full Approbation: But the Interest of his Rival was so powerful, that the Thanks of the House could not be procured him, how much soever deserved. The Commons addressed the Queen for the Accounts relating to the Affairs of Spain; which being considered, the House resolved, that of above twenty nine thousand Men provided by Parliament for the Service of Spain and Portugal, there were only eight thousand six hundred and sixty Men in Spain and Portugal at the Time of the Battle of Almanza. And it was agreed to address the Queen, to know how this came to pass. The Lords afterwards examined the Complaints of the Merchants, and the Conduct of Sir Thomas Hardy and Captain Kerr were narrowly sifted by them. The former was honourably cleared, but the other was found guilty of such ill Practices, that the House addressed the Queen to employ him no more: with which her Majesty promised to comply.

The Answer given by the Queen to the Address of the Commons just mentioned, was so tedious, intricate and obscure, that instead of removing the Suspicions entertained upon that Head, it increased them. But Means were found to make the House satisfied with it. The Lords also presented an A.D. 1707. Address to the Queen about Mismanagements in the Navy; which, occasioning Reflections on her Royal Consort Prince George of Denmark, was not very acceptable.

But the Attention of the Parliament was taken off from these Affairs by a sudden Alarm of an Invasion from France. The Discontents in Scotland, occasioned by the Union, were very much increased by ill Conduct since that Time. It was ordered by the Articles of Union, that Scotland should be liable to several new Customs and Excises, for which the Equivalent Money was allowed to that Kingdom. But instead of making the Collection of these Taxes easie by plausible Circumstances, they were attended by all that could make them grievous or uneasie. Two Commissions were appointed for managing the Excise and Customs there, which consisted partly of English and partly of Scots. At the same Time vast Numbers of Surveyors, Collectors, and other Officers were sent down from England, who executed the new Laws with the Rigor natural to hungry and ravenous Men, who have usually no other Way of Thinking, but of making their own Gains as great as possible. This Treatment appeared so like that of a conquered People, that the Scots universally resented it. And the Friends to the Pretender cultivated their Discontents with so much Care, that they inclined many to desire his Restoration, to avoid a Yoke which by being new and unexpected was the more grievous. This Temper of the People of Scotland was communicated by the Pretender's Friends to his Ministers in France. And the French Court having concerted Measures with the disaffected Scots, agreed to send thither a great Body of Troops accompanied by a Fleet, with the Pretender himself on Board.

Many Things concurred to engage the French King in this Enterprize. The Attempt made upon Toulon had struck a Terror and Consternation through his Dominions; and he thought his Honour concerned to revenge it. The Disaffection reigning among the Scots, gave him Hopes of fixing the Pretender, for some Time at least, in Scotland, and making a Diversion of the Strength and Attention of England from the War abroad. And the State of Scotland was such, as furthered very much this Undertaking. The Garrisons were in a defenceless Condition, and in Want of every Thing needful to stand a Siege; besides which, there were not above two thousand five hundred Regular Troops in the Kingdom, and those disaffected enough. The Money for the Equivalent was at that Time in the Castle of Edinburgh; and it happened that a Fleet of Dutch Ships had just then run a-ground on the Coast of Angus, with a good Quantity of Ammunition on Board, besides Cannon and small Arms, and a great Sum of Money; all which the Jacobites of that Countrey would have secured.

The Preparations for the Invasion of Scotland were carried on with that Secrecy, that the

An Invasion threatened from France.

A.D. 1707. the Design was rather guessed at than known, till the Time the Pretender set out from St. Germain's. The French King at parting presented him with a rich Sword set with Diamonds; and at his Arrival at Dunkirk he was furnished with a Set of Gold and Silver Plate, Cloaths for his future Life-Guards, Liveries for his Household, and the like Royal Provisions.

The News of this crossing the Seas into England, the Secretary of State acquainted the Commons therewith; upon which the two Houses joined in an Address of Lives and Fortunes to the Queen; and the Commons ordered a Bill to be brought in for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, and to enable the Queen to secure and detain suspected Persons.

In Flanders ten Battalions of Foot were ordered to be ready at an Hour's Warning to be embarked for England. And the Admiralty here made such Expedition, upon the first Notice of the Preparations making at Dunkirk, that before the Pretender came there, three and twenty British, and three Dutch Men of War, sailed over to the Flemish Coast, under the Command of Sir George Byng. They understood there by a Fisherman whom they took, that ten Thousand Men were at Dunkirk ready to embark for Scotland; and that the Pretender was on his Way thither.

This Appearance of the British Fleet damped the Hopes of the French. For it was supposed there, that the Lisbon Fleet being sailed out with its Convoy, Great Britain would have been left bare of Shipping. The Count de Fourbin, who was to command the French Fleet, sent Word, that though he might get out of Dunkirk Harbour, and perhaps land the Troops, he could not answer for the Safety of his Fleet afterwards. But the King of France returned him a positive Order, that he should embark the Troops, and sail with the first fair Wind. While this was doing, the British Fleet was driven from its Station by high Winds, and went back into the Downs; and the French took the Opportunity to sail out of Dunkirk Harbour. They were at first driven back by the Wind's changing; but it came about two Days after, and they set Sail for Scotland. Mean time Sir George Byng's Fleet was reinforced, by the prodigious Diligence that had been used, to the Number of forty Men of War, besides smaller Vessels; and came out again, and sailed over to the Coast between Dunkirk and Calais. The Admiral was there met by an Ostend Ship, sent out to give him Notice, that the French had the Day before sailed from the Pits of Newport, where the contrary Wind had driven them. Upon this he sailed immediately in Pursuit of them.

As soon as the Queen was informed of this, she went to acquaint her Parliament with it; upon which Occasion both Houses attended her with very loyal Addresses, and were suitably answered. In the mean Time Troops were in Motion in every Part of England towards Scotland; those which were A.D. 1707. quartered in the South of Ireland were ordered to march towards the North, that they might have but a short Passage; and the Troops detached from Flanders were brought over by Admiral Baker, whom Sir George Byng had left for that Purpose, and were landed at Tinmouth. The Fear with which over-cautious and timorous People were affected upon this Occasion, caused a great Run upon the Bank, and put those who had the Direction of it into no small Perplexity. But the Government, and those who were well disposed to it, giving their Assistance, this Cloud passed over without any farther Mischief than a little Threatening.

Mean while the French Fleet, being favoured by a strong Gale, pursued their Course through the German Ocean; till in four Days Time they came before the Firth of Edinburgh, and cast Anchor at the Mouth of it on the Evening of the fourth Day. They had resolved to sail up the Firth towards Edinburgh; but the next Morning they were alarmed with the Sight of Sir George Byng's Squadron. This put them in no small Perplexity. Their Fleet was not in a Condition to encounter Sir George Byng, and much less dared they venture up the Streight, where their Retreat would be infallibly cut off. It was resolved by them to make off as soon as possible; and a Land Breeze luckily chanced to rise at the same Time, which favoured that Resolution. The British Fleet stood after them, but in vain, the others being too far before them. Only the Salisbury, an English Ship, but taken by the French, was cut off from the rest, and retaken. The French steered North, it being proposed by some among them to land at Inverness; and a small Vessel was sent out to get Pilots to conduct the Fleet into that Port. But the Wind fell so contrary, and became so boisterous, that it was impossible to pursue that Course without dispersing their Ships; which would have endangered their falling in with Sir George Byng's Squadron. So that at last it was resolved to lay aside that Attempt, and to return home. The British Fleet, which had pursued the French while there was any Hopes of coming up with them, came into Leith Road, and stayed there to prevent a second Attempt of the Enemy in those Parts. So that having the Seas open, the French Squadron got back in Safety to Dunkirk.

On Board the Salisbury were taken, the Lord Griffin, an English Peer, who went over to St. Germain's in King William's Time; two Sons of the Earl of Middleton, one of the Pretender's Chief Ministers, and several Irish Officers. The three first were committed to the Tower, and the others to Newgate. The Lord Griffin, upon a former Outlawry, received Sentence of Death. But his great Age pleaded for him in the Breast of the merciful Queen; so that the Execution was reprieved from Time to Sir George Byng comes up with the French, who return home.

The French Fleet set sail with the Pretender on Board.

A.D. 1707. Time, till his Life was put an End to by a natural Cause.

Gregg executed.

While these Things passed, the Lords were busily employed in examining William Gregg abovementioned. He denied that his Master Mr. Harley, was directly or indirectly privy to his Treason, or that he had any other Accomplices. No Threats or Promises were wanting to oblige him to discover whatever he might know. But he continued fixed in that Denial; and when he was afterwards executed, confirmed the same in his Dying Speech by the most solemn Protestations. In that Speech 'tis observable, that he blesses God for touching his Conscience so powerfully as to prevent his prostituting the same to save his Life. But whether the Temptations he speaks of here arose from the Suggestions of his own Mind, or others, cannot be clearly deduced from his Words. But though Mr. Harley preserved his Reputation, his Enemies at Court were too powerful to suffer him to keep his Place. However the Queen still retained a secret good Opinion of him, which he made such Use of, as to bring about in some Time a very great and extraordinary Revolution, as will be hereafter related.

The Parliament dissolved.

The Alarm of the French Invasion being over, and the Business of the Parliament completed, the Queen came to the House of Peers; and after a Speech of Thanks ordered the Parliament to be prorogued. And soon after the same was dissolved by Proclamation.

Abundance of Persons of Rank were at this Time brought from Scotland to be examined, having been secured when the Invasion was apprehended. Some of them were kept in Prison a long Time; but the greater Part were soon discharged.

A.D. 1708.

The next Year had by this Time made some Advance, and the Duke of Marlborough passed over into Holland to attend the Campaign. Prince Eugene met him at the Hague; where having consulted on the Business of the ensuing Summer, they went away; one to the Court of Hanover, the other to that of Vienna upon the same Affair. The Duke of Marlborough on his Return went to the Army, and took the Field.

The Campaign in Flanders.

The French had maintained an Intelligence in several of the great Towns of Flanders, which surrendered to the Allies after the Battle of Ramellies. When their Army was ready, the first Action of the Campaign was their surprizing first of Ghent, and then of Bruges, by Means of their Correspondence in those two great Towns. The Duke of Marlborough had Information of the French Designs upon those Places, and not only sent a Detachment to secure them, (which came too late) but marched that Way with his whole Army. He met the French Army in his March thither, who were in Motion to secure those Conquests; and resolving to attack them, put his Army in Order. But the French had no Mind to the Encounter, and by Favour of the Night got away. The Loss of these great Towns, and this Disappointment, cast a Damp upon the Minds of the Allies. The Duke of Marlborough fell ill of a Fever, which was by some imputed to this Inconstancy of Fortune, which had been hitherto so inviolably faithful to him. But these Clouds passed over quickly upon the Arrival of a Reinforcement of thirty thousand Men from the Moselle, under the Command of Prince Eugene. Besides this, the French Army was stopped unexpectedly by a short Resistance made at the Citadel of Ghent; by which they lost three or four Days, which gave the Duke and Prince Eugene an Opportunity to come up with them near Oudenarde.

At the Appearance of the Confederate Army, a Division arose among the French Commanders. The Duke of Burgundy, the French King's Grandson, commanded the Army under the Direction and Counsel of the Duke de Vendosme. These two Generals happened to be at Variance before the Allies came in View; and the new Measures necessary to be taken upon that Occasion increased the Misunderstanding. So that they suffered the Confederates to send a Detachment cross the River Schelde, and to lay Bridges over it, while they passed the Time in their Tents in unseasonable Disputes and Contradictions. At last, the Duke of Burgundy, by the Concurrence of several young Officers, who thought to make their Court to him by thwarting the Duke de Vendosme, carried the Question for an Engagement.

The Situation of the two Armies was as follows. The River Schelde ran between them; Oudenarde, which was possessed by the Allies, terminating the Left of their Army. Below Oudenarde, and to the Right of the same, the Confederates, by the Neglect of the French, had laid several Bridges over the River. Between three and four in the Afternoon, the Allies began to pass at the lower Bridges; and General Cadogan, with twelve Battalions, attacked seven French Battalions posted in a Village, of whom very few escaped. Immediately after Major-General Rantzau, with eight Squadrons, attacked a Body of French Horse, whom they defeated. The Electoral Prince of Hanover (now our gracious Sovereign King George II.) was at the Head of one of the Squadrons of Dragoons, that routed this French Cavalry, and charged the Enemy Sword in Hand, with equal Glory and Danger; his Horse being shot under him in the Encounter, and Colonel Lusky, who commanded the Squadron, killed at his Side. Another Attack was made upon the Enemy by the Prussian Horse, who also gained the Advantage. Thus the Fight began with prosperous Omens; but it happened through the Length of the Way the Confederate Foot had to march, that the Engagement was not general till seven o' Clock. Then the Enemy being attacked on the Right and Left, the firing grew universal from Wing to Wing of both the Armies. The French defended themselves like valiant Men; but after a stout Resistance, were forced to yield to the super-

A.D. 1708. superior Strength and Fortune of the Allies.

The French
retire.

The Victory of Oudenarde would probably have been as great and important as that of Bleinheim or Ramellies, had not the Night interposed to save the French Army. For they were almost surrounded by the Confederates, who fired upon them on all Sides; but the Darkness came on so fast, that no Distinction could be securely made of Friends or Foes. So that the Confederate Generals were obliged to give Orders to their Troops to forbear shooting; and the French made off without farther Disturbance. Next Morning as soon as it was light, a Detachment of Horse was sent out to pursue the Enemy, but without Success. The French endeavoured to lessen this Defeat into a drawn Battle, because it was not so complete as the others had been. But the Number of Prisoners, which were above six Thousand, one hundred Colours and Standards taken, the keeping the Field, and Pursuit the next Day, entirely confuted that Pretence.

The Siege of
Lisle begun.

The French after this Defeat retired towards Ghent, and intrenched themselves behind the Canal that runs between that City and Bruges. The Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene having caused the Lines cast up by the Enemy in French Flanders, and now forsaken by them, to be levelled; agreed to begin next the Siege of Lisle. This Enterprize was attended with great Difficulties. The Surprise of Ghent which lies upon the Schelde, had cut off the Confederates from their great Magazines at Antwerp, and Sas van Ghent. The Place itself was fortified with all the Defence that Art or Cost could give it; and kept by a numerous Garrison, experienced and well commanded. It is said, that the Duke de Vendosme thought the Siege so hazardous, that when he was informed of it he said, that he could not believe so wise a Captain as Prince Eugene could venture upon so rash an Enterprize. But the Difficulties of it were not too great to be overcome by Resolution, Prudence and Circumspection.

The Siege went on with good Success. The French drained the neighbouring Garrisons to relieve it; and made several Advances as if they designed to attack the Duke of Marlborough, who covered the Siege. But such wise Precautions were taken as repulsed the French without fighting. These Attempts proving vain, the French took another Counsel; and posted themselves along the Schelde, to cut off the Communication of the Confederate Army with Brussels. This seemed a fatal Blow; for the Allies were now in an hostile Country, where no Recruits of Ammunition, to supply the vast Expence thereof in the Siege, could be had. Every one was in Despair except the Duke of Marlborough, who found an Expedient. There was a Body of British Forces, that had been employed just before in alarming the Coast of France. The Duke sent Orders to General Erle their Commander, to come immediately to Ostend, and post himself at Oudenburgh and Leffinghem near that Place. By this Means a great Convoy was sent by the Way of Ostend, consisting of all Manner of Necessaries; and six Thousand of the Confederate Troops, under Major-General Webb, were sent to guard it. The French were struck with Amaze at this unlooked for Disappointment; for they thought they had shut up all the Avenues to any Relief. But that no Endeavours might be wanting on their Part, the Count de la Motte who commanded in Ghent, came out with near twenty four Thousand Men to intercept this Convoy; and met with it near a Place called Wynendale. But Major-General Webb, who commanded the Guard, disposed his Men with such admirable Skill, that notwithstanding the vast Superiority of Numbers, by the pure Force of Order and Disposition, the French were driven back in two or three successive Attacks; and this with so great a Slaughter and Terror among the common Soldiers, that after having lost six or seven Thousand Men in the Encounter, they could be brought to charge no more. So that the Convoy attended by its brave Defenders, arrived safely in the Camp before Lisle. General Webb got immortal Glory by this important Victory; which may justly be reckoned among the greatest Acts performed in this War. But he was not so well rewarded for it as he deserved. The Duke of Marlborough's Secretary in a Letter written into England, gave all the Honour of it to General Cadogan, the Duke's Favourite, who did not come up till after the Engagement; and this was so resented by General Webb, that he left the Army in Disgust, and came over to England to do himself Justice.

The Battle of
Wynendale.

The French made one Effort more that had like to have proved more effectual than the others. The Duke de Vendosme came in Person between Bruges and Newport, and ordered the Dykes between those two Towns to be cut in several Places. This poured out such an Inundation upon the neighbouring Country, as covered all the Face of the Land, and shut up Ostend within it. But Major-General Cadogan found means to convey a large Quantity of Stores through the Water, which lasted till the Town of Lisle was surrendered.

The Town of Lisle surrendered.

But a great Labour remained behind; for the Citadel was yet to be reduced, which was one of the completest Pieces of Fortification in Europe. The French had by this Inundation, and the Intrenchments they had made along the Schelde to secure the Country behind it, cut off all Hopes of any farther Supplies of Ammunition; and the Confederates were in the midst of an hostile Country, where no Provisions could be had, but such as were to be taken by Force. But the invincible Constancy of the Confederate Generals bore or surmounted all these Difficulties. And because the Citadel could not be attacked by Way of Approach and Battery for Want of Ammunition, it was resolved

A.D. 1708. solved to carry on the Siege by way of Saps. And the Duke of Marlborough who covered it, found means to bring so much Provision from the Enemy's Territories, as served with frugal Management, to subsist the two Armies.

The French
attack Brussels but are repulsed.

The French enraged at so many unlooked for Disappointments, made furious Incursions into the open Countrey of Dutch Brabant; where they committed great Ravages. And the Elector of Bavaria at the same Time marched towards Brussels with fifteen Thousand Men, with Design to attack it. The Dutch were in great Alarms; since not only Brussels, but Antwerp their near Neighbour, was in very great Danger, being shut up from all Relief but by Sea; and Men were ready to give the Title of Obstinacy to the unmovable Perseverance of the two Generals. But their sedate Courage and Foresight was not yet disconcerted. The Duke of Marlborough ordered Forces to be transported from Ostend to Antwerp; whither the States-General sent all the Troops they could spare from the neighbouring Garrisons. The Duke also sent Word to Monf. Pascal, the Governor of Brussels, that he would certainly come to his Relief. In the mean Time the Elector of Bavaria came before Brussels; a City large but unfortified; and by Consequence, weakened by its great Extent. Having received a resolute Answer to his Summons, he attacked the Town under the Cover of the dark Night; and was courageously resisted. The Assault continued all Night, and did not cease till Ten the next Morning, when the Enemy retired in great Disorder; having suffered much by the valiant Defence of the Besieged. The Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene at the same Time left the Camp before the Citadel of Lisle with so much Secrecy, that they came unexpectedly upon the Enemy, and obliged them to abandon their Intrenchments upon the Scheld and the Siege of Brussels. They then returned to the Camp at Lisle with such Expedition, that the Enemy could take no Advantage of their Absence.

The Citadel
of Lisle surrenders.

The Garrison of the Citadel being informed that the Way was open to furnish the Besiegers with Necessaries, and finding themselves out of all Hopes of being relieved, agreed soon after to surrender upon honourable Terms.

Thus ended one of the most famous Sieges recorded in History, whether we consider the Difficulties and Obstacles it met with, or the Prudence and good Fortune by which they were overcome. Though it was so late in the Winter before this Conquest was completed, the Duke of Marlborough entered upon the Siege of Ghent; which was surrendered to him in eleven Days. The Loss of this Place made the Enemy abandon Bruges, and other Posts thereabouts; which left that Countrey in its former State. Then the Army separated, and went into Winter Quarters.

On the Side of Savoy the Troops did not take the Field till it was late, nor were the Events there very important. What little Advantage was obtained there, belonged to the Allies: the Duke of Savoy having taken the Fortresses of Exilles, and some other Places, by which he made himself an Entrance into the Territories of the French, and shut them out from his own.

The Campaign in savoy.

In Spain and Portugal very little was done. The Superiority of the Enemy enabled them to take Tortosa in Catalonia, and Denia and the Town of Alicant in the Kingdom of Valencia; but the Castle of this latter Place being situate on a high Rock, and of the utmost Difficulty of Access, held out many Months after.

At Sea the Fleet performed very signal Service. Admiral Leake, after he had arrived at Barcelona, sailed from thence with a Body of Land-Forces on board, to make an Attempt upon the Island of Sardinia. It met with so good Success, that within a few Days after their Arrival before Cagliari, the Metropolis, the Viceroy surrendered, and the States of the Countrey acknowledged King Charles. After the Return of the Fleet to Barcelona, Major-General Stanhope formed a Design against the Island of Minorca, which was to be put into the Hands of the Queen of Great-Britain. It was wisely considered, that an Island situate as it were in the Middle of the Mediterranean, must be of singular Importance to the British Crown, which by possessing that small Spot, would become the Neighbour of all the Princes and States whose Dominions border on that great Sea. Its noble Harbour of Port-Mahon, was also like to prove a convenient Place of Refreshment for our Merchant-ships, and a Dock for Ships of War.

Sardinia and Minorca taken.

This Expedition was attended with all the Success that could be desired. The Fleet from Barcelona met with Sir John Leake, who was cruising about Port-Mahon, and the same Day the Land Forces began to be set ashore. The People of the open Countrey declared immediately for King Charles. There were only three Places in the Island capable of making any Resistance; but these being surprized with an Attack they did not expect, gave the Assailants but a short Trouble. So that in about a Fortnight, the whole Island was reduced to Obedience. An English Garrison was left in Port-Mahon, and Brigadier Petit, a skilful Engineer, was made Governor of the Island, that effectual Care might be taken for the Strengthening of the same. A Squadron of Ships was also ordered to winter there.

The Conquest of this Island dissipated a League that was forming, by the Influence of the French King, among the Princes and States of Italy against the Emperor. And the Confederate Fleet acting in concert with the Imperial Troops there, obliged the Pope to acknowledge King Charles III. for King of Spain.

An Accident happened soon after that gave the Court a good deal of Trouble.

The

A. D. 1708. The Muscovite Ambassador, Andrew de Matueof, had had his Audience of Leave, and was upon the Point of Departure. There were some Persons to whom he was indebted, who were apprehensive he would leave the Kingdom without paying them; though 'tis said that he had taken Care for their Satisfaction. They not knowing this, and being ignorant Men, unacquainted with the nice Privileges of Publick Ministers, caused him to be arrested in the open Street. The Ambassador not understanding at first the Reason of his being seized, thought he was assaulted by Ruffians, and endeavoured to defend himself; which caused the brutish Bailiffs to offer him personal Indignities; and not content with this, they carried him away to a Spunging-House; where he was detained, till the Earl of Feversham and a City Merchant came to bail him. The Ambassador wrote the next Day with great Resentment to the Secretary of State, Mr. Boyle, to demand Redress; and the other Publick Ministers, whose Honours and Privileges were concerned in this Affront put upon one of their Character, jointly required Satisfaction for this flagrant Violation of the Law of Nations. The Queen and the Ministers were strangely perplexed what to do; the Laws that fence about the Liberties of English-men not permitting so severe an Animadversion, as was necessary to give the Satisfaction that was due for such an Outrage. The Queen expressed her utmost Concern to the Foreign Ministers upon this unhappy Accident, and the Persons concerned were taken into Custody of Messengers, and prosecuted. But there being no Provision in our Laws for such Cases, little more could be done. The Czar of Muscovy wrote over to demand that Capital Punishments should be inflicted on those who had affronted his Ambassador; or some at least that was adequate to the Part the several Persons had in it. At length, after very near a Twelve-month's Dispute, it was agreed that Mr. Whitworth, the Queen's Minister with the Czar, should in a very formal Manner, beg of that Prince to excuse the Inability the Queen was under, by the Laws of her Kingdom, to give him the Satisfaction she wished; which was accepted by the Czar. An Act of Parliament was also passed to prevent any future Insults to Publick Ministers of the same kind.

The Death of Prince George of Denmark.

This Year the Queen met with a great Affliction in the Loss of her Royal Consort, Prince George of Denmark, with whom she had lived above five and twenty Years in all the Happiness that the most entire reciprocal Fidelity and Affection could administer. The Prince had been many Years Asthmatical, which was often attended with spitting of Blood; and about three Months before his Death, a dropical Humour (to which he had before been subject) seized him. This ill Disposition of Body increasing, he fell into a Suffocation, on the twenty eighth of October, in which all the Art of Physick could give him no Relief; so that he expired, to the Queen's inconsolable Affliction, and with A. D. 1708: the Sorrow of the Court and Nation. He was born at Copenhagen in April 1653. being only Brother to Christian V. King of Denmark, whom he rescued from imminent Danger in an Engagement between the Danes and the Swedes. He was eminently instrumental in the Revolution, as was said above; and during the Queen's Reign, by troubling himself but little with Affairs of State, he preserved the good Will of both the contending Parties. The Earl of Pembroke was made Lord High Admiral in his Room. And the Offices of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Lord President of the Council, being vacant by that Remove, the first was given to the Earl of Wharton, and the other to the Lord Somers, who had placed themselves among the Discontented at the Beginning of the last Session of Parliament.

In about three Weeks after the new Parliament assembled. The Queen was too much oppressed with Sorrow for her late Loss, to meet them as usual; so that Lords Commissioners were appointed of the Great Officers, to represent her. The Commons chose Their Pro-Sir Richard Onslow Speaker, who was presented to the Lords Commissioners and approved. The Speech made from the Throne was in the usual Style. The two Houses separately addressed the Queen upon the Death of Prince George; which Addresses were ordered to be presented in a private Manner.

The Convocation assembled at the same Time with the Parliament. But the Heats that had passed between the two Houses, and the little Affection born by a Majority of the Lower House to the then ruling Powers, brought on a Prorogation as soon as they were assembled; even before they had made Choice of a Prolocutor.

There passed not much of Importance this Session. A Debate arose in the House of Commons concerning the Right of the eldest Sons of Scotch Peers to sit there. It was said on one Side, that it would put a disadvantageous Mark of Distinction on the Peers of that Nation, if the same Liberty were not allowed to them as to those of England, whose Sons have Power to represent the Commons in Parliament. But it was alledged on the other Hand, that the Electors of Scotland, being vastly more subject to the Peers than those of England, would lose their Right of chusing in effect; since their Landlords would be sure to compel them to chuse their Sons. It was also observed, that the Parliament of Scotland before the Union always excluded the eldest Sons of the Peers. So that these latter carried it; and new Writs were ordered to be issued for the Election of Members in the Room of the Lord Haddo and the Lord Johnstown, returned for the Shires of Aberdeen and Linlithgow.

The Conduct of Major-General Webb at the Battle of Wynendale had been universally admired; and the Injury done him, by seeking

A.D. 1708. ing to rob him of the Reputation he there acquired, was much repented. Some Members of the House of Commons moved, that he might have the Thanks of the House for his eminent Services by that great Action; and he received the same in his Place (he being a Member of the House) from the Speaker; for which the General returned his Acknowledgments in a handsome and modest Speech.

The Parliament addresses the Queen about a second Marriage.

In the Form of Prayer used on the eighth of March, the Day of the Queen's Accession to the Crown, the Prayer for the Queen had, among others, a Petition that she might become a happy Mother of Children. In about two Months after the Prince's Death, an Order of Council was published by the Queen's Directions, for the leaving out that Petition. This made it be concluded, that the Queen designed to spend the Remainder of her Life in Widowhood; upon which it was resolved in the House of Commons to address her Majesty not to suffer her Grief so far to prevail, as to give over all Thoughts of a second Marriage. This Address was agreed to by the Lords; and carried to the Queen by the Lord Chancellor, and the Speaker of the House of Commons. The Queen was a little surprized at this Address, which she did not look for. She told them, that the frequent Marks of Duty and Affection she had received from her Parliament must needs be very acceptable; that the Provision she had made for the Protestant Succession shewed how much she had at Heart the Happiness of the Kingdom; but that the Subject of their Address was of such a Nature, that she was persuaded they did not expect a particular Answer. However the Commons, the next Day, voted their Thanks to the Queen for the same.

Two Millions of Money raised in four Hours.

The Commons being very much perplexed about finding Ways and Means to raise the Supplies, accepted a Proposal of the Bank of England to advance four hundred Thousand Pounds, and to circulate two Millions four hundred Thousand Pounds in Exchequer Bills, upon Condition of prolonging their Corporation for twenty Years after August 1711. and receiving Subscriptions for doubling their Stock. Books were accordingly set open for Subscriptions, which were to amount to the Sum of two Millions two hundred and one Thousand one hundred and seventy one Pounds ten Shillings. All this Money was subscribed in four Hours Time. And so numerous and pressing were the Crowds that came to this Subscription, that 'twas thought a Million more might have been taken in. If in King William's Time our Neighbours were surprized to hear that two Millions had been raised in three Days, what must their Wonder have been now, when they were told, that after immense Expences in a new War, our Nation was able to raise the same Sum in almost as few Hours? So incredible are the Effects of our invaluable Liberty, and its fair Offspring, Industry and Commerce!

There was little considerable done in either House after this. A Bill of general Naturalization of all Foreign Protestants passed both Houses, and was turned into an Act, A.D. 1708. which is since repealed. The two Houses also took into Consideration the Conduct of the Ministers on Occasion of the Pretender's Invasion. Some unaccountable Instances of Neglect and Mismanagement were laid to their Charge; but they were so powerful in both Houses, that their Conduct was approved by the Commons, and not censured by the Lords. At last, the Business of the Parliament being quite over, they were prorogued by Commission.

During this Time a Treaty of Peace had been set on Foot by France. The President de Rouillé was sent to open the Negotiation. The States-General acquainted the Queen and the Emperor of Germany with this Advance; upon which Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough came to the Hague. But when the Overtures made by France came to be considered, the two Generals and the States-Deputies agreed that they were unsatisfactory. Upon this the French Court, who was willing to keep up the Negotiation, sent the Marquis de Torcy, Secretary of State, to carry it on; and ordered the President to seem to comply with the Demands of the Allies, till he came.

A Treaty of Peace set on foot.

The Negotiations were begun with the utmost Jealousie and Mistrust on both Sides. The Allies were heartily desirous of a secure Peace, but had great Reason to suspect the French Sincerity. The Peace of Nimeguen, and that of Ryswick, had been concluded by France, only to be made the Foundations of future Wars. They apprehended the French Dexterity in dividing; of which they remembered a famous Example at the Treaty of Nimeguen; where by disuniting the Confederate Powers, France gave Laws to them all. So that they entered into the Treaty with the greatest Fear and Caution. The French King, on the other Hand, remembering his former Injustice and Insolence, and his present Weakness, feared that they would give Room to the Confederates to insist on Terms so severe, though reasonable in themselves, as he could not bear to submit to, while he feared to reject them. This made Him irresolute, and the Proceedings of his Ministers to appear full of Artifice; perhaps more than they really were.

The Allies had three principal Points to gain. The first was to obtain so many strong Towns from the French in the Spanish Netherlands, as should keep that formidable Power at a safe Distance from the United Provinces; or as the Term then was, serve for a Barrier to that State. The second was to provide a like Security for the Empire. The third, which was then taken to be the most important, was to restore Spain and the West-Indies to King Charles III. For in those Days it was thought impossible in Great Britain and Holland, that he should make them that ill Return he has since done. France seemed to have formed no settled Plan, but that of yielding as little as possible in these Particulars.

The Conferences began at the Hague, between the Duke of Marlborough, the Lord Viscount

The Conferences thereon.

A.D. 1708. Viscount Townshend, Prince Eugene (to whom was added afterwards Count Zinzendorf) the Grand Pensionary, and the Deputies of the States on the one Hand; and the Marquis de Torcy, and the President de Rouillé on the other. The first Day the French Ministers agreed to the demolishing Dunkirk, the banishing of the Pretender from France, and the other Points insisted on by the British Plenipotentiaries; in which no Difficulty was expected. They agreed also to yield Furnes, Ypres, Menin, Tournay, Lisle, Condé, and Maubeuge for a Barrier to Holland. With Respect to the Empire, they offered to restore all Things as they were settled by the Treaty of Ryfwick, and to demolish the Fortifications of Strasburgh. But the Allies insisting on some other Articles, namely, the Restitution of all Alsace to the Empire; Monsieur de Torcy declared he had no Power to make any farther Concessions; broke up the Conference, and sent to the Pensionary to desire Passes to return home. But afterwards, as they said, upon the Desire of the Resident of Holstein, the French Ministers put off their Departure. So that the next Day another Conference was held, at which they proposed to surrender Strasburgh in its present Condition; though they had before declared they could make no new Advances. But this not being thought sufficient, another Conference was held the next Day, which was unsuccessful. Upon this, the French Ministers declared they would go away; sent to the Grand Pensionary for Passes, and took their Leave of Prince Eugene, the Duke of Marlborough, and the Ministers of Neutral Princes. Their Passes were quickly sent them; but it was intimated to them, that they must not expect any for their Return to the Hague. But after this, at the Desire of some neutral Ministers, as they said, they agreed to stay longer, and sent to their Court for new Instructions. In four Conferences which were afterwards held, the French seemed at last to comply with all the Preliminary Articles insisted on by the Confederates; and Directions were given to have them written out fair, in order to be examined. This being done, a Conference was appointed in which they were to be signed.

But all Men were surprized when they were informed, that when this Draught came to be presented at the Conference, and was signed by the Ministers of the Allies, the French refused to do the same; saying, they had no Instructions to go so far. This cast a Cloud over the pleasing Expectations that had been indulged before, of a sudden Peace and Tranquility. But these were in some Measure cleared again by the Marquis de Torcy; who promised to set out immediately for France, to present them to the King for his Ratification.

During the Marquis's Journey into France, Men were divided between Hopes and Fears. At last they were informed, that the Marquis had written a Letter to Prince Eugene at Brussels, to acquaint him, that his Master having considered the Project of Peace, A.D. 1708. could not accept of it. This was confirmed by the President de Rouillé, who was left at the Hague; and at a Conference acquainted the Confederate Ministers with the same. The principal Difficulty alledged by him was contained in the thirty seventh Article, which obliged the French King to cause his Grandson to evacuate the Spanish Monarchy in two Months; which Term he desired to have enlarged, but promised to recall his own Troops from thence within that Time. This was not Satisfactory to the Allies; so that the President declaring he could make no farther Concessions, he was ordered to return home. And the States came to a Resolution to prosecute the War with all possible Vigour; and the Duke of Marlborough shortly after set out for the Army.

At the Time of this Treaty the Conduct of the Allies upon this Occasion was much applauded. Without doubt, the perfect Harmony with which they proceeded was highly admirable; and was, to be sure, no small disheartening to France. But whether they did prudently to reject the Concessions made by the French King in Relation to his Grandson, has been since disputed. This is certain, that the Experience of our Times has shewn, that if it was a Mistake, it was a fortunate one.

The Campaign began with the Siege of Tournay; the French Army, which stood upon the Defensive, being so strongly encamped; that the Duke and Prince Eugene did not think it adviseable to attack them. The Town was invested on the twenty seventh of June, and on the thirtieth of July it surrendered. The Citadel held out another Month; but on the thirty first of August it also yielded. After this the Confederate Generals detached the Prince of Hesse to attempt to make his Way within the French Lines, which he effected. The French Army, under the Mareschal de Villars, upon Advice of this, marched towards the Prince of Hesse to attack him; and at the same Time the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene came to his Assistance. This brought the two Armies together; and the Duke and Prince Eugene resolved to attack the Enemy. But the French General, who resolved to stand upon the Defensive, removed his Army to a Situation, where the Allies, if they would venture to attack him, should be obliged to do it upon a very great Disadvantage.

There were three Woods near the Place where he was encamped, in which he posted his Infantry; who were not only covered by the Shelter of the Wood, but defended by a strong Intrenchment cast up across the open Paths, that gave Entrance into it. Between these Woods was a Plain, which was defended by no fewer than three Intrenchments, one behind another, to compensate for the Disadvantage of lying exposed and open. But notwithstanding these prodigious Defences, the Confederate Generals, used to Victory, and ever favoured by Fortune,

The Treaty proves at last unsuccessful.

The Campaign in Flanders.

Tournay taken.

The Battle of Blaregnies, or Malplaquet.

A.D.1709. tune, resolved to attack him. At eight in the Morning, September 11. fifty Pieces of Cannon were discharged as a Signal for fighting, and the Allies marched up towards the Enemy. Those who were in this Fight have told us, that the Fury of the Encounter, the Violence of the Fire on both Sides, and the Daringness of the Attempt, are not to be expressed. The Confederate Troops had met a long Train of Success, which made them despise the Dangers that were before them. The French were filled with Shame and Rage, to find themselves contemned so far as to be attacked behind such formidable Works; so that the one advanced, the other maintained their Ground with equal Resolution. The Slaughter was more bloody and cruel than had been known in any of the former Battles; but the Loss of the Confederates was the greater, who marched up against such Disadvantages, as perhaps since the Invention of Guns no Army ever faced before. The slain and wounded fell among them so fast, that the Soldiers Hearts at last began to fail them, and they stood still, and shrunk back. But their Commanders, among whom the Duke of Argyle distinguished himself, put themselves at their Head; and encouraged them so effectually, that they made a second Effort; in which they broke through all Opposition, and got within the Intrenchments. The Enemy could then no longer stand their Fury, but gave Way on all Sides. Those who were in the Wood were driven into the Plain; where they drew up again, under the Cover of their Horse, behind a third Intrenchment; making a dreadful Fire upon the Pursuers, as they followed them out of the Wood. The Fight was then renewed; for this last Intrenchment was the most dangerous of all the rest, and the Enemy defended it with as much Vigour as if the Battle were only beginning. The Confederate Troops gave Way again at the first Assault; nor could they be brought to a second Onset, till the Duke and Prince Eugene put themselves at their Head; which encouraged them so, that they bravely fell on a second Time, and forced their Passage. Then the Intrenchments being levelled to make a Way for the Horse, they charged the French Cavalry with such Success, that they were put to the Rout, and their whole Army fell into Disorder, and turned their Backs. The Right, and Left, and Center of the Enemy were dispersed into different Bodies, and pursued two Leagues from the Field of Battle; in which Pursuit great Numbers of them were slain and taken Prisoners.

The French defeated.

Thus ended the famous Battle of Blaregnies, or Malplaquet, as it is called from two Villages near the Field of Battle. It began at eight in the Morning, and lasted till three in the Afternoon; till which Time the Victory was uncertain. If we consider that the Enemy defeated in this Battle was neither in Arms, Discipline, or Numbers inferior to the Confederates, and besides inclosed and defended by such strong Works and Defences, that the Generals themselves, when they came to survey in cold Blood the Difficulties they had overcome, could hardly believe what they saw; we may justly look upon the Victory as one of the greatest recorded in History. For both at Bleinheim and Ramellies the Armies fought on equal Terms. But the Consequences of this Victory were not proportionable to the Honour gained in the Action, or the dear Price it was purchased at, no fewer than eighteen thousand valiant Men being slain on the Side of the Confederates. The French Loss was not so great, though it could not but be considerable in so bloody a Combat; and they were studious to conceal their own Loss, in order to diminish the Glory of the Allies. But as they did not think fit to interpose during the Siege of Mons, which was afterwards undertaken, it appears that their Army was much more diminished than they would have had it believed.

The only Action that passed after this Battle was the Siege of Mons, which surrendered after about a Month's Siege. The Winter being by that Time far advanced, and the Weather extremely bad, the Army went into Winter-Quarters.

On the Rhine a Project was formed for invading Burgundy. But the usual Neglect on that Side gave Time and Opportunity to the French to disappoint it. An Irruption was afterwards made into Alsace by the Germans under Count Merci, which proved unsuccessful; that General being met and defeated by the French, under Count de Bourg. This Misfortune, which happened late, was the only Action on that Side; and passed without any Consequences. There was as little done in Savoy, on Account of a Dispute between the Duke and the Emperor; which last was so much in the Wrong, that Great Britain and Holland espoused the Duke of Savoy's Interests with great Warmth. But the Court of Vienna was, as usual, obstinate and untractable: so that a favourable Opportunity was lost of entering France, which might otherwise have been compassed this Summer.

In Portugal, an Action happened early between the Spaniards and the Confederates, in which the former got the better; though without any remarkable Loss or Disadvantage to the latter. And the Earl of Galloway, who commanded there, took such Care that the Spaniards could not improve their Victory. During the rest of the Campaign nothing happened worth relating.

The Castle of Alicant in the Kingdom of Valencia, which we left besieged the last Year, held out all the Winter; though the Garrison was ill supplied with necessary Provisions, and in fear of wanting Water. The Situation of the Castle being upon a high Rock which did not admit of the usual Method of Attack, the Enemy spent a great deal of fruitless Time in the Siege. A very singular Invention was put in Practice upon this Occasion. The Enemy finding their other Efforts ineffectual, were persuaded (by a Je-

A.D.1709.

Mons taken.

The Campaign on the Rhine.

And in Portugal.

The Siege of Alicant.

A.D. 1709. a Jesuite, as some say) to endeavour to blow up the Rock upon which the Castle stood. To this End, a deep winding Cavern was bored below in the Rock with the incredible Labour of four or five thousand Men, for three Months together. Within this Cavern there were lodged fifteen hundred Barrels of Powder; after which the Cavity was stopped up again with all the Security that the Labour and Invention of Men could give; a small Communication only being left to give Fire from without, to the Mine within. This Preparation being made, they sent to the Garrison to acquaint them with what was done, and to desire them to send any Persons they could trust, to be satisfied of the Truth of it. Then they ordered the Messengers to acquaint the Garrison, that unless they surrendered, the Mine should be fired. The Effect of Powder buried in Mines made in loose Earth, had been often tried, and was well known; but it was not so certain what the Consequence would be, when its Fury was opposed by a stony Wall of hard and solid Rock. So that the Governor, who was a Man of Resolution, determined to wait the Event, and rejected the Summons; upon which the Mine was fired. The Powder, set on Fire, struggled some Time in its Prison before it could make it self a Vent; and by the Force with which it laboured to discharge it self on all Sides, made the Castle, and the very Rock it stood on, shake to and fro, like a Tree blown by the Wind. At last the firm compacted Stone gave Way to the Violence of the imprisoned Fire, and the Rock split from the Bottom to the Top, and burst asunder in an horrible Cleft, with a Roaring, as if a thousand Cannon had been discharged at once. The Governor, and about thirty Officers, sunk down immediately into the dismal Pit, which chanced to open just under their Feet; and then the Rock closing suddenly again, shut them up for ever in that dreadful Tomb. Part of a Bastion was ruined; and a Cistern of Water was emptied. Nevertheless the Mischief done by this Mine was not answerable to the Terror; so that the Officers who escaped, retained their Courage, and agreed to hold out while their Provisions lasted. A Squadron of Ships was sent from Barcelona to relieve them; but the Besiegers had made such Provisions to hinder it, that the Ships were forced to give over the Attempt. But left so many brave Men as were in the Garrison, should undergo the Hardships which Prisoners of War usually pass through, General Stanbope, who was aboard the Fleet, and the Admirals, sent Proposals to the Enemy to surrender the Castle upon honourable Terms; which was easily agreed to.

The Castle of Alicant surrendered.

In Catalonia, nothing happened remarkable but the taking of Balaguer by General Staremborg, which gave some Life to the languid State of Affairs on that Side. This Year Cardinal Portocarrero died; whose Intrigues with the French Ambassador at the Death of King Charles II. of Spain, kindled this last War throughout Europe.

This Summer, about the Beginning of May, A.D. 1709. there came over into England great Numbers of the Inhabitants of the Palatinate, Suabia, and other Parts of Germany, lying towards the French Frontiers. They continued coming over till the Middle of June; by which Time it was computed there were about six thousand of them. Their Countrey had been so miserably desolated by having been so long the Seat of the War, and consequently of Rapine and Plunder, that it was no Wonder if some of its Inhabitants were willing to leave it, in Hopes of mending their Condition in another Land. How far the Ministry were concerned in inviting them over, or with what Views it was done, besides that general Benefit of increasing the Strength of our Countrey, by increasing the Number of its Inhabitants, is not very certain. 'Tis said that some of those People had before come into England, and from thence transported themselves into our American Plantations, where they thrived and prospered; and being willing to give Part of their good Fortune to their Countreymen, had invited others to take the same Course; upon which Invitation they came into Holland, where they were supplied with Shipping for their Passage by the British Minister there, by Orders from above. They were kindly and charitably received here, by all Sorts of Persons, some few of the meanest Vulgar excepted, who made the Complaint usual with our idle Poor, that they were come to take the Bread out of their Mouths. Tents were allowed them by the Queen for their Shelter, and set up on Black-Heath, and a Field near Camberwell; and a Brief was granted for their Relief throughout the Kingdom of Great-Britain. This good Reception engaged others of that People to come over with such increasing Numbers, that the Government not knowing what to do with so many, was forced to put a Stop to it. Of those who remained here, some few were taken into private Families, or into some Parishes for a Sum of Money; the rest were sent to Ireland, or the Plantations. But they proved a lazy, unindustrious Sort of People; whether it were the Nature of their Countrey, or whether having been used to Oppression, and its sure Consequence, Indolence and Remissness, they could not soon leave a Habit deeply fixed in them by long Custom. So that 'tis said that in a few Years near two Thirds of them perished.

The Parliament met as usual, about the Time the Campaigns were over. The Commons went immediately upon the Supplies, and agreed to raise one Million five hundred thousand Pounds by Way of Lottery. And because the severe Frost, which had happened the last Winter, had made Corn very scarce and dear in Foreign Parts, which occasioned great Exportations of the same from hence, and caused a sensible Diminution of our own Stock, the Commons passed a Bill for prohibiting the same. This Bill, with that for the Land-Tax, passed so quickly,

The Parliament meets. Their Proceedings.

A.D. 1709. ly, that by December 10. they were ready for the Royal Assent.

Doctor Sacheverell preaches a Sermon at St. Paul's, which makes a great Noise.

But they were on a sudden diverted from other Thoughts, by an Affair very trivial in it self, but of very important Consequences. At the Solemnization of the Fifth of November this Year, a Sermon of a very singular Nature was delivered in St. Paul's Cathedral, before the Lord-Mayor, and Court of Aldermen. The Preacher was Doctor Henry Sacheverell, a Clergyman of a Character neither eminent nor obscure. This Gentleman was of that Party that was out of Favour at that Time; and being a hot and zealous Man in his Way, took the Opportunity of that Publick Audience, to give a Vent to those Complaints and Jealousies that were common to him with those of the same Side. And because it was pretended (and believed too by most of that Party) that the present Ministry were Friends to the Dissenters, and Enemies to the Church, he made his Sermon a furious Invective against the Dissenters, and those who being of the Church of England, were disposed to Moderation and Lenity towards them; to which he added many bold Glances towards those who were in Power. He also inculcated in very strong and suspicious Terms, the Doctrine of Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance, which taken in its full Extent, is certainly incompatible with the late Revolution. The Sermon it self was an exceeding mean Composure; the Vehemence and Fury of it supplying the Place of Reason and Eloquence. The Court of Aldermen, who were mostly of the other Side, thought themselves struck at by it, and refused to give Thanks for it, and to desire him to print it; which is a Compliment usually paid to those who preach before them upon those solemn Days. But the Lord-Mayor, who was of the opposite Party, giving him Encouragement, the Doctor printed it, with a Dedication to his Lordship, of a like Strain with the Discourse it self.

As soon as this Sermon became Publick, it made a great Noise. For both Parties had been long persuaded, beyond Hope of Conviction, that their Antagonists fully intended, the one to destroy the Church; the other to persecute the Dissenters, and to bring in the Pretender. And though, as was said above, the Controversie was at Bottom only what Set of Great Men should be in Place, (for under so excellent a Prince there could be no real Ground for any of those Fears and Apprehensions) yet Men were too much prejudiced to discern this obvious Truth; and contended for that which was a meer private Concern, as furiously as if All had been at Stake. So that the present Ministry, whose Aspersions it was to be called Enemies to the Church, having continued long in Power, and there being no Prospect of a Change, the opposite Party was filled with Panic Fears for an imaginary Danger of the Church, which they persuaded themselves was upon the Verge of being destroyed by those at the Helm. Thus this Sermon was entirely in the Taste of all A.D. 1709. on that Side; who extolled and applauded the Preacher, as something more than a second Cato, who stood alone unsubdued, and dared to speak in Defence of his sacred Mother, the Church, while all others tamely yielded and acquiesced under its impending Ruine. The other Side were as highly inflamed against him. The furious Declamations he had made against the Dissenters, and the unguarded Warmth with which he pressed the Doctrine of Non-Resistance, gave him the Name among that Party, of a Popish Persecutor, an Enemy to the Revolution, and a Friend to the Pretender. And because he was applauded by the other Side, they supposed that he spoke plainly out what all the rest of their Adversaries thought as well as he, but were afraid, or ashamed, to profess so openly. So that the Dispositions of both Parties became fit Fuel for the Fire that broke out upon his Impeachment.

At the Court and in the Parliament, which were now on the same Side, the Reflections in this Sermon were much resented. It was looked on as a bold Attack upon them, which if neglected, would produce more of the same Kind. Besides this, the Leaders there having so long triumphed over their Rivals, both in the Senate and at Court, and baffled all Attempts, they thought scorn that one private Clergyman, scarce heard of before, should presume to offer them so general an Insult. It is said that Lawyers were consulted with, to know whether the Doctor could not be punished by the Courts in Westminster-Hall, for the Offence given by his Sermon; who agreeing that he could not, it was resolved that he should be impeached by the House of Commons. It is reported also that this was done at the particular Instance of the Earl of Godolphin, whose usual Wisdom and Moderation so far forlook him, that on Account of an idle Reflection cast upon himself by the Epithet of Volpone, (more deserving the Neglect than Resentment of so great and wise a Man) he insisted on that Prosecution of him.

Accordingly Dec. 13. Complaint being made in the House of Commons of this Sermon, and of the Preface to another Sermon of Dr. Sacheverell's, preached at Derby the August before, he was ordered to attend the House the next Day; when he was committed by them to the Custody of the Serjeant at Arms. And the Day after he was impeached of High Crimes and Misdemeanors at the Bar of the House of Lords. After the Interruption occasioned by the Christmas Holidays, the Articles of Impeachment were drawn up. They were four in Number, importing in Substance, that Dr. Sacheverell did suggest and maintain, 1. That the necessary Means to bring about the Revolution were odious and unjustifiable. 2. That the Toleration of Dissenters is unreasonable, and the Allowance of it unwarrantable. 3. That the Church of England was in Danger under the Queen's Administration. 4. That there were Persons of Characters

He is impeached by the House of Commons.

A.D.1709. Characters and Stations who endeavoured to overturn the Constitution; and that throughout the whole Management of Affairs there was a general Male-Administration. The Doctor in his Answer (for which he did not want good Assistance) denied the Charge, and artfully evaded the Particulars he was pressed with. The Commons Replication being carried up to the Lords, the Tryal was prepared for. The Lords proposed to have it at the Bar of their House; but at the Motion of the Commons, the Lords desired the Queen to give Orders for preparing Scaffolds in Westminster-hall.

The fierce Animosities raised by this Impeachment.

In the mean Time the publick Dissensions which were kindled by the Publication of the Sermon, increased every Day; till the Commons Impeachment of Dr. Sacheverell blew them up into the fiercest Flames. Those who thought the Church in Danger, supposed that the Design against her was now to receive the finishing Blow by some terrible Punishment of one of her Ministers for standing up to defend her from imminent Destruction. The Solemnity with which this was to be done, by a Tryal in Westminster-Hall before the whole Legislature, confirmed their Fears; and they concluded that all that Pomp and Formality was used to deter all others from making the least Effort in Defence of the Church any more. This Effect of so splendid a Tryal was foreseen by the Doctor's Friends, which made it be proposed by them to the others, who not being aware of the Consequences, fell into the Snare. The Fury of this Party kindled that of the opposite Side; so that it is not to be conceived but by those who lived in the Time, the Fierceness of the Animosities by which the Nation in those Days was rent asunder. The Feuds spread themselves even into private Families with an inexpressible Rancour; Husbands, Wives, Parents, Children, Brothers, Sisters, fell into the bitterest, and sometimes irreconcilable Quarrels, only because they differed in Opinion about Dr. Sacheverell. For according to the wild Way of arguing used by Parties, it was laid down as an infallible Rule that those who were against Dr. Sacheverell, were for destroying the Church, and those who were his Friends were for bringing in the Pretender.

A.D.1710.

Dr. Sacheverell's Tryal.

On the twenty seventh of February the Tryal began; and continued till March 10. The Managers on the Part of the House of Commons were Sir John Holland, Comptroller of the Queen's Household; Mr. Boyle, Secretary of State; Mr. Smith, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Sir James Montague, Attorney-General; Robert Eyre, Esq; Solicitor-General; Robert Walpole, Esq; Treasurer of the Navy; Sir Joseph Jekyll, Nicholas Lechmere, Esq; Mr. Dolben, Sir Thomas Parker, Sir Peter King, Sir John Holles, the Lord William Pawlet, the Lord Coningsby, Spencer Cowper, Esq; William Thompson, Esq; Lieutenant-General Stanbope, Lieutenant-General Mordaunt, Spencer Compton, Esq; and Sir David Dalrymple. The Council for Dr. Sacheverell were Sir Simon Harcourt, Mr. Dodd, Mr. Phipps, Mr. Dee, and Dr. Henchman a Civilian. Most of these Gentlemen have been since distinguished by higher Stations and Titles than they possessed at that Time. We refer to the printed Tryal those who are curious to know the Particulars of this curious Proceeding, which our proposed Brevity does not permit us to enlarge upon. Many excellent Things were said by the Managers to justify the Self-Defence used by our Country at the Revolution; and on the Reasonableness, Equity and Prudence of a Toleration for the Dissenters. The Council for the Doctor evaded the Charge against him with great Acuteness. He made one Speech for himself, which was of a very different Strain from his Sermon, being perhaps one of the most finished Pieces of Oratory that is to be found in any Language.

When the Managers had finished their Reply to the Defence made by Dr. Sacheverell and his Council, an unexpected Question was started by the Earl of Nottingham, who was the Doctor's Friend, that had like to have overturned all the Proceeding. That Lord proposed a Query to the Judges, whether in all Indictments or Informations for Crimes committed by Writing or Speaking, the particular Words, supposed to be Criminal, ought not to be expressly specified. This had not been done in the Course of this Prosecution; the Articles of Impeachment being grounded on the Scope and Intention of the whole Sermon, without quoting any particular Passages. When the Question was proposed to the Judges, they all agreed that it was absolutely necessary by the Law of England, that such Words should be particularly inserted. This caused a great Contestation among all the Prosecutors; but it chanced that one single Precedent of a Case of Dr. Manwaring in the Reign of King Charles I. was found, in which a Charge was laid against him by the Commons, for preaching slavish Doctrines, without expressing the very Words, upon which it was carried in the House of Lords, that such Specification of the very Words was not necessary. So that the Question being afterwards put, whether Dr. Sacheverell was Guilty or Not He is found Guilty; sixty nine Peers found him Guilty, guilty. and fifty two Not Guilty.

The Ferment, occasioned by the Impeachment, broke out with great Fury at the Beginning of this Tryal. When Dr. Sacheverell went to Westminster-Hall, he was attended with great Crowds who waited upon him to the Hall, and conducted him back with loud Huzzas and Acclamations. This was done the first Day. The second Day the Mob grew more boisterous; and not content with huzzaing the Doctor, obliged all that passed by to pull off their Hats to him; abusing those who complied slowly with their Sovereign Orders; and in their Return they broke the Windows of Mr. Burges's Meeting-house near Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. But on the Evening of the third Day they became

The Mob rises, and pulls down Meeting Houses.

A.D. 1710. came so outrageous, that after having attended Dr. Sacheverell from his Tryal, as usual, they went to the Meeting-house they had insulted the Day before; and breaking it open, took out the Pulpit, Pews, Benches, and all that was loose and combustible, and carrying them into Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, made a great Bonfire with them. They also demolished and destroyed two or three other Meeting-Houses; and grew to such a Strength and Fury, that they talked of insulting the Houses of the Lords and others who were thought to be against Dr. Sacheverell; and even of attacking the Bank of England, as 'tis said. The Tumult was such, that it was found necessary to send the Queen's Guards to disperse them; which was not done without a few Cuts given to some of the forwardest. The next Day the Trained-Bands of Westminster were ordered out, which took in some of the Mutineers, and terrified the rest, so that the Publick Quiet was soon re-established. Three Persons were tryed for High-Treason, and levying War; one of which was found Guilty but pardoned; the Verdict found against the other was special, but never argued; the third was acquitted.

Dr. Sacheverell's Sentence.

These Tumults being a Sample of the great Ferment all over the Nation, seem to have influenced the House of Lords in determining the Penalty to be laid upon Dr. Sacheverell. The Sentence passed upon him was only, that he should be forbidden to preach for three Years, and that his two Sermons should be burnt by the Hands of the Common Hangman; a Judgment by no means answerable to the Dignity of the Persons concerned in the Accusation, or the Solemnity of the Tryal. But it was visible that any more severe Sentence would have caused so dreadful a Convulsion throughout the Kingdom, as must have been attended with very fatal Consequences.

The Sermons were accordingly burnt; and soon after there were burnt Collections made by Dr. Sacheverell of impious Passages in several Books lately published, which he had laid before the House of Lords to justify the Insinuations in his Sermon of the Danger of the Church.

A Bill for limiting Officers in the House of Commons.

While this Tryal was preparing for, a Bill was brought into the House of Commons, and carried there by a great Majority, for limiting the Number of Officers, to sit in the House of Commons. What the Reason was for offering such a Bill at this Time is uncertain; but there seems to have been a Mystery in it. But whether the Leaders there had any Prospect of the Change that happened afterwards, and were willing to weaken the Hands of their Adversaries when they should come into Power; or whether they were desirous to recover some Credit with the Publick by offering so popular a Bill, can only be guessed at. It was as mysteriously opposed in the House of Lords, as it was brought into the House of Commons; some of both Parties speaking against it. And those who opposed it were so numerous as to throw it out.

A.D. 1710.

After Dr. Sacheverell's Tryal was over, and Sentence was passed, there remaining nothing of Importance to be transacted in Parliament, the Queen came and prorogued them. And before they met again, a Proclamation was issued for dissolving them.

The Parliament dissolved.

France made new Overtures of Peace this Winter to the Allies, by the Intervention of Monsieur Petkum, Resident of the Duke of Holstein, who was a Neutral Prince. They were received after some Difficulty; but with the usual Caution, and Mistrust of the Sincerity of France. The King of France pretended to agree to all the Articles demanded by the Allies the last Year; and sent the Mareschal d'Huxelles, and the Abbot de Polignac to treat about some Methods for satisfying the Allies on the Affair of Spain and the West-Indies; which he pretended to be willing to see restored to the House of Austria, but alledged that he could not effect it in the Manner demanded by the Allies.

A new Treaty of Peace set on foot.

The French Plenipotentiaries upon their Arrival in Holland, went to Gertruydenburgh, which was the Place appointed for their Residence, and has given Name to this Treaty. But when these Plenipotentiaries entered into Conference, they proposed nothing more than had been offered at first; which was that the King of France should make a separate Peace with the Allies, and engage himself not to assist his Grandson directly nor indirectly against them. This Proposal being rejected, they offered several Schemes of Partition; as first, that Naples and Sicily should be left to King Philip; afterwards the Kingdom of Arragon; then Sicily and Sardinia, with the Places possessed by Spain on the Coasts of Tuscany; and lastly, Sicily and Sardinia alone.

In this Manner they prolonged the Negotiations from March till June, nothing being all the while concluded on. It seems as if France was resolved to hazard the utmost Extremities rather than abandon King Philip; and the Insincerity of that Court gives Reason to suspect that some secret Designs lay hid under these Schemes of Partition. The utmost that France could be brought to at this Treaty, was to offer to assist the Allies with a Sum of Money to expel King Philip from the Spanish Dominions if he refused the Partition of Sardinia and Sicily. But the Restitution of all the Spanish Dominions was the reigning Notion among the Allies at that Time; besides which, they did not want Reason to suspect the Sincerity of the French King in these Offers, so that they rejected them; and not long after the French Plenipotentiaries returned home.

But without Success.

The Campaign in Flanders promised more at the Beginning of it, than it afterwards brought forth. The Confederate Army was very early in the Field; and, without any Opposition, entered the Lines which the French had cast up to stop their Progress. They then besieged Douay, which surrendered to them after a Siege of fifty three Days. When this Place was taken, a Design

The Campaign in Flanders.

A.D. 1710. sign was formed to besiege Arras. But the French General, the Mareschal de Villars, posted himself with so much Dexterity behind new Lines cast up near that Town, that the Confederate Generals found their Measures disappointed; it being impracticable either to besiege Arras, or come to a Battle with the Enemy. However, that they might not lose the Summer in Inactivity, they besieged and took the Towns of Bethune, Aire and St. Venant, the Surrender of which two last concluded the Campaign.

On the Rhine.

The Campaign on the Rhine was, as usual, inconsiderable; the Princes and States of Germany (a Body august and venerable in Appearance, but the worst compacted that can be imagined, and the least fit either for Offence or Defence) neglecting to send their several Quota's of Troops, under different Pretences. The Elector of Hanover was so tired with the perpetual Disappointments he had met with from these Neglects, that before the Campaign began, he laid down his Command.

In Piedmont.

In Piedmont the Duke of Savoy fell ill; which maimed the Operations of the Campaign on that Side. Count Thaurin, who commanded the Confederate Forces in his Room endeavoured to penetrate into Dauphiné; but the great Number of Forces kept there by France, which was very apprehensive this Year of an Invasion on that Side, and the prodigious Works cast up to oppose this Attempt, made all his Endeavours frustrate.

And in Spain.

In the Events of the War in Spain, the Caprice of Fortune was very remarkable; the two contending Parties overcoming, and being overcome, by turns. King Philip had the Advantage of coming first into the Field: King Charles being hindered by waiting for the Reinforcements he expected from Italy; which, by the Difficulties that always attend great Imbarkations, were slow in coming. However General Stanhope arrived at Barcelona with some Part of them, Time enough to give some Stop to the Enemy's Progress. King Charles took the Field in Person, and the two Armies drew so near that three hundred of King Philip's Men were killed and wounded by the Cannon on the other Side. Nevertheless no Engagement happened; King Charles, whose Troops were fewer in Number than those of his Rival, not daring to attack a superior Enemy; and being too advantageously posted to give the Enemy any Encouragement to become the Assailants. But King Philip sending out a Body of Forces, took the Castle of Calaf, which streightened the Confederates so in their Supplies of Provisions, that they were forced to retreat farther back into the Principality of Catalonia to be more commodiously subsisted. In this State they continued about a Month; waiting for the remaining Troops that were expected from Italy, and others from the Lampourdan on the Side of Roussillon.

A Descent made in Languedoc.

In the mean Time, the Fleet sailed out from Barcelona, to make an Attempt on the Coast of Languedoc; by which they hoped to A.D. 1710. revive the Insurrection in the Cevennes, which had been quieted for some Time. They came before the Port of Cette, and landed about four Thousand Men under Major-General Stanhope without Opposition. They took also the Town of Agde. But the Duke de Roquelaure Governor of Languedoc, and the Duke de Noailles from Roussillon, came with such Speed, and with so numerous Forces, that the Confederates were obliged to abandon their Enterprize, and take the Land-Forces again on board.

The Army in Catalonia being at last reinforced by the Troops they expected, came out to meet the Enemy. It was not long before they came up with them near Almenara; where the Enemy seeing themselves closely pursued, their Cavalry, which with a Brigade of Foot was in their Rear, made a Halt, and put themselves in Order to receive the Charge. At the same Time they sent to the rest of their Infantry, that were marching before, to face about, and come to their Assistance, which they did with all the Speed they could. But while these Foot were upon the March, the Confederate Horse came up with that of the Enemy, and attacked them so briskly, that they gave Way, and turned their Backs, and fled in so great Disorder, that the Horse and Foot were driven together and intermingled in the Flight; the Infantry throwing away their Arms to make the speedier Escape. The Fear that possessed those who had stood the Charge, communicated it self to those Troops who were advancing to sustain them; so that the whole French and Spanish Army was turned to Rout and Confusion; and had not the Darkness of the Night which came on apace (for it was seven in the Evening before the Fight began) prevented the Pursuit of the Advantage gained by the Allies, a complete Victory had been obtained. However a great Number of the Enemy were slain and wounded; and the Consternation spread every where by this ill Success of King Philip's Forces, had almost the same Effect.

The Spanish Army retired under the Cannon of Lerida, but the Confederates marching into Arragon, King Philip was obliged to decamp from thence to save Castile. But this Motion drew on a second Battle. For King Charles still pursued him, and overtook him near Saragossa.

Next Day the Fight began. The Enemy who expected to be attacked put themselves in Order. Their Left was covered by the Ebro, and their Right Wing of Horse was drawn up on the Brow of a steep Hill, with a Battery of eight Pieces of Cannon in Front. The Left of the Confederates engaged with the Spanish Right Wing first; from whence the Fight spread it self by Degrees through the Center along the whole Front of both Armies. The Ground was vigorously disputed on both Sides; the Enemy having the Odds both of Numbers and Situation. But at last in the Center and on

The Battle of Saragossa.

A.D. 1710. the Right Wing of the Confederates, the Scale of Victory turned on their Side; so that in two Hours Time, the Field was entirely won, with great Slaughter and Loss of the Enemy, who had eight or nine thousand Men killed or taken Prisoners. The broken Remains of their Army, being not in a Condition to make a Stand against the Allies, were obliged to abandon the Countrey to them, and retire into Navarre, to recruit themselves at a Distance from the Pursuers.

After this Action was over, which seemed to be decisive, a Council of War was called, to consider what was to be done afterwards. Some proposed to march directly into Castile to Madrid; others were for hastening to secure the Passes on the Frontiers of France to prevent King Philip's receiving Assistance from thence. The first of these Counsels was followed; which was the worse. The Army marched directly to Madrid, there being no Forces in the Way to oppose them; and King Charles made his publick Entry into that City.

But he continued there not long. King Philip received daily Reinforcements of Troops from France, through those Passes which ought to have been secured. The Portuguese who were sent for, and expected to join the Confederate Army, were so slow and remiss, that before they came, King Philip and the Duke of Vendosme, who had got together an Army of fourteen thousand Men, secured a Bridge, and posted themselves so as to hinder effectually the Conjunction of their Army with that of King Charles. Mean while the Army of King Philip increased so fast by Recruits arriving there every Day, that the Confederate Generals found it necessary to retire out of Castile, and hasten back to Catalonia. But this Retreat was like to be attended with great Difficulties for Want of Provisions, which were hard to be met with in sufficient Quantity; partly because the Countrey was their Enemy, and partly because of its native Poverty. This obliged the Army to march in three Columns at a Distance from each other; not being able to get sufficient Subsistence when in a Body. But this Separation was attended with a very fatal Disaster.

The Disaster of Brihuega.

The Enemy, who wanted no Intelligence, were soon informed of the Manner in which the Confederate Army marched, which gave them Hopes of cutting off one or other of those separate Bodies. The English under Major-General Stanhope were in the Rear. These being heavy laden with Baggage and Plunder, which last Article made them very odious to the People, moved so slowly, that they were overtaken by some of the Enemy's Parties of Horse, who were sent before the main Army to disturb and hinder their March. These Parties joining together made a Body of Horse, that surrounded the English Foot near a Village called Orcho, and would have cut them to Pieces, had not the Horse come timely to their Relief. But this Escape did not make them at all more cautious. For though they might suppose that the Enemy was in pursuit of them, they went two Days after, into Brihuega, a defenceless Town with a ruinous Castle, where they proposed to stay two or three Days to bake Bread. But on the second Day at Noon, they saw the Enemy appear on a neighbouring Mountain. The Drum beat to Arms, and General Stanhope sent Word of the Danger he was in to Count Staremburg, who commanded the main Army, and was within four Leagues of him. But to make the Misfortune complete it was found that the Troops in Brihuega wanted a sufficient Quantity of Powder and Shot, which they had neglected to provide themselves with at the Time of their Separation from the main Body. This Neglect gave them up into their Enemies Hands; for they were otherwise able enough to have kept the Enemy at a Bay, till General Staremburg came to assist them. So that after a noble Defence, so long as their Ammunition lasted, they being surrounded on all Sides, and hotly pressed, were forced to surrender Prisoners of War, not above two or three Hours before General Staremburg was come up to their Relief. About eight thousand brave Men were by this Means delivered up to their Enemies, as defenceless as if they had been bound Hand and Foot.

It was next to a Miracle that the rest of the Army under General Staremburg was not cut off with them. For when the unfortunate News came to him of the Surrender of the English in Brihuega, he was too far engaged to avoid fighting, and too much inferior in Numbers to hope for Success. The next Day he saw the Spanish Army putting it self in Order near Villa-Viciosa, to attack him. His Troops stood the Shock bravely for some Time; but being overpowered by Numbers they gave Way on the Left, and took to Flight. But it happened that the Enemy in their Pursuit fell in with the Baggage of the Allies, and thinking every Thing was safe, fell to plundering. General Staremburg took the Opportunity, and with that Part of his Troops that remain'd unbroken, charged the Enemy's Foot who had not yet engaged, with that Success that the Fortune of War changed Sides, and the Enemies were routed in their Turn; and the Confederates followed the Chase till the Darkness put an End to it. This Victory being gained, General Staremburg pursued his March without Interruption to the Frontiers of Aragon.

But the Escape of his Troops from their imminent Danger was all the Advantage that attended this Victory. His Army was still so weak that he was obliged to march with all Expedition into Catalonia, and to leave the whole Kingdom of Aragon exposed to the Enemy. And thus by sudden and uncommon Turns of Fortune the Kingdom of Spain was lost and recovered in one Summer.

While these Things were done abroad, a total Change was made at home of the Queen's Ministry.

A.D. 1710. Queen's Ministers, which had very great Consequences, and from which Alteration we may very properly date a second Period of this Reign. The Causes of this great Change we shall endeavour to relate, as well as the imperfect Accounts that have been hitherto made publick will permit. The Duchess of Marlborough, who had long enjoyed the Queen's Graces without a Rival, had possessed them for some Time past, rather in Appearance than in Reality; by the usual Fate of Royal Friendships, which when come to the Height, soon tend to Decay; a mutual Satiety arising, when nothing more is left for the Prince to give, or for the Favourite to receive. Thus it came to pass that the long Intimacy between the Queen and the Duchess began to slacken and cool after the Duke had been carried up to that Pitch of overflowing Wealth and Greatness, whither the Favour both of the Queen and People concurred to raise him after the famous Battle of Ramellies. The Duchess began to find Inconvenience and Fatigue in her Attendance upon the Queen, and used to leave her for Months together; and the Satiety and Absence of the former Favourite prepared the Queen's Mind to receive a new one. The Duchess, who was too good a Courtier not to know the Disadvantage she might receive by being away, had left a Relation of hers, Mrs. Abigail Hill, to make her Court to the Queen during the Times of her Absence. Mrs. Hill had been preferred by her before to be Dresser and Chamber-Woman to the Queen; so that the Duchess looked on her as one who might serve her, without Danger of Rivalship. But Mrs. Hill had the good Fortune to make her self so acceptable to the Queen, that her Credit grew daily; till it first equalled, and at last overtopped that of the Duchess her self. As this Lady's Favour increased, Mr. Harley, the Secretary of State, applied himself to her with great Dexterity; and got so far into an Intimacy with her, as gave him an Opportunity to oblige her in a very extraordinary Affair. It is said, that Mrs. Hill fell in Love with one Mr. Masbam, a very handsome young Gentleman, in the Service of Prince George; and having intrusted Mr. Harley with the secret of her Passion, he found Means to engage the Gentleman in Courtship to her; and they were married. This made a firm Conjunction of Interests between this Lady and Mr. Harley, who never wanted her Credit with the Queen. The Duke of Marlborough, and Earl of Godolphin were jealous of his Interest there; and endeavoured to remove him, but in vain, till the Affair of Gregg's Correspondence gave them a Pretence to insist upon it with so much Warmth, that the Queen was forced to comply.

Mr. Harley, though out of Place, yet by Mrs. Masbam's Interest, kept up his Favour with the Queen; to whose Presence and Conversation he was still admitted. In the mean Time it is said that the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough were much wanting in Respect and Duty to their Royal Mistress, A.D. 1710. being puffed up and made giddy by a long and uninterrupted Enjoyment of Princely and Popular Favour. The Queen was of a mild Temper, but stately; and jealous of the Dignity of her Birth and Station to a great Degree; so that she laid those Instances of Disrespect much to Heart. And it is supposed that Mr. Harley found Means to insinuate into her the Necessity of recovering her Royal Authority by changing the Ministry; and the Convenience of doing it at this Time, when the Impeachment of Doctor Sacheverell had made their Party so very unpopular.

The first Remove made was of the Duke of Kent, the Lord Chamberlain; which was followed by that of the Earl of Sunderland, who was Secretary of State. These were universally looked on, both at home and in Foreign Countries, as Forerunners of greater Changes; and caused great Alarms among the falling Ministers, and their Partizans. These last were now as much alarmed (and with just as much Reason) for the Security of the Protestant Succession, as the other Side had been upon Doctor Sacheverell's Impeachment for the Safety of the Church. With these Apprehensions they began to sell out their Shares in the Publick Funds; which began to sink in their Value thereupon. For though the two Parties were pretty equally divided among all Ranks and Conditions in the Nation, it was however observed, that those whose Wealth consisted in Land, were more generally inclined to that Party which was called the Tories; and those whose Fortunes lay chiefly in Money, the Funds and Commerce, were mostly of that Side who called themselves Whigs. The Governors and two Directors of the Bank of England, who were of this last Party, soon after the Removal of the Earl of Sunderland went to the Queen, and were bold to offer their Reasons against the Change in the Ministry. The Queen answered them with a great deal of Moderation, that for some particular Reasons she had thought fit to remove the Earl of Sunderland; that she had not yet determined to make any other Changes, but that whenever she did, she would take Care they should not injure Publick Credit. But this Representation of theirs was not so favourably received by others, who censured it as an Act of the highest Presumption, and an unexampled Insult upon the Throne.

Our Allies abroad also were under great Alarms, or at least were persuaded to appear so. The Dutch and Imperial Ministers, by Order of their Masters, applied to the Queen to represent to her, that the Change of her Ministry might prove pernicious to the Common Cause. The Queen answered the Imperial Minister, That whatever Changes she might make, it was not her Intention to remove the Duke of Marlborough; and that she desired that Prince Eugene, and the other Imperial Generals, might act in Concert with him as before. It is not certainly known what Answer she gave to the Dutch

Memo-

A.D. 1710. Memorial. But this Interposition of the Allies was very much reflected on, as an undue Meddling with what was not their Concern. And it was said, that if it could be supposed that the Ministers promoted these two great Insults upon their Sovereign, it was alone a more than sufficient Reason for disgracing them. Some excused these Offices of the Allies by the Example of the Queen, who some Time before had interceded in the Behalf of the Emperor's Protestant Subjects in Silesia and Hungary; and of the Parliament, who moved the Queen to press the Emperor to send Prince Eugene to command in Spain. As if a Prince, whose Family was saved from Ruine in his own Countrey, and assisted in another, by British Arms and Wealth, ought to presume as far with his Preserver and Benefactor, as his great Deliverer and Supporter might do with Him.

The Changes went on, and about a Month after the Earl of Sunderland, the Earl of Godolphin was removed, and the Treasury put into Commission; in which Mr. Harley was named. The Earl of Rocheſter was made President of the Council, in the Room of the Lord Somers; the Lord Cowper resigned the Great Seal, which was given to Sir Simon Harcourt: And, to be brief, a total Alteration was made in all Offices of Trust and Profit, which were filled by Men of new Principles. Only the Duke of Marlborough's great Services and Reputation made it unsafe to attempt his Remove as yet. Besides this, the Parliament being dissolved, the Heats raised by the Impeachment of Doctor Sacheverell, turned the popular Stream so much against the falling Party, that the Elections for Members were as much to their Disadvantage, as the Changes at Court.

The Screw-Plot.

The seventh of November this Year was appointed for a Thanksgiving; and a very idle Report was raised soon after about a Plot, which took its Rise from an Advertisement in the London Gazette, relating to some Iron Pins that were supposed to be follen from the great Timbers upon the West Roof of St. Paul's Cathedral; which promised a Pardon, and Reward for the Discovery of the Persons concerned. It was found afterwards that these Iron Pins were left out by the Workmen, who thought the Roof strong enough without them. But this Advertisement coming out a Day or two after the Day of Publick Thanksgiving, when there was some Thoughts that the Queen might come to the Cathedral, it raised a Report among some weak and hot People, that the discontented Party had laid a Plot for killing the Queen and Court at that Solemnity, by letting fall the Roof of the Church upon them. This visionary Plot was afterwards known by the Name of the Screw-Plot.

The Parliament meets.

The Parliament met soon after, being composed chiefly of Persons well affected towards the late Changes at Court. The Commons chose William Bromley, Esq; their Speaker, who is mentioned above to have brought in the Bill to prevent Occasional Conformity. After the usual Forms were over, the Commons went upon the Supply, and passed the Land-Tax Bill so early, that it was ready for the Royal Assent before Christmas. A.D. 1710.

Their Proceedings.

The Duke of Marlborough arrived about this Time from Holland. Though it was well enough known that his Intimacies lay with the discharged Ministry who were become exceedingly unpopular; yet the Fame of his great Actions had instilled such a Veneration for him in the Minds of the People, that he was received at his Return with as great Acclamations as ever. Nevertheless he received not the usual Compliments of Thanks from the Houses, being looked on as one out of Favour, by the Court-Party which prevailed in both. But he was outwardly well received by the Queen and the new Ministers, with whom he dissembled his Discontents; and soon after made a voluntary Resignation of all his Duchesses Places, to save the Court the Trouble of demanding them.

When the Parliament met after the Christmas Adjournment, the Lords enquired into the War in Spain. They passed a Censure upon the Earl of Galway's Conduct there, at the Time of the Battle of Almanza; and upon the Orders sent him by the Ministers. And the Stream of that House being turned, the Earl of Peterborough, whose Conduct was entirely approved, received at last the Honour of their Thanks. The Commons fell upon some Abuses in the victualing the Navy, and brought in a Bill to repeal the Act for general Naturalization, which was rejected by the Lords; as was also a Bill to limit the Number of Officers in the House of Commons. A Bill passed both Houses, which enacted, That no Persons should be chosen Knights of the Shire who had not six hundred Pound per Annum Freehold in Land; or Burgesses under three hundred Pound per Annum. A Bill was also passed for raising Money by Way of Lottery; which met with an extraordinary Success. These Bills received the Royal Assent soon after. A.D. 1711.

The Convocation met as usual, on the Day the Parliament began to sit; and Doctor Atterbury (since Bishop of Rocheſter) was chosen Prolocutor. The old Disputes revived, and the two Houses could not agree upon an Address, which occasioned a Prorogation to still that Quarrel. But a License being sent from the Queen at their next Meeting to empower them to act, this Difference was compromised, and the Convocation addressed the Queen, and were graciously received. The Queen by a Letter recommended to them some Considerations relating to Ecclesiastical Affairs; but nothing was done upon it. The Convocation meets.

The Commons ordered a Bill to be brought in for the building of fifty new Churches in and about London; the Money for which was to be raised by a Tax on Coals for three Years. They afterwards went upon the Publick Debts; upon which a Scheme

A.D. 1711. was formed to incorporate those Creditors of the Publick, for whose Satisfaction no Provision was made by Parliament, into a Company who should have the sole Privilege of trading into the South-Seas; which was a Branch of Commerce not hitherto cultivated, and which promised a plentiful Return. This Scheme produced what is now the South-Sea Company.

Mr. Harley stabbed by Guiscard.

An Accident happened soon after to Mr. Harley, now looked on as Prime Minister, of a very extraordinary Nature, which much increased his Reputation and Character. There was a French Gentleman called the Marquis de Guiscard, who upon some Disgust had left France, and offered himself to the Service of the Allies. He was put on Board the Fleet designed for the Descent upon France in 1706. and was afterwards made a Colonel. But his Regiment being cut off at the Battle of Almanza, he was obliged to apply for a Pension, on which he subsisted. In the mean Time, upon some Discontent, he entered into a Correspondence with France. This being discovered, he was apprehended, and brought before a Committee of Council at the Cockpit near Whitehall. While he was waiting with the Messengers who secured him, he took a devilish Resolution to murder some or other of the Committee, if he should find himself closely pressed; and with this Intent hid a Penknife, which he saw in the Room where he was, in his Sleeve. For what Reason he did this, or who was principally aimed at, is not very certain. The Committee being assembled, Guiscard was called for, and brought in. There were present, the Lord Keeper Harcourt, the Earl of Rochester, the Dukes of Ormond, Newcastle and Buckingham, the Earl Powlet, Mr. Harley, and the three Secretaries of State; the Duke of Queensberry, the Lord Dartmouth, and Mr. Saint-John; who sat round a Table, to one End of which Guiscard was brought to be examined. After a Question or two was asked him, which he denied, his Letters which he had written were laid before him. When he found himself pressed by such convincing Evidence, he resolved to put his murderous Design in Execution; and desired to speak with Mr. St. John aside; to whom he had, it seems, a particular Enmity. But Mr. St. John telling him if he had any Thing to say, he must speak it before the whole Committee; Guiscard thus disappointed, burst out into an open Fury, and taking the Penknife out of his Sleeve, stabbed Mr. Harley, who sat next him, into the Breast. The Blow would certainly have proved mortal, had not Providence so directed it, that the Penknife struck against one of his Ribs, by which it broke within half an Inch of the Handle. But Guiscard's Rage making him insensible of this, he redoubled his Blow with the broken Blade, and struck Mr. Harley a second Time a little above the first Wound; upon which Mr. Harley fell back in his Chair.

What happened next cannot be distinctly related; the Surprize and Confusion of that A.D. 1711. noble Assembly was too great to permit them to observe or remember for some Time. Some drew their Swords, some rung the Bell for the Messengers, others sheltered themselves behind the Tables, or behind those of a more vigorous Age. Mr. St. John, whose Sword was one of the first out, wounded Guiscard in several Places; and some others offering the like, he had been killed, had not the Earl Powlet cried out to save him alive. The Messengers rushed in, and laid hold on him; but Rage increasing his Strength, which was naturally very great, for he was very tall and strong built, he struggled with them a long Time, notwithstanding his Wounds, before he could be secured and bound. It is said as he lay upon the Ground, he cried out to the Duke of Ormond, desiring him to dispatch him; which the Duke answered with a noble Scorn.

Mr. Harley is said to have behaved himself upon this Occasion with the Courage and unconcern of a truly great Man. As soon as he had recovered the sharp Pain of so fierce a Blow, he got up, and walked about; holding his Handkerchief to the Wound to keep it from the Air. The Surgeon being sent for, and unbuttoning his Coat and Waistcoat to come to the Wound, the Piece of the Blade which was broken off dropped out, which he put in his Pocket, saying, He thought he had the best Title to it. He underwent all the necessary and painful Operations of Probing and Dressing usual upon those Occasions, without any Discomposure; and only asked, whether the Wound was mortal, because in that Case, he had some Family Affairs to settle. But the Wound not having reached any Vital Parts, he recovered of it in less than two Months.

This Attempt against Mr. Harley produced an Act to make it Felony to attempt on the Life of a Privy-Counsellor. Upon his Recovery he was complimented by the Speaker of the House of Commons; and not long after made Earl of Oxford, and Earl Mortimer.

Soon after this, the Commons presented to the Queen a Representation of several Mismanagements of the Publick Treasure under the late Ministry. But this Representation was afterwards answered by some of their Friends. This Representation was the last Affair of Consequence done till the Session was ended by a Prorogation.

The Parliament prorogued.

At the latter End of April the Armies in Flanders began to move. The Emperor Joseph dying some Time before, the French proposed to make an Irruption into Germany this Summer; thinking that the Want of their Head would put that great Body into Confusion. To this End the Marechal de Villars, who commanded in Flanders, had Orders to inclose himself in such Lines as should enable him to spare some of his Troops for the Enterprize on Germany. But Prince Eugene, who was sent to the Upper

The Campaigns abroad.

A.D. 1711. Rhine to command the Army there, defeated that Enterprize. In the mean Time the Duke of Marlborough finding his Progress stopped, and his Campaign rendered unactive by the French Precautions, made several Attempts to force the Lines, but in vain. But at Length his consummate Experience in the Art of War furnished him with a Stratagem, by Means of which he got within them without the Loss of one Man. Afterwards he besieged Bouchain, which surrendered in less than a Month. He would probably have now made greater Progresses; but the French Lines, though they could not keep him out, had had this Effect, to make him waste most of the Summer. So that by that Time Bouchain was taken, the Season was so far advanced, that it was necessary to separate the Army.

On the Side of Savoy the French made frustrate the Designs of the Confederates by standing on the Defensive, and securing themselves in a strongly fortified Camp. So that the Duke of Savoy, who had brought his Army to the Banks of the Rhône, was unable to proceed; and having spent the Summer in vain, was forced to repass the Mountains into Piedmont.

The Campaigns in Catalonia and Portugal were as inconsiderable. The only Action of Moment performed in Catalonia, was the raising the Siege of the Castle of Cardona, which being attacked by the Spaniards, was relieved by Count Staremberg, with great Loss of the Enemy. This Summer King Charles left Catalonia, to receive the Imperial Crown of Germany, he being unanimously elected Emperor. And this great Alteration of his Fortune made Way for another in the Measures of Great-Britain, which appeared soon after. In Portugal a small Irruption was at first made into Spain; but the Spaniards making another on their Side, the Portuguese Troops were recalled to defend their own Frontiers.

An Attempt upon the French Settlements in America.

But a very important Undertaking was entered on this Summer in America. It had been made a Complaint of the late Ministry, that they had neglected the Use of our Maritime Power, which seems so peculiarly our natural Strength; and it was suggested that this was done for the Sake of the General at Land, that the Publick Treasure might be employed to advance his Glory. Two great Points were principally our Interest to look after that Way; First, the seizing some Places in the Spanish West-Indies; the second, the regaining the Newfoundland Fishery, which the French had taken from us. This Error of the last Ministry the present proposed to amend; and concerted a Scheme for driving the French from their Settlements in Canada and Newfoundland. Great Preparations were made to this End; and the Secret was so well kept, that no Precautions were taken against it.

A Fleet fails for Quebec.

Towards the End of April, the Fleet under Sir Hovenden Walker, with Land-Forces on Board, set sail from Portsmouth; whence they safely arrived at Boston in New-England, after a Passage of seven Weeks. They continued there above a Month, waiting for Supplies and Reinforcements which they expected from that Plantation, and to refresh the Soldiers. After this they set Sail for Canada, and got to the Mouth of the River of St. Lawrence, on the Banks of which stands Quebec, the head Settlement of the French in North-America, with which it was proposed to begin. But now they began to find such Obstacles as at last frustrated their Design. The River of St. Lawrence is one of the greatest Rivers in the World, but of so dangerous a Navigation from the very Mouth of it, that it is not to be attempted without very skilful and experienced Pilots. But the River being entirely in the Hands of the French, there were none such to be had in New-England. Some few Persons were taken aboard by Force, who were thought capable; but these professed before-hand their Ignorance and want of Skill. The Fleet however set Sail in Hopes of overcoming the Difficulties by Diligence and Care, or of finding them less than the Report. But before they could reach the Gulf of St. Laurence, into which the River empties it self, they were informed by the Master of a French Vessel which they took, that the Dangers were even greater than they were represented. That the Navigation of the River was so dreadful, that when Ships went to Quebec from France, they were obliged to give out that they were bound to another Place, otherwise they could not get their Complements of Seamen; and that of nine Ships that came down the River the Year before, eight were lost. This was very discouraging; for the Town of Quebec, to which they were bound, stood near four hundred Miles up this dangerous Stream. However it was resolved to make an Essay; and the Fleet continued its Course, and entered the River's Mouth. They might have still succeeded, had the Weather favoured them. But the second Day after they entered it, a Calm of several Hours was followed by an extreme thick Fog, accompanied with a hard easterly Wind. The Fleet was in the utmost Peril, being exposed to a Storm in a dangerous and unknown River, where no Anchorage could be had; nor could they, by Reason of the Fog, see which Way to steer to avoid the Danger, nor whither the Stream would bear them if they committed themselves to it. In this Distress it was resolved to bring to, hoping to be carried along by the Current in the Mid-Channel. But the Motion of the Stream was so irregular, that in two Hours they found themselves driven to the Northern Shore amongst Rocks and Islands, where the whole Fleet was near being lost. But at length, by the Force of extreme Toil and Skill, the Men of War got clear of that perillous Coast; but eight of the Transports were cast away, with eight hundred Men, Soldiers and Mariners, on Board. This Disaster being over, the Fleet, after waiting two or three Days to take in the Men who had A.D. 1711. had escaped on Shore from the wrecked Vessels, sailed out of the River; and finding the Season of the Year so far advanced, that the Enterprize could not be safely pursued, they made the best of their Way home. The Disappointment received some Aggravation by the Loss of the Admiral's Ship the Edgar, which soon after her Arrival at Portsmouth, was blown up by some unknown Accident with four hundred Seamen, and thirty of the Inhabitants of Portsmouth on Board, these last being making merry with some of their Friends there.

Which returns without Effect.

Negotiations of Peace begun.

This Year were begun the Negotiations of Peace which brought on the Treaty at Utrecht. In the Middle of April, Propositions of Peace were sent over from France to the Ministers here. Whether this were done by Encouragement from hence, or only because the French Court thought it probable that new Counsellors were likely to follow new Measures, is uncertain. These Proposals were less advantageous than France had offered hitherto. Nevertheless they were so far accepted, as to be communicated to the States of Holland; who returned Answer, That they thought them too dark, and too generally expressed to found a Treaty on, unless they received some farther Explanation.

But the Ministers here were of another Opinion; and in no long Time sent Matthew Prior, Esq; a Gentleman whose Poetical Works have made him sufficiently known, to carry on the Treaty in France. Besides the obvious and general Evils of War, two particular Causes seem to have created in them this extraordinary Fondness for Peace. The first, the Proposal above-mentioned for forming a South-Sea Company, for executing which a Peace was necessary; and the second, the Necessity a War would lay upon them of employing the Duke of Marlborough, who was linked to a different Interest. Mr. Prior, together with his Instructions, received Orders to return immediately, if the French started any Difficulties about what he demanded; but the French were too dextrous Negotiators to comply with his Demands in an Instant; and so put off treating with him, till he was obliged to return. But he came back, accompanied with Monsieur Mefnager, a French Gentleman, who was to carry on the Treaty in England.

This was done without the Knowledge of any of the Confederates. But it happened that Mr. Prior in his Return, was stopped at Deal by some Custom-House Officers; which obliged him to discover his Name, which he had before disguised, and to continue at that Place till he was released by Orders from above. Thus the Matter took Air, and being made known to Count Galles, the Imperial Minister here, he went to expostulate with Mr. St. John about it; who made him Answer, that nothing should be done contrary to the Queen's Engagements with her Allies.

Monsieur Mefnager at his Arrival in Lon- don, entered into Conferences with several A.D. 1711. of the Ministers; and at length the special Preliminaries between Great-Britain and France were agreed on, and signed by the two Secretaries of State on the Part of Great-Britain, and Monsieur Mefnager on the Part of France. A Sett of general Preliminaries was also left here, signed by Monsieur Mefnager, to be made Use upon Occasion; after which he returned to France. And from this Time a perfectly good Correspondence was established between the Courts of St. James's and Versailles. The Reasons that engaged the Ministers to enter into such a sudden Confidence with an old Enemy, whose Dexterity in Negotiations, and Unfaithfulness to Agreements, administered such abundant Cause of perpetual Jealousie and Caution, rather than of Intimacy and Trust, are too mysterious to be known, and too uncertain to be guessed at. The most important Matter of the General Preliminaries was, that Spain and the West-Indies were to remain with King Philip; the Difference of the other Articles from what was formerly insisted on being not so considerable.

Soon after the Departure of M. Mefnager the preliminary Articles he left behind him were made publick. They were received with an universal Dislike. For both Parties, however divided in other Things, agreed in this, to restore Spain and the West-Indies to the House of Austria; it being universally supposed that the Spanish Councils would otherwise be so influenced by those of France, that the Danger of Europe would be the same, as if those Crowns were placed on one Head. So that the Friends of the Ministry were out of Countenance to see so important an Article as this was reckoned, so tamely and entirely given up; and their Enemies were furnished with abundant Matter of Exclamation against them. It was happy for the Ministers that the Party-Feuds had been so outrageous just before. For their Scheme was so generally disapproved, that they had certainly been given up to their Enemies, had not those of their Party been moved to defend them, rather because they would not yield to the opposite Side, and confess themselves mistaken, than because they were satisfied with their Conduct. For in those Days it was thought impossible that a Prince so much indebted to a Nation as Charles III. of Spain had been to ours, should ever forget those high Obligations, or reward them with Affronts and Injuries; and to have suggested that it could ever come to pass that those two Competitors for Spain should enter into an Alliance to the Prejudice of Great-Britain, so strict that neither Gratitude nor Interest could for several Years dissolve it, would have been looked on as downright Frenzy.

The Preliminaries disliked.

Whether the present Ministry foresaw that those strange Things were not so impossible as Men then conceived, or whether the Goodness of God, whose Strength is made perfect in humane Weakness, directed either the Oversights or private Views and Self-Ends of those great Men to his own wife and

A.D. 1711. and gracious Purposes, is what we want Light to determine with Certainty. But be that as it will, the Ministry went on, notwithstanding their Discouragements, and in some Time, by Pamphlets published at proper Seasons (the modern Way of addressing the People) they brought their own Party by Degrees to be fully satisfied with their Measures.

Utrecht appointed for the Place of Treaty.

The Parliament meets.

Their Proceedings.

In the mean Time the General Preliminaries being communicated to the Allies, the Emperor who was always stirring up others, but slack in his own Performances, was for entirely rejecting them. The States-General were slow in their Resolutions; and sent over Monf. Buys, as Envoy Extraordinary upon this Occasion. The Conferences he held with the Ministers were kept secret; but the Result of them was, that the States consented to a Congress. This Consent being gained, the City of Utrecht was appointed for the Place of Meeting; and the Time of beginning the Conferences there was fixed to the first Day of the following Year. The Bishop of Bristol, who was also Lord Privy Seal, and the Earl of Strafford, late Minister at Berlin and in Holland, were appointed Plenipotentiaries on the Part of Great-Britain.

The Parliament met late this Year; its Meeting being put off by several Prorogations, in Expectation of the Turn Affairs would take in so critical a Time. The Articles of the Peace being, as was said, generally disliked, there arose foul Weather about them in the House of Lords. When the House was moved for an Address of Thanks for the Queen's Speech, the Earl of Nottingham stood up, and objected against the Preliminary Articles of Peace as unsafe and dishonourable, and moved that a Clause might be inserted in the Address, signifying that it was the humble Opinion and Advice of the House, that no Peace could be safe or honourable, by which Spain and the West-Indies should be left to the House of Bourbon. This produced a warm Debate. On the one Side were urged, the express Engagements our Nation was under to recover Spain and the West-Indies for the House of Austria; and the dangerous Greatness of the House of Bourbon. On the other Side, the vast Burthen and Expence of the War, to which the Negligence of the House of Austria it self did not a little contribute, was insisted on. The End of the Debate was, that the Clause was carried, and inserted in the Address of Thanks. The Queen gave it an evasive Answer, saying, that she should be sorry any Persons could think she would not do her utmost to recover Spain and the West-Indies from the House of Bourbon.

The House of Commons were more complaisant; for a Clause being offered to be added to the Address of Thanks, of the same Nature with the abovementioned, it was rejected by a great Majority. And an Address expressing a full Satisfaction with the Peace the Queen had in View, was presented, and graciously received.

It happened soon after, that the Bill to prevent Occasional Conformity, which had been so violently thrust upon the Lords by the Commons, and so pertinaciously rejected, was now, by an odd Reverse of Things, set on foot, and carried smoothly in that Assembly that had so warmly opposed it before. The Reason of this is said to be, that the Earl of Nottingham, who had been a great Stickler for it, became discontented with the Proceedings of the present Rulers, and fell in with the opposite Party. These last received him with great Welcome, and agreed to the previous Stipulation he made with them, that they should assist him in carrying this his Favourite Bill. Accordingly this Bill was proposed by the Earl of Nottingham, and his Motion seconded by many of its former Opposers. The Title however, to avoid Scandal, was changed, and some other Things added. Thus both Sides being of a Mind, it went easily through the Lords House; and the Commons being well disposed to it, it was confirmed there.

The Queen had by Patent made the Duke of Hamilton, a Peer of Scotland, a Duke in England, by the Title of Duke of Brandon. But this was opposed by several of the Lords, and the Question coming before the House, it was resolved, by a Majority of five Voices, that Scotch Peers made Peers of Great-Britain since the Union, have no Right to sit in the House as such.

Not long after this, the Duke of Marlborough was disgraced at Court, being turned out of all his Places. He had been continued in them hitherto, partly because it was unsafe to remove him, his great Character being equally acknowledged and respected by both Parties, and partly in hopes of bringing him into the present Measures. But he continued inflexible as to the latter, and the Popularity of the present Ministers among their own Party, prevailed by Degrees over that of the Duke, and Means were found, by many mean and ridiculous Rumours and Stories, to sink his Character with all those of that Side; so that the Disgrace of this great Man, who had been the Admiration of our Countrey, and of all Europe, since the Beginning of this Reign, passed over like an ordinary Occurrence. The Duke of Ormond was made Captain-General of all the Queen's Forces in his Room.

The Ministers had received a great Mortification by the late Address of the House of Lords about the Peace; and they now met with another. The usual Adjournment of Parliament at Christmas drew nigh. At the Conclusion of the Day when that Adjournment was to be made, the Business of the House being over, the Lord Treasurer and other Lords went out, thinking nothing was to be done farther, except the Formality of Adjourning. But the other Side took the Opportunity, and made a Motion, which was carried, for addressing the Queen to give Orders to her Plenipotentiaries to act in Concert with the Allies, and to procure a general

A.D. 1711.

The Duke of Marlborough disgraced.

A.D. 1711. general Guaranty of the Terms of Peace. And the discontented Party finding their Superiority in that House, resolved to push on their Advantage; and to that End, caused the Adjournment to go no farther than the second of January.

Twelve new Peers created. This new Address, and the Fear of farther Attempts at the next Meeting, caused great Alarms among the Ministry. They found their Measures were broken if they were thus continually thwarted by one of the Houses of Parliament. In this Perplexity no other Expedient either would or could be taken but the sudden Creation of twelve new Voices to be ready against the Meeting of the House. To this End two Peers eldest Sons were called up by Writ; and ten Gentlemen, but of prime Rank and Estates, were made Lords. All this was done in a few Days. So that at the Meeting of the

A.D. 1712. House of Lords these new Peers were introduced. An Experiment was then made to try the Strength of both Sides, by a Motion by the Courtiers for a farther Adjournment till the 14th, to which the Commons were adjourned, which was carried in the Affirmative. And thus the Attempts of the discontented Lords were frustrated; and their Measures broken. But this unusual Step raised great Clamours without Doors among that Party; and occasioned a Murmuring and Uneasiness among all serious Patriots; for the Thing was bad, and the Example worse.

Prince Eugene comes into England. The Court of Vienna, alarmed at the Measures taken by Great-Britain, resolved to send Prince Eugene into England, to look after their Interests. They could not have sent a Messenger more welcome or more honoured. He was received with a Profusion of Respects by Persons of all Parties and Ranks; suitable to the Glory and Renown his immortal Actions had purchased. But he was not able to change the Counsels entered into by the Ministry; for which the Remissness and Negligence of the Court from which he was sent, helped them to a very weighty and reasonable Excuse. He brought an Offer from the Emperor to make up his Troops in Spain to thirty Thousand Men, and to take a fourth Part of the Expence upon himself. This was communicated by the Queen to the House of Commons; but so much had been promised before, and so little performed, by the German Court, that no Notice was taken of it. He continued here about two Months; during which both Parties seemed to contend with Emulation to shew their high Esteem and Respect for his particular Person; and the Prudence of his Behaviour towards both in so critical a State of Things was such as became so great and wise a Man. So that though it usually happens that eminent Persons are most revered at a Distance, the Prince, by a rare Conduct, preserved his Character in its full Lustre at a nearer View.

Proceedings of Parliament. The Parliament met according to the Adjournment. The Commons passed a Censure upon Robert Walpole, Esq; he being accused of taking Money on two Contracts for A.D. 1712. Forage for the Queen's Troops; and he was committed to the Tower. The Duke of Marlborough being out of Favour at Court, was attacked in the House of Commons. A Charge was brought in against him for having taken Money of the Contractors for Bread and Bread Waggon for the Army; and for deducting two and a half per Cent. out of the Pay of the Foreign Troops in Flanders in the Service of the Queen; and it was voted, that the taking those Sums was unwarrantable and illegal. The Duke on his Part did not deny the Receipt of this Money; but alledged that it was appropriated by him to the Purchase of Intelligence, which had helped him to many signal Advantages over the Enemy. And it is certain, that no General was ever better served with those important Advertisements than the Duke of Marlborough.

The Business and Employment of the House of Commons was to justify the Measures of the present Ministry, by laying open the Faults of their Predecessors. To this End they examined the State of the War, and voted that the States-General, and the other Allies, had been very deficient in their Quota's of Men and Money towards the Support of the same. They next called for the Treaty called the Barrier-Treaty, concluded between Great-Britain and Holland after breaking off the Conferences at the Hague. In this Treaty they resolved that there were several Articles dishonourable and pernicious to the Queen and Kingdom. The States-General, who apprehended this Censure when the Commons entered upon that Treaty, wrote a Letter to the Queen to offer to rectify what might be thought amiss therein. But this either came too late, or was not regarded. The Commons also sent up a Bill for limiting the Number of Officers in their House, but it was thrown out by the Peers.

In the mean Time, the Ministers of the several Parties concerned in the War assembling at Utrecht at the Time appointed, the Conferences of Peace were entered on. They continued till the Campaign began in May with very little Effect; the Allies being in an ill Humour, and the French tricking and insolent, on Account of the Measures lately taken by Great-Britain.

The Campaign in Flanders this Year had a different Aspect from any of the foregoing. The Duke of Ormond, who succeeded the Duke of Marlborough in the Command, met with Prince Eugene at Tournay; from whence they went together to the Army. But he soon received an Order from London, not to enter upon any Enterprize whether of a Battle or a Siege, till he received farther Directions. What was the Reason of this mysterious Order is hard to guess exactly. The fierce Enemies of the Ministers imputed it to a treacherous Design against the common Cause, or at least to their unwary Engagements with the old Enemy, by whom they were over-reached, and now obliged to

A.D. 1712. make their Court to. The Ministers on their Part alledged, that the Forwardness of some of the Allies in the Negotiations of Peace, who desired to prolong the War at the Expence of Great-Britain, occasioned those Orders. For it was said, that all Things of Importance being agreed on by France, even good Success could only serve to encourage those ill Humours; whereas any Misfortune might give the French a Pretext to unravel all that had been done. There seems to have been a good deal of Truth and Reason both in the Accusation and Defence.

It came to pass soon after that the French Army being viewed, was found posted in such a Manner, as made an Attack very safe and practicable. Whether this happened by Chance, or whether the French, knowing the Duke of Ormond's Instructions, hoped to inflame the Eagerness of the other Commanders for a Battle, that upon their Disappointment, the Feuds among the Allies might be the fiercer, every one may judge as he pleases. Upon this Report, Prince Eugene and the States-Deputies came to the Duke of Ormond, and pressed him to fall upon the French Army in that exposed Situation. This brought the Matter to a Crisis; the Duke, who was directed to disguise his Orders as long as possible, putting off the Proposal with the best Excuses he had, which were but trifling. This Way of Proceeding irritated the others; who being weary of opposing strong Reasons to frivolous Put-offs, at last left him; protesting against all the Mischiefs that might arise from this Conduct.

At the same Time this happened in Flanders, the Bishop of Bristol at Utrecht made a Declaration to the States, that the Queen having found herself ill treated by them, thought herself at Liberty to take separate Measures in order to make a Peace for her own Conveniency.

The News of these Transactions coming over, gave a general Alarm here. In the two Houses of Parliament, the Discontented Party made an Attack upon the Ministry, but in vain; being over-ruled by great Majorities. They caused a great Surprise without Doors among the Friends as well as Enemies of the Ministry; for the great Victories obtained under the Conduct of the Duke of Marlborough relished so well with the whole Nation, ever fond of Military Glory, and the Aversion to France was still so great, that both Parties were well enough agreed to lay that Power as low as possible. So that even the well-affected to the Ministry were much startled to see that all their Steps tended to the Advantage of our dangerous and inveterate Enemy, and to disunite us from the Allies.

The Queen acquaints the Parliament with the Articles of Peace.

Soon after this, all Things being agreed between Great-Britain and France relating to the Peace, the Queen came to the Parliament, to acquaint them with the particular Articles concluded. They contained in Substance, that with Respect to the Concerns of Great-Britain, The Queen and A.D. 1712. Protestant Succession should be acknowledged by France; Dunkirk should be demolished; Gibraltar and Port-Mahon should remain in Possession of Great-Britain; our Trade and Concerns in North-America should be settled in the most beneficial Manner, and the Assiento, or Contract for furnishing the Spanish West-Indies with Negroes, should be granted to the British Nation. With Respect to the Dutch, the same Barrier was offered them which they demanded in 1709, two or three Places excepted; and the Spanish Low-Countries were to be given to the Emperor. Spain and the West-Indies were to remain to King Philip; but to prevent the Union of that Crown with France, he was to renounce in the most solemn Manner for himself and his Posterity, all Pretensions to the French Monarchy for ever.

These were the principal Articles, and they were variously descanted upon. Some said, that if these Conditions of Peace were accepted, they did not see to what End the War was ever begun, or so much Blood and Treasure expended in it. That the Grand Alliance was intended to depress the exorbitant and dangerous Power to which France had arrived, by setting the Duke of Anjou on the Throne of Spain; but that by this Peace, that Power was left in the very same State as at first. That the Renunciation of King Philip offered as a Security, seemed more like a Jest, than a serious Proposal; as if every one did not know of how little Account the most solemn Oaths and Promises are with Princes, when they stand in the Way of their Ambition. On the other Side it was alledged, that the State of Things was much altered since the Beginning of the War; France had received great Defeats and Losses, and instead of threatening Europe, as it did then, had Work enough to defend its own Frontiers; King Philip was then young, and a Frenchman, and by Consequence under Pupillage of his Grandfather; now was advanced in Years, and become a Spaniard by his long Converse with that Nation; Charles III. his Competitor was then a Titular-Prince, without Power or Revenue; now one of the mighty Crowned Heads of Europe. That the French King was grown so old that he could not expect many Years of Life, and that his Death would no doubt introduce a new Face of Affairs in France, and in all Probability cut off the Conjunction between Paris and Madrid. That for these Reasons the Fears which united the Confederacy were passed over, and new and different Measures were now become safe and expedient. That it would be Madness to give the Crown of Spain to the Emperor of Germany, could it be ever so easily done. That whether this could be brought about at all, was doubtful; considering the Uncertainty of the Events of War, and the Firmness of the Spaniards to King Philip. But if it could, it would be very idle to spend Lives and Treasure in a difficult Undertaking,

The Reflections upon them.

A.D. 1712. dertaking, which if it could be at last compassed, would only destroy the Ballance of Power which Great-Britain and Holland had been fighting for so long. As to King Philip's Renunciation, it was said, that though it was indeed a very slender Thing in itself, it would however be effectually made valid by those who were to enjoy the Benefit of it. So that upon the Whole, the Ministers had taken the best and easiest Methods for answering the End for which the War was entered into, and had made all the Use that could properly be made of the Successes that had attended it. As to the Articles which respected the Interest of Great-Britain and Holland, there was no considerable Objection made to them.

The two Houses of Parliament presented their Addresses of Thanks to the Queen for her gracious Communication of these Articles of Peace, with Assurances of their perfect Confidence in her Majesty's Wisdom and Conduct. A Motion was afterwards made in the House of Commons, that the Queen might be addressed to give Instructions to her Plenipotentiaries to invite the several Powers in Alliance with her Majesty to be Guarantees of the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover; but it was rejected by a great Majority. The Addresses of the two Houses about the Articles of Peace were succeeded by others from every Part of the Nation of the same Tenor.

Divisions in the Confederate Army in Flanders.

Mean while in Flanders the Separation between the Duke of Ormond and the other Confederates grew wider and wider. A Cessation of Arms for two Months had been agreed on between Great-Britain and France; and the Duke of Ormond signified the same to Prince Eugene and the other Confederate Generals. This Declaration was very unacceptable, and broke off all Correspondence between the Duke and the other Commanders. The Dutch Deputies and Prince Eugene told the Duke, that his Marching off with the British Troops and the foreign Forces in the Queen's Pay, would leave the rest of the Army to the Mercy of the Enemy; but that they were sure the Foreigners would not march. And their Words proved true; for the States suspecting before that some Measures had been agreed on between Great-Britain and France as were now made publick, had agreed with the German Princes to whom those Troops belonged, to take them into their Pay. So that when the Duke of Ormond commanded them to obey his Orders about the Cessation of Arms, they all excused themselves, and refused to obey any Orders but what should be given them in Conjunction with Prince Eugene, and the Dutch Deputies.

The Negotiations at Utrecht.

At the Time this passed in Flanders, the Bishop of Bristol at Utrecht communicated to the Ministers of the Allies the same Proposals for a Suspension of Arms. The Ministers of the States either were surpris'd, or seem'd to be so; and the other Ministers stood at a Gaze, not knowing what Resolution to take. Only the Emperor's Ministers, according to their Custom, spoke very high, A.D. 1712. and propos'd to the States to renew the Alliance for the Recovery of Spain and the West-Indies, and compassing the other Ends propos'd by the Confederacy; and to this End offer'd, that their Master should furnish and maintain above one hundred thousand Men at his own Charge to carry on the War.

The Dutch were sufficiently perplexed. They knew by long Experience how vain and airy all these magnificent German Promises would prove in the Performance. So that they seem to have been inclined to accept the Proposals of the British Ministers. But while they were wavering in their Resolutions, the Imperial Minister let them know, that if they agreed to a Cessation of Arms, his Master would recal Prince Eugene with all his Forces from Flanders, and leave their State to the Mercy of the French. This Menace seems to have determin'd the Doubt; and the States refus'd their Consent to a Cessation of Arms.

The Condition upon which this Cessation of Arms was agreed on, was, that the Town of Dunkirk should be surrendered to the Queen. This famous Place, which was sold to the King of France by King Charles, as was above taken Notice of, had been by the Force of Art, and at an immense Expence, formed into a commodious Port, and made impregnable both by Land and Sea, by stupendous Works and Fortifications. Its Situation almost over against Dover had made it a cruel Thorn in our Sides during these two Wars with France; being a common Receptacle for the French Privateers which infest'd our Merchant-Ships both in the Channel, and in the German Ocean, to the inexpressible Damage of our Trade.

The Duke of Ormond was preparing to go with the British Troops to take Possession of Dunkirk, when he received a Letter from the Marquis de Torcy, signifying that the Surrender of Dunkirk was agreed on by the French King his Master, on Condition only of a general Suspension of Arms which was not yet brought about. What Design lay hid under this Subterfuge of the French Court is not known; but they soon relinquish'd it, upon what Motive is as uncertain. But instead of the Troops under the Duke of Ormond, a Body of Forces was sent from England to take Possession of it.

Dunkirk possess'd by the British Troops.

Soon after this, the whole Body of the Confederate Forces (having besieged and taken Quesnoy) separated from those under the Duke of Ormond, and invest'd Landrecy. The Duke had a Body of Forces under him that wanted Employment, and which he did not know what to do with, and considered how to dispose of them. At last he resolv'd to move towards Ghent; which being at a Distance from the Seat of the War, which still continued between the French and the other Allies, and also near the Sea, his Troops would be there both safe and quiet, and in a Readiness to embark for England upon Occasion. In his March thither, he was

The Occurrences in Flanders.

A.D. 1712. was forbid Entrance into any of the Towns that were garrison'd by the Dutch.

The Allies surprized at Denain.

The Separation of the Confederates from the British Forces cost them dear soon after. For during the Siege of Landrecy, Prince Eugene had posted a Body of Troops at Denain, about seven Leagues from the Camp before Landrecy. These Troops were placed here to cover the Passage of the necessary Stores from Marchiennes (which was not far from Denain, and where the Magazines of the Allies were) to the Confederate Army employed in the Siege. The Mareschal de Villars formed a Design to surprize these Forces; and found such Means to amuse the Allies, that he came to Denain unexpected and unprepared for. The Spirit and Fortune of the Allies seemed to have left them with the British Power: For as soon as the French began to attack a Line that guarded the Camp, the Soldiers that defended it, appeared in a Consternation. A great Part threw down their Arms, upon the first Discharge; while those, who remembering their former Valour and Victories, stood bravely to their Defence, were surrounded, and most of them cut to Pieces. From thence the French marched to the Camp; and after no very difficult Contention, broke through the Intrenchment, and carried all before them. The Scheld lay behind the Camp, and the Terror and Confusion that had seized the Forces of the Allies was so great, that whole Battalions threw themselves into it at once, to escape the pursuing Enemy. The Loss of the Confederates in Men slain, drowned and taken, was above half the Forces posted there; besides a vast Quantity of warlike Stores.

From this Place the French went to Marchiennes, where the great Magazines lay; and took it with all the Stores laid up there; which Loss soon after obliged Prince Eugene to raise the Siege of Landrecy. A Disgrace that never happened to his great Rival in Fame, the Duke of Marlborough, who by a Turn of good Fortune, peculiar to himself above any General in ancient or modern History, might boast that he never began a Siege or Battle, that he did not happily accomplish. The French followed the Stream of this good Success, and went on conquering throughout the whole Campaign; having retaken before the Armies separated, Douay, Bouchain, and Quesnoy; Prince Eugene himself being unable to stop their Progresses.

During the Summer, the Dispositions towards Peace crept on, but with extreme Slowness. Though the Dutch and Germans stood out, the Duke of Savoy and the King of Portugal came at last into the Suspension of Arms, which was prolonged for four Months. The Lord Lexington was sent into Spain to be Witness of King Philip's Renunciation of the Crown of France; and the same was performed with great Solemnity before an Assembly of the Cortes, or States of Spain.

The Duke of Hamilton was appointed the A.D. 1712. Queen's Ambassador Extraordinary to the Court of France. But when he was upon the Point of Departure on his Embassy, he was stopped by a dismal Accident. The Duke and the Lord Mobun had had a Law-Suit together for near eleven Years, which had produced a most bitter and rancorous Enmity between them. It happened that these two noble Persons were together at the Chambers of a Master in Chancery at the Examination of Witnesses relating to their Cause; when, as it is said, the Duke of Hamilton reflected on one of the Witnesses on the Side of the Lord Mobun. This Reflection, falling obliquely upon the Lord Mobun, and lighting upon an ulcerated Mind, enraged him so, that not content with retorting the Reflection upon the Duke, he sent him afterwards a Challenge, which the other received. On the Day appointed, the two Lords, with General Maccartney and Colonel Hamilton for their Seconds, went into Hide-Park early in the Morning; where the two Principals drew their Swords, and fought with such an implacable and revengeful Fury, that being more intent on hurting each other, than defending themselves, they exchanged so many and such cruel Wounds, that the Lord Mobun fell dead upon the Place, and the Duke died in the Arms of his Servants as they were carrying him to his Coach. General Maccartney, the Lord Mobun's Second, absconded, and went beyond Sea; but Colonel Hamilton surrendered himself. He deposed that General Maccartney had given the Duke a mortal Wound after the Fight was over between the two Lords, which caused a Proclamation to be issued for apprehending him. But the Truth of that Story was then much questioned; and General Maccartney, who came over after the Queen's Death, stood his Trial for the same, and was acquitted.

In the Winter the Negotiations of Peace A.D. 1713. were quickened by a Plan of Peace communicated to the Dutch by the Earl of Stratford, which they at last agreed to. So that the King of Portugal, the King of Prussia, and the Duke of Savoy, being come also into the Queen's Measures, the Conferences of Peace went on so successfully, that before the Spring the Peace was signed by all the Confederate Powers, the Emperor and Empire excepted; who according to the Custom of those who are entirely in the Wrong, were enraged with Great-Britain and Holland, for shewing them that Neglect, which their own ill Conduct had brought upon them. The Parliament, which met soon after, being acquainted with the Conclusion of the Peace, presented their Addresses of Thanks to the Queen; and their Example was followed by the rest of the Kingdom. So that on the fifth of May the Peace was proclaimed in the usual Forms.

The Transactions from the Conclusion of the Peace to the End of this Reign, were of no very great Moment; consisting of violent

A Duel between the Lord Mobun and Duke Hamilton.

The Treaty of Peace signed.

The Peace proclaimed.

A brief View of the Occurrences afterwards.

A.D. 1713. olent Strugglings between the contending Parties, and of Fears and Jealousies raised against those who were in Power, by those who were out of it, upon very important Pretences indeed, but with so great a Smoke, that it could never be clearly seen what Fire lay under. We shall just give an orderly and methodical Account of what passed, without entering into any mysterious Disquisitions, or casting any ill-grounded Reflections.

Proceedings
of Parliament.

Soon after the proclaiming the Peace, the eighth and ninth Articles of the Treaty of Commerce with France were laid before the House of Commons, in order to be confirmed by Act of Parliament. Great Opposition was made to it by the Discontented; who endeavoured to prevent the bringing in of the Bill. They were over-ruled by a great Majority as to the bringing it in; but when it came to be read before the House; and several Traders were heard in Relation to it, the Assembly was so much changed, that the Bill was rejected.

About this Time, there was a great Debate in the House of Lords concerning the dissolving the Union. The Occasion of it was, that the Tax on Malt had been by Act of Parliament extended to Scotland; which was complained of by the Scots, and laid before the House of Lords. Upon this it was proposed, to dissolve the Union between the two Kingdoms; which produced a Division in the House, and brought on an important Debate. The Scotch Lords were unanimous without Respect of Party, for this Dissolution; but the English Members were divided: And by a Change, not much wondered at by those who know the Cabals of Parties, those who opposed the making that Union were now against dissolving it; while those who framed it with great Zeal, as zealously contended to abolish it. But in the End, that Side which was against the Dissolution prevailed.

The Commons addressed the Queen, to know what Equivalent was allowed the French King for the Demolition of Dunkirk; to which she returned a dubious Answer, but told them that it was already in his Hands.

It being stipulated by the Treaty of Peace, that the Pretender should retire out of France, he accordingly left that Kingdom, and went into Lorrain. But some of the Discontented in the House of Lords took Exception against his Abode there, as not sufficiently distant from the British Dominions; and moved to address the Queen, that she would press the Duke of Lorrain to remove him, and all Powers at Amity with her, not to entertain him. This Address was easily carried; and the Queen promised to repeat her Instances with that Duke, that he might be removed. This Answer was laid hold on by the Discontented, as a Ground for another Address, in which they wondered those Instances had not been complied with; which was meant as an Insinuation that no such Instances had yet been made. But the Queen gave it no Answer. An Address of the same Kind with the former of these was presented by the Commons, nem. con. with which the Queen said she would comply.

A Day of Thanksgiving was observed for the Peace; after which, the Term being just expired of the Parliament's sitting, it was dissolved by Proclamation.

The Parliament dissolved.

The Duke d'Aumont the French Ambassador came into England soon after. But that Minister met with an unhappy Accident during his Abode here; the House he lived in being burnt, and a great Quantity of his Goods; upon which he removed to Somerset-House. After this, he made his Publick Entry, which was very magnificent; in which he endeavoured to ingratiate himself with the People, by throwing Money amongst them; a Compliment not often paid to those Attendants.

A French Ambassador comes over.

An Application was made for preserving the Harbour of Dunkirk about this Time, but in vain; and the Demolition was soon after entered upon; by which that Thorn was at last taken away that had lain so long in the Sides of our Commerce.

An extraordinary Book was published in October this Year, entitled, The Hereditary Right of the Crown of England asserted, which made a great Noise; it being a covert Plea for the Right of the Pretender. One Mr. Bedford, a Nonjuring Clergyman, who professed himself the Author, was prosecuted for the same; upon which he was fined, and ordered to walk with a Paper on his Head to the several Courts in Westminster-Hall; but the ignominious Part of the Punishment was, out of Respect to his Character, remitted by the Queen.

The Queen continued a long while in a dangerous State of Health, which gave great Alarms, and caused a Run upon the Bank. But it was thought fit to put a Stop to these Inconveniencies by a Letter from the Queen to the Lord-Mayor; in which she let him know that she was so well, as to think of removing, which made People ease.

The Queen's
Health declines.

Soon after this, the Emperor, who had undertaken to continue alone the War against France, found himself unequal to the Enterprize; and Conferences of Peace were begun at Rastadt, between Prince Eugene on the Part of the Emperor, and the Marechal de Villars on that of France. This was managed with great Secrecy, and in such a Manner, as to affect to put a Slight on Great-Britain. Nor content with this, he moved the Dutch, to enter upon a Treaty with them about their Barrier; and desired it might be carried on at Vienna; which was done to shut out Great-Britain from any Part therein. But the Earl of Strafford, the Queen's Minister, represented to the Dutch the Resentment his Mistress might shew if such an Affront were offered her; so that the Imperial Court had the Mortification to find their Affront returned upon them, by the States declining to enter on any such Conferences of Peace at Rastadt between the

Emperor and
France

A.D. 1714. Treaty without the Queen's Participation.

A new Parliament meets

Their Proceedings.

A new Parliament met shortly after, in which Sir Thomas Hanmer was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons. But the Queen was so much indisposed, that she could not come to approve the Speaker in Person, but was obliged to supply her Place by Lords Commissioners. Not long after was signed the Peace between Great-Britain, and Spain. The two most material Articles of this Treaty were, that the British Nation should have Liberty to trade in the Spanish Dominions in America, bordering on the South-Seas; and that the Fortresses of Gibraltar, and the Island of Minorca, should be for ever yielded to Great-Britain.

The Queen was now so well recovered, that she came to the Parliament, and made a Speech to them; in which the principal Matters were, to acquaint them with the Conclusion of the Treaty of Spain, and to complain of the Insinuations that were spread of the Danger of the Hanover Succession. Her Speech was answered by Addresses from the two Houses; containing their Thanks for the one, and their Abhorrence of the other.

The Proceedings of the two Houses were not very material. In the House of Lords the Discontented endeavoured to give all the Hindrance they could to the Men in Power; but were over-ruled by Majorities. The most important and best-grounded Complaint against them, was their Desertion of the Catalans in the late Treaty with Spain; who, notwithstanding they had resisted their King upon the Encouragement of Great-Britain, were abandoned to his Resentment, and stripped of the Privileges they had so long enjoyed above the other Subjects of the Spanish Monarchy. That unhappy People, enraged to see themselves thus forsaken, entered upon a very rash Attempt, and endeavoured to defend themselves by their own Strength; the Consequence of which was only to bring upon themselves more hard and severe Usage. After this, when the House was upon the State of the Nation, a Question was proposed, Whether the Protestant Succession were not in danger under the present Administration. Upon this many Things were said against the Ministry, and it was observed that some who had hitherto sided with them went over to the other Party: But it was however, carried in the Negative. A Motion was made in that House for addressing the Queen to offer a Reward to any who should bring the Pretender, dead or alive. This was so far agreed on, that a Committee was ordered to draw up an Address to that Purpose; but when the Address came to be read, it was strongly opposed. Some Lords alleged, that it was inhumane and unchristian to set a Price on any Man's Head in that Manner; and gave such cogent Reasons for it, that it was agreed to alter the same; and that the Reward should be only for apprehending and securing him, if he should land, or attempt to land, in the Queen's Dominions. But when it was presented to the Queen, she told them she did not see at that Time any Occasion for such a Proclamation; but when she thought it proper, she would take Care it should be issued out.

Another Clamour was raised against the Ministry, in relation to certain Sums of Money said to be remitted yearly to the Heads of Clans in Scotland; who were known to be in the Pretender's Interest. But when the Matter came to be debated, the Ministers made it appear that it was the same Thing that had been done in King William's Time to keep those People quiet; upon which the House approved their Conduct.

Shortly after this, Baron Schutz the Minister of Hanover came to the Lord Chancellor, and desired him to send over a Writ to the Electoral Prince of Hanover (his present Majesty) to summon him to Parliament under the Title of Duke of Cambridge. But this was so little agreeable to the Queen, that she wrote over to the Princess Sophia, and the Electoral Prince, in very strong Terms, to let them know that she could not allow his coming over at that Juncture; and because Baron Schutz had made this Step without first acquainting the Queen with it, he was forbidden the Court.

The Proceedings in the House of Commons were more quiet than those in the Upper House, the Friends of the Ministry being very powerful there. Nevertheless, an Attempt was made there against them; for upon considering the State of the Nation, the Question was put there also, whether the Protestant Succession were in Danger? But it was carried in the Negative; though in this House also, some of the Partizans of the Ministers forsook them.

The two Houses agreed upon an Address of Thanks for the Peace, which was very acceptable at Court. Soon after the Commons went upon a Bill, which made a great Noise at that Time, but is since repealed, entitled, an Act to prevent the Growth of Schism. This Bill went at last through both Houses, but with great Opposition.

About a Month after this Bill passed, during which nothing of Moment happened in either House, the Queen came to the Parliament to prorogue the same, and made a Speech to them, which proved the last she ever made. It contained only general Expressions of Kindness; after which the Lord Chancellor prorogued the Parliament to the tenth of August.

Soon after the Rising of the Parliament, an open Rupture happened among the Ministry. The Lord Treasurer, and the Lord Bolingbroke had long been at Variance; and there had been of late no good Correspondence between the first of those Lords, and the Lady Masham. These two Enemies of his at last made a Shift to compass his Removal; and July 27. he surrendered the Staff of Lord Treasurer. It was a Matter of great Difficulty to supply that important Place

A Writ of Summons demanded for the Duke of Cambridge.

The Parliament prorogued.

A Rupture among the Ministers.

A.D. 1714. Place at this Time; so that there was no small Confusion and Distraction at Court; to increase which, the Queen was in a dangerous Condition. Several Persons were named to be Commissioners of the Treasury; the Lords Bolingbroke, Paget, Lexington, Batburst and Masbam; the Bishop of London, the Honourable Henry Boyle, Esq; John Bridges, Esq; Commissioner of the Customs, Sir John Packington, Mr. Campion, Mr. Hill, and others. But no Resolution was taken thereupon; and several Persons named, declined accepting such a precarious Employment.

The Queen's last Sickness.

In the mean Time, the Queen grew so ill, that her Life was not to be expected; upon which a Committee of Council met, at which the Duke of Shrewsbury, who was Lord Chamberlain, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, was proposed to be Lord Treasurer; which was agreed to by the Queen, who gave him the Staff, which was the last Act of Regal Authority she exercised; for in a few Hours after she was taken so ill, that she was incapable of attending to any Thing, and in less than two Days she died.

Works of Piety in her Time.

THE principal of these, and which by its Lustre effaces all others of less Importance, was her Majesty's own noble Gift of her Revenue of the First-Fruits and Tenth, for the Augmentation of poor Livings for the better Maintenance of the Clergy. A Charity designed to last as long as the World shall endure, and which will be as long admired. A Medal was deservedly struck upon this Occasion; in which the Queen is represented sitting on her Throne; and delivering an Instrument to a Clergyman, who receives it on his Knees; and is attended by others in the same Habit and Posture.

Casualties in her Time.

IN 1703, Nov. 26. was one of the greatest Storms of Wind that was ever known. It began at twelve o' Clock at Night, and grew fiercer and fiercer till three; from which Time it raged for about four Hours with such a Violence as is scarce to be conceived. It would fill a large Work to relate distinctly the Particulars of the Mischiefs done throughout England in that Space of Time; and the prodigious Effects of the tempestuous Air. Great Numbers of Ships upon and near the English Coasts were cast ashore, or on Rocks, or foundered at Sea; while those who after a thousand Dangers escaped, were scattered and driven by the furious Wind to incredible Distances. On Land, Trees, Forests, Houses, Churches, Towns, felt the Marks of its Rage; few escaping without some Tokens of it, unless they chanced to be fenced by some very peculiar Situation. With this Vehemence the Storm continued from three till near seven, when it abated, and soon after went off; leaving a surprizing Scene of Desolation behind it. It is said, that the Damage which the City of London received by it amounted to near a Million; and that the Loss of the City of Bristol only was near one hundred and fifty Thousand Pounds. Thirteen of the Queen's Men of War were lost, and the Number of Trading Ships that were destroyed is not to be computed. In 1708. there happened a violent Frost, so that the Thames was frozen over, and People crossed it upon the Ice. The Frost it self was of longer Continuance than that in 1683. and the Cold more intense; but as there were some intervening Thaws, the Effects were not so remarkable as of that other. It was very observable that this Frost was incomparably more severe so far South as Italy, than it was in the Northern Countrey of Scotland.

Of her Person and Conditions.

HER Height was of a middling Size, her Shape genteel while she was unmarried, but after she bore Children, she became inclined to Corpulency. Her Hair was dark brown, her Complexion ruddy and sanguine, and her Features strong but regular. When she was in her Infancy, she had a Defluxion in her Eyes, that caused a Contraction in the upper Lids, and gave her Countenance a cloudy Air, which was the only Blemish she had. She was well furnished with those polite Accomplishments that besit and adorn a Birth and Station like hers. She danced very well, and had a fine Ear and a great Relish for Musick; and was herself counted an excellent Performer on the Guitar, an Instrument then in vogue. She had also a good Taste of Poetry, Painting, and all the Liberal Arts. She was an exact Oeconomist, and maintained her Family in great Decorum and Regularity. It does not appear from the History of her Reign, that her Personal Conduct had any remarkable Share in the Glories of it; from whence one may be apt to conclude, that she gave herself up in the Management of Affairs of State to the Direction and Advice of her Ministers. Yet she knew very well how to put on the Majesty of a Queen, when she had occasion; and it was particularly observed of her, that she appeared to great Advantage in her Speeches to her Parliaments, having a clear harmonious Voice, and a very graceful Manner of Delivery. The distinguishing Part of her Character was a deep Sense and constant Exercise of the Christian Virtues of Piety and Charity, rarely to be found among such as have lived continually amidst the Splendor of Courts, and the Pride of Authority and Command. Her Love to her Religion appeared very signally in the Part she had in the Revolution; as her Gift of the First-Fruits and Tenth to the poor Clergy will be an everlasting Monument of her Charity and Beneficence.

Of

Of her Death and Burial.

SHE had been troubled a great Part of her Life with the Gout, which some Time before her Death caused an Imposthumation in her Leg. This might have been rather a Means of prolonging her Life, had it continued to take that Course; but it happened on a sudden, that the gouty Matter stopped its Course that Way, and fell upon her Brain. On Thursday July 29. she was taken with a shooting Pain in her Head, attended with a dozing Heaviness; upon which she was let Blood by Cupping, which gave her Relief, so that she rose the next Morning, and had her Head combed. But not long after she was taken with a Fit like that of an Apoplexy; upon which she was let Blood. This brought her to herself; but she fell into the same at three that Afternoon; from which being recovered, she fell into a dozing Heaviness, which continued upon her with little Interval of Sense till she died, which happened on Sunday August 1, about seven in the Morning, in the fiftieth Year of her Age, and in the thirteenth Year of her Reign, which had now continued twelve Years, and five Months, wanting seven Days. August 24. she was interred in Westminster-Abbey.

MAYORS and SHERIFFS of LONDON in this Queen's Reign.

In 1702.

SIR William Gore, Mayor.
Sir William Withers, Sir Peter Floyer,
Sir James Bateman, Sheriffs.

In 1703.

Sir Samuel Dashwood, Mayor.
Sir Robert Bedingfield, Sir Samuel Garrard, Sheriffs.

In 1704.

Sir John Parsons, Mayor.
Sir Gilbert Heathcot, Sir Joseph Wolf, Sheriffs.

In 1705.

Sir Owen Buckingham, Mayor.
Sir John Buckworth, Sir William Humphreys, Sheriffs.

In 1706.

Sir Thomas Rawlinson, Mayor.
Sir Charles Thorold, Sir Samuel Stanier, Sheriffs.

In 1707.

Sir Robert Bedingfield, Mayor.
Sir William Benson, Sir Ambrose Crawley,
Sheriffs.

In 1708.

Sir William Withers, Mayor.
Sir Benjamin Green, Sir Charles Peers, Sheriffs.

In 1709.

Sir Charles Duncomb, Mayor.
Sir Charles Hopson, Sir Richard Guy, Sheriffs.

In 1710.

Sir Samuel Garrard, Mayor.
Sir Richard Hoare, Sir Thomas Dunch, Sheriffs.

In 1711.

Sir Gilbert Heathcot, Mayor.
Sir George Thorold, Francis Eyles, Sheriffs.

In 1712.

Sir Robert Beachcroft, Mayor.
Sir John Cass, Sir William Stewart, Sheriffs.

In 1713.

Sir Richard Hoare, Mayor.
Sir William Lewen, Sir Samuel Clark, Sheriffs.

In 1714.

Sir Samuel Stanier, Mayor.
Sir Francis Forbes, Sir Joshua Sharp, Sheriffs.

THE REIGN OF King GEORGE I.

A.D. 1714.

The King ordered to be proclaimed.

AS soon as the Queen's Death was known, many Lords, Privy-Counsellors, and other Persons of Distinction of both Parties assembled at St. James's Palace.

By an Act passed in the Queen's Reign, the Administration of the Government, in case the Successor should be in Foreign Parts, was to devolve, till his Arrival, on the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other great Officers of the State, besides a Number to be appointed by the Successor to be added to them. Accordingly Dr. Tenison Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Harcourt Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Buckingham Lord President of the Council, the Duke of Shrewsbury Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Strafford first Lord Commissioner of the Admiralty, and Sir Thomas Parker Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, became Lords Justices by Virtue of the Act. Then the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and the Resident of Brunswick, in whose Hands three several Instruments had been lodged by the Elector, according to the Act, produced the same, and it appeared that his Electoral Highness had named therein the following Persons, to wit, the Archbishop of York, the Dukes of Shrewsbury, Somerset, Bolton, Devonshire, Kent, Argyle, Montrose and Roxburgh, the Earls of Pembroke, Anglesea, Carlisle, Nottingham, Abingdon, Scarborough and Orford; the Lord Viscount Townshend, the Lord Hallifax, and the Lord Cowper, to be added to the other Lords Justices. Then Orders were given for proclaiming the King, which was done, first in the City of London, and then in every Part of the British Dominions, with universal Applause and Satisfaction.

An Express was sent to Hanover by the Elector's Minister, with an Account of this; and the Lords Justices also sent the Earl of Dorset with the same Advice.

Pursuant to the same Law which enacted the Method above mentioned, of appointing Lords Justices upon the Queen's Demise, the Parliament assembled on the Afternoon of the Day on which she died. The Speaker being in Wales, it was moved, that they should adjourn for three Days, but this was opposed, and it was carried that the Adjournment should be only till the next Day, at which Time the Members took the Oaths appointed by Law.

Aug. 5. The Lords Justices issued out a Proclamation, requiring all Persons in Offices to proceed in the Execution thereof, and to take the Oaths. The same Day they went to the Parliament; when the Lord Chancellor gave the two Houses an Account of what had been done since the Queen's Death, and desired their Assistance in the publick Cares and Concerns, which was answered by suitable Addresses from both Houses. After this, the House of Commons went upon a Bill for the Support of his Majesty's Household, and of the Honour and Dignity of the Crown, and seven hundred Thousand Pounds per Ann. was appointed to that End.

While this was done in Great-Britain, the News of the Queen's Death, and of the Proclamation of his Majesty was brought to the Court at Hanover. Mr. Craggs who was dispatched before the Queen's Death, but when all Hopes were past, was sent back with Letters for the Lords Justices, signifying the King's Intention to come over as soon as possible; the Substance of which was communicated by the Lords Justices to the Parliament. And soon after the Bill for the Support of the King's Household passed both Houses, and with another Money Bill received the Assent of the Lords Justices. And this being done on the twenty fifth of August, the Lords Justices came and prorogued the Parliament, which never sate again.

A.D. 1714.

The Parliament assembles.The News of the Queen's Death carried to the King.

A.D. 1714. Aug. 24. The Funeral of the late Queen was performed in Westminster-Abbey, with the Ceremonies used to the Remains of Princes, but in a private Manner. Her Body had been opened two Days after her Death, and her Vitals appeared very sound, only some Water was found in the Abdomen. But the Queen having given Orders that her Head should not be examined, that Part was let alone.

The Queen's Funeral.

Aug. 28. An Express arrived from Hanover, with Orders for the Regency and Council; one for preparing a Patent to create the Prince Royal Prince of Wales; and another for removing the Lord Bolingbroke from being Secretary of State; upon which the Doors of his Office in the Cockpit were locked and sealed up.

The King comes to Great-Britain.

On the last Day of August the King and Prince set out upon their Journey to Great-Britain. On the fourth of September they were met on the Frontiers of the Republick of Holland, by the Deputies of the States-General, who paid them the Compliments usual on such Occasions; and as they passed through the Territories of the States, were received every where with a Profusion of Respects. On the sixteenth they went on board the Royal Yachts, which were brought to Oranje-Polder; on the seventeenth they arrived at Gravesend, and the next Day at Greenwich. The Morning after the King's Arrival there, he sent Word to the Duke of Ormond, who came to wait on him, that he had no farther Occasion for his Service as Captain-General. The Earl of Oxford, who came there also to pay his Respects, had barely Leave to kiss the King's Hand, without exchanging a Word.

A total Change in all Offices.

Next Day the King made his Entry into the City, and arrived at St. James's, after which he began to apply himself to the Exercise of his Regal Authority. This occasioned very great and quick Alterations; the several Offices of Trust and Power being almost entirely put into new Hands. The Duke of Marlborough was made Captain-General in the room of the Duke of Ormond; the Lord Cowper, Lord Chancellor, in the Place of the Lord Harcourt; the Earl of Nottingham, Lord President of the Council, in the room of the Duke of Buckingham; and, in a Word, a total Change was made in the Body of the Ministry; which Change also reached to all other (even to the most inferior) Posts and Offices in the Disposal of the Crown; and it appeared that the King intended to use the Service only of one Sort of Men.

The Princess of Wales comes to England.

October 11. Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales landed at Margate; being accompanied with her Daughters, the Princesses Anne and Amelia; upon which the Prince her Consort, set out to meet her, and conducted her on the thirteenth through the City of London to the Palace of St. James's.

The King's Coronation.

October 20. The Ceremony of the King's Coronation was performed with great Solemnity and Magnificence; several Advancements having been before made in the Body of the Peerage to make the Appearance more illustrious; to which the extraordinary Brightness of the Day, and Clearness of the Weather (the Time of the Year considered) did much contribute. Only the Lustre of this Pomp happened to be clouded by an unhappy Accident; some of the Scaffolds built for the Convenience of Spectators breaking down, by which several were killed and dangerously hurt; on which unfortunate Persons the King was pleased to bestow many kind Marks of his paternal Tenderness and Concern. But such was the Unhappiness of our Countrey, that our Party-Divisions, which at the King's first Coming had been changed into an unanimous and universal Joy and Welcome, were now broke out again so furiously, that in several Cities and great Towns of England, great Riots were occasioned by the Celebration of this Day; the two Factions being so mutually inflamed, that they took all Opportunities of provoking and exasperating each other.

October 29. The King with the Royal Family went into the City, at their Invitation, to grace the Inauguration of the new Lord Mayor with their Presence; and at parting his Majesty ordered a Thousand Pounds to be paid to the Sheriffs for the Release of Prisoners for Debt.

The King dines in the City.

Little of Moment happened abroad at this Time, excepting that a Treaty was concluded at Baden in Switzerland, between the Emperor and Empire on one Part, and the French King on the other; which put a final End to the long War that had infested Europe so many Years.

The Treaty of Baden.

Several Copies of a Declaration of the Pretender, dated from Plombieres in Lorraine, were at this Time sent by the French Mail to several Persons of Quality in England, who delivered them to the Secretaries of State; upon which the Marquis de Lamberti, the Duke of Lorraine's Minister, was forbid the Court; and though the Duke afterwards excused himself, yet the Excuse not being thought satisfactory, the Marquis went home soon after.

A Declaration of the Pretender.

November 27. Several Persons were tried at Bristol for a Riot committed on the King's Coronation Day; of whom nine were found guilty, and one acquitted. Two others were also indicted, one for Murder then committed, the other for Felony and Burglary, of which the first was acquitted, and the second found guilty of Felony only. One Francis Stephens, whose House was assaulted by the Mob, was indicted for killing a Man at that Time; but it being found that he did it in Defence of his House, he was acquitted.

Persons tried for a Riot at Bristol.

January 11. A Proclamation was published against a Pamphlet entitled, English Advice to the Freeholders of Great Britain, then dispersed to influence the Elections in the new Parliament, the old one having been dissolved November 5.

January 15. A Proclamation was published in Form for electing a new Parliament; in which many Reflections were contained.

A Proclamation for a new Parliament.

A.D. 1714. tained on the late Ministry, and the Electors were moved to send up to Parliament such Persons as had shewed the most Firmness to the Protestant Succession, when it was in Danger.

A Fire in Thames-street. January 13. A Fire broke out near Bear-Key in Thames-Street, by which above a hundred and twenty Houses were destroyed, being either burnt, or to stop the Progress of the Fire, blown up. The Loss was computed at above five hundred thousand Pounds, and about fifty Persons lost their Lives.

Dutch Ambassadors make their Publick Entry. March 9. Messieurs Van Duyvenvoord and Van Borsselen, Ambassadors Extraordinary from the States, made their Publick Entry; and three Days after made their Compliments of Congratulation to the King, and the Prince and Princess of Wales.

The Parliament meets. Their Proceedings. March 17. The Parliament met at Westminster. The Prince of Wales being first introduced into the House, and taking his Seat there with the usual Ceremonies, the King signified to the Commons that they should return to their House, and chuse a Speaker; which they did, and elected Spencer Compton Esquire. On the twenty first his Majesty coming a second Time to the House of Peers, the Speaker of the Commons was presented and approved. Then the Lord Chancellor read to both Houses the King's Speech; in which, besides the usual Motions for Supplies, and Exhortations to Unanimity and Affection, great Complaints were made of the Conduct of the former Government. It was answered by suitable Addresses from both Houses.

March 29. The Commons voted a Supply; and on the thirty first resolved to address the King, to order certain Papers of different Kinds relating to the Proceedings of the Ministry in the late Reign, to be laid before the House; which was taken for the Prelude to an Impeachment.

Lord Bolingbroke goes over to France. Before this Resolution was passed, the Lord Bolingbroke went privately over to France in Disguise; but the Earl of Oxford continued to wait the Event.

April 9. The Papers desired by the Commons were laid before the House by Order of the King; and it was moved that a select Committee of Twenty might be appointed to look over them, and digest the Substance of them under proper Heads, and report the same, with their Observations thereupon to the House. And accordingly such a Committee was appointed, only with the Addition of one to the Number. And it was ordered that the said Committee should be a Committee of Secrecy.

The Committee of Secrecy.

Their Report, upon which several Persons are secured and impeached. June 9. Mr. Walpole, from the Committee of Secrecy, acquainted the House of Commons, That he had the Report to present from the Committee, but moved, left some Persons therein concerned should make their Escape, that the Speaker might issue out his Warrant for apprehending such Persons as the Chairman of the Committee should name: and that no Members might be permitted to go out, which was agreed to. And upon this, Mr. Prior, and Mr. Thomas Harley, were taken into Custody.

The Report was then read on that Day, and the next; and it was at length, after many Debates, agreed to impeach the Earl of Oxford, the Lord Bolingbroke, and the Duke of Ormond of High Treason, and the Earl of Strafford of High Crimes and Misdemeanors.

July 15. A Letter was read in the House of Commons from Staffordshire, giving an Account of several great Disorders committed there by Men assembling themselves to pull down Meeting-Houses; upon which the House addressed the King to give Directions to put the Laws in Force against such riotous Proceedings. And soon after the Act was passed against Riots; which Act, with some others, received the King's Assent July 20. after which the Lord Chancellor read the King's Speech; in which he acquainted the Houses that he had received certain Advice that an Invasion was attempting from abroad, and Designs were carrying on at home, in favour of the Pretender. And upon this, the House of Commons resolved immediately to present to his Majesty an Address of Lives and Fortunes; and soon after an Act was made to empower the King to secure and detain suspicious Persons. To this was added a Clause for granting a hundred thousand Pounds to such as should seize and secure the Person of the Pretender, in case of an Invasion.

Meeting-Houses pulled down.

On the third of September, the Earl of Mar met at Aboyne in Scotland, with several of the Nobility and Gentry of that Kingdom; where they resolved to draw together immediately what Number of Men they could, and march towards the South. Accordingly, the Earl of Mar caused the Pretender's Standard to be set up on the sixth of that Month. On the ninth, he published a Declaration, summoning all Persons to appear in Arms.

An Account of the Rebellion in Scotland and England.

About the same time, the Rebels formed a Conspiracy to surprize the Castle of Edinburgh, which was to have been executed on the eighth, after the following manner. They were to have scaled the Wall on the West side of the Castle, by Ladders of Ropes, which were to be pulled up by Lines let down from within by some Soldiers whom they had corrupted. The Conspirators did accordingly rendezvous at the Foot of the Castle-Wall at the Time appointed, and a Rope was let down, and fixed to one of the Ladders; but an Officer of the Garrison who was going his Rounds, surprized the Soldier that was drawing it up in order to fix it on the Top of the Wall; upon which he ordered a Centinel, who was posted near the Place, to fire. This gave such an Alarm to the Conspirators, that they fled and dispersed themselves; leaving behind them their Ladders and Firelocks, to make their Escape the better. Four of them were taken by the Life-Guard, who were patrolling near the Castle. By the Confession of those

A.D. 1715, those that were taken, about eighty Persons were engaged in this Design.

In the mean time, there was such a Conflux of the Rebels to the Earl of Mar, that in a few Days they amounted to some Thousands. They possessed themselves of Aberdeen, Perth, Dundee, and other Towns; in all which they proclaimed the Pretender, seizing the publick Money that was in the Hands of the Collectors and Receivers, and giving Receipts for it in the Name of the King they had set up. Thus they were Masters for some time; the Duke of Argyle, who was sent to command the King's Forces that were assembled to suppress them, being obliged to post his Troops under the Cannon of Sterling to defend that Pass, and keep the Rebels from advancing to the South.

But at the same time, there began another Insurrection in the North of England, in Concert with the Scots. Mr. Forster, Knight of the Shire for Northumberland, with the Earl of Derwentwater, and the Lord Widdrington, assembled their Friends in the Beginning of October, and appeared in Arms at Alnwick, within six Miles of Newcastle, where they proclaimed the Pretender, Forster taking upon him the Title of General of his Forces. Their first Design was to have seized Newcastle; but they were prevented by the Townsmen, who took up Arms, barricaded their Gates, and made other Preparations to defend the Place; in-somuch that the Rebels did not think fit to attack it, but marched away to Wakeworth, Felton and Hexham. In this last Place they expected to be joined by some of the Scots; and accordingly an Attempt was made to that Purpose after the following manner.

In the Night between the twelfth and thirteenth of October, about fifteen hundred Scots, commanded by Brigadier Mackintosh, passed over the Firth in Boats from Fife. Some of the King's Frigates lay in the Firth, but could not fall down soon enough to intercept them; only a large Boat, that had been manned out from Leith, fell in among them, and took one of theirs, in which there were about forty Highlanders. On the thirteenth, about Noon, they arrived at Haddington; from whence they advanced the next Day, towards Edinburgh; and came within a Mile of it, about six in the Evening. But being informed that the Gates were shut, and that the Inhabitants were in Arms to defend the Place, and prevent their scaling the Walls, they filed off to Leith, and entered it without Opposition.

The Duke of Argyle hearing of this Motion, sent out first a Detachment of Dragoons, and then marched himself from Sterling with another Party, to Edinburgh. But the Rebels at Leith being informed of this March, put themselves in a Posture to receive him; and did it so successfully, that the Duke of Argyle would not venture to attack them without Cannon. Upon this, he went to Edinburgh, to bring some great Artillery from thence; but in the mean time, the Rebels marched off by Night; and taking the Opportunity of a low Ebb, marched off by the Sands Eastward, and came to Seaton-House, in the County of Lothian.

While these Things happened, another Rising was begun in the Southern Parts of Scotland. On the sixth of October the Earl of Wintoun left his Seat at Seaton, and carried with him about fifteen of his Servants: And on the tenth, he was joined by the Earl of Carnwath, and the Lord Viscount Kennmure, at Moffet, in the County of Annandale; where they formed a small Body of Men, of whom the Lord Kennmure took upon him the Command.

They marched about the Country for five Days, after which they were joined at Wooler by Forster and his Party; and thus united, they marched to Kelfo in Tiviot-dale, where the Highland Foot commanded by Mackintosh joined them. Thence they went back to Jedburg, where upon a false Alarm that the King's Forces under General Carpenter were at hand, and came to attack them, they marched out of the Town, and drew up to receive them. But it appearing that the Forces they took to be the King's, were a Party of their own Men, they returned to Jedburg, and thence went to Langholm, where between five and six hundred of the Highland Foot, who refused to march into England, left them, and returned to their own Country.

But the Party which remained marched forward into England, and on the third of November came to Appulby. Here the Militia of Cumberland and Westmoreland, which the Earl of Carlisle and the Lord Lonsdale had assembled, met them; but as soon as the Rebels came near, they betook themselves to their Heels; so that the Rebels, meeting no Opposition, plundered the Lord Lonsdale's House, and carried off all the serviceable Horses they could light on. Thence they advanced still Southward, and came to Lancaster; where finding seven or eight Pieces of Cannon, they seized them, and fitted them with Carriages. They stayed there two Days, and on the third Day marched to Preston, which they made themselves Masters of without any Opposition; a Regiment of Foot, and some of the County Militia, retiring from thence to Wigan.

In the mean time, the Duke of Argyle, being uncertain which Way the Rebels would bend their March, sent two Parties, one to Kilsyth, and another to Falkirk, to oppose their passing the Head of the Forth; in case they should, in retiring from before General Carpenter, endeavour to get to the Earl of Mar. On the other hand, General Carpenter, who went to Newcastle to secure that Place, upon which he apprehended the Rebels might have a Design, being informed that they had taken a quite different Course, followed them as fast as he could, with three Regiments of Dragoons; leaving a Regiment of Foot behind him, because they could not bear

A.D. 1715: bear such swift Marches as he was obliged to make. General Wills also, who was then at Chester, having Advice that the Rebels were marching towards Lancashire, went to Manchester to prevent them, with a Regiment of Foot; and was soon after joined there by four Regiments of Dragoons. Thence he went to Wigan, where he found another Regiment of Dragoons, and one of Horse.

With this Force he set out against the Rebels, who continued at Preston; and about One in the Afternoon, Nov. 12. he arrived at Ribble-Bridge, which is a small Mile from Preston. Several of the Rebels Horse and Foot were posted there to defend it; but upon the Approach of the Kings Troops, they retired into the Town without disputing the Passage. As soon as the King's Forces had gained the Rising Ground near the Town, the Troops drew up while the General viewed the Avenues; which he found strongly barricaded, and two Pieces of Cannon planted upon each Barricade.

The Town has two Avenues, one that leads to Wigan, and another to Lancaster; both of which the General determined to attack at once. The Disposition being made, and the Troops ready, the General gave Orders to the Brigadiers that commanded the two Attacks, to march, and gain the Ends of the Town, and set the Houses on Fire, to dislodge, by that means, the Rebels from their Barricade, and to make such Lodgments for their Men, as would prevent the Rebels falling out upon them, or making their Escape.

Brigadier Honeywood, with the Troops under his Command, marched and attacked the first Barrier, which they immediately abandoned, and retired to the second Barricade, which was very strong both by Nature and Art. The Brigadier, finding it would cost him a great many Men to take the Barricade, thought it more proper to possess himself of two great Houses within fifty Yards of it, by which he secured his Men from the Fire of the Rebels, which was very great, and annoyed them very much from the Windows. He continued in that Situation till Night; by Favour of which, he threw up Breast-works to secure himself from Sallies, and posted his Men so, that it was not possible for any to make their Escape out of the Town. And as soon as he had got his Men under Cover, he ordered the Houses between him and the Barricade to be set on Fire; which was done accordingly, though not without the Loss of some Men.

Brigadier Dormer, with the Troops under his Command, gained the End of the Town; but they sustained a great Fire in their Approach; however, they set the Houses on Fire, which burnt up the Barricade. A little before Day the General viewed all the Posts, and gave Orders for making a Communication between the two Attacks, to sustain each other in case they were pushed.

November 13. General Carpenter arrived, with the Regiments of Cobham, Churchill, and Molesworth, about ten o' Clock. At three in the Afternoon the Rebels, finding themselves surrounded, sent out Col. Oxborough to ask for Terms; to which the Generals answered, That they must surrender at Discretion. Upon this they sent out again, to demand Time till Seven the next Morning, to deliberate. The Generals sent two Officers into the Town to acquaint the Rebels; that the Time desired should be allowed them, provided they sent out an English Lord and one of the Mackintoshes for Hostages, that none within the Town should attempt to escape, and that they should make no new Works. This being agreed to, the Earl of Derwentwater and Colonel Mackintosh were sent out as Hostages; and early the next Morning, the Rebels surrendered at Discretion. Their Numbers were found to be, four hundred sixty three English, and one thousand and five Scots; of whom a great Part was sent up to London, the rest being dispersed into the neighbouring Prisons.

On the same Day this happened in Lancashire, an Encounter passed in Scotland near the City of Dumblane, between the King's Forces there under the Duke of Argyle, and the Rebels under the Earl of Mar. The Particulars of this Fight are uncertain, and the Event doubtful; the two Sides concerned in it having published very different Accounts of both. This is certain, that neither Party pursued the other after the Action; but soon after parted, and went different Ways; the Duke of Argyle to Sterling, and the Earl of Mar to Perth.

Dec. 22. The Pretender landed in Scotland at Peterhead, in a small French Ship; accompanied with only six Gentlemen, among whom was the Marquess of Tinmouth, the Duke of Berwick's Son. He dispatched an Express immediately to the Earl of Mar, to acquaint him therewith; upon which, the Earls of Mar and Marischal, and others, set out with a Party of Horse to meet him. He passed through Aberdeen unknown, he, and all that were with him, being clothed like Sea-Officers. On the twenty seventh, the Earl of Mar and his Company joined him: He then issued out his Declaration, too long to be here inserted.

January 6. He made a Publick Entry into Dundee on Horseback, with about three hundred Persons attending him on Horseback likewise; the Earl of Mar being on his Right, and the Earl Marischal on his Left. He continued about an Hour in the Market-Place; the People kissing his Hand all the while. Next Day he left Dundee, and the Day after arrived at Scoon; the Place where the Kings of Scotland use to be crowned.

It was observed that in none of the Places through which he passed, he ever went to a Protestant Church, though of the Episcopal Persuasion; as many expected, and others confidently reported he would do; but on the contrary, having brought his

A.D. 1715. own Confessor, and not a few Papists from France, he constantly performed his Devotions with them after the Romish Way.

January 9. He made his Publick Entry on Horseback into Perth, and having viewed the Garrison, returned in the Evening to Scoun, where he fixed his Council, and issued out several Proclamations. One for a General Thanksgiving for his safe Arrival, another for praying for him in Churches, a third for the Currency of Foreign Coins, a fourth for summoning the Meeting of a Convention of Estates, a fifth for all fencible Men, from sixteen to sixty, to repair to his Royal Standard; and a sixth for his Coronation on the twenty third of that Month; which Ceremony was not performed.

While these Things were transacting among the Rebels, the Duke of Argyle was preparing to attack them in Perth; of which they having Advice, sent out three Thousand Highlanders, who plundered and burnt the Countrey between that Town and Dumblane. But these Precautions stood them in little Stead. For the Duke of Argyle, being joined by the six Thousand Dutch Soldiers, whom the States of Holland, in Pursuance of their Treaties with Great-Britain, had sent to the King's Assistance, and having likewise received the Train of Artillery that he expected, broke up from Sterling on the twenty ninth of January, and marched from thence, with the King's Army under his Command, to Dumblane. On the thirtieth he came to Tullibardine, where he rested on the thirty first, to give Time to the Countrey People to clear and repair the Roads. The Pretender having Notice of these Motions of the King's Army, came from Scoun to Perth on the thirtieth, and about eleven in the Forenoon abandoned that Place; the Rebels retiring with so much Precipitation, that they left their Cannon and Waggons behind them, except three of the larger Pieces, which they threw into the River. They passed the Tay over the Ice, and retired towards Dundee. The Duke of Argyle received Advice of this Retreat of the Rebels at Tullibardine on the thirty first, and marched the same Evening, with General Cadogan, and a great Detachment of Horse and Foot, and arrived at Perth at two in the Morning of the following Day; and on the same Day in the Afternoon, he was joined there by the rest of the Army.

The Pretender returns to France.

On the fourth of February, the Pretender received Advice at Montrofs about four in the Afternoon, that Part of the King's Army was advancing to Aberbrothock, a Town within eight Miles of that Place; upon which he ordered the Clans, which had remained with him after his Flight from Perth, to be ready to march about eight that Night towards Aberdeen, where he assured them a considerable Force would soon come to them from France. At the Hour appointed for their March, the Pretender ordered his Horses to be brought before the Door of the House in which he lodged, and the Guard which usually attended him, to mount, as if he designed to go with the Clans to Aberdeen; but at the same Time he slipped privately out on Foot, accompanied by only one of his Domesticks, went to the Earl of Mar's Lodgings, and from thence, by a By Way, to the Water-side, where a Boat waited, and carried him and the Earl of Mar on Board a French Ship of ninety Tons. And some others of his Party being afterwards fetched on board, the Ship hoisted Sail, and put to Sea; the others on Shore being left to shift for themselves. In five Days Time he landed at a Place between Gravelines and Calais.

We now turn to the Affairs of Parliament. January 9. The two Houses met, and the King came to the House of Peers, where in his Speech he took Notice to them of the happy Success his Arms had met with in suppressing the Rebellion. Upon the Return of the Commons to their House, it was agreed there to impeach of High Treason, James Earl of Derwentwater, William Lord Widdrington, William Earl of Nithisdale, George Earl of Wintoun, Robert Earl of Carnwath, William Viscount Kenmure, and William Lord Nairn; which Lords had been made Prisoners after the Action at Preston; which was done accordingly, and the Articles drawn up, and presented to the House of Lords.

January 23. The impeached Lords were brought to the Bar of the House of Peers, where all of them, except the Earl of Wintoun, did, either by Writing, or by Word of Mouth, plead guilty to the Articles of Impeachment; and on the ninth of February they were brought to the Court erected at Westminster-Hall, where the Lord Cowper, Lord High Chancellor of Great-Britain, who was made Lord High Steward for that Solemnity, after an excellent Speech, pronounced Sentence of Death upon them; and they were remanded to the Tower.

Great Solicitations were made for them to both Houses. In the House of Commons it was moved, in order to avoid Importunities of that Kind, that the House should adjourn to the first of March, before which Time they were to be executed; and it was carried in the Affirmative by seven Voices only. But in the House of Lords, a Motion being made that an Address be presented to his Majesty, that he would be pleased to reprieve, according to his Discretion, such of the condemned Lords as should appear to deserve his Mercy, it was carried to present such an Address by a Majority of five Voices.

Feb. 23. Orders were sent for the Execution of the Earl of Derwentwater, the Lord Kenmure, and the Earl of Nithisdale, by Beheading; and for reprieving the others. The Earl of Nithisdale found means to escape that very Evening in Womens Apparel; but the Earl of Derwentwater and the Lord Kenmure suffered according to their Sentence.

March 15. came on the Tryal of the Earl of Wintoun, one of the impeached Lords; the Lord Cowper being again Lord High Steward. That Nobleman had thought fit

A.D. 1716. to plead Not Guilty to the Impeachment of the House of Commons, and gave in an Answer to the same; to which the Commons having replied, he was this Day brought upon his Tryal. It lasted two Days; and at the End of the second Day he was brought in Guilty by the unanimous Vote of all the Peers.

The Septennial Act brought in.

April 10. The Duke of Devonshire made a Speech in the House of Lords upon the Inconveniencies attending the Triennial Elections of Members of Parliament; and, after some other things, offered a Bill for enlarging the Continuance of Parliaments. The Bill was vigorously opposed in that House, and in the House of Commons; but it was carried in both. The Purport of the Bill was to change the Term of the Sitting of Parliaments from Three to Seven Years; by which the Parliament now sitting, which had been chosen but for three Years, and which must have been in course dissolved in a short Time, was empowered to sit four Years more.

One of the Articles of Limitation repealed.

June 18. A Bill was brought into the House of Commons to repeal one of the Articles of Limitation contained in the Act for settling the Succession of these Kingdoms on the House of Hanover; by which Article, the King then in being was restrained from going out of England, Scotland or Ireland, without Consent of Parliament, which passed both Houses. And on the twenty sixth, the King came to the House of Peers, and having passed the two last mentioned Bills, and some others of less Importance, he ordered the Parliament to be prorogued.

Tryals of the Prisoners at London and Lancashire.

During the Sitting of the Parliament, the Courts were busie in the Trial of the Prisoners taken at Preston. Jan. 11. Mr. Baron Bury, Justice Eyre, and Baron Montague, opened a Commission at Liverpool in Lancashire; where Bills of High Treason were found against a hundred sixty one of the Rebels, of which Number about forty were Scots. The Tryals began on the twentieth of January, and lasted till the eighth of February; during which Time sixty five were found guilty, five confessed themselves guilty, all whom received Sentence of Death, and five only were acquitted. Of those who received Sentence of Death, twenty two were executed in different Parts of Lancashire. These Tryals being over, and all the Prisoners at Lancaster, to the Number of about three hundred, and most of those that were at Liverpool and Chester, to the Number of about six hundred, having submitted to the King's Mercy, and petitioned for Transportation, the Judges closed their Commission.

At London about thirty Persons were tryed upon the same Account; of whom seven were acquitted. Of those who were found guilty, Colonel Oxborough, Richard Gascoigne, Esq; John Hall, Esq; and Mr. William Paul, a Clergyman, were executed.

William Pitt, Esq; the Keeper of Newgate, was tryed upon an Indictment for permitting the Escape of Thomas Forster, Esq; A.D. 1717. who having been General of the Rebels, and committed to Newgate thereupon, had found means to get away. But the Jury, after a long Tryal, brought him in Not Guilty.

Jan. 22. Francis Francia, a Jew, was tryed at the Old-Baily for High Treason, in carrying on a traiterous Correspondence with Persons beyond the Seas, and soliciting Assistance from thence to levy War, and excite a Rebellion. Upon his Tryal, several Letters, and Books, containing Copies of Letters, were produced, which had been seized at Francia's House, and which he had owned to be his. The Letters appeared to be of a dangerous Nature, containing many dark Hints in relation to some Design carrying on in Great Britain, and the cautious Manner in which this Correspondence was carried on, insinuated that something extraordinary was designed by it. But these Things being no more than Presumptions, the Jury brought him in Not Guilty.

Jan. 29. at Night, the Count de Gyllenberg, the Swedish Minister here, and his Secretary, were put under Arrest, by Order of Council; and a Guard placed in the Minister's House. His Papers were also seized, sealed up, and carried away. Mr. Caesar of Hertfordshire, Sir Jacob Banks, a Native of Sweden, and one Major Boyle Smith, were apprehended about the same time, but quickly set at Liberty.

The Swedish Minister arrested.

The arresting a publick Minister, who is under the Protection of the Sacred Law of Nations, made a great Noise; and all the Foreign Ministers at our Court applied themselves to the King and his Ministers to know the Reason of so extraordinary a Step. Soon after they received a Letter from the Secretaries of State, importing, that the Count de Gyllenberg had been concerned in fomenting a Rebellion in the Kingdom, to be supported by Foreign Troops. And soon after, the Letters and other Papers taken from the Swedish Minister were printed, in order to confirm that Allegation. From those Letters it appeared that the Count, together with Baron Gortz in Holland, and Baron Sparre, Resident of Sweden at the Court of France, were concerting a Design to raise a Rebellion in Great Britain, and to bring over twelve thousand Swedish Troops to countenance the same; and that this was to be done in Consideration of a Million of Dutch Florins, to be paid by the Disaffected here. The Government having traced out this Design, applied themselves with all Vigour to prevent the Execution of it, by putting the Nation in such a Posture of Defence, that if the Swedes should make any Attempt, they might not fail to meet with a warm Reception. And these Preparations were so effectual, that no more was heard of this Swedish Invasion.

Feb. 20. the Parliament met. The King acquainted them in his Speech, that he had ordered Copies of the Letters and Papers seized at the Swedish Minister's to be laid before

A. D. 1717. fore them, which was done accordingly, and produced suitable Addresses from both Houses, and a Bill was brought in to the House of Commons to prohibit Commerce with Sweden, which passing the two Houses, and having received the Royal Assent, was put in Force by a Proclamation from the King.

Feb. 28. Lawrence Howel Clerk, was tried at the Old-Baily, and found guilty of writing and publishing a seditious Libel, entitled, The Case of Schism in the Church of England truly stated. On March 2. he received Sentence to pay a Fine of 500*l.* to remain in Prison three Years, to find Security for his good Behaviour during Life, to be twice whipped, and to be degraded. But the Whipping was afterwards remitted.

April 3. a Message was sent from the King to the House of Commons, to the following Effect.

A Message from the King to the House of Commons.

GEORGE, R.
 "HIS Majesty being desirous, above all Things, not only to secure his Kingdoms against the present Danger with which they are threatened from Sweden, but likewise to prevent, as far as is possible, the like Apprehensions for the future, thinks it necessary that such Measures should be early concerted with other Princes and States, as may conduce most effectually to that End.
 "And as this may require some Expence, his Majesty hopes that his Commons will, by their Assistance at this Juncture, enable him to make good such Engagements as may ease his People of all future Charge and Apprehensions upon this Account."

The next Day being appointed to consider of this Message, Mr. Stanhope, Secretary of State, made a Motion to second it. It was very strongly opposed by several Members, as unparliamentary and unprecedented; and this so vigorously, that it was at last carried by a Majority of four only, to comply with the King's Message.

April 9. the Lord Townshend was removed from the Post of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

April 10. Robert Walpole, Esq; first Lord Commissioner of the Treasury, Mr. Methuen, one of the principal Secretaries of State, Mr. Pulteney Secretary at War, Sir William St. Quintin and Mr. Edgecomb, two of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, resigned their Employments. As did also about the same Time the Earl of Orford, George Doddington, Esq; Sir John Jennings, Sir Charles Turner, and Abraham Stanyan, Esq; Commissioners for executing the Office of Lord High Admiral of Great-Britain and Ireland.

April 12. Mr. Stanhope made another Motion, that the House would allow the Sum of two hundred and fifty Thousand Pounds for the Purposes abovementioned. This was opposed as warmly as the general Proposal, and was debated on two several Days, but it was at last carried for the A. D. 1717. Motion by an Odds of one hundred and fifty three against one hundred and thirty two.

April 16. the Parliament adjourned to May 6. The same Day the Duke of Devonshire resigned his Office of Lord President of the Council; on which Day also the Duke of Bolton was declared Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and the Earl of Sunderland, and Joseph Addison, Esq; were sworn principal Secretaries of State.

April 26. the Lower House of Convocation appointed a Committee to draw up a Representation to be laid before the Upper House, against some Doctrines and Positions laid down in a Pamphlet entitled, A Preservative against the Principles and Practices of the Nonjurors, written by Dr. Hoadley, Bishop of Bangor, and likewise in a Sermon preached by him before the King, March 31. This Representation was drawn up, and presented May 10. to the House, who read and received it Nem. Con. But before it was carried to the Upper House, the Convocation was prorogued to Nov. 10.

May 22. the Earl of Oxford having been a Prisoner near two Years, and the Commons having not yet appeared to make good their Articles against him, petitioned the Lords, setting forth his Case, and praying that it might be taken into Consideration. Upon this the House of Lords, after a long Debate, appointed the thirteenth of June for the Day of his Tryal; and sent a Message to the Commons to acquaint them therewith.

The Commons upon this Message, appointed a Committee to consider of the State of the Impeachment against that Earl. The Committee having sat for some Time, reported to the House, that by reason of the long Interruption which the Prosecution of the Impeachment had met with by the weighty Affairs of the Nation, it would be impossible to adjust and apply their Evidence within the Time appointed; for which Reason it was ordered by the House to send a Message to the Lords, to desire that the Tryal might be put off to a farther Day. With this Request the Lords after some Debate complied; and the twenty fourth of June was appointed for the Tryal.

Upon that Day the House of Commons, resolving it self into a Committee of the whole House, came to the Place fitted up in Westminster-Hall for this Tryal. Soon after, the Peers came thither in their Robes, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Cowper, being appointed Lord High Steward. The Lords being seated, the Earl of Oxford was brought to the Bar, and the reading of the Articles of Impeachment, and other Forms, being over, the Managers for the House of Commons were told they might proceed. When Mr. Hampden, who spoke first, had finished his Speech, Sir Joseph Jekyll stood up, in order to proceed to the first Article of Impeachment. But as he was beginning to speak, the Lord Harcourt desired to offer something to the Lords, upon which the

Lords

A. D. 1717. Lords and Commons went away to their several Houses.

When the Lords were returned to their House; the Lord Harcourt represented to them, that the Proceeding of the Commons was improper, in going through the several Articles of High Crimes and Misdemeanors. That if they would only make good the two Articles of High-Treason, the Tryal would be quickly ended; whereas by the other Method it would be drawn out to an immoderate Length. He observed besides here was a great Hardship put upon a Peer, which might be of ill Consequence to the Body of the Peerage; for that the Earl had undergone a long Confinement, having been refused Bail under Pretence of an Accusation of High-Treason, and had upon the same Pretence been brought to the Bar in the ignominious Circumstances of one accused of so great a Crime, whereas now it seemed as if such Charge was after all to be brought against him. Therefore he moved, that the Commons might not proceed upon the Articles of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, till Judgment was given upon those for High-Treason. And this Motion was carried by a great Majority; and proper Notice was sent to the Commons.

The two Houses came together again in Westminster-hall, where the Lord High Steward having in Form acquainted the Commons with the Resolution of the Peers, the Managers told the Lords that they could not proceed without Directions from the House; upon which the Lords and Commons went away to their respective Houses.

Next Morning the Commons took the Lords Resolution into Consideration, and ordered the Managers to search for Precedents in such Cases. While this was doing, they received a Message from the Lords that they had ordered the Earl to be brought before them that Day. But the Commons desiring farther Time, the farther Proceedings on the Tryal were put off till June 28.

In the mean Time the Commons continuing positive in their own Method, a Conference was held between the two Houses, but in vain, both Sides being stiff. And soon after the Lords sent Word to the Commons, that they had ordered the Earl to be brought to the Bar of their House in Westminster-Hall the next Day, June 29, in order to his Tryal. Upon this the Commons sent to the Lords to desire them to continue sitting for some Time, to which the Lords agreed. But not long after, the Commons having sent to desire a free Conference upon the Subject of the last Conference, the Lords absolutely refused it; and on the first of July sent to acquaint the Commons, that they had ordered the Earl to be brought before them in Westminster-Hall, at eleven o' Clock in the Forenoon of that very Day.

That whole Day was spent in Messages passing to and fro between the two Houses to no purpose, neither House being inclined to recede. So that at last the Lords sent a Message to the Commons to acquaint them that they were going to proceed farther on the Tryal of the Earl of Oxford, and went accordingly. The Commons were all in a Fury, and made an Order that none of their Members should be there. The Earl being then brought to the Bar, Proclamation was made for his Accusers to come forth and make good the Articles of Impeachment; but none appearing, the Lords returned to their House, where the Question being put, whether the Earl should be discharged, it was carried in the Affirmative. And the Lords coming back to Westminster-Hall, the Question was put to all the Peers, who declared themselves Content, upon which the Earl was immediately discharged.

He is unanimously discharged.

A Bill of Attainder against the Earl was afterwards moved for in the House of Commons, but after some Stir it came to nothing. But the Commons addressing the King to except him out of the Act of Grace then depending, the King promised to comply with their Request. And soon after the King came and prorogued the Parliament. At which Time among other Acts, was one of general and free Pardon.

About that Time the King created the Right Honourable James Stanhope, Esq; a Baron of the Kingdom of Great-Britain, by the Styles and Titles of Baron and Viscount Stanhope.

About the same Time most of the State Prisoners in the Fleet, Newgate, and in the Marshalsey, as likewise those in the Hands of Messengers, were discharged, in pursuance of the Act of Grace.

The Parliament met again upon the twenty first of November, but the Occurrences that passed in this Session were of no Moment; being little more than the usual Forms of Supplies, and consenting to the keeping the Standing Army for a Year longer. As this last Subject was in Debate, William Shippen, Esq; arguing against the Standing Army, let fall Words to this purpose: "That the King's Speech to the Parliament seemed rather calculated for the Meridian of Germany, than of Great-Britain; and that the King was unacquainted with our Language and Constitution." And these Expressions being taken Notice of, he was sent to the Tower. There was at this Time a very great Scarcity of Silver Specie, upon which the Value of the Gold Coin was diminished; and it was ordered that Guineas should be reduced from 21 s. 6 d. to 21 s. and other Gold Coins in Proportion. On the twenty first of March the Parliament was prorogued.

Proceedings of Parliament.

Value of the Gold Coin diminished.

Seven Days after the Parliament met, an unhappy Difference happened between the King and the Prince of Wales upon the following Occasion. Her Royal Highness the Princess having been delivered of a Son, Nov. 1. the Day of his Baptism was appointed on the twenty eighth. It is said that the Prince had pitched upon the Duke of York, Bishop of Osnabrug, his Majesty's Brother, to be one of the Godfathers; with A Difference between the King and Prince.

A.D. 1717. which Choice he thought his Majesty was satisfied. But when the Ceremony came to be performed, the Duke of Newcastle stood Godfather with the King, not as Proxy for, or representing the Duke of York, but in his own Name and Person. This his Royal Highness took ill of the Duke, not as he acted in Obedience to the King's Command, but as if the Duke had done, or at least seemed officious to do, something that he was not commanded. This raised the Indignation of his Royal Highness to that Degree, that he could not help shewing it; and as soon as the Ceremony was over, spoke some warm Words to the Duke, expressing his Resentment. Upon Report of these Words to the King, his Majesty sent his Commands to the Prince to keep in his Apartment till his Majesty's farther Pleasure should be known. And soon after it was signified to his Royal Highness that he should leave St. James's; which he did accordingly, the Prince's going with him, and retired to the Earl of Grantham's House in Albemarle-street; the Children of their Royal Highnesses remaining, by the King's Order, at St. James's. Soon after this, his Majesty's Royal Pleasure was signified to all Persons who have Access to Court, that whosoever should go to see their Royal Highnesses, should not be admitted to his Majesty's Presence.

A.D. 1718. On the sixth of March came on at the Old-Baily, the Tryal of James Shepheard, a Lad about eighteen Years of Age, Apprentice to a Coach-Painter in Devonshire-street without Bishopsgate, London, for High-Treason, in imagining and conspiring the Death of the King. It appeared from the Evidence, that the Prisoner came to the House of one Mr. Leak, a Nonjuring Clergyman, and left there a Letter for him, of a strange Nature, in which he offered to kill the King with his own Hands, in order to make a Way for the Pretender to come to the Crown. That Mr. Leak, upon reading the Letter, immediately burnt it with Indignation; but went and told the Contents of it to Sir John Fryer, Alderman of the Ward, by whose Advice he caused the Prisoner, who came to him three Days after for an Answer, to be secured. That when the Prisoner was apprehended, he did not at all deny the Letter, but offered to write such another before them, which he did accordingly; and told them it was the same with that he had sent to Mr. Leak, upon which he was committed to Newgate.

His Behaviour at his Tryal was suitable. When he was called upon by the Court to make his Defence, he answered, that he acknowledged the Truth of what had been deposed against him; saying, that he meant it, that he intended it, and did not think there was any Harm in it, or any Guilt in the Fact, if committed. So the Jury found him Guilty; and he was soon after executed.

March 28. Mr. Thomas Kinnerley, a Clergyman, was tryed and convicted at the Assizes at Kingston in Surrey, for combining and conspiring with William Moore, falsely to A.D. 1718. charge the Right Honourable Charles Earl of Sunderland, with an Attempt to commit Sodomy on the said William Moore, in order to extort great Sums of Money from the said Earl.

This Summer was remarkable by the Invasion of Sicily by the Spaniards. The King of Spain, having already conquered Sardinia, sent a Fleet from Barcelona to invade Sicily. This Attempt was begun with that Success, and so well seconded by the Concurrence of the Sicilians, that it seemed probable that the whole Island would quickly be reduced. But while the Spaniards were besieging the Castle of Messina, a Stop was put to their Progress by the Arrival of an English Fleet into the Mediterranean, under Sir George Byng. That Fleet came to an Anchor in the Port of Naples July 21, where the Viceroy had Orders to assist the King of Sicily as far as he was able. In order thereto he caused two Thousand Men to be embarked to reinforce the Garrison of the Citadel of Messina; and the British Admiral undertook to secure the Passage of those Transports. On the twenty ninth at Night he came off the Point of Messina, and sent Captain Saunders on Shore with a Letter to the Marquis de Lede, who was Commander of the Spanish Army. The Marquis, in a Conference he had with the Captain, and in the Letter he sent to Sir George Byng by way of Answer, declared, that he had no Powers to treat, and would pursue his Orders, which were to seize on Sicily. On that Morning the Spanish Fleet having Advice of the Approach of the English, weighed from Messina, and stood through the Faro. Next Day Sir George Byng followed them, and coming up with them, an Engagement happened the Day following. When the British Fleet was come up with that of the Spaniards, the latter fired at them, upon which the Fight begun. But the Contention was neither long nor obstinate, the Spaniards soon finding themselves unequal to the British Fleet, and making the best of their Way from them, Fourteen of their Men of War were taken and destroyed, besides other smaller Vessels.

October 13. The Ratifications of the Treaty of Quadruple Alliance were exchanged between the Emperor, France, and Great-Britain. And soon after the King of Sicily acceded to the same.

November 11. The Parliament met. The King having taken Notice in his Speech of the Action in the Mediterranean, a great Debate arose in both Houses concerning the Answer to be returned to it. One Party proposed the expressing a perfect Satisfaction in those Measures that had been taken, which was as warmly contradicted by others; but in the End the former carried it.

Dec. 17. the King declared War against Spain; which being communicated to the two Houses, an Address was moved for, by which the Houses would promise to assist his Majesty in the Prosecution of so just and neces-

The Spaniards invade Sicily.

Sir George Byng defeats the Spanish Fleet.

War declared against Spain.

A.D. 1719. necessary a War. This was also strongly opposed, but to as little Purpose as before. A Bill was offered in the House of Lords by Earl Stanhope, entitled, An Act for strengthening the Protestant Interest in these Kingdoms, containing a Repeal of Part of the Act against Occasional Conformity, as also of the Schism Act, and some Clauses in the Test and Corporation Acts; which passed both Houses. A Bill was brought into the House of Lords for regulating the Peerage of the two Kingdoms, which made a great Noise; but before it could be gone through, the Parliament was prorogued. March 9. the King came to the House of Peers, and made a Speech to both Houses, importing that he had received Advice, that an Invasion would be attempted from Spain in Favour of the Pretender; upon which Occasion both Houses presented him with very loyal Addresses. And in about a Month after the Parliament was prorogued, nothing material intervening.

Peerage-Bill first brought in.

An Invasion to be attempted from Spain.

Upon Advice of the Design of the Spaniards to invade the Kingdom, the Government was busied in Precautions to oppose their Designs. And because it was generally believed that the late Duke of Ormond would command the Troops that were to be employed in that Expedition, a Proclamation was published for apprehending him, and other attainted Persons. On the fifth of April, Sir John Norris sailed from Spithead with nine Men of War, and was afterwards joined by seven others. Troops were ordered to the West, where the Landing was expected; and some Forces were brought over from Holland. But the Enterprize of the Spaniards was conducted with that amazing Secrecy, that all these Precautions were taken above a Month too late; and the Spanish Fleet was out at Sea before the Court of Great-Britain so much as dreamed that they were coming. Forty Transports and five Men of War, having the late Duke of Ormond, and five Thousand Men on Board, had set Sail from Cadiz on the twenty third of February before; and were standing for the Coast of England, when all Things here were in the Height of Security. It is said their Intention was to land near Bristol, which might easily have been done at a Time when such an Attempt was never thought of, much less prepared for; after which, taking the Advantage of so dismal a Consternation and Surprise as such an unexpected Coming would have occasioned, and of the Disaffection reigning among the People, they were to have marched directly to London. Be this Particular true or not, there can be no doubt, but that their Landing would have caused a dreadful Convulsion throughout the Kingdom, and have had fatal Effects on the Happiness and Quiet of our Country. But it happened very surprizingly, that quickly after the Spanish Fleet had set Sail from Cadiz, the Wind came about to the North-East, and continued impetuous and obstinate in that Quarter all over the Bay of Biscay for many

A Fleet sets Sail from Cadiz for England.

Days together; so that by that Time the Spaniards were arrived to the Westward of Cape Finisterre, they were met by this contrary Wind; which soon after increased to a furious Storm that lasted eight and forty Hours, and shattered, foundered, or dispersed the whole Navy; some of the Ships being driven even as far to the South West as the Islands of the Azores. One Ship, which was sent after the rest, landed in the North of Scotland, with the Marquis of Tullibardine, the late Earl Marischal and Seaforth, and four hundred Spaniards; but the Spaniards were quickly after made Prisoners by the King's Forces there. May 11. The King set out for his German Dominions, and arrived at Herrenhausen by Hanover on the eighteenth. He returned from thence to Great-Britain November 15.

They are dispersed.

September 21. A Fleet of Men of War and Transports sailed from St. Hellens, the Fleet being commanded by Admiral Mighells, and the Land-Forces aboard by the Lord Cobham. On the twenty ninth they landed at Vigo, on the Coast of Galicia in Spain. The Town soon surrendered, the Citadel held out somewhat longer, but was soon forced to yield. They afterwards took another Town, called Pontavedra; with a vast Quantity of Warlike Stores laid up at those two Places. After this, the Forces not being able to continue any longer in Spain, they re embarked for England, and arrived there safely November 11.

A Descent on Spain.

November 23. The Parliament met. In the King's Speech, He, among other Things, obliquely recommended the Bill for regulating the Peerage abovementioned; and as soon as the Forms of Addresses were over, it was brought into the House of Lords. By this Bill it was to be enacted, "That instead of the sixteen elective Peers of Scotland, twenty five Peers of that Nation were to have Hereditary Seats in Parliament, and to be the Peers on the Part of the Peerage of Scotland; which Peers were to be declared by the King. That eight Peers more should be added to the Peerage of England, to be declared by the King also; after which no more Peers should be made, unless upon Extinction of a Family of a Peer". This was the Substance of that famous Bill. It passed through the House of Lords without any great Difficulty; but when it came before the Commons, it was so little approved, that it was rejected by a Majority of two hundred and sixty nine, against a hundred and seventy seven.

The King recommends the Peerage-Bill again.

Rejected by the Commons.

January 22. was presented to the House of Commons a Scheme of the South-Sea Company for reducing the National Debts, by taking in the Annuities, and other Publick Debts made redeemable, into the Capital Stock of that Company: And another of the same Kind was offered by the Bank. This produced a second from the South-Sea Company; and this last was followed by another from the Bank; and the Commons taking both into Consideration, resolved to accept

A.D. 1720.

South-Sea Scheme proposed and agreed to.

A.D. 1720. accept that of the South-Sea Company. And a Bill to that Purpose having passed both Houses, it received the Royal Assent April 7.

February 28. A Proclamation was published for a Suspension of Arms between Great-Britain and Spain; the King of Spain having complied with his Britannic Majesty, and acceded to the Quadruple Alliance.

Disputes between the House of Peers in Great-Britain, and that of Ireland.

Between two and three Years ago, an Appeal had been brought to the House of Peers in England, by Maurice Annesley Esq; a Gentleman of Ireland, from a Judgment given against him by the House of Lords in that Kingdom. Upon this Appeal the British House of Peers gave Judgment in Favour of Annesley; and sent Orders to the Barons of the Exchequer in Ireland to put him in Possession of certain Lands there, of which he had been dispossessed by Virtue of the Sentence of the Irish House. An Order was accordingly issued by the Barons to the High-Sheriff of the County of Kildare, where those Lands lay, to put the said Annesley in Possession; but the High-Sheriff chose to abide by the Decree of the Irish House, and refused to do so. Upon this he had several Fines set on him by the Barons of the Exchequer. The House of Peers in England, informed of this Contravention to their Orders, confirmed the same with new ones; upon which the Matter came before the Irish Lords. That House made several warm Resolutions against these Orders, and against the Barons of the Exchequer for complying with them; and made a Representation to the King against these Proceedings of the House of Peers in Great-Britain. But this Representation was so far from having any Effect, that the Peers here brought in a Bill for securing the Dependency of Ireland upon the Crown of Great-Britain; the Purport of which was, to disable the House of Lords in Ireland from exercising any Judicature in Matters brought before the Courts of that Kingdom. And this Bill being sent down to the Commons, passed that House with some Amendments.

June 11. The King came to the House of Peers, and having given the Royal Assent to the Bills ready for him, ordered the Parliament to be prorogued; and soon after he went to his Dominions in Germany, from whence he returned November 11.

The Consequences of the South-Sea Scheme.

As soon as the House of Commons had passed a Resolution to accept the Proposals of the South-Sea Company, the Value of South-Sea Stock began to rise; and increased so fast, that before the Month of May was ended, it was at five hundred and fifty; and by the second of June was come to eight Hundred and ninety. The vast Gain made by this Stock put the whole Nation, as it were, in a Fit of Madness; and gave Occasion to many crafty Knaves to invent and set on Foot strange Projects to be carried on by Joint-Stocks; under which Pretence, Shares in these ridiculous and chimerical Partnerships, were to be sold out to those who had Money and Inconsideration enough to be Purchasers. This Trade was drove A.D. 1720. on, and met with a prodigious and unconceivable Success; those who had Money of their own, and often of other Persons, leaving their Trades and Professions to go a jobbing in Exchange-Alley with Shares in these imaginary Undertakings; though the Cheat of them was so well understood both by Buyer and Seller, as to be called by both by a very proper Name, that of Bubbles. Future Ages will not believe what they read, (as those who lived in the Time scarce believe what they remember) when they are told that Men would be content to lay out their Money upon Projects, without knowing what Ground there was for them, or even so much as enquiring, or at all concerning themselves about it. This Evil increased so fast, that the Legislature was obliged to interpose; and an Act of Parliament was passed to suppress these Publick Cheats. Nevertheless, the Madness was so great and epidemical, that before this Law could have its Effect, a Million and half of Money is said to have been won and lost in this abominable Traffick.

Bubbles.

When the South-Sea Stock was risen to eight Hundred and ninety, many cautious Persons being willing to secure their great Profits, there appeared the Day after so many Sellers in Exchange-Alley, that by two or three in the Afternoon, the Stock fell to six Hundred and forty; at which the chief Directors of the South-Sea Company being alarmed, they set their Agents to work, by whose Management the Stock came up again that Evening to seven Hundred and fifty; about which Price, with some small Fluctuation, it continued till the closing of the Company's Books on the twenty second of June. In the mean Time, the South-Sea Stock suffered a considerable Shock. For many Persons who had followed the King to Hanover, and others who were hard put to it to make their second Payment for the first Subscription, were both equally desirous to turn their Stock into Money; so that, for some Days, the Number of Sellers exceeded that of Buyers. Hereupon, the Managers of the South-Sea Stock bethought themselves of two Expedients. The first was, lending out Money or Notes to the Proprietors of their Capital Stock, to the Sum of four Hundred Pounds, upon every Hundred Pounds original Stock, at the Rate of four Pounds per Cent. per Annum. The second was, giving Publick Notice, that all Persons possessed of the Company's Bonds, which came due on the twenty fifth of June, might then have their Money for the same of the Company's Cashier; and that the said Bonds would be taken in Payment for the two Million two hundred and fifty thousand Pounds South-Sea Stock, sold by Subscription, after the Rate of three hundred Pounds for each hundred Pounds Original Stock. By these Means Money being plenty, and the Stockjobbers in good Humour, the South-Sea Company opened their Books for a third Subscription, at the Rate of a thousand

A.D. 1720. fand Pounds for each hundred Pounds Capital Stock, to be paid in ten equal Payments, the one in Hand, the other nine half-yearly. It was at first given out, that the Company designed to take in Subscriptions only for one Million original Stock. But some Men in Power having taken this Opportunity to oblige and reward their Friends and Retainers, their Lifts were so full, that the Directors were obliged to enlarge the Subscription to about four Millions Capital Stock, which at that Rate came to forty Millions Sterling. What is yet more wonderful, these last Subscriptions were, before the End of June, sold at above two hundred per Cent. Advance; and after the Closing of the Transfer Books, the original Stock rose to above a thousand Pounds per Cent. At the same Time the first Subscriptions were at about five Hundred and sixty, and the second at about six Hundred and ten per Cent. Advance.

During the Month of July there was no great Variation in the Price of South-Sea Stock, save only that it gradually decreased from a Thousand to nine Hundred and thirty Pounds, in Proportion, as the last Subscription at a Thousand, rose to three Hundred and thirty Pounds Advance, or clear Profit. In the next Month the South-Sea Stock continued sinking; insomuch that on Wednesday the seventeenth of August, it fell to eight Hundred and thirty, including the Midsummer Dividend; which having given the Directors of the South-Sea Company no small Uneasiness, they raised it by Means of their Agents to eight Hundred and eighty. But the Humour of selling out continuing the two following Days, the Stock fell again to about eight Hundred and twenty, at which Price the Transfer-Books of the Company were opened on Monday August 22. That Day and the next Morning there was a great Crowd at the South-Sea House. And the Directors observing that great Quantities of Stock had been bought at a Thousand, and even higher Rates, against the opening of the Books, and that many Persons would be obliged to sell out, in order to pay the Difference, which would sink the Stock yet lower; they came to a sudden and unexpected Resolution, to shut that very Day, viz. August 23. the Transfer-Books, and on the next Day to open other Books, for taking in a Money-Subscription of one Million, for enlarging the Capital Stock, at the Rate of one Thousand Pounds, for each hundred Pounds Capital Stock; which Subscription was to be paid in five Payments, viz. twenty Pounds per Cent. in Hand, and the rest in four equal half-yearly Payments. Accordingly the Subscription-Books were opened at the South-Sea House, August 24. and there was such a vast Crowd of Subscribers, and amongst them not a few of the Prime Nobility, that in less than three Hours, more than the intended Sum was subscribed; and that very Afternoon, this fourth Subscription was sold in Exchange-Alley at thirty or forty per Cent. Advance. Three Days after this the Transfer-Books were opened again; but the South-Sea Stock, instead of advancing, was now fallen below eight Hundred. The Directors, to keep it up, and silence the Murmurings of different Sorts which now began to arise, lent Money to some of the Proprietors, viz. four Thousand Pounds for every Thousand Pounds Capital Stock, for six Months, at the Rate of four Pounds per Cent. per Annum. Besides, they made a Resolution that thirty per Cent. in Money should be the half Year's Dividend, due at Christmas next; and that from thence, for twelve Years after, the yearly Dividend should be fifty per Cent. in Money. But these Expedients proved ineffectual; the Credit of the Directors, and the Value of the Stock declining apace; so that on Michaelmas-Day the Price of South-Sea Stock, after some Fluctuations, fell to a Hundred and fifty, from which it never rose again; to the Ruine and Damage of Thousands, who by wicked Arts, and the Madness of the Times, had been unwarily engaged to hazard their Fortunes in that Stock, when it was brought up to those extravagant Prices that have been mentioned above.

December 8. The Parliament met; the King having returned from his German Territories about a Month before. After the Forms of the King's Speech, &c. were over, the two Houses fell upon the evil Consequences of the South-Sea Scheme. The House of Commons ordered the Directors to lay before them an Account of their Proceedings, and of all Matters relating to the Execution of the South-Sea Scheme, which was done by them accordingly. A Bill was brought in and passed, to restrain the Sub-Governor, Deputy-Governor, Directors, Treasurer, Under-Treasurer, Cashier, Secretary, and Accomptant of the South-Sea Company, from going out of the Kingdom for the Space of one Year, and from alienating their Effects. Afterwards, a Committee of Secrecy was appointed to examine the Accounts laid before the House, and to make Report thereof; which Committee went soon after to the South-Sea House, and took Possession of it, and of all the Books and Papers there.

The Lords had their Part also in this Inquisition made after the Robbers of the Publick. The Sub-Governor, Deputy-Governor, twenty four of the Directors, Knight the Cashier, and Surman Deputy-Cashier, were brought before the Peers on the twelfth of January. And being sworn to make true Answers to such Questions as were put to them, they were examined separately till nine at Night; when the Lords resolved, "That the Governors and Directors of the South-Sea Company had prevaricated with them, in giving false Representations of Matters of Fact; that by lending Money on Stock and Subscriptions, they were guilty of a notorious Breach of Trust, and ought to make good the Losses which the Company had sustained by their frau-

A.D. 1720.

Proceedings of Parliament against the South-Sea Directors.

A.D. 1720. "dulent Management". And soon after the Lords ordered a Bill to be brought in to disable them from any Office in the South-Sea, Bank, or East-India Companies, and

A.D. 1721. from voting upon Elections. January 21. the Lords, in a grand Committee, received and examined the Extracts of some Brokers Books; by which it appeared that large Quantities of South-Sea Stock had been transferred to the Use of Mr. Aislaby, one of the Lords of the Treasury.

Knight escapes.

But while this was doing, Knight, the Cashier of the South-Sea Company, who was thought to be intrusted with the principal Secret of this Affair, either of his own Accord, or, as 'twas shrewdly suspected, at the Suggestion of others, thought fit to retire out of the Kingdom; and on Monday January 23. embarked in a Vessel in the River, that carried him that Evening to Calais. Upon this the House of Commons immediately addressed the King to issue out a Proclamation for apprehending him; which was done, but to no Purpose. After this, they addressed the King to give Directions to his Ministers in Foreign Courts, to make Application, that the said Knight might be secured, if he should be found in any of their Dominions.

Mean Time, the Examination of the South-Sea Directors went on; and some were taken into Custody of the Black-Rod, and others of the Serjeant at Arms; while those who were Members of the House of Commons were expelled. Two of the Directors, who were examined before the House of Lords, made very ingenuous and large Discoveries; and named several Persons in the Administration, and in the House of Commons, to whom great Sums in South-Sea Stock had been given for procuring the passing the South-Sea Act; upon which the Lords resolved that such Practices were notorious and dangerous Corruptions. During these Examinations an extraordinary Accident happened. Sir John Blunt, who was one of the Directors, and accounted the principal Manager of the South-Sea Scheme, being brought before the House of Lords, refused to be sworn to answer such Interrogatories as should be put to him; alledging, that he had already been examined before the Committee of Secrecy of the House of Commons, and to such Extent of Affairs, that unless he had a Copy of his Examination there, he could not remember every Particular. The Lords did not immediately shew their Resentment for this Obstinacy, left something should be done in an Heat that should break the Harmony between the two Houses. But as they were debating concerning what was to be done on this Incident, a noble Duke cast some Reflection upon the Ministry, which provoked the Lord Stanhope, who was at the Head of the Ministry, to answer him with so much Passion and Vehemence, that his Blood was overheated, and he was taken on the sudden with such a violent Headach, that he was obliged to go home and be cupped. This eased him a little, but he was forced to be let A.D. 1721. Blood the next Morning. He continued pretty well till the Evening, when falling in to a Drowsiness, his Physician ordered him a Glyster; but as he was turning himself to receive it, he fell on his Face, and was instantly suffocated.

The Death of the Earl Stanhope.

About this Time, News arrived that Mr. Knight was taken in Flanders, and secured in the Castle of Antwerp; which was received with great Joy. But this was damped again by an Account that afterwards arrived, that the Emperor could not send him over hither, on Pretence of certain Privileges of the States of Brabant, in which Province he was taken; by virtue of which Privileges they claimed that no Person apprehended in their Countrey for any Crime, should be tryed in any other Place. This was received with marvellous Indignation here in Great-Britain; and thought a very ill Return for the Obligations the Emperor had received from our Countrey; but notwithstanding all that was done here, whatever the Reason was, he was not suffered to be brought over.

Knight is taken again.

But is not brought over.

Feb. 18. the Report from the Committee of Secrecy was read in the House of Commons; upon which the House came into several Resolutions against the Directors, and it was ordered that the Frauds committed by them should be made good out of their Estates. Feb. 25. a farther Report was made, which related chiefly to great Quantities of Stock and Subscriptions which appeared to have been taken in for Mr. Aislaby, late Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Charles Stanhope, Esq; one of the Secretaries of the Treasury, both Members of the House; who thereupon insisted on their Innocence, and pressed that a short Day might be appointed to examine that Matter. This being done Feb. 28. it was determined by a Majority of three Voices only, in favour of Mr. Stanhope. March 8. Mr. Aislaby's Case came under Consideration, and after a very long Debate, it was resolved that Mr. Aislaby had been guilty of great Corruptions; that he should be expelled the House, and committed Prisoner to the Tower; and that a Bill should be brought in to restrain him from going out of the Kingdom for one Year, and for discovering his Estate and Effects.

After him Sir George Caswall was censured by the House for corrupt Practices, in holding fifty Thousand Pounds Stock in the Hands of Robert Knight, Cashier of the South-Sea Company, without paying any valuable Consideration for it; and it was ordered that he should be expelled the House, and committed Prisoner to the Tower.

March 14. A Part of the Report was read which related to the Earl of Sunderland, and the next Day the House took it into Consideration. Then a Motion was made, "That it appears to this House, that after the Proposals of the South-Sea Company were accepted by this House, and a Bill ordered to be brought in thereupon, and before such Bill passed, fifty Thousand Pounds of the Capital Stock of the South-

"Sea

A.D. 1721. "Sea Company, was taken in by Robert Knight, late Cashier of the South-Sea Company, for the Use and upon the Account of Charles Earl of Sunderland, a Lord of Parliament, and first Commissioner of the Treasury, without any valuable Consideration paid, or sufficient Security given for Payment for, or Acceptance of the same." This Motion occasioned a warm Debate, that lasted till near eight o' Clock in the Evening; but the Question being put thereupon, it was carried in the Negative by a Majority of two hundred and thirty three Votes against one hundred and seventy two.

April 17. Ballances of the Estates of the Sub-Governor, Deputy-Governor, Directors, Deputy-Cashier and Accomptant of the South-Sea Company, which amounted to above two Millions, were laid before the House. Soon after a third Report was made by the Committee of Secrecy, the Substance and most material Part of which was, that James Craggs, sen. Esq; late Postmaster General, had taken forty Thousand Pounds South-Sea Stock without paying for it, or giving sufficient Security for the Payment of the same. And May 1. the House agreed to several Resolutions to that Purpose, and ordered that all the Estate real and personal of Mr. Craggs, be applied towards the Relief of the Sufferers in the South-Sea Company.

After this, the late Governors, &c. of the South-Sea Company presented their several Petitions, praying the Compassion of the House; upon which the House ordered them such respective Portions of their Estates as were judged suitable to their several Circumstances, and the Shares they had in the late Transactions. The Remainder, together with the Estates of Mr. Aislaby and Mr. Craggs, were appointed to be applied to the Relief of the Sufferers by the South-Sea Scheme, by a Bill for that Purpose. When this Bill was brought up to the House of Lords, Mr. Aislaby made two elaborate Speeches for himself, but in vain.

This Affair was what took up the two Houses chiefly during this Session; which being now concluded, the King came July 29. to the House of Peers, and giving the Royal Assent to the Bills prepared for him, (among which one was, an Act of General and Free Pardon) the Parliament was, by his Order, prorogued to the thirty first of the same Month; on which Day the King came again to the House of Lords, and told them that the Occasion of his calling them again so suddenly was, to give them an Opportunity of resuming the Consideration of Publick Credit. The Commons being returned to their House, made several Resolutions to that End; the Substance of which was, "To remit to the South-Sea Company the four Millions they were to pay to the Publick; to divide the Stock undisposed of, and in the Hands of the Company, among the Proprietors; to allow those who had borrowed Money of the South-Sea Company upon Stock, to clear themselves by paying ten per Cent. of the Money borrowed; and to disannul all Con-tracts for Stock and Subscriptions".

While this was doing, a great Riot was made by great Numbers of Persons of both Sexes, who demanded Justice of the Members as they went into the House, putting into their Hands written and printed Papers, to desire them to do Justice to the Annuitants. Upon this the House ordered the Justices of the Peace for the City of Westminster to attend the House; who coming not long after with some Constables, the Proclamation against Riots was read; upon which, with some Reluctance, those People dispersed. This being done, and a Bill being brought in, in Pursuance of the above Resolutions, for the restoring Publick Credit, it passed the House of Commons; and being agreed to by the House of Lords, the King came August 10. and gave the Royal Assent thereto; and afterwards prorogued the Parliament to October 19. August 25. Simon Lord Viscount Harcourt was sworn of his Majesty's most honourable Privy-Council.

October 19. The Parliament met, according to the Prorogation. They sat till the seventh of March afterwards; but what passed in that Session was not very material. And soon after they had broke up by the King's Prorogation, a Proclamation was published for dissolving that Parliament, and calling another to meet on the tenth of May following. The Meeting of this new Parliament being put off till October 9. they met on that Day; and the Commons having chosen Spencer Compton Esquire their Speaker. The next Day the King came and made a Speech to the Parliament, in which he took Notice of a dangerous Conspiracy, formed in Favour of the Pretender. This Speech being delivered, and the King retired, a Motion was made in the House of Lords for a Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and for empowering his Majesty to secure and detain all suspected Persons, till the twenty fourth of October in the following Year 1723. which passed the House, though not without strong Opposition. The two Houses having presented their Addressess, this Bill was sent down to the Commons, where it was also passed, and received the Royal Assent next Day. As soon as this Assent was given, the Lord Carteret informed the House that the Bishop of Rochester, the Lord North and Grey, and the Earl of Orrery were committed to the Tower; and that his Majesty desired the Consent of the House to detain them there by Virtue of that Act; to which the House consented, and soon after the Duke of Norfolk was apprehended.

November 16. A Message was sent to the King, importing that a Paper had been seized, entitled, The Declaration of James the Third, &c. which his Majesty thought proper to lay before the House. Upon which the two Houses ordered, that the said Declaration should be burnt by the common Hangman. November 21. Christopher Layer Esquire was tried for High Treason at the King's-Bench Bar, before the Lord Chief Justice

A.D. 1721.

A.D. 1722.

The Parliament dissolved.

A Plot mentioned in the King's Speech to the new Parliament,

Proceedings of Parliament.

Bishop of Rochester, Lord North and Grey, and the Earl of Orrery committed to the Tower.

A.D. 1723. Justice Pratt, and the Justices Powys, Eyre, and Fortescue-Aland; and after a long Hearing he was found guilty.

January 15. A Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to examine Christopher Lyster in Relation to the Conspiracy mentioned in his Majesty's Speech at the opening the Parliament; of which the said Lyster had been found guilty.

March 1. William Pulteney Esquire, who was Chairman of that Committee, reported the Matter as it appeared to them; which Report he read in his Place, and afterwards delivered it in at the Table. Next Day, the House proceeded to take the Report into Consideration. The Report set forth, "That a Design had been long carrying on by Persons of Figure and Distinction at home, in Conjunction with Traytors abroad, for placing the Pretender on the Throne of these Kingdoms. That various Methods had been attempted; and various Times fixed for putting this Design in Execution. That the first Intention was to have procured a regular Body of Foreign Forces to invade these Kingdoms at the Time of the late Elections; but that the Conspirators, being disappointed in this Expectation, resolved next to make an Attempt at the Time it was generally believed his Majesty intended to go to Hanover, by the Help of such Officers and Soldiers as could pass into England from abroad unobserved, under the Command of the late Duke of Ormond, who was to have landed in the River with a great Quantity of Arms, provided in Spain for that Purpose; at which Time the Tower was likewise to have been seized, and the City of London to have been made a Place for Arms; but this Design being also disappointed by the Discoveries made in England, and his Majesty's putting off his Journey, by the Encampment of his Forces at home, as well as by the sending for those from Ireland, and by the Readiness of his Majesty's good Allies, the States-General, to assist him in Case of Need, by the Orders given in Spain, that the late Duke of Ormond should not be suffered to embark, and the like Orders issued in France, that he should not be suffered to pass through that Kingdom; the Conspirators found themselves under a Necessity of deferring their Enterprize till the breaking up of the Camp; during which Interval, they were labouring by their Agents and Emissaries, to corrupt and seduce the Officers and Soldiers of his Majesty's Army; and depended so much on this Defection, as to entertain Hopes of placing the Pretender on the Throne, though they should obtain no Assistance from abroad, which nevertheless they still continued to solicit for. And that in this Design, the Lords who were Prisoners, with others of inferior Rank, were concerned."

Bills of Pains and Penalties against Plunket, Kelly, and the Bishop of Rochester.

Upon this Report, three Bills of Pains and Penalties were brought in. The first was for John Plunket, the second for George Kelly, and the third for the Bishop of Rochester.

A.D. 1723.

The two former were to be imprisoned during the King's Pleasure, and to forfeit their Estates; the latter to be deprived of his Office and Benefice, banished the Kingdom, be guilty of Felony if he returned, and it was not to be in the King's Power to pardon him without Consent of Parliament. And these three Bills passed the House. When they were carried up to the House of Lords, the Persons concerned were heard severally by themselves and their Council against those Bills, but to no Purpose. So that the Bills having passed the House of Lords, and receiving afterwards the Royal Assent, Plunket and Kelly were committed Prisoners, and the Bishop of Rochester transported himself beyond Sea. And on the twenty seventh of May, the King came to the House of Peers, and prorogued the Parliament.

On the ninth of January the Parliament met again, and sate till April 24. But the Occurrences of this Session had nothing particularly remarkable.

May 16. A Circular Letter was sent by the King's Order to the two Universities, importing, that to enable those two learned Bodies to answer more effectually the Ends of their Institution, his Majesty had erected two Professorships of Modern History, and Modern Languages. For this Royal Gift his Majesty received the Addresses of Thanks from both the Universities.

Novemb. 12. The Parliament met; but nothing material occurred till Feb. 9. on which Day Mr. Comptroller of the King's Household acquainted the House, that he had a Message from his Majesty to the House; and farther, that he was commanded by his Majesty to lay before the House, Copies of several Reports and other Papers relating to the Masters in Chancery; and he delivered in at the Table the said Copies and other Reports. And the said Reports, with some of the Papers therein referred to, being read, they were ordered to be taken into Consideration upon the twelfth of that Month. And this being done, a Motion was made, that Thomas Earl of Macclesfield, Lord High Chancellor, be impeached of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, which was carried in the Affirmative; and it was ordered that Sir George Oxendon should go up to the Lords, and impeach him, which was done accordingly. And a Committee was appointed to draw up Articles against him. The Articles of Impeachment being prepared, they were on March 20. carried up to the Lords.

April 20. A Petition was presented to the House of Commons, in the Name of the late Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, praying, that Leave might be given to bring in a Bill to enable the Petitioner to hold and enjoy certain Estates; and it was ordered, that a Bill should be brought in according to the Prayer of the said Petition.

Proceedings of Parliament.

May

A.D. 1725. May 6. Came on the Tryal of the Earl of Macclesfield, which held till the twenty sixth of the same Month, after which the Lords gave Judgment that he was Guilty of the High Crimes and Misdemeanors charged upon him. Soon after this, Sentence was passed upon him, that he should be fined thirty Thousand Pounds, and remain in the Tower, till he should pay the same. And soon after the King came to the House of Peers, May 31, and prorogued the Parliament.

Order of the Bath restored. May 17. His Majesty re-established the Degree of Knighthood of the Bath, and erected the same into a regular Military Order for ever, by the Name and Title of the Order of the Bath; and appointed his Grace John Duke of Montague to be the first Great Master of the Order. The Honour of Knighthood in this Order was conferred on the following Persons.

1. His Royal Highness Prince William.
2. John Duke of Montague, Great Master.
3. Charles Duke of Richmond.
4. William Duke of Manchester.
5. Charles Earl of Burford, eldest Son of the Duke of St. Albans.
6. John Earl of Leicester.
7. William Earl of Albemarle.
8. Henry Earl of Deloraine.
9. George Earl of Hallifax.
10. Talbot Earl of Suffex.
11. Thomas Earl of Pomfret.
12. Lord Nassau Pawlet.
13. George Lord Viscount Torrington.
14. George Viscount Malpas.
15. John Lord Glenorchy.
16. John Lord Delaware.
17. Hugh Lord Clinton.
18. Robert Lord Walpole.
19. Spencer Compton, Esq;
20. William Stanhope, Esq;
21. Conyers D'Arcy, Esq;
22. Thomas Lumley Saunderson, Esq;
23. Paul Methuen, Esq;
24. Robert Walpole, Esq;
25. Sir Robert Sutton, Knt.
26. Charles Wills, Esq;
27. Sir John Hobart, Bart.
28. Sir William Gage, Bart.
29. Robert Clifton, Esq;
30. Michael Newton, Esq;
31. William Yonge, Esq;
32. Sir John Monson, Bart.
33. Thomas Watson-Wentworth, Esq;
34. William Morgan, Esq;
35. Thomas Coke, Esq;
36. William Earl of Inchequin.
37. John Lord Viscount Tyrconnel.

June 17. The Knights of the Bath were installed in Henry the Seventh's Chapel at Westminster with great Magnificence.

About this Time there were great Tumults in several Places in Scotland on Occasion of a Malt-Tax.

A.D. 1726. January 17. The Parliament met. The King took Notice in his Speech of an Alliance made between the Emperor and King of Spain, as also a Treaty of Commerce between them; upon which his Majesty observed, that to prevent the evil Consequences of this Conjunction to Great-Britain, he had entered into a Defensive Alliance with the Kings of France and Prussia. The King's Speech was answered by Loyal Addresses from both Houses.

February 10. The Treaty of Hanover concluded between France, Great-Britain, and Prussia, on the third of September 1725. and the Treaties of Peace and Commerce between the Emperor and the King of Spain, were laid before the House of Commons, who resolved to take the same into Consideration on that Day Sevensnight.

February 17. Both Houses took those Treaties into Consideration, and agreed separately to address his Majesty thereupon; in which they promised to vindicate his Majesty's Honour, in Case of any Insult made upon his Territories, not belonging to the Crown of Great-Britain.

March 24. A Message from his Majesty to the Commons was read in the House as follows.

GEORGE R.

"HIS Majesty having nothing more at A Message
"Heart, than an earnest Desire to se- from the "cure to his own Subjects the full and free King.
"Enjoyment of their Trade and Navigati"on, and in the best Manner to prevent "and frustrate such Designs as have been "formed against the particular Interest of "this Nation, and the general Peace of Eu"rope, has found it necessary, not only to "augment his Maritime Force, but to "concert such other Measures as may most "effectually conduce to these desirable Ends;
"and as these Services will require some "extraordinary Expence, his Majesty hopes
"he shall be enabled, by the Assistance of "Parliament, to increase the Number of "Seamen already voted, and granted for
"the Service of this Year; and to enter "into, and make good such Engagements
"as the Circumstances and Exigency of Af"fairs may require.

This Message being taken into Consideration the next Day, it was resolved that an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, that he will be pleased to make that Addition to the Number of Seamen, and concert such other Measures as his Majesty should think fit; assuring him that the House would effectually make good all such Expences and Engagements.

May 23. The King came to the House of Peers, and prorogued the Parliament.

This Spring three strong Fleets were sent into the Baltick, to the Coast of Spain, and into the West-Indies. The first under the Command of Sir Charles Wager, having attended the two Kings of Denmark and Sweden, came on the twenty ninth of May before the Island of Nargen, three Leagues from Revel; from whence the Admiral sent a Letter to the Czarina, to acquaint her that he had Orders to keep the Russians from attempting any Hostilities on their Neigh-

A.D. 1726. bours. There was at that Time a considerable Fleet in the Port of Revel; which was well furnished with Ammunition and Provisions, and a great Number of Land-Forces were assembled, in order to be taken on Board for some secret Design: But upon the Approach of the British Fleet, the Men of War were unrigged, and the Land-Forces were dismissed.

The Fleet sent to Spain, under Sir John Jennings, hovered about that Coast a long Time. The Squadron sent to the West-Indies under Admiral Hofier, came before Porto-Bello in the Gulf of Mexico, where the Galleons were. But upon the Approach of the British Squadron, the Spaniards unloaded them, and carried ashore the Treasure they contained.

A.D. 1727.

Proceedings of Parliament.

January 17. the Parliament met. The King in his Speech took Notice to them, "That the Proceedings and Transactions since the Conclusion of the Treaties between the Emperor and Spain had made it necessary for the British Nation to be put into a Condition to do themselves Justice, or tamely to acquiesce with the Surrender of Gibraltar, and the Emperor's Usurpation of our Commerce". His Majesty farther informed the Parliament, "That the placing the Pretender on the Throne of these Realms was one of the Articles of the secret Engagements; and that these fatal Combinations had extended themselves as far as Russia; and that if the Designs of that Court against some of their Neighbours had not been prevented by the Arrival of our Fleet in the Baltick, a Way had been opened for invading these Kingdoms, and giving powerful Assistance to Attempts from other Quarters. Upon which his Majesty said he was confident he might be secure of the Support and Assistance of the Parliament". His Majesty's Speech was answered by suitable Addresses from both Houses.

Count Palm's
Memorial.

March 2. M. de Palm, the Emperor's Resident here, in an Audience he had of the King, delivered into the Hands of his Majesty, a Memorial in Latin, couched in a very indecent Style, unbecoming the Majesty of so mighty a Crowned Head; and to add to the Indignity, the said Memorial was, the next Day, publickly dispersed, and printed Copies of Translations of it, one in English, and the other in French, sent to several Members of both Houses of Parliament, to Aldermen of the City of London, and other Persons of Character; together with a Letter from the Count Sinzen-dorf to M. de Palm, wherein the Resident was ordered, first to present the said Memorial to the King of Great-Britain, and afterwards to publish it to the whole Nation.

This Affront to the Person of a King of Great-Britain was resented accordingly. The Resident was immediately ordered to depart the Kingdom, and the two Houses of Parliament concurred in an Address, signifying their highest Resentment at such an Insolence. This Address was succeeded by another from the City of London not long after, to the same Effect; whose Example was followed by all or most of the Cities and Corporations in Great-Britain.

The Spanish Army which had sat down before Gibraltar at the latter End of February, was employed to the End of this Reign in the Siege of that Place. But after four Months spent there with very little Advance, a Kind of a Pacification made between his Majesty and the King of Spain, gave them a Pretence, which they willingly laid hold on, to give over any farther Attempts.

June 3. His Majesty set out from St. James's Palace for his Dominions in Germany. He was detained at Gravesend two Days for want of Wind, from whence he departed on the fifth, and landed in Holland on the seventh. He passed through the Territories of the Republick, to all Appearance in perfect Health, till he came to Delden, where he eat his Supper with a good Appetite; and, among other Things, part of a Melon. But this it seems did not digest well; for having set out again about three the next Morning, his Majesty had not travelled two Hours before he felt some Gripings of the Cholick. Being arrived at Linden, where his Dinner was provided, he found himself unable to eat; upon which he was presently let Blood, and had such Remedies, as were judged proper, administered to him. Those about him wished he would have rested there; but his Majesty being desirous to reach his own Dominions with all possible Speed, he travelled on; and falling into a kind of Dozing in his Coach, he rested in the Arms of a Gentleman that sat alone in the Coach with him. About ten that Night he arrived at the Duke of York's Palace at Onnabrug, where he was let Blood in the Arm and Foot; but these Bleedings produced no Effect; so that his Lethargy still increasing, he departed this Life on Sunday June 11. about one in the Morning, aged sixty seven Years and fourteen Days; being born May 28, 1669. He came to the Crown August 1, 1714. So that he reigned twelve Years, ten Months, and ten Days. He was married November 21, 1682. to Sophia-Dorothea, Daughter of the Duke of Zell; who dyed November 3. before. By this Marriage he had George-Augustus, Prince of Wales, his present Majesty; and Sophia-Dorothy, married to the King of Prussia.

The Reign of King GEORGE I.

Of his Person and Conditions.

HIS Majesty's Person was of the middle Size, and well-built; and his Countenance had a Native Air of Regal Majesty, joined with something that was at the same Time very engaging and attractive. In his Youth he was noted for acquitting himself with Applause in all Exercises of the Body. He understood and spoke the Latin, French and Italian Languages to a great Exactness; nor was he unacquainted with our own; but he was too far advanced in Years, when the Crown of England was settled on his Family, (he being then above Forty) to render it familiar to him. He was also an Admirer and Judge of the beautiful Arts. He had given remarkable Proofs of his personal Courage at the Siege of Buda in Hungary, where the Fire of his Temper once engaged him so far among the Enemies, that he would have been killed or taken, had he not made his Escape by swimming his Horse through the Danube. His Conduct as a General appeared when the Command of the Imperial Army on the Rhine was delivered to him; the Campaign there under his Direction being the most important and successful of any before, or after him. That he was in his own Nature of a gentle and gracious Temper, appeared from his mild and easy Government of his Hereditary Dominions, where he had no Restraint but his own Will. And to confirm this, it is particularly related of him, that when the News was brought him that the Earl of Nithisdale, who was sentenced to die for the Rebellion, had made his Escape the Night before Execution, his Majesty only said with a pleasant Smile, It was the best Thing a Man in his Circumstances could possibly do. This is all that our slender Knowledge and Informations enable us to add concerning the personal Character of this great Prince. We hope our Readers will pardon the Defectiveness of it, on Account of the Difficulty there is to collect Materials on such a Subject so near to our own Times: and because we profess to insert it, only in Conformity to our Method in other Places.

MAYORS and SHERIFFS of LONDON in this King's Reign.

In 1715.

SIR William Humpbrys, Mayor.
Sir Robert Breeden, Sir Randolph Knipe, Sheriffs.

In 1716.

Sir Charles Peers, Mayor.
Sir John Ward, Sir John Fryer, Sheriffs.

In 1717.

Sir James Bateman, Mayor.
Sir Gerard Conyers, Charles Cook, Sheriffs.

In 1718.

Sir William Lewen, Mayor.
Sir Peter Delme, Sir Harcourt Masters, Sheriffs.

In 1719.

Sir John Ward, Mayor.
Sir John Bull, Thomas Ambrosi, Sheriffs.

In 1720.

Sir George Thorold, Mayor.
Sir John Eyles, Sir John Tash, Sheriffs.

In 1721.

Sir John Fryer, Mayor.
Sir George Caswall, Sir William Billers, Sheriffs.

In 1722.

Sir William Steward, Mayor.
Sir George Mertins, Sir Edward Becher, Sheriffs.

In 1723.

Sir Gerrard Conyers, Mayor.
Humphrey Parsons, Francis Child, Sheriffs.

In 1724.

Sir Peter Delme, Mayor.
Sir Richard Hopkins, Sir Felix Feast, Sir Edward Bellamy, Sheriffs.

In 1725.

Sir George Mertins, Mayor.
Sir Joseph Eyles, Sir Robert Baylis, Sheriffs.

In 1726.

Sir Francis Forbes, Mayor.
Sir Francis Porteen, Sir Jeremiah Murden, Sir John Thompson, Sheriffs.

In 1727.

Sir John Eyles, Mayor.
Sir John Lock, Sir William Ogborn, Sheriffs.

INDEX

OF THE

PRINCIPAL MATTERS contained in this WORK.

G GEORGE Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, kills a Man by Accident, 420. He is suspended, 435. The Corporation Act, 628.

Act of Uniformity, 629.

Five-Mile Act, 637.

Act of Toleration, 779.

Agitators in the Parliament Army, 503.

Algerines, a fruitless Attempt against them, 627. Another with better Success, 631.

The Triple Alliance concluded by King Charles II. 648, 649.

Duke of Alanson makes Suit to Queen Elizabeth, 348, 350, 353, 358. He comes to England, 355, 359.

Alterations in Religion made by the Parliament under Q. Elizabeth, 328.

St. Alban martyred at Verulam, 3.

Alfred King of England, 8, 9. founds Oxford, 9.

The Allies surprized at Denain, 896.

Archbishop of St. Andrews murdered, 698.

Anne of Britain contracted to the King of the Romans with an odd Ceremony, 240. She is afterwards married to the King of France, ibid.

Anne Bullen, married to King Hen. VIII. 281. Crowned, 282. Delivered of the Lady Elizabeth, ibid. She miscarries, 283. She is committed to the Tower, and beheaded, ibid.

Anne of Cleve, married to K. Hen. VIII. 287. Divorced, 288.

Lady Anne, Daughter of the Duke of York, married to Prince George of Denmark, 718. She retires from London, 757. She has a Difference with her Sister Queen Mary, 798. She becomes Queen, 832.

Anne, Queen of Great Britain, begins her Reign, 832. The State of Affairs at that Time, ibid. and 833. She promises to allow a hundred Thousand Pounds per Ann. out of her Revenue for the Publick Service, 833. She declares War against France, 834. Her Answer to the Parliament's Address about a second Marriage, 878. She changes her Ministry, 887, 888. The Allies interpose about it, 887. She begins to treat of a Peace, 891. Her Health declines, 897. She makes her last Speech to the Parliament, 898. Her Gift of the First-fruits and Tithes, 899. Her Person and Conditions, ibid. Her Death and Burial, 900.

The Lady Arabella marries Mr. Seymour, and dies in the Tower, 414.

The Marquis of Argyle beheaded, 627.

The Earl of Argyle invades Scotland in concert with the Duke of Monmouth, 727. He is taken and beheaded, 728.

The Spanish Armada sent to invade England, 374. Their Defeat, 375.

The Army of the long Parliament under King Charles I. send a Representation to them, and impeach Eleven of their Members, 504. They enter the City, 505. Divisions therein, 507. Their Intrigues against the Rump, 576. They turn the Parliament out a second Time, 579. They are disbanded, 620.

Standing Army, Debates thereon, 815, 816, 817.

Arthur King of Britain, 4.

Prince Aribur, Competitor of King John, 68, 69. He is taken Prisoner and dies, 70.

Prince Arthur, Son to Henry VII. marries the Lady Katharine of Spain, 245. His Death, 246.

Articles of Peace in Queen Anne's Time made Publick, 894. Reflections on them, ibid.

Lord Arundel of Wardour, made Earl or Count of the Empire, 384.

Assizes at Oxford, a sudden Mortality there, 353.

Association in Defence of Queen Elizabeth, 363. of the Prince of Orange, 755. after the Assassination Plot, 811.

Athelstane King of England, 10.

The Siege of Athlone in Ireland by General Ginkle, 786.

L'Aubespine the French Ambassador plots against Queen Elizabeth, 371.

Lord Audley tried, and beheaded for Sodomy, 442.

Aurelius Ambrosius, and Aurelius Conanus, Kings of Britain, 4.

B Abington's Plot against Queen Elizabeth, 367. He and others executed, 368.

John Baliol, Competitor for the Scottish Crown, adjudged King of Scotland by Edward I. 96. He afterwards falls at Variance with him, 97. swears Fealty to him, and is carried Prisoner to England, ibid.

Edward Baliol, crowned King of Scotland, 117.

Barcelona, the raising of the Siege thereof, 863.

Battle Abbey founded by William the Conqueror, 29.

The Battle of Hastings, 23.

— of Lewes, 87.

— of Evesham, ibid.

— of Fawcirk, 97.

— of Bannockburn, 107.

— of Halli-down-hill, 117.

— of Cressy, 121.

— of Poitiers, 123.

— of Agincourt, 170, 171.

— of St. Albans, 194, 197.

— of Earnet, 210.

— of Tewksbury, 211.

— of Bosworth, 232, 233.

The Battle of Spurs, 259.

— of Floddon-Field, 260.

— of St. Quentin, 323.

— of Newport, 389.

— at Newburne, 459.

— of Edgehill, 478.

— at Brentford, 479.

— at Stratton, 480.

— in Chalgrove Field, 481.

— of Lansdowne, 482.

— of Round-way-down, ibid.

— of Newberry, 484.

— at Newark, 487.

— at Crofted Bridge, 490.

— of Marston-Moor, ibid.

The second Battle of Newberry, 492.

The Battle of Naseby, 497.

— of Routon-Moor, 499.

— of Dunbar, 534.

— of Worcester, 539.

— of Sedgmore, 730.

— of the Boyne, 782.

— of Aghrim, 786.

— of Steenkirk, 791.

— of Landen, 794.

— of Schellenberg, 847.

— of Blenheim, 848.

— of Ramellies, 860.

— of Almanza, 867.

— of Oudenard, 874.

— of Wynendale, 875.

— of Blaregnies or Malplaquet, 879.

— of Almenara, 885.

— of Saragossa, ibid.

— of Villa Viciosa, 886.

Elect of Bavaria declares for France, 835.

Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, made Protector of Richard II. 138.

Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, slain at the Altar, 58. His Shrine set up at Canterbury, ibid. It is pulled down by Henry VIII. 286.

The Duke of Bedford made Regent of France, 180. He quells a Conspiracy at Paris, 181. He makes the French King retire before him, 183. He falls out with the Duke of Burgundy, 184. His Death, ibid.

Several Bishops committed to Prison under King Edward VI. 304.

Bishops removed from their Seats in Parliament, 473. They are restored, 626.

The Affair of the seven Bishops in the time of King James II. 743 to 746.

General Blake's Actions in the War of the Rump Parliament with Holland, 544 to 549. His Successes in the Mediterranean, 555. He beats the Spanish Fleet at Cadix, 557. His brave Attempt on them at Santa Cruz, 559.

Blood's Attempt on the Duke of Ormond, 655. He endeavours to steal the Crown out of the Tower, 657.

Sir George Booth's Rising, 572.
 Duke of Bourgoigne murdered by the Dauphin of France, 174.
 An unsuccessful Attempt on Brest under King William III. 796.
 Bribery, a famous Enquiry made into it by the House of Commons, 799.
 Britain, subdued by the Romans, 2. Quitted by them, ibid.
 Brute, and his three Sons, 1.
 Robert Bruce attempts to make himself King of Scotland, 97. He is defeated by the Earl of Pembroke, 98. Invades England, 107, 116.
 Edward Bruce, crowned King of Ireland, 108. Taken Prisoner and beheaded, ibid.
 The Duke of Buckingham joins with the Duke of Gloucester, 220. He proposes him for Heir to the Crown, 224. Offers him the Crown, 225. He plots with the Bishop of Ely to pull him down, 228. He is betrayed and beheaded, 230.
 Mr. George Villiers made Duke of Buckingham, 411. He is attacked in the House of Commons, 431. Accused of High Treason by the Earl of Bristol, 432. Impeached by the House of Commons, 433. His Expedition to the Isle of Rhé, 434. He is murdered by Felton, 437.

C.

CABAL, under King Charles II. 652. Transactions under their Ministry, 652 to 660. They break to Pieces, 666.
 An Expedition to Cadix, in the Time of King Charles I. 429. Unsuccessful, 430. Another, 383, 835.
 Cadwan, Cadwallo, and Cadwallader, Kings of Britain, 4. The Prophecy made to Cadwallader, that his Offspring should reign in Britain again, 236.
 Calais, taken by King Edward III. 122. Retaken by the French, 323.
 The French Camisars, 844.
 The Campaigns in the long War with Louis XIV. of France are here referred to according to the Years.
 That in 1668. 649.
 In 1672. 661.
 In 1673. 669.
 In 1674. 673.
 In 1675. 676.
 In 1676. 677, 678.
 In 1677. 678, 679.
 In 1678. 684.
 In 1690. 784.
 In 1691. 787, 788.
 In 1692. 791, 792.
 In 1693. 793, 794, 795.
 In 1694. 796, 797.
 In 1695. 803, 804, 805.
 In 1696. 812.
 In 1702. 835, 836.
 In 1703. 842, 843, 844.
 In 1704. 846, 847, 848, 849, 850.
 In 1705. 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858.
 In 1706. 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865.
 In 1707. 867, 868, 869, 870.
 In 1708. 874, 875, 876.
 In 1709. 879, 880, 881.
 In 1710. 884, 885, 886.
 In 1711. 889, 890.
 In 1712. 893, 894, 895, 896.
 Cardinal Campejus sent by the Pope to judge of the Marriage of King Henry VIII. with Queen Katharine, 276.
 Duke of Cambridge, a Writ demanded for him, 898.
 Canutus, first Danish King in England, 7.
 Caretjeus, King of Britain, 4.
 A Cardinal taken in Bed with an Harlot, 41.
 Bishop of Carlisle's Speech in Behalf of King Richard II. 158.
 Cavendish sails round the World, 373.

The Emperor Charles V. comes into England, 266, 268.
 Charles III. of Spain comes into England, 845. He fails to Portugal, ibid. He goes to Spain with the Earl of Peterborough, and lands in Catalonia, 856. The Danger he was in at Barcelona, 862. His noble Resolution, ibid. His ill Conduct afterwards, 864. He is elected Emperor of Germany, 890.
 Charles Duke of Albany, second Son to King James I. made Duke of York, 406. Becomes Prince of Wales by the Death of his Brother Henry, 412. Is made King by the Title of Charles I. 428.
 Charles I. King of Great Britain proclaimed, 428. His Marriage, ibid. He dissolves his first Parliament, 429. Begins a War with Spain, ibid. He borrows Money by Letters of Privy Seal, 430. He calls a second Parliament, ibid. He imprisons the Earl of Arundel, 430. Is offended with the Commons, and speaks sharply to them, 432. He dissolves them, 433. He calls a new Parliament, 436. He consents to the Petition of Right, ibid. He sends the Black-Rod to the House of Commons, who shut the Door upon him, 438. He dissolves them, and imprisons some of the Members, ibid. His Declaration, 439. He sends Aid to the King of Sweden, 440. He puts in Force the Law of Knighthood, ibid. He makes a Progress into Scotland, 444. His Intentions to introduce a Liturgy there, ibid. He raises an Army against the Scots, and goes against them in Person, 452. He makes a Pacification with them, 453. He calls a new Parliament, 457. He dissolves it, 458. He goes to his Army raised against the Scots, ibid. He calls another great Council of the Peers, 460. He treats with the Scots at Rippon, ibid. He meets his Parliament, 461. He goes into Scotland, 468. He returns to England, 470. He comes to the House of Commons to seize five of the Members, 473. He removes to York, and issues out Commissions of Array, ibid. He is denied Entrance into Hull by Sir John Hotham, 474. He rejects the Parliament's Propositions, 475. He attempts Hull in vain, 476. He proclaims the Parliament Rebels, and sets up his Standard at Nottingham, ibid. The Events of the Civil War, to Page 500. He comes to the Scots Camp, 501. He is delivered to the Parliament by the Scots, 502. Brought away from Holmby by Col. Joyce, 504. He is brought to Hampton-Court, 505. He endeavours to escape thence, but is betrayed by Col. Hammond, 507. He is brought to Windsor, and thence to St. James's, 515. His Wife and Children, 518. His Trial, ibid. His Behaviour before his Death, and on the Scaffold, 519, 520. His Burial, ibid. His Personage and Conditions, 521.
 Charles II. King of Great Britain proclaimed in Scotland, 525. He removes from Holland into France, 526. He lands in Scotland, 533. He is crowned at Scone, 536. He enters England at the Head of the Scotch Army, 538. His wonderful Escape from Worcester, 539, 540, 541. He goes into Germany, 551. He repairs to the Pyrennees, where France and Spain were in Treaty, 576. He sends a Letter to General Monk, who accepts it, 605. He comes to Breda, 606. His Letters and Declaration from thence presented to the great Bodies, 609 to 614. His Return, 615, 616. His Counsellors and Servants, 617. His excellent Conduct and Felicity, 618, 619. He marries the Infanta of Portugal, 629. Some Account of him, 631. He issues out a Declaration, dispensing with the Act of Uniformity, 632. He begins to prepare for a War with Holland, 634. He declares War, 635. The Bishop of Munster joins with him, 637. He declares War with France and Denmark, 638. He concludes the Triple Alliance, 649. He enters into secret Negotiations with France, 652. He issues a second Declaration in Favour of Dissenters, 660. He declares War against Holland, ibid. He is obliged by the Parliament to recal his Declaration, 667. He makes Peace with the Dutch, 671. A new Period of his Reign, 672. Some Account of his Disposition with Respect to Publick Affairs, 672. He offers to mediate between France and the Confederates, 673. He seems inclined to a War with France, 680. He raises a vast Force in six Weeks Time, 684. He lays aside his Thoughts of War, 685. He protects the Queen, who was accused by Oates and Bedloe, 692. He enters into new and wholesome Councils, 696. He erects a new Privy Council, 697. He proposes Limitations of the Crown to the Parliament, ibid. He falls sick, 701. Some Lords offer a Petition against the calling a Parliament at Oxford, which he rejects, 707. He dissolves the Parliament at Oxford, 708. He issues a Declaration, 709. He seizes the Charter of the City, and imposes hard Conditions on the Citizens, 713. He gives new Charters to most of the Corporations in England, 718, 720. He projects a great Alteration in Affairs, 721. His Marriage and Issue, ibid. His Personage and Conditions, 722. His Death and Burial, ibid.

The Burning of the English Ships at Chatham, 645.

Chelsea Hospital erected, 721.

Chimney Money, 628.

Christian King of Denmark visits King James I. 409, 413.

Church of England dangerously attacked by the Papists under King James II. 735.

The Protestant Churches shut up in Ireland, 778.

City of London has a Quo Warranto brought against it, upon which the Liberties thereof are seized into the King's Hands, 713. Its Charter restored, 751.

Earl of Clarendon attacked by the Earl of Bristol, 632. His Fall and Banishment, 646 to 648.

Clergy of the Church of England write against Popery with great Success, 735. The noble Stand they made, 742. The dangerous Snare laid for them by the King's second Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, 743.

The Clergy charged in a Praemunire by Hen. VIII. upon which they submit to him, 280.

The Silver Coin, the ruinous State of it, 802. An Act to prevent the Clipping of it, ibid. The Circumstances that attended the calling it in, and recoinage it, 800, 807, 808, 813, 814.

Coleman's Letters, 828.

Electorate of Cologne, the Influence it had upon the Revolution in England, 749.

Committee of Safety, 580. Dissolved, 592. Ten Competitors at once for the Kingdom of Scotland, 96.

The Conference at Hampton-Court, 418. Conference at the Savoy, 624.

A Contest betwixt the Jesuites and secular Priests, 393.

A Contest for Precedency between the Wives of the Lord Protector and the Lord Admiral, with its fatal Effects, 307.

The Convocation grants the King a Benevolence, 458. They appoint an Oath with an etc. in it, 517. A great Difference between the two Houses, about the Power

I N D E X

Power of adjourning the Lower House, 825. Another about an Address that the Church was not in Danger, 859.

Earl of Cornwall's Greatness, 85.

The Corporations surrender their Charters to King Charles II. 713.

The Scots Covenant taken by both Houses in England, 494. Burnt, 625.

Sir John Coventry's Nose slit, 655.

Cranmer first appears, 281. He is sent to Rome to prove the Unlawfulness of the King's Marriage, ibid. He is made Archbishop of Canterbury, 282. He is Godfather to the Princess Elizabeth, ibid. He is sent to the Tower, 317. He is condemned to be burnt, 321. He is burnt, 323.

Publick Credit almost sunk, 813. The wife Methods taken to restore it, ibid.

Thomas Cromwell's Fidelity to his Master Cardinal Wolsey, 277. He is taken into the King's Service, 282. He is made Master of the Rolls, 283. He is made Lord Keeper, Lord Cromwell, and Vicar General, 284. He is made Earl of Essex, 287. He is imprisoned and beheaded, ibid. and 288.

Olivier Cromwell, lands in Ireland, 528. He takes Drogheda by Storm, and puts all to the Sword, 528. He subdues Ireland, ib. He is made General of the Parliament Forces, 533. He turns the Rump out of Doors, 548. He calls another Parliament, 549. They dissolve themselves, and surrender the Power into his Hands; upon which he is made Protector, 550. He makes Peace with the Dutch, ibid. The Powers of Europe court him, 551. He calls a Parliament, but soon dissolves them, 553. He makes an Attempt upon Hispaniola, 554. He makes a Collection for the Vaudois, 555. He appoints Major Generals, 556. The humble Petition and Advice to him to make himself King, rejected by him, 558. He assists the French in Flanders, 559. He is installed Protector, ibid. He appoints an House of Lords which gives him Trouble, 561. He falls sick, and dies soon after, 562, 563.

Richard Cromwell, proclaimed Protector, 564.

The Army grows disaffected to him, 566.

He calls a Parliament, 567. The Army make him dissolve it, 568. He resigns the Government, 570.

Earl of Cumberland takes Porto Rico, 387.

D.

DANES first invade England, 8. Infest the Land from Time to Time, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13. They become Masters, 13.

Lord Darnley married to the Queen of Scots, 334. He is strangled in his Bed, 336.

David King of Scots made Prisoner, 54. Another David King of Scots made Prisoner by the English, 121. He is set at Liberty, 124.

Davison imprisoned for the Death of the Queen of Scots, 372.

Declaration of the Royal Party before the Restoration of King Charles II. 609. Declaration and Letters of King Charles II. from Breda, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614. His two Declarations of Indulgence to the Dissenters, 632, 660.

An Earl of Derby dreadful to King Richard II. 145.

Earl of Desmond rebels against Queen Elizabeth, 355. He is slain, 361.

Domesday-Book, on what Occasion composed, 26.

Antonius de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato in England, 419.

Captain Drake sails round the World, 357.

His Acts on the Coast of Spain, 373. His Death, 378.

Duel between Duke Hamilton and Lord Mohun, 896.

Dunkirk taken by the English and French, 562. Sold to France, 629. Surrendered to Queen Anne's Troops, 895. Demolished, 897.

Lord Viscount Dundee raises Troubles in Scotland against King William III. 774. He is slain in Battle, 775.

Dutch Fleet attacked at Bergen, 636. Burnt at the Vlie, 641.

The Dutch refuse to strike Sail to the King's Yacht, 657.

The Dutch Smyrna Fleet attacked, 658, 659.

The Dutch invaded by the French King, 661.

Driven to great Extremities, ibid. They resolve to go with one Consent to the East-Indies rather than submit to the King of France, 662. A great Escape they met with, ibid. Another, 665.

Dying Speeches of Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, and the Lord Capel, 525.

E.

A Strange Earthquake, 397.

East-Angles, their Kings, 7.

East-India Company erected, 389.

East-Saxons, their Kings, 6.

Ecclesiastical Matters, several Alterations made in them by the Parliament under King Edward VI. 304.

Ecclesiastical Commission set up by King James II. 736.

Edgar King of England, 11.

Edgar Atheling, Grandson to Edmund Ironside, 16. He opposes William the Conqueror, 24. Submits to him, and retires, 26.

Edmund King of England, 10.

Edmund Ironside, King of England, 15. Murdered, ibid.

Edred King of England, 11.

Edward the Elder, King of England, 9.

Edward the Martyr, King of England, 12, 13.

Edward the Confessor, King of England, 18, 19.

Edward, Son of King Henry III. is taken Prisoner by the Barons at the Battle of Lewes, 87. He escapes, and routs them at the Battle of Evesham, ibid.

Edward I. King of England, in the Holy Land when his Father Henry III. died, 94. His Valour there, and his dangerous Wound and Cure, ib. His great Escapes, ibid. He is crowned, 95. He depresses the Clergy, ibid. He unites Wales to the Crown of England, 96. He is made Arbitrator between the Competitors for the Crown of Scotland, ibid. He adjudges the Crown to Baliol, ibid. He enters Scotland, and subdues it, 97. A second Expedition there, ibid. Two of his Ribs are broke at the Battle of Fonkirk, ibid. His last Expedition into Scotland, 98. His Quarrel with the King of France, ibid. Concludes a Truce with him, 99. His Differences with his Lords, ibid. He puts all the Clergy out of his Protection, 100. His Wives and Children, 101. His Personage and Conditions, 102. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Edward II. King of England, his ill Conduct, 105. He is crowned, ibid. His Contention with the Nobles about Gaveston, 106. Is defeated by the Scots at Bannockburn, 107. He takes a new Favourite, Hugh Spencer, 108. The Lords take up Arms against him, 109. The King reduces them to Submission, and puts many of them to Death, 110. His Queen comes to England, and brings an Army against him, 111. He is forsaken by all, ibid. He is imprison'd, 112. He is deposed by the Parliament, ibid. Is inhumanely treated, ibid. His miserable Death, ibid. His Wife and Children, 113.

His Personage, &c. 114.

Edward III. King of England crowned, 116.

He confines his Mother, ibid. Claims the Crown of France, 117. Does Homage to the King of France for Guyenne, ibid. Makes War upon France, 118. Defeats the French in a Sea-Fight, 119. His Army defeated, ibid. He sends a Challenge to the French King, ibid. Concludes a Truce, ibid. Receives a Scotch Invasion, 119. He enters France again, 120. Wins the Battle of Cressy, ibid. The Scots repulsed by his Queen, and their King taken, 121. He takes Calais, 122. He is chosen King of the Romans, but refuses it, ibid. He passes over again into France, 124. He makes a Peace with France, ibid. Institutes the Order of the Garter, 128. He falls out with the Archbishop of Canterbury, 129. He prohibits all Collations by the Pope to Benefices in England, ibid. His Wife and Children, 131. His Personage, &c. 132. His Death and Burial, 133.

Edward the Black Prince takes John King of France Prisoner at the Battle of Poitiers, 123. He goes into Spain, 125. He dies, 126.

Edward Earl of March, Son to the Duke of York defeats Henry VI. near Northampton, 196. He comes to London with a great Army, and is elected King by the Name of Edward IV. 198.

Edward IV. King of England engages King Henry VI. near Towton in Yorkshire, and defeats him, 203. He is crowned, 204. He sits three Days together in the King's Bench, ibid. He marries the Lady Elizabeth Gray, ibid. He is surprized by the Earl of Warwick, and made Prisoner, but soon escapes, 207. He is forsaken on the sudden, and forced to fly to the Duke of Burgundy, 209. He finds Assistance, and lands in Yorkshire, ibid. His Dissimulation, 210. He comes to London, where King Henry is delivered to him, ibid. He meets the Earl of Warwick at Barnet, where, after a bloody Fight, the Earl is slain, 210. He defeats Queen Margaret's Army at the Battle of Tewksbury, and takes her Prisoner, 211. He passes over into France, 213. He makes Peace with the French King, 214. He has an Interview with him, ibid. He enters Scotland, 216. Declares War against France, ibid. His Wife and Issue, 217. His Personage, &c. 218. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Edward V. proclaimed King of England, 220. The wicked Policies of the Duke of Gloucester to get him into his Hands, ib. He is conveyed to the Tower, 222. He is murdered with his Brother Richard, 227. Their Bones found almost two Hundred Years afterwards, ibid.

Edward VI. King of England crowned, 302. He excludes his two Sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, from the Crown, and appoints the Lady Jane Gray his Successor, 311. The four great Hospitals in London founded by him, 312. His Personage and Conditions, 313. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Edwyng King of England, 11.

Egbert first King of England, 8.

Eldest Sons of the Kings of England made Dukes of Normandy, 40.

Eleanor, Queen to King Edward I. her conjugal Love, 94. Her Death, 96. Crosses erected in Memory of her, 102.

The Princess Elizabeth born, 282. Her Dangers under Queen Mary, 320. She becomes Queen, 327.

Elizabeth, Queen of England crowned, 327. She is sought for in Marriage by King Philip is deposed by the Parliament, ibid. Is inhumanely treated, ibid. His miserable Death, ibid. His Wife and Children, 113.

His Personage, &c. 114.

Edward III. King of England crowned, 116.

He confines his Mother, ibid. Claims the Crown of France, 117. Does Homage to the King of France for Guyenne, ibid. Makes War upon France, 118. Defeats the French in a Sea-Fight, 119. His Army defeated, ibid. He sends a Challenge to the French King, ibid. Concludes a Truce, ibid. Receives a Scotch Invasion, 119. He enters France again, 120. Wins the Battle of Cressy, ibid. The Scots repulsed by his Queen, and their King taken, 121. He takes Calais, 122. He is chosen King of the Romans, but refuses it, ibid. He passes over again into France, 124. He makes a Peace with France, ibid. Institutes the Order of the Garter, 128. He falls out with the Archbishop of Canterbury, 129. He prohibits all Collations by the Pope to Benefices in England, ibid. His Wife and Children, 131. His Personage, &c. 132. His Death and Burial, 133.

Edward the Black Prince takes John King of France Prisoner at the Battle of Poitiers, 123. He goes into Spain, 125. He dies, 126.

Edward Earl of March, Son to the Duke of York defeats Henry VI. near Northampton, 196. He comes to London with a great Army, and is elected King by the Name of Edward IV. 198.

Edward IV. King of England engages King Henry VI. near Towton in Yorkshire, and defeats him, 203. He is crowned, 204. He sits three Days together in the King's Bench, ibid. He marries the Lady Elizabeth Gray, ibid. He is surprized by the Earl of Warwick, and made Prisoner, but soon escapes, 207. He is forsaken on the sudden, and forced to fly to the Duke of Burgundy, 209. He finds Assistance, and lands in Yorkshire, ibid. His Dissimulation, 210. He comes to London, where King Henry is delivered to him, ibid. He meets the Earl of Warwick at Barnet, where, after a bloody Fight, the Earl is slain, 210. He defeats Queen Margaret's Army at the Battle of Tewksbury, and takes her Prisoner, 211. He passes over into France, 213. He makes Peace with the French King, 214. He has an Interview with him, ibid. He enters Scotland, 216. Declares War against France, ibid. His Wife and Issue, 217. His Personage, &c. 218. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Edward V. proclaimed King of England, 220. The wicked Policies of the Duke of Gloucester to get him into his Hands, ib. He is conveyed to the Tower, 222. He is murdered with his Brother Richard, 227. Their Bones found almost two Hundred Years afterwards, ibid.

Edward VI. King of England crowned, 302. He excludes his two Sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, from the Crown, and appoints the Lady Jane Gray his Successor, 311. The four great Hospitals in London founded by him, 312. His Personage and Conditions, 313. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Edwyng King of England, 11.

Egbert first King of England, 8.

Eldest Sons of the Kings of England made Dukes of Normandy, 40.

Eleanor, Queen to King Edward I. her conjugal Love, 94. Her Death, 96. Crosses erected in Memory of her, 102.

The Princess Elizabeth born, 282. Her Dangers under Queen Mary, 320. She becomes Queen, 327.

Elizabeth, Queen of England crowned, 327. She is sought for in Marriage by King Philip is deposed by the Parliament, ibid. Is inhumanely treated, ibid. His miserable Death, ibid. His Wife and Children, 113.

His Personage, &c. 114.

Edward III. King of England crowned, 116.

He confines his Mother, ibid. Claims the Crown of France, 117. Does Homage to the King of France for Guyenne, ibid. Makes War upon France, 118. Defeats the French in a Sea-Fight, 119. His Army defeated, ibid. He sends a Challenge to the French King, ibid. Concludes a Truce, ibid. Receives a Scotch Invasion, 119. He enters France again, 120. Wins the Battle of Cressy, ibid. The Scots repulsed by his Queen, and their King taken, 121. He takes Calais, 122. He is chosen King of the Romans, but refuses it, ibid. He passes over again into France, 124. He makes a Peace with France, ibid. Institutes the Order of the Garter, 128. He falls out with the Archbishop of Canterbury, 129. He prohibits all Collations by the Pope to Benefices in England, ibid. His Wife and Children, 131. His Personage, &c. 132. His Death and Burial, 133.

Edward the Black Prince takes John King of France Prisoner at the Battle of Poitiers, 123. He goes into Spain, 125. He dies, 126.

Edward Earl of March, Son to the Duke of York defeats Henry VI. near Northampton, 196. He comes to London with a great Army, and is elected King by the Name of Edward IV. 198.

Edward IV. King of England engages King Henry VI. near Towton in Yorkshire, and defeats him, 203. He is crowned, 204. He sits three Days together in the King's Bench, ibid. He marries the Lady Elizabeth Gray, ibid. He is surprized by the Earl of Warwick, and made Prisoner, but soon escapes, 207. He is forsaken on the sudden, and forced to fly to the Duke of Burgundy, 209. He finds Assistance, and lands in Yorkshire, ibid. His Dissimulation, 210. He comes to London, where King Henry is delivered to him, ibid. He meets the Earl of Warwick at Barnet, where, after a bloody Fight, the Earl is slain, 210. He defeats Queen Margaret's Army at the Battle of Tewksbury, and takes her Prisoner, 211. He passes over into France, 213. He makes Peace with the French King, 214. He has an Interview with him, ibid. He enters Scotland, 216. Declares War against France, ibid. His Wife and Issue, 217. His Personage, &c. 218. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Edward V. proclaimed King of England, 220. The wicked Policies of the Duke of Gloucester to get him into his Hands, ib. He is conveyed to the Tower, 222. He is murdered with his Brother Richard, 227. Their Bones found almost two Hundred Years afterwards, ibid.

Edward VI. King of England crowned, 302. He excludes his two Sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, from the Crown, and appoints the Lady Jane Gray his Successor, 311. The four great Hospitals in London founded by him, 312. His Personage and Conditions, 313. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Edwyng King of England, 11.

Egbert first King of England, 8.

Eldest Sons of the Kings of England made Dukes of Normandy, 40.

Eleanor, Queen to King Edward I. her conjugal Love, 94. Her Death, 96. Crosses erected in Memory of her, 102.

The Princess Elizabeth born, 282. Her Dangers under Queen Mary, 320. She becomes Queen, 327.

Elizabeth, Queen of England crowned, 327. She is sought for in Marriage by King Philip is deposed by the Parliament, ibid. Is inhumanely treated, ibid. His miserable Death, ibid. His Wife and Children, 113.

His Personage, &c. 114.

Edward III. King of England crowned, 116.

He confines his Mother, ibid. Claims the Crown of France, 117. Does Homage to the King of France for Guyenne, ibid. Makes War upon France, 118. Defeats the French in a Sea-Fight, 119. His Army defeated, ibid. He sends a Challenge to the French King, ibid. Concludes a Truce, ibid. Receives a Scotch Invasion, 119. He enters France again, 120. Wins the Battle of Cressy, ibid. The Scots repulsed by his Queen, and their King taken, 121. He takes Calais, 122. He is chosen King of the Romans, but refuses it, ibid. He passes over again into France, 124. He makes a Peace with France, ibid. Institutes the Order of the Garter, 128. He falls out with the Archbishop of Canterbury, 129. He prohibits all Collations by the Pope to Benefices in England, ibid. His Wife and Children, 131. His Personage, &c. 132. His Death and Burial, 133.

Edward the Black Prince takes John King of France Prisoner at the Battle of Poitiers, 123. He goes into Spain, 125. He dies, 126.

Edward Earl of March, Son to the Duke of York defeats Henry VI. near Northampton, 196. He comes to London with a great Army, and is elected King by the Name of Edward IV. 198.

Edward IV. King of England engages King Henry VI. near Towton in Yorkshire, and defeats him, 203. He is crowned, 204. He sits three Days together in the King's Bench, ibid. He marries the Lady Elizabeth Gray, ibid. He is surprized by the Earl of Warwick, and made Prisoner, but soon escapes, 207. He is forsaken on the sudden, and forced to fly to the Duke of Burgundy, 209. He finds Assistance, and lands in Yorkshire, ibid. His Dissimulation, 210. He comes to London, where King Henry is delivered to him, ibid. He meets the Earl of Warwick at Barnet, where, after a bloody Fight, the Earl is slain, 210. He defeats Queen Margaret's Army at the Battle of Tewksbury, and takes her Prisoner, 211. He passes over into France, 213. He makes Peace with the French King, 214. He has an Interview with him, ibid. He enters Scotland, 216. Declares War against France, ibid. His Wife and Issue, 217. His Personage, &c. 218. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Edward V. proclaimed King of England, 220. The wicked Policies of the Duke of Gloucester to get him into his Hands, ib. He is conveyed to the Tower, 222. He is murdered with his Brother Richard, 227. Their Bones found almost two Hundred Years afterwards, ibid.

Edward VI. King of England crowned, 302. He excludes his two Sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, from the Crown, and appoints the Lady Jane Gray his Successor, 311. The four great Hospitals in London founded by him, 312. His Personage and Conditions, 313. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Edwyng King of England, 11.

Egbert first King of England, 8.

Eldest Sons of the Kings of England made Dukes of Normandy, 40.

Eleanor, Queen to King Edward I. her conjugal Love, 94. Her Death, 96. Crosses erected in Memory of her, 102.

The Princess Elizabeth born, 282. Her Dangers under Queen Mary, 320. She becomes Queen, 327.

Elizabeth, Queen of England crowned, 327. She is sought for in Marriage by King Philip

Philip of Spain, 328. She sends an Army to assist the Scotch Lords, 330. She makes Peace with France, ibid. The many Matches offered to her, ibid. The Pope makes great Offers to her, 331. She calls in base Money, 332. She sends an Army to assist the French Protestants, ibid. Her first Favours to the Earl of Leicester, 333. The Parliament move her to marry, 335. She seizes a great Quantity of Spanish Money, 340. She assists the French Protestants, 342. She is solicited to set the Queen of Scots at Liberty, ibid. She treats with the Scots about that Matter, 343. A Match between her and the Duke of Anjou proposed to her, 344. She is chosen by the States the Protector of the Low Countries, which she declines, 351. She makes a League with them, 352. She sequesters the Treasure brought from the Indies by Captain Drake, 353. She receives Don Antonio of Portugal, 358. Her Reception of the Duke of Anjou, 359. She interposes between the Czar of Muscovy and the King of Sweden, 360. Plots against her in Behalf of the Queen of Scots, 362. She makes a League with the Princes of Germany, 364. She protects the States, 365. She makes League with the King of Scots, 367. Her great Suspence about the Queen of Scots, 371. She sends a Fleet to Portugal with Don Antonio, 376. She helps the King of Navarre, 377. Her Letter to the King of France, who turned Roman Catholic, 380. She makes a League with him, 384. She fits out a Navy against the Spaniards, 385. Her sharp Answer to a Pollish Ambassador, 386. Her Personage and Conditions, 398. Her Death and Burial, ibid.

The Bishop of Ely's politick Management with the Duke of Buckingham, 228, 229.

Empson and Dudley, two Instruments of King Henry VII. to raise Money, 247. They are beheaded, 255.

Episcopacy restored in England, 621. In Scotland, 626.

Robert Earl of Essex sent into France, 378. He challenges Monf. Villars to a single Combat, 380. He takes Cadiz, 383. He is sent with a Navy against the Spaniards, 385. He is made Earl Marshal, 386. The Queen gives him a Box on the Ear, 387. He is sent into Ireland, and makes a Truce, upon which he is imprisoned at his Return, 388. He is brought to a private Tryal, 389. He raises an Insurrection, 390. He is tried, and found Guilty, 391. Beheaded, 392.

Earl of Essex, General of the Parliament-Army, 475.

Earl of Essex cuts his Throat in the Tower, 716.

Ethelbald King of England, 8.

Ethelbert the first Saxon Christian King, 5.

Ethelbert King of England, 8.

Ethelred King of England, ibid.

Ethelred the Unready, King of England, 13.

Ethelwulf King of England, 8.

Prince Eugene of Savoy raises the Siege of Turin, 864. He comes into England, 893.

The Royal Exchange first built by Sir Thomas Gresham, 396.

The Exchequer shut up by King Charles II. 658.

The Exclusion of the Duke of York first touched on, 690. V. Parliament.

F.

THE Bastard Falconbridge makes a strange Attempt on London, 212. He is taken and executed, ibid.

Sir John Falstaff defeats the French, 183.

Family of Love, 395.

Sir John Fenwick's Case, 814.

The Fire of London, 642.

First-Fruits and Tenth given to King Henry VIII. 296. Queen Anne bestows them for the Relief of the poor Clergy, 899.

Fisher, Bishop of Rockester, reflects on the House of Commons, 278. He is beheaded, 282.

Forbisher's Voyages into America, 352.

The Kingdom of France totally recovered by the French in the Time of Henry VI. 189.

Francis I. King of France taken at the Battle of Pavia, 273. Set at Liberty, ibid.

The French spoil the Coasts of England, 137. They make great Preparations to invade England, which are defeated, 142.

The French land in England, and do some little Mischief, 784. They project another Invasion, which is unsuccessful, 789.

William Fuller, an Impostor, 788.

G.

Sebastian Gabato, or Cabot, makes Discoveries in North America, 245.

Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, his Hatred to the Protestants, and his strange Death, 323.

Pierce Gaveston, the Favourite of King Edward II. 105. His Greatness, Fall and Death, 106, 107.

Prince George of Denmark dies, 877.

George I. King of Great Britain, proclaimed, 901. He comes into Great-Britain, 902. A Difference between his Majesty and the Prince, 909. He declares War against Spain, 910. He restores the Order of the Bath, 917. An Affront offered him by Count Palm, the Emperor's Minister, 918. His Death, 919.

Gibraltar taken by Sir George Rooke, 850. It drives the French and Spaniards from before it, 851. A second unsuccessful Siege thereof, 919.

General Ginckle's Acts in Ireland, 785, 786, 787.

The Massacre at Glencoe, 803.

Owen Glendour, a Welsh Rebel, 160. He perishes for Hunger, 162.

Duke of Glocester made Protector to Henry VI. 180. Marries another Man's Wife, 182. He is murdered privately, 188.

Glocester besieged by King Charles I. 482. Relieved by the Earl of Essex, 483.

Henry Duke of Glocester, Brother to King Charles dies, 621.

Duke of Glocester, Son to the Princess Anne of Denmark, dies, 823.

Sir Edmond Godfrey murdered, 688.

Earl Godwyn's Cruelty to Prince Alfred, 17. His Death, 18.

Greenwich Hospital erected, 828.

Gregg's Treason, 871. He is executed for it, 874.

Gresham College founded, 396.

Gunpowder Treason, 406, 407.

Guns first used, 122.

H.

HACKET, a Blasphemer, in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, 379.

Richard Haidock preaches in his Sleep, 405.

Mr. Hamden opposes Ship-Money, 447. He is slain in Chalgrave-Field, 481.

The Marquess of Hamilton sent into Germany to aid the King of Sweden, 441. His Acts in Germany, 442. He returns, 443.

Hardknute the third Danish King in England, 18.

Mr. Harley stabbed by Guiscard, 889. He is made Earl of Oxford, ibid.

Harold Harefoot, second Danish King in England, 18.

Harold, second English King after the Danes, 19. He is slain, 23.

Lord Hastings, a great Intimate of the Duke of Glocester, 210. He is beheaded by him, 223.

Hengist and Horsa, Saxons, first invade Britain, 3.

Henry I. King of England crowned, 38. His Troubles with his Brother Robert, 39. He encounters the French King, 40. He falls out with Archbishop Anselm, 41. His Children cast away at Sea, 42. His Wives and Issue, 43, 44. His Personage, &c. 44. His Death and Burial, 45.

Henry II. King of England crowned, 52. The great Extent of his Dominions, ib. Repells the King of Scots, 53. Crowns his Son King with himself, ibid. His Sons join against him, and demand of him to resign the Kingdom, 54. A Reconciliation made, 55. He conquers Ireland, 56. His Contention with Becket, 57. He does Penance for the Murder of Becket, 58. His Wife and Children, 59. His Personage, &c. 60. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Henry III. King of England crowned, 77. A second Time, 78. Holds a Parliament, ibid. He takes the Government upon himself, ibid. Falls out with his Barons, 79. Journeys into France, ibid. Encourages Strangers, ibid. He marries, ibid. The Lords confederate against him, 80. They confederate again, ibid. He is in Danger of being killed, 81. He is denied a Subsidy by the Parliament, ibid. His ill Ways to raise Money, 82. He undertakes the Cross, 83. He at last agrees with his Parliament, and confirms the Charters with great Solemnity, ibid. His vast Expences, 84. He falls out with his Barons, 85. He is forced to send away all Strangers, 86. He makes Peace with the Barons, ibid. He is taken Prisoner at the Battle of Lewes, 87. He is set free, ibid. He finally prevails over the Barons, 88. His Wives and Children, 90. His Personage, &c. 91. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Henry Duke of Hereford lands at Ravensthorpe in Yorkshire, 150. Crowned King of England by the Name of Henry IV. 157. The Lords conspire against him, 159. He disperses them, ibid. He is attacked by the Welsh and the Scots, 160. Another Conspiracy against him, 161. A third Conspiracy against him, which is defeated, 162. His Wives and Children, 165. His Personage, &c. ibid. His Death and Burial, 166.

Henry, Son of Henry IV. his disorderly Courses, 163. Crowned King of England by the Name of Henry V. 169. His good Conduct, ibid. Sends to claim the Crown of France, ibid. A Conspiracy against him, 170. He enters France, and wins the Battle of Agincourt, 170, 171. He returns to England, 171. He goes to France again, and takes Cas in Normandy, 172. He besieges and takes Roan, 173, 174. He marries the Lady Katharine, the French King's Daughter, and is made Regent of France, 175. He returns to England, ibid. He goes again into France, where he dies, 176. His Wife and Issue, 178. His Personage, &c. ibid. His Death and Burial, 179.

Henry VI. King of England proclaimed at Paris King of England and France, 180. Knighted at four Years old, 182. Crowned King of England, 183. and King of France, 184. He marries the Daughter of the Duke of Anjou, titular King of Sicily and Naples, 187. He goes against the Rebels under Jack Cade, but retires soon after to Killingworth Castle, 191. He is defeated by the Duke of York, and wounded wounded at the Battle of St. Albans, 194. Accommodates Matters with the Duke of York, ibid. He takes the Field a second Time against him, and obliges him to fly to Ireland, 195. He is defeated by King Edward IV. and forced to fly to Scotland, 203, 204. He enters England, but is again defeated, ibid. He is taken in Disguise, and committed to the Tower, 205. He is restored to the Crown by the Earl of Warwick, 209. His prophetic Speech of King Henry VII. ibid. He is again made Prisoner, 210. He is murdered, 212. His Wife and Issue, 199. His Death, Burial, Personage, &c. 200.

Henry Earl of Richmond, the Prophecy of him when but ten Years old, by Henry VI. 209. He flies to Britain, and is claimed by King Edward IV. but to no Purpose, 213. He is delivered at last, but makes his Escape, 215. He begins his Attempt for the Crown of England, being aided by the Duke of Britain and the King of France, 230. He is in great Danger of being betrayed, 231. He sets Sail for England, and lands at Milford Haven, 232. Wins the Crown of England at the Battle of Bosworth, 233.

Henry VII. King of England crowned, 236. He marries the Lady Elizabeth, 237. He disperses a Rebellion under the Lord Lovel, ibid. He defeats the Rebellion under Lambert Symnel, and takes him Prisoner, 238. He makes a Truce with the Scots, ibid. He sends an Army to help the Duke of Britain against France, 239. He assists the Emperor against the French, 240. He makes Peace with France, 241. His Proceedings on the Appearance of Perkin Warbeck, 242. He marries his Daughter to the King of Scots, which produces the Union of the two Crowns, 246. His wife Observation thereupon, ibid. His Policy to get the Earl of Suffolk into his Hands, 247. His ill Arts to get Money, ibid. The great Treasure he heaped up, 248. He concludes a Marriage with the Duchess Dowager of Savoy, which is prevented by his Sickness, ibid. His Wife and Issue, 251. His Personage, &c. ibid. His Death and Burial, 252.

Henry VIII. King of England, he marries the Lady Katharine, the Relict of his Brother Arthur, 254. He is crowned, ibid. He enters on a War with France, 255. He is cheated by the King of Spain, 256. He enters France in Person, 258. He besieges Torouin, ibid. The Emperor Maximilian takes Pay of him, ibid. He defeats the French at the Battle of Spurs, 259. He takes Torouin and Tournay, ibid. The Pope gives him the Title of Christianissimus, 262. He concludes a Peace with France, ibid. He escapes a great Danger in Hawking, 264. He has an Interview with the King of France, 266. The Pope gives him the Title of Defender of the Faith for his Book against Luther, 268. He makes Peace with France, and becomes Arbitrator between the Emperor and the French King, 274. He breaks with the Emperor, 275. He endeavours to get a Divorce from Queen Katharine, 276. He is first called Supreme Head of the Church, 280. He marries Anne Bullen, 281. The Pope summons him to appear before a general Council, 282. He marries the Lady Jane Seymour, 284. He erects six new Bishopricks, 286. He marries the Lady Anne of Cleve, 287. He marries Katharine Howard, 288. He is proclaimed King of Ireland, 289. He sends an Army into Scotland, 290. He proposes to match his Son with the King of Scots his Daughter, ib. He marries the Lady Katharine Parr, 291. He sends over an Army to help the Emperor against the King of France, 292. He lays Siege to Boulogne, ibid. He makes Peace with France, 293. His Speech to his Parliament, ibid. His artful Dealing with the Lord Gray, 294. His Personage and Conditions, 299. His Death and Burial, ibid.

Prince Henry, Son of King James VI. of Scotland born, 381. He is made Prince of Wales, 410. His Death, 412.

Holland, Duke of Exeter, his strange Reverse of Fortune, 213.

Holy Maid of Kent, her Imposture, 282.

Sir John Hotham denies King Charles I. Entrance into Hull, 474. He and his Son beheaded, 493.

J.

Jamaica first conquer'd by the English, 555.

James I. King of Scots does Homage for Scotland, 181.

James III. of Scotland slain at Bannockbourn, 240.

James VI. King of Scots imprisoned by the Gowries, 360. He becomes King of England, by the Title of King James I. 401.

James I. King of Great Britain, 401. He comes into England, 402. He makes Peace with Spain, 405. A false Report that he was slain, 408. He is made free of the Cloth-workers, 409. He erects the Order of Baronets, 413. He makes a Journey to Scotland, 414. He makes a Progress to Cambridge, 415. He presides at the Conference at Hampton Court, 418. He causes Vorstius to be expelled, 419. His Wife and Children, 426. His Personage and Conditions, ibid. His Death and Burial, 427.

James Duke of York, Brother to King Charles II. abjures the Protestant Religion, 656. The Part he had in two Sea-Fights, 635, 663. He is married to the Princess of Modena, 670. He retires beyond Sea, 695. He is presented as a Recusant, 704. The Succession of the Crown of Scotland settled on him, 711. His great Escape at Sea, 712. Lives in full Power to the End of King Charles's Reign, ibid. He succeeds to the Crown at his Brother's Death, 725.

James II. King of Great Britain, his excellent Declaration, 725. Goes to Mals, ib. The Warnings that came to him, ibid. His Conduct acceptable, 726. His Greatness after the Suppression of Monmouth's Rebellion, and the fatal Consequence it had upon him, 732. He dispenses with the Tests, ibid. His Answer to the Commons, who address him against it, 733. He prorogues them, ibid. His Conduct in Scotland and Ireland, ibid. He closets the Members of Parliament, but in vain, 734. He assumes a dispensing Power, and breaks through all the Laws against Popery, ibid. He courts the Dissenters, ibid. He attempts to make Converts among his Courtiers, 737. He sends an Ambassador to Rome, who is ill received, ibid. He puts out a Proclamation to suspend the Laws against Dissenters and Papists, 738. He dissolves the Parliament, and makes a Progress to model the new Elections, 739. His Treatment of the Fellows of Magdalen College, ibid. He seeks to engage the Prince and Princess of Orange in the Repeal of the Penal Laws and Tests, but in vain, 742. He issues out a second Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, 743. His Queen delivered of a Son, and the Suspicions thereon, 746. He tries to engage the Army to repeal the Penal Laws and Tests, but in vain, 747. The French King offers him Succours against the Prince of Orange, which he refuses, 749, 750. He asks Advice of the Bishops, upon News of the Prince of Orange's Design, 750. He makes several Concessions, 751. His other Preparations, ibid. Depositions relating to the Birth of the Prince of Wales, 752. His ill Conduct with Respect to the Prince of Orange's Invasion, 755. He comes to Salisbury, where his Army forsakes him, who are followed by the whole Kingdom, 756. He sends Commissioners to the Prince, 758. Goes away the same Night he receives the Answer, ibid. He is stopped at Feverham, and returns to London, 760. He receives a Message from the Prince of Orange to leave Whitehall, upon which he goes to Rochester, and soon after to France, 761. He lands in Ireland, 775. He meets his Irish Parliament, 778. Their bloody Act of Attainder, ibid. He retires again to France, 782. An Attempt made in his Favour, which proves unsuccessful, 789, 790. Another of the same, 810. His Personage and Conditions, 768. His Death, 828.

St. James's House and Park first built and laid out, 297.

Lady Jane Seymour, Queen to Henry VIII. dies in Childbed of Prince Edward, 285.

Lady Jane Dudley, proclaimed Queen, 314. She is condemned to die, 317. She is beheaded, 320.

Jefferies and Kirk, their Cruelties in the West, 731.

Jews first come into England, 27.

Jews killed at Richard I's Coronation, 62.

Jews slain in divers Places, 65.

Jews banished by Edward I. 100.

Images taken down and suppressed, 236.

The Rise of the Independents, 503.

Insurrection under Wat Tyler, 138. under

Jack Straw and others, 139. under Blue- beard, 189. under Jack Cade, 190. under

John a-Chamber, 239. In Cornwall, under

Thomas Flamock and Michael Joseph, 243.

In London against Strangers, 264. on Account of Innovations in Religion, 285.

In the West on Account of Religion and other Matters, 304. under Ket the Nor- folk Tanner, 305. In Yorkshire, 306. under the Earls of Northumberland and West- morland, 341. under Leonard Dacres, ib.

Against Inclosures, 409. In Behalf of King Charles I. when under Restraint,

510, 511. under Colonel Penruddock, 553.

of the Fifth-Monarchy Men, 623. of

Pentland Hills in Scotland, 644. of Bor-

well Bridge in Scotland, 698. of the French Protestants in the Cevennes, 844.

Interdict, the Kingdom under one for six Years, 73.

An Invasion attempted from France in Favour of the Pretender, 872. Unsuccessful, 873. An Invasion attempted from Spain, 911.

John, King of England crowned, 68. His Contest with Prince Arthur, 68, 69. The King of Scots does Homage to him, 69.

He makes Peace with France upon dis-honourable Conditions, ibid. He divorces his Wife, ibid. Guilty of great Cruelties, ibid. He loses all Normandy, 70. A Device of his to get Money, ibid. His Acts in France, 71. He reduces Ireland and

Wales, ibid. His Army defeated by the French, ibid. He falls out with his Lords, ibid. They take up Arms, 72. He overcomes them, ibid. He surrenders his Crown to the Pope's Legate, 73. His Wives and Children, 74. His Personage and Conditions, 75. His Death and Eu-rial, ibid.

John King of France taken Prisoner at the Battle of Poitiers, 123. He is brought over to England, 124. He is released, 125.

John of Gaunt, fourth Son of Edward III.

132. He favours Wickliffe, 129. His Breach with the Londoners, 130.

Ireland conquered by King Henry II. 56.
Affairs of Ireland in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, 355, 365, 378, 386, 387, 393.
All the Judges banished, 146.

K.

Katharine of Spain, Queen to Henry VIII. cited to justify her Marriage with him, 276. Her Answer, ibid. She appeals to the Pope, ibid. Upon her standing to her Appeal she is confined, 281. She is divorced from him by Act of Parliament, ibid. Her Death, 283.
Katharine Howard married to King Henry VIII. 288. She is beheaded for Incontinence, 289.
Katharine Parr, married to King Henry VIII. 291. Her narrow Escape, ibid.
Katharine of Portugal married to King Charles II. 629. She has two Miscarriages, 638, 650.
Kingdom of Kent, with the Kings thereof, 5.
Three Kings slain in one Battle in Africa 354.
Sir Edward Knevet sentenced to have his Right Hand cut off for striking a Person in the King's Court, 288. The Ceremonies used upon that Occasion, ibid. The King pardons him, ibid.
Knights Templars imprisoned, 113.
Knights of the Hare, 118.

L.

Lambert's Intrigues against the Rump-Parliament, 576. He dissolves them by Force, 579. He escapes out of the Tower, but is retaken, 608. He is tried for High Treason, and convicted, but pardoned, 630. He is charged by Oates with being concern'd in the Popish Plot, 690.
Archbishop Laud's House beset, 458. He is beheaded, 494.
Laws made by Ina, King of the West Saxons, 6.
Legate from Rome first came to England, 41.
Earl of Leicester his first Rise, 333. He is sent General of the Queen's Forces into Holland, 366. His Acts there, ibid. Called home, 373. His Death, 376.
Leighton writes a Book against the Bishops, called Zion's Plea, and is severely punished by the Star-Chamber, 441.
Leolin Prince of Wales rebels against Edward I. 95. Overthrows the English, ib. He is slain in Battle, 96.
The Levellers, their Rise, 527. Suppressed by Cromwell, ibid.
Lewis, Son of the King of France, sent for into England by the Barons against King John, 72. He leaves England, 78.
Lewis XIV. of France invades Flanders, 648. Seizes Lorrain, 654. Declares War against Holland, 660. His surprizing Success, 661. He sets his Grandson on the Throne of Spain, and seizes the Spanish Netherlands, 824.
Liturgy of the Church of England first established, 312. Restored, and some Additions made to it, 629.
Lollards, Disciples of Wickliffe, 129.
Bishop of London ordered to suspend Dr. Sharp, which he refuses to do, 735. He is suspended, 736.
The Siege of Londonderry in Ireland, 775, 776, 777.
Lopez executed for High Treason against Queen Elizabeth, 381.

M.

Madame, Sister to King Charles II. visits her Brother, 653. Her Negotiations with him, ibid. Dies soon after, ibid.
The Affair of Magdalen College in Oxford, 739, 740.

Malgo Conanus, King of Britain, 4.
Malcolm King of Scots slain in Battle, 33.
Isle of Man conquered by the Earl of Salisbury, 117.
Earl of Marlborough takes Cork and Kinsale in Ireland, 784. His Lady a Favourite of Queen Anne, 833. He is made Captain-General, ibid. His Success at first, 835. He is made a Duke, 837. His March into Germany, 846. He first meets with Prince Eugene, ibid. He projects an Invasion of France by the Way of the Moselle, 853. He is disappointed by the Fault of the Germans, 854. He forces the French Lines, 855. He is made Prince of Mindelheim, ibid. His Danger at the Battle of Ramelies, 861. He is sent to the King of Sweden, 868. He falls ill of a Fever, 874. He resigns all his Duchesses Places, 888. He is disgraced, 892.

The Lady Mary claims the Crown upon the Death of King Edward VI. 314. She is proclaimed Queen, 315.

Mary I. Queen of England, she restores the deprived Bishops, 316. She is crowned 317. She concludes a Marriage with Philip Prince of Spain, 318. Her Marriage solemnized, 321. She is reported to be with Child, but falsely, 322. She gives up all the Abbey Lands she was possessed of, ibid. Her Personage, &c. 326. Her Death and Burial, ibid.

Mary II. Queen of Great Britain, her heroic Sentiments, 767. Her prudent Conduct in King William's Absence, 784, 789. Her Charity to the Vaudois, 792. Her Sickness and Death, 797. Her Personage and Conditions, 829, 830.

Mary Queen of Scots conveyed to France, 304. She marries the Dauphin of France, 324. She passes into Scotland, 331. She marries the Lord Darnley, 334. After his Death the Earl of Bothwell, 336. She is imprisoned, and obliged to resign the Crown, 337. She comes into England, 338. She is sentenced to be beheaded, 369. Intercession made for her Life, 370. The Sentence executed, 371, 372.

Massacre of the Danes, 13.
Massacre of the Protestants in France, 347.
Master of the Ceremonies first appointed, 403.

Maud the Empress, Daughter of King Henry I. born, 43. The Nobility swear Allegiance to her, 44. She comes into England, 47. Her Acts and Adventures, 48. Meeting-Houses pulled down, 884, 903.
Kingdom and Kings of Mercia, 7.
Two Millions raised in three Days, 817. In four Hours, 878.

Minorca taken by the British Fleet under Queen Anne, 876.

A Mine within a Rock, the Effect of it, 881.

General Monk enters into a Treaty with Lambert, 585. Negotiations that passed between them, ibid. to 592. He promises to restore the Parliament, 589. He marches into England, 593. He comes to London, 596. Pulls down the City Gates, 597. Declares for a Free Parliament, 599. Sends Sir John Greenvil to the King, 604. Made Duke of Albemarle, 617. He attacks the Dutch at a great Disadvantage, 639. His Saying concerning the Corruptions of the Court, 646. His Death, 652.

Duke of Monmouth first appears, 656. The Duke of York grows jealous of him, 696. He begins to entertain high Thoughts, 697. He is disgraced, 701. He appears at Court again unexpectedly, but is soon banished, 719. He lands in England, 728. His great Success at first, 729. He attacks the King's Forces in the Night, but is defeated, 729. He is taken and beheaded, 730.

Montrose's Success in Scotland, 492. His last Attempt in which he was taken, 530. He is barbarously put to Death, 532.

Moorfields in London planted, 413.

Sir Thomas More made Chancellor, 279. He is beheaded, 282.

Roger Mortimer, the Queen of Edward II. falls in Love with him, 111. He is apprehended and executed, 117.

Simon Mountford, Earl of Leicester gives King Henry III. the Lie to his Face, 84. He is slain at the Battle of Evesham, 87.

Bishop of Munster makes War with the Dutch, 637. He concludes a Peace with them, 638.

Murder of Mr. Thynne, 711.

Muscovy Company first set up, 338.

The Muscovite Ambassador arrested, 877.

N.

JAMES Naylor, Champion of the Quakers, 558.

New-Forest in Hampshire made by William the Conqueror, 27.

New-River Water brought to London, 413.

The Dukes of Norfolk and Hereford accuse each other, 149. They are banished, 150.

The Duke of Norfolk proposes to marry the Queen of Scots, 340. He is committed to the Tower, 344. He is tryed and executed, 346.

The Earl of Northampton slain fighting for King Charles I. 480.

Kingdom and Kings of Northumberland, 7.

The Duke of Northumberland beheaded for Treason against Queen Mary, 316.

The Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland raise a Rebellion in the North against Queen Elizabeth, 344.

O.

TITUS Oates first appears, and his Informations, 687, 689, 690. He accuses the Queen, 692. He is convicted of Perjury, severely whipped, and imprisoned for Life, 726. He applies to the House of Lords after the Revolution, 779. He is set at Liberty, and a Pension allowed him, ibid.

An Oath with an &c. in it, 517.

Occasional Conformity Bill, 838. It is thrown out by the Lords, ibid. It passes the Commons, and is thrown out by the Lords a second Time, 845. Brought into the House of Commons a third Time, and proposed to be tacked to the Land-Tax Bill, which is rejected, 851. It passes the Commons, but is again thrown out by the Lords, ibid. It is brought in by the Lords under a different Title, and passes both Houses, 892.

Sir John Oldcastle burnt, 177.

The Duke of Ormond taken Prisoner at the Battle of Landen, 795. His Acts at Vigo, 836. He is made General in Flanders, 894.

Sir Thomas Overbury poisoned, 411.

P.

THE Palatine of the Rhine comes into England, and marries the Lady Elizabeth, Daughter of King James I. 412.

The Palatines come over into England, 581.

The City of Paris drives away the English, 185.

Court of Parliament first instituted, 40.

A Parliament without any Clergymen in it, 95.

A Parliament called the Good Parliament, 127.

A Par-

A Parliament that wrought Wonders, 145. They send all the Judges but one to the Tower, ibid.

A Parliament confers its whole Authority on certain Persons, 149.

A Parliament under King Henry VIII. complains of the Clergy, 277. The Commons draw up three Bills against them, 278. The Commons complain of the Bishop of Rochester, ibid. The Parliament forbids Annates to be paid to the Pope, or Appeals to be made to Rome, 279. The Commons accept the King's Pardon, 280. The Parliament abolishes the Pope's Authority in England, 282. The Proceedings of the Commons upon a Member's being arrested, 289.

First Parliament under King Charles I. meets, 428. The Commons prepare a Remonstrance of Grievances, upon which the Parliament is dissolved, 429.

Second Parliament meets, 430. The Commons refuse the King a Supply, upon which he speaks sharply to them, 432. Dissolved, 433.

Third Parliament meets, 436. The Commons complain of illegal Imprisonments, Martial Law, and other Grievances, and present the Petition of Right to the King, and a Remonstrance against the Duke of Buckingham, ibid. The Commons lock the Door of their House, and refuse to admit the Black-Rod, 438. The Parliament dissolved, ibid.

Long Parliament under King Charles I. meets, 461. They vote against Ship-Money, and pass a Bill for Triennial Parliaments, 462, 463. Their Protestation, 465, 466. Pass a Bill for Continuance of the Parliament, 466. They pass a Bill to put down the Star-Chamber, and High Commission Court, 468. They send nineteen Propositions to the King, 474. They raise an Army under the Earl of Essex, 475. They send Propositions to the King at Hampton-Court, 506.

Rump Parliament pass an Act against Kingly Government, 523. They declare the House of Peers useless, 524. They begin a War with Holland, 544. They are forcibly turned out by Cromwell, 549. They are restored by the Army, 570. Dissolved by Lambert, 579. Restored a second Time, 592.

Convention Parliament summoned, 604. They recall the King, 612. Their Character, 618. They pass the Act of Indemnity, 619. Dissolved, 622.

Long Parliament under King Charles II. meets, 625. They pass a new Act of Oblivion, 626. They oppose the Declaration of Indulgence, 631. They repeal the Triennial Act, 633. Pass a severe Law against Conventicles, ibid. Kept prorogued for two Years, 656. They meet again, 665. The Commons vote the Declaration of Indulgence to be against Law, ibid. They pass the Test-Act, 667. They oppose the Duke of York's Marriage with a Papist, 670. A great Debate in the House of Lords about an Oath to confirm the Doctrine of Non-Resistance, 674. It is quashed by a fierce Contention between the two Houses, 675, 676. That Dispute revived, 677. The Commons address the King to protect Flinders, which produces a long Fencing between the King and the House, 679 to 684. Oates's Informations about the Popish Plot brought before the Commons, 689. The Commons attack the Earl of Danby, 693. They are dissolved, 695.

Second Parliament in King Charles II. Reign meets, 696. A Dispute about the Choice of a Speaker, ibid. They fall upon the Earl of Danby, ibid. He pleads the King's Pardon, which causes a Difference between the two Houses, 698. A Bill brought into the House of Commons to exclude the Duke of York from the Crown, ibid. They are dissolved, 700.

Third Parliament in that Reign meets, 705. The Commons pass the Exclusion Bill, which is thrown out by the Lords, 705. The Commons address the King to consent to the Exclusion, which he refuses, 706. They go into violent Heats, ibid. The Parliament dissolved, 707.

Fourth Parliament meets at Oxford, 708. The Commons bring in the Exclusion-Bill, upon which the King dissolves them, ibid.

King James II's Parliament meets, 727. Their Loyalty to him, ibid. and 729. The Alarm they were under about the King's Speech, 732. The Commons address the King about dispensing with the Tests, 733. Dissolved, 739.

Convention Parliament summoned by the Prince of Orange, 762. They meet, 763. The Commons declare the Throne vacant, 764. The Lords disagree to it, but at last yield, 765. They declare the Prince and Princess of Orange King and Queen, 766. They pass a Bill to turn the Convention into a Parliament, 770. The Lords reverse several Attainders, 778. A Difference between the two Houses about Titus Oates, 779. Dissolved, 781.

Second Parliament in King William's Reign meets, 781. They make an Enquiry into Bribery, 799 to 802. The Commons impeach the Duke of Leeds, 802. Dissolved, 806.

Third Parliament meets, 806. Pass a Bill for regulating Tryals in Cases of High-Treason, ibid. Their Debates about restoring the Silver Coin, and the Methods taken to that End, ibid. They address against the Scotch East India Company; and the Commons impeach some who were concerned in it, 809. The Commons address against a Grant made to the Earl of Portland, ibid. They enter into an Association on Account of the Assassination-Plot, 811. They make a severe Law against Nonjurors, ibid. Their Debates about a Standing Army, 815, 816, 817. They agree to have the Army disbanded, 817. The Commons prosecute Smugglers, and false Endorsers of Exchequer Bills, 817, 818. Dissolved, 818.

Fourth Parliament meets, 820. They prove very thwarting to the King, ibid. The Commons enquire into the Disposal of the Irish forfeited Estates, 821. They pass a Bill for applying those Estates to the publick Use, which causes a Difference between the King and them, 822. Dissolved, 825.

Fifth Parliament meets, 825. The Commons fall upon the Partition Treaty, ibid. They impeach the Lords Portland, Somers, Orford and Halifax, 826. Difference thereupon between the two Houses, ibid. The Lords dismiss the Impeachments, 827. The Parliament passes an Act for settling the Succession in the House of Hanover, ibid. Dissolved, 828.

Sixth Parliament meets, but do nothing before the King's Death, 828. They are continued by Queen Anne, but do little the first Session, 834. Dissolved, 837.

First Parliament in Queen Anne's Reign meets, 837. The Commons oppose a Grant of five Thousand Pounds per Ann. to the Duke of Marlborough, ibid. A Bill to prevent Occasional Conformity passes the Commons, but is thrown out by the Lords, 838. A Difference between the two Houses, ibid. A Plot in Scotland examined by the House of Lords, which occasions a Difference between the two Houses, 845. Another Difference about Elections in the House of Commons, ib. Occasional Conformity Bill proposed to be tacked to the Land-Tax Bill, 851. The two Houses uneasy at the Scotch Act of Security, 852. The Queen and Parliament give the Honour and Mannour of Woodstock to the Duke of Marlborough, 852. A new Dispute between the two Houses about Elections, 852. Dissolved, 853.

Second Parliament meets, 858. Both Houses vote that the Church was not in Danger, 859. They give five Thousand Pounds per Ann. for ever to the Duke of Marlborough, 866. They become with the Addition of the Scotch Members the first Parliament of Great Britain, 870. A Debate in the House of Lords about carrying on the War in Flanders, 871. Dissolved, 874.

Third Parliament of the Queen, and second of Great Britain meets, 877. They address the Queen about a second Marriage, 878. The Commons impeach Dr. Sacheverell, 882. He is found guilty by the House of Lords, 883. Dissolved, 884.

Fourth Parliament meets, 888. The Lords thwarting to the Ministry, 892. The Commons censure the Duke of Marlborough, 893. Dissolved, 897.

Fifth Parliament meets, 898. Their Proceedings, ibid.

First Parliament in King George's Reign meets, 903. They impeach the Lord Bolingbroke, the Earl of Oxford, the Duke of Ormond, and the Earl of Strafford, ibid. They impeach the Lords taken at Presford of High-Treason, 906. They pass the Septennial Act, 907. The Earl of Oxford petitions the Lords for a Tryal, 908. The two Houses differ about him, upon which he is discharged, 909. The Commons commit Mr. Shippen to the Tower, ibid. The Peerage Bill passes the House of Lords, but is rejected by the Commons, 911. It is recommended from the Throne, and passes the Lords, but is again rejected by the Commons, ibid. The Proceedings against the South-Sea Directors, and others, 913, 914, 915. Dissolved, 915.

Second Parliament under King George I. meets, 915. Pass a Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, ibid. Report of the Committee of the House of Commons about a Plot, 916. Bills of Pains and Penalties passed against the Bishop of Rochester, George Kelly, and John Plunket, ibid. The Commons enter upon the Conduct of the Masters in Chancery, and impeach the Earl of Macclesfield of High Crimes and Misdemeanours, ibid.

Thomas Parr, a long Liver, 447.

William Parry executed for Treason against Queen Elizabeth, 364.

Parsons and Campion, two Jesuits, come into England, 356.

Parties of Whig and Tory, the Rise of those Names, 703.

Party of Trimmers, 709.

Passive Obedience first set on foot, 628. Revived, 711.

The Creation of twelve new Peers at once, 893.

Pembrokeshire given to some Flemings for their Habitation, 43.

Perkin Warbeck first appears, 241. He is entertained by the King of France, and the Dukes of Burgundy, 242. He endeavours to land in Kent, but is repulsed, 243. He is received by the King of Scots, who enters England in his Behalf, ibid. He lands in Cornwall, is defeated, takes Sanctuary, surrenders himself, and is committed to the Tower, 244. He escapes from thence, but is taken and hanged, 245.

 A dreadful Pestilence, 131.
 The Earl of Peterborough takes Fort Monjuich and Barcelona, 856, 857. His other Successes, 858, 862. He is removed, 868.
Philip, Prince of Spain, comes to England, and marries Queen Mary, 321. He goes to Flanders, 322.
Philippa Queen to Edward III. defeats the Scots, and takes their King Prisoner, 121.
John Philpot sets out a Fleet at his own Expence against the Scots, 137.
Alice Pierce, Concubine to King Edward III. 127.
 The Plague in 1665, 637.
 Plantations in America, 424, 425.
 The Popish Plot breaks out, 686. Tongue's Informations, ibid. Oates's Informations, 687, 689, 690. Bedloe's Informations, 690, 691. Oates and Bedloe accuse the Queen, 692. Prance's Informations about the Murder of Sir Edmund Bury Godfrey, 694, 695. Dugdale's Informations, 699.
 The Meal-Tub Plot, 701.
Fitz-Harris's Plot, 707.
 Rye-House Plot, 714, 715.
 Sham Plot fathered upon the Bishop of Rockester, 792.
 The Lancashire Plot, 798.
 The Assassination Plot, 809, 810.
 The Scotch Plot in Queen Anne's Time, 845.
 The Screw Plot, 888.
 Cardinal Pool comes into England, 321. He passes Absolution on the Kingdom of England, 322. He is made Archbishop of Canterbury, 323.
 Two Popes set up against each other, 35, 38, 153.
 The Pope sends over three hundred Romans to be beneficed in England, 81.
 The Pope releases Edward I. of his Covenant with his Subjects, 99.
 The Pope's Legate assaulted at Oxford, 89.
 Prices of Things in King John's Time, 75.
 Protestation of the Bishops to the King and House of Lords, for which they are committed to the Tower, 472.
French Prophets in London, 871.
Prynne, Bastwick and Burton censured, 447.
La Pucelle appears in France, 183. Her Actions, ibid. She is burnt for a Witch, 184.

Q.

AN Attempt on Quebec unsuccessful, 890.

R.

SIR Walter Raleigh takes a great Spanish Ship, 380. He is questioned by Essex for landing at Fayal without his Leave, 385. His Plot under King James I. 403. He is tried and imprisoned, 404. He is set at Liberty to go to Guiana, 414. He is beheaded at his Return, 415.
Alderman Read, for refusing to pay an Assessment, is sent a Soldier into Scotland, where he is taken Prisoner, 293.
Reading lost by King Charles I. 480.
 Rebellion and Massacre in Ireland, 469.
 Rebellion in Scotland and England against King George I. 903, 904, 905, 906.
 The Reformation begins, 284. Established, 395.
 Regicides tried and executed, 620, 629.
 Religious Houses of three hundred Marks per Ann. and under, surrendered to King

Henry VIII. 283. All in general suppressed, 286.
Richard I. King of England, crowned, 61. His first Acts, 62. He goes to the Holy Land, 63. He takes Messina, and subdues Cyprus, ibid. Falls out with Leopold Duke of Austria, ibid. His Acts in the Holy Land, ibid. He is made Prisoner by Duke Leopold, 64. He returns to England, ibid. His Acts after his Return, 65. Wounded at the Siege of a Castle, 66. His Wife and Children, 67. His Personage, &c. ibid. His Death and Burial, ibid.
Richard II. King of England, crowned, 136. Occurrences afterwards, 137. A remarkable Instance of his Courage at the Insurrection under Wat Tyler, 139. He enters Scotland with an Army, 141. He takes the Government upon himself, 142. Differs with his Parliament, ibid. Undoes all they had done, 143. He propounds Questions to the Judges, tending to subvert the Authority of Parliaments, ibid. Falls into arbitrary Measures, 144. The Lords come to him with an Army, and threaten to chuse a new King, upon which he does what they require, 145. He seizes the Liberties of the City, but restores them for ten thousand Pounds, 147. He goes to Ireland, ibid. Has an Interview with the King of France, ibid. He seizes the Duke of Gloucester, and imprisons other Lords, 148. He summons a Parliament, which is very submissive, ibid. His Misfortunes begin, 150. He flies too long in Ireland, 151. He comes over, and finds his Kingdom in his Enemies Hands, ibid. He is taken and imprisoned, ibid. He is brought to London, 152. Articles presented against him in Parliament, ibid. He resigns the Crown, ibid. His Wives, 154. His Personage, &c. ibid. His Death and Burial, 155.
Richard Duke of Gloucester kills Henry VI. 212. He kills the Duke of Clarence, 215. His wicked Arts to get King Edward V. into his Hands, 220. He is appointed Protector, 221. Orders Lord Hastings to be beheaded, 223. Usurps the Crown, 225.
Richard III. King of England crowned, 226. He sends Sir James Tyrrel to murder King Edward V. and his Brother, 227. His Terrors of Conscience afterwards, ibid. He falls out with the Duke of Buckingham, 228. He seeks to marry King Edward's Daughter, 231. To which End he rids himself of his present Wife, 232. His Acts at the Battle of Bosworth, in which he is slain, 232, 233. His Wife and Issue, 233. His Personage, &c. ibid. His Death and Burial, 234.
Ridley, Bishop of London, burnt in Queen Mary's Time, 323.
David Rizio killed in the Presence of the Queen of Scots, 336.
Robert, eldest Son of William the Conqueror, loses the Crown of England by his Absence, 32. Refuses the Kingdom of Jerusalem, 36. Loses the Crown of England a second Time, 38. Is taken by his Brother Henry, who puts out his Eyes, 39. His Death, 40.
Robin Hood and Little John, 65.
Rome sacked by the Imperialists, 275.
Rosamund, Concubine of King Henry II. 59.
Lord Ruffel withdraws from the Privy-Council, 703. He is apprehended for the Rye-House Plot, 715. His Character, ibid. He is tried and condemned, 716. His Behaviour under Sentence, 717.

R. Sacheverell's Sermon at St. Paul's, and its Consequences, 882 to 884.
 Earl of Salisbury defeats the French, 181.
 He is slain, 183.
San Joseph, an Italian, lands in Ireland, 356.
 Duke of Savoy his deep Dissimulation with King William III. and his Allies, 812.
Saxons enter Britain, 2. Their Idolatry, 3.
Saxon Heptarchy, the Kings thereof, 5, 6, 7.
 Elector of Saxony chosen King of Poland, 815.
 Lord Scalae defeats the French, 182. Taken by them, 183.
Scotland subdued by Edward I. 97.
 The Scots obtain great Advantages in England in the Time of Edward II. 108.
 The Scots defeated at Hallidown-Hill, 117.
 The Scots invade England under King David, 119.
Scottish Affairs in the Time of Queen Elizabeth, 330, 342, 343, 345, 348, 353, 354, 361, 364.
 The Beginning of the Commotions in Scotland about the Book of Common-Prayer, 447 to 452. They raise an Army, 452. They enter into a Treaty with the King, upon which a Pacification ensues, 453. They break their Agreement, and march into England, 459. They defeat the Lord Conway at Newburne, 459. They petition the King to call a Parliament, 460. They present their Demands, 462. Their Army disbanded, 468. They raise an Army to assist the Parliament, 485. Their Army marches into England, and their Acts there, 486. They enter England again in Behalf of the King in the Hands of the Parliament, 512. Their Commissioners treat with King Charles II. at Breda, 529. They proclaim him King, and raise an Army for him, 533. They enter England with the King at their Head, but are defeated at Worcester, 538, 539. They are subdued by Monk, 542.
 The Scotch Convention in 1688. meets, 773. They put the Kingdom in a Posture of Defence, and send Assistance into Ireland, 774. They declare the Throne vacant, and settle the Crown on King William and Queen Mary, ibid.
 A Scotch East-India and African Company erected, 808. Addressed against by the English Parliament, 809.
 The Scots send a Colony to Darien, but are obliged to abandon it, 821. Their Complaints and Discontents about that Affair, 823, 824.
 The Scotch Parliament continued by Queen Anne, 834. Breaks up, ibid.
 A new Scotch Parliament meets, 839. An Act for Toleration of the Episcopal Persuasion set on Foot, but opposed by the Scotch Kirk, 840. An Act for Security of the Kingdom passes the House, but is rejected by the Lord Commissioner, 840, 841. Violent Heats there, 841, 842. Adjourned, 842. They meet again, and an Act of Security is passed, 851. They pass an Act for a Treaty about an Union with England, 858.
 A Sea-Fight between the English and French, 256.
 A Sea-Fight near Dover, between the Spaniards and the Hollanders, 455.
 First Sea-Fight between the English and Dutch Common-wealths, 544.
 Second Sea-Fight near Phymouth, 545.
 Third Sea-Fight, ibid.
 Fourth Sea-Fight, 546.
 Fifth Sea-Fight, 547.
 Sixth Sea-Fight, 548.

The last Sea-Fight, 549.
 First Sea-Fight in the first Dutch War under King Charles II. 635.
 Another Sea-Fight of four Days, 639, 640.
 A third Sea-Fight, 640.
 The Sea-Fight in Sould-Bay, in the second Dutch War, 663.
 Another Sea-Fight, 668.
 Two other Sea-Fights, ibid. and 669.
 Sea-Fight in Bantry-Bay, 778.
 Another Sea-Fight, 783.
 A Sea-Fight off Cape Barfleur, 790.
 A Sea-Fight in the West-Indies, 839.
 A Sea-Fight with the Spaniards in the Mediterranean, 910.
 Lord Ashley, one of the Cabal in King Charles II's Reign made Earl of Shaftsbury, 658. He declares himself against the Court, 666. He is put into the Tower, 679. Discharged, 683. His seditious Intrigues and Practices, 697, 701, 702, 704. He is apprehended, 710. A Bill of High-Treason against him returned Ignominious, 711. He goes over to Holland, and dies there, 712.
 Dr. Sharp ordered to be suspended, 735.
 Dr. Shaw endeavours to persuade the Londoners to chuse the Duke of Gloucester King, 224.
 Sir Robert Shirley, Ambassador from the King of Persia, 412.
 Ship-Money set on Foot, 446. Voted against Law, 462.
 Jane Shore, a Concubine of Edward IV. 217. She is made to do Penance, 224.
 Sir Philip Sidney slain, 366.
 Siege of Namur under King William III. 803 to 805.
 Siege of Lisle, 875, 876.
 Siege of the Castle of Alicant, 870.
 Sindercomb plots to assassinate Cromwell, 558.
 Sigismund the Emperor comes into England, 172.
 Earl of Hartford, made Duke of Somerset, and Protector of King Edward VI. 302. He enters Scotland, ibid. He wins the Battle of Musselburgh, 303. He is accused and sent to the Tower, 307, 308. He is beheaded, 310.
 Sir Robert Carr made Earl of Somerset, 411. His Crime and Fall, ibid.
 Kingdom and Kings of the South Saxons, 5.
 South-Sea Company first thought of, 889.
 South-Sea Scheme agreed to by the Parliament, and its Consequences, 911, 912, 913.
 King of Spain bequeaths his Crown to the Duke of Anjou, 825.
 Two Spencers, Favourites of King Edward II. are banished, 110. Put to Death, 112.
 Spirit in the Wall, an Imposture so called, 321.
 Sports allowed on the Lord's Day, 516.
 Sir William Stanley accused of partaking with Perkin Warbeck and beheaded, 242.
 Statute of Mortmain enacted, 95.
 Stephen King of England crowned, 46. His Acts and Troubles at the Beginning of his Reign, 46, 47. He is taken Prisoner by Maud the Empress, 48. Set at Liberty, ibid. He makes an Agreement with Prince Henry her Son, 49. His Wife and Children, 51. His Personage and Conditions, ibid. His Death and Burial, ibid.
 Stews put down, 296.
 Storm in 1703. 897.
 Earl of Strafford impeached, 461. He is tried, 464. He is attainted by Bill, ibid. He is beheaded, 467.
 Straights Fleet lost, 793.
 Stukely, an English Fugitive, killed in Africa, 354.
 The Marquess of Suffolk, his Power under King Henry VI. 187, 188. He is made a Duke, 188. He is accused and imprisoned, but soon released, 189. He is beheaded at Sea, 190.
 Earl of Sunderland disgraced by King James, 752. His Apology, 753. He is made Lord Chamberlain, but soon resigns, 814.
 Earl of Surrey beheaded, 294.
 Sutton's Hospital founded, 420.
 Sweating Sickness, 237, 298.
 The Swedish Ambassador arrested by Order of King George I. 907.
 Swayne King of Denmark, his Invasion of England, 14.
 Lambert Symnel, his Imposture, 237. He is taken, and made a Turn-spit in the King's Kitchen, 238.

T.

LORD Talbot taken by the French, 183. His Acts afterwards, 186. He is slain in Battle, 193.
 Francis Throgmorton, executed for Treason against Queen Elizabeth, 362.
 Tir-Oen, or Tyrone, an Irish Rebel, first appears, 331. He is proclaimed Traytor, 379. He breaks out into open Rebellion, 387. He is defeated in Battle, 393. He submits, 394. He flies beyond Sea, 409.
 William Tindal, burnt for translating the Bible, 283.
 Tobacco first brought into England, 366.
 Toulon, the Attempt on it, 869.
 The Treaty of Bulloigne, 389.
 A Treaty at Oxford between King Charles I. and his Parliament ineffectual, 480.
 The Treaty of the Isle of Wight, 514.
 The Treaty at Breda begun, 644. Concluded, 646.
 The Treaty at Cologne, 669.
 The Treaty at Nimeguen begun, 667. Concluded, 685.
 The Treaty of Ryfwick, 814.
 The Treaty of Partition, the Design and Terms thereof, 819.
 The Treaty at the Hague, 878, 879.
 The Treaty at Gertruydenburgh, 884.
 The Treaty of Utrecht begun, 893. Concluded, 896.
 Sir Robert Tresilian Lord Chief Justice hanged, 146.
 Tryals by Juries, established by the Conqueror, 27.
 The Tryal of Staley, 691. of Coleman, 692. of Ireland, Pickering and Grove, 693. of Green, Berry and Hill, 695. of Reading, 697. of Five Jesuits, 699. of Langhorn, 700. of Sir George Wakeman, ibid. of the Lord Stafford, 705. of Plunket, 710. of Fitz-Harris, ibid. of Stephen Colledge, ibid. of Walcor, Hone, and the Lord Russel, 716. of Hambden, Braddon, Johnson, Barnardiston, Oates and Roswell, 720. of Oates for Perjury, 726. of Cornish, 731. of the Lord Delamere, 733. of the seven Bishops, 746. of Lord Preston and Mr. Ashton, 785. of those concerned in the Assassination Plot, 811. of James Shephard, 910. of Christopher Layer, 915.
 Owen Tudor, who had married King Henry V's Queen, beheaded, 197.
 Turkey Company set up, 355.
 The Earl of Tyrconnel made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by King James II. 734. His Dissimulation with the Prince of Orange, 763.

V.

SIR Henry Vane beheaded, 630.
 Prince Vaudemont's fine Retreat, 804.
 The Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge suspended, 738.
 Vigo, the Spanish Galleons taken and destroyed there, 836.
 Virginia planted, 412.

W.

Union with Scotland proposed by King Charles II. 651. Commissioners meet about it, but in vain, 652. Proposed by King William III. 773. Concluded in the Reign of Queen Anne, 865.
 The Universities attacked by the Romanists under King James II. 738.
 Voadicia, Queen of the Britains, her Acts against the Romans, and Death, 2.
 English Volunteers in the Low-Countries, 353.
 Vortigern King of Britain calls in the Saxons, 2.
 Vortimer King of Britain, 3.
 Vortiporus King of Britain, 4.
 Uter Pendragon, King of Britain, 4.
SIR William Wade's Embassy to the Queen of Scots, 362.
 William Walleys, a brave Scotchman, 97.
 Walworth, Lord Mayor of London, slays Wat Tyler, 138.
 Walsingham's Negotiations with the King of Scots, 360.
 The Earl of Warwick sent to Savoy to treat of a Match for King Edward IV. 205. Finding the King married in his Absence he grows discontented, 206. He conspires against King Edward, and raises a Commotion in Yorkshire, ibid. He surprises King Edward, and makes him Prisoner, 207. He is forced to fly to Calais, and thence to the King of France, 208. His Daughter married to Prince Edward, Son of Henry VI. ibid. He lands in Devonshire, ibid. He takes King Henry out of Prison, and sets him on the Throne, 209. He fights with King Edward at Barnet, and is there slain, 209, 210.
 The Welsh made tributary by King Athelstan, 10.
 Kingdom of West-Saxons begins, 5. The Kings thereof, 5, 6.
 William Wickham, Bishop of Winchester, made Lord Chancellor, 146. An Account of his Rise, 166.
 John Wickliffe preaches new Doctrines, 129. His Followers persecuted, 154, 177.
 William the Conqueror, his Birth and Succession to the Duchy of Normandy, 20. His Troubles when young, 21. His Life saved by a Fool, ibid. The Occasion of his invading England, ibid. He lands in England, and wins the Battle of Hastings, 22, 23. He is crowned King of England, 23. His Proceedings afterwards, 23, 24. Many Attempts against him, 24, 25. He subdues Wales, and makes the King of Scots do Homage to him, 26. His Wife and Children, 29. His Personage and Conditions, 30. His Death and Burial, ibid.
 William Rufus, King of England crowned, 32. His Brother Robert and others oppose him, but are quieted, ibid. He repels the Scots, 33. He conquers Wales, ibid. Oppresses the Clergy, ibid. His Magnanimity, 34. His Contention with Archbishop Anselm, ibid. He builds Westminster-Hall, 36. His Personage and Conditions, ibid. Slain in hunting in the New-Forest, 37.
 William, Prince of Orange comes into England, 655. He is made Stadtholder of the Republick of Holland, 662. He encourages the Dutch to hold out against France, ibid. He obliges the French to evacuate Holland, 669. He comes to England, and marries the Lady Mary, 681. He is applied to on Occasion of King James's Encroachments, 748. He sets Sail for England, 753. Lands at Torbay, 754. His Declaration, ibid. He is joined by great Numbers, 755. He marches towards London, 760. He sends Word to King

I N D E X

King James to retire to Hamp. 761. He comes to London, 762. He assembles the Lords, and a Body of the Commons, who desire him to take the Administration, and to summon a Convention, ib. He assembles the Peers and Gentlemen of Scotland, who desire him to do the same for that Kingdom, 763. Himself and the Princess declared King and Queen by the Convention, 766. They are proclaimed, 768.

William III. King of Great Britain, his first Acts, 769. He gives up the Duty of Chimney Money, 771. He is crowned, together with the Queen, 773. Proclaimed in Scotland on the same Day, 774. He declares War against France, 778. He goes over into Ireland, 781. He is wounded in the Shoulder by a Cannon Ball, ibid. His Danger in going to Holland, 785. He rejects the Bill for free Proceedings in Parliament, 796. He makes a Grant to the Earl of Portland, which is opposed by the Commons, 809. A Plot to assassinate him, 809, 810. He sends the Earl of Portland to France, 818. The French propose the Partition Treaty to him, which he accepts, 819. He mediates a Peace between the Emperor and the Turks, ibid. His Message to the Commons about his Regiment of Dutch Guards, 810. He gives an angry Answer to the Commons Address about the Irish forfeited Estates, 822. His Conduct after the Duke of Anjou was made King of Spain, 825, 826. He goes to Holland, 827. He returns, 828. Declines in his Health, ibid. He makes his last Speech to the Parliament, ibid. His Personage and Conditions, 829. His Death and Burial, 830.

Williams Bishop of Lincoln fined and imprisoned for Misdemeanors, 448.

Bishop of Winchester made a Cardinal, 182. He falls out with the Duke of Glocester, 187. His Death, 188.

Cardinal Wolsey, his Rise, 261. He first corrupts King Henry VIII. 262. He is made a Cardinal, 263. He makes Dukes and Earls attend him, 265. He procures the Ruine and Death of the Duke of Buckingham, 267. He is sent to mediate between the Emperor and the King of France, ibid. He seeks to be Pope, but in vain, 268. His Transactions with the Parliament, 270. He suppresses forty Monasteries for the erecting of two Colleges, 273. He goes to France, 275. He crosses the King's Divorce from Queen Katharine, and his Marriage with Anne Bullen, 277. He is disgraced and confined, ibid. He is accused of High Treason in Parliament, 278. He is commanded to go to his Diocese of Tork, 279. He is arrested, ibid. He falls sick and dies, 280. His prodigious Greatness, ibid. Whitehall Palace given by him to the Crown, ib. Wolves destroyed in England by King Edward, 11.

Sir Thomas Wyat's Rising, 318. He is taken and sent to the Tower, 319. He is beheaded, 320.

Y.

Y Eomen of the Guard appointed by King Henry VII. 237.

Duke of York made Regent of France, 185. He begins to aspire to the Crown of England, 188, 190. He complains of the Duke of Somerfet, and raises an Army, 192. He takes an Oath to King Henry VI. ibid. He takes up Arms again, and marches to London, 193. He fights the King at St. Albans, 194. He is made Protector of the Realm, ibid. A Trap laid for him, which he escapes, ibid. He takes the Field again, but is forced to fly to Ireland, 195. He is convicted of Treason in Parliament, 196. He returns, and is declared Heir to the Crown, ibid. He is slain, 197.

F I N I S.

